On Tuesday afternoon the Queen held a Court at Buckingham Palace. Count Schimmelpenninck, the Netherlands Minister, had an audience of the Queen to deliver his new credentials from his Sovereign. The Marquis de Sault, the Sardinian Minister, had an audience of her Majesty, to present a letter from his Sovereign on his accession. The Right Hon. Thomas Wyse, Her Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Greece, had his audience of leave. Viscount Palmerston and Lord J. Russell also had audiences of the Queen. Her Majesty was attended by Lord Byron, Lord in Waiting, and Col. Bouverie Hood, Groom in Waiting. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent came to town from Frogmore House, Windsor, and took luncheon with the Queen and Prince Albert. Her Royal Highness afterwards proceeded to Clarence House, St. James's. Prince Albert, attended by Lieut.-Colonel Seymour, honoured the Earl of Ellesmere with a visit in the course of the day, at his residence in Belgrave-square. The Queen had a dinner party in the evening, at Buckingham Palace. The company included his Royal Highness the Count of Syracuse, his Serene Highness Prince Ernest of Hesse Philippsthal, his Serene Highness Prince William of Hesse Philippsthal, &c.

Wednesday was the birth-day of her Royal Highness the Princess Alice, and of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent arrived early at Buckingham Palace. The Queen and Prince Albert went about eleven o'clock to Gloucester House, to pay a visit of congratulation to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, on the auspicious return of her natal day. Her Majesty held a juvenile party in the afternoon at Buckingham Palace. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager arrived at three o'clock, accompanied by their Serene Highnesses the Countess Erbach Schonberg, and the Princesses Amelia and Elise of Hohenlohe-Schillingsfurst. Her Majesty was received at the garden entrance by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, who conducted her Majesty to the drawingroom, where the Queen received her august visitor.

On Thursday, her Majesty held a Drawingroom at St. James's Palace.

VISIT OF THE PRINCESSES HOHENLOHE-SCHILLINGSFURST TO PORTSMOUTH.—These august relatives of the Queen Dowager left town on Monday morning, on a visit to see the lions of Portsmouth, attended by a small retinue. Their Serene Highnesses arrived at Portsmouth about half-past twelve, and were received without any ceremony of firing salutes, &c. The Port-Admiral and the Governor were in attendance upon them, and conducted them to the Sallyport, where the barge of the former was in waiting to receive and carry them on board the steam-yacht Fire Queen, which lay off the stairs. The Fire Queen conveyed by their Serene Highnesses the Countess Erbach Schonberg, and the Princesses Amelia and Elise of Hohenlohe-Schillingsfurst. Her Majesty was received at the garden entrance by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, who conducted her Majesty to the drawingroom, where the Queen received her august visitor.

ARRIVAL OF THE HEREDITARY GRAND DUKE AND DUCHESS OF MECKLENBURGH-STRELITZ.—Their Royal Highnesses the Hereditary Grand Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz arrived at the residence of the Duke of Cambridge, at Kew, on Monday night, from the Continent. Their Royal Highnesses were accompanied from Dover by the Duchess of Cambridge. On Tuesday afternoon their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and the Hereditary Grand Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz paid a visit to her Majesty and Prince Albert at Buckingham Palace. Their Royal Highnesses also visited her Majesty the Queen Dowager at Marlborough House.

STATE BALL.—The Lord Chamberlain has issued invitations for a grand ball at Buckingham Palace, on Monday next, the 30th inst., by command of her Majesty.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge is, we are glad to learn, recovering from his severe attack of gout, but is not yet sufficiently well to take active exercise.

His Serene Highness Prince William of Hesse Philippsthal, who, with Prince Ernest, is staying on a visit to the Queen Dowager, at Marlborough House, is on the eve of entering the British navy as midshipman.

Their Highnesses Prince and Princess Metternich, accompanied by Prince Richard and the Princess Metternich, have gone to Richmond, where the Prince has engaged a villa.

THE EX-ROYAL FAMILY OF FRANCE.—The ex-King of the French, since his arrival at St. Leonard's-on-Sea, has been in the enjoyment of excellent health and spirits. His ex-Majesty, in common with the rest of the illustrious family, appears to enjoy the retirement and genial air of this salubrious watering-place, and the late unseasonable weather has not prevented him from enjoying the pleasure of taking boating excursions to the various points of attraction along the coast.

ADDITIONAL PAUPER LUNATIC ASYLUM.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert has arranged to lay the first stone of the additional Pauper Lunatic Asylum for the county of Middlesex, at Colney Hatch, on Tuesday, the 8th of May, at twelve o'clock. The magistrates and their friends will be admitted by tickets issued by the visiting justices; the public without tickets. Colney Hatch is situated about nine miles N.E. of London, near the village of Southgate. In consequence of the building being only two stories high, it will range nearly a quarter of a mile in length. The asylum is intended to accommodate a thousand patients.

There is now making in Spitalfields, under the direction of Howell, James, and Co., of Regent-street, one of the most superb productions of the English loom. The dress is ordered expressly by her Majesty, and is intended to be worn at the Birthday Drawingroom. It is composed of the finest silk and thread of pure silver. The effect that is produced by a tasteful combination of the colours and the pattern is extremely beautiful, and reflects great credit on the English manufacturers.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD

BAMPTON LECTURER.—The Rev. Edward Meyrick Goulburn, M.A., late Fellow of Merton, has been elected Bampton Lecturer for the ensuing year.

The Reader of Experimental Philosophy will commence a course of lectures on Electricity, &c., at the Clarendon, on Monday, the 7th of May, at 1 o'clock.

It is contemplated to unite all the various museums of natural history, geology, &c. under one roof, in a building appropriate for the purpose, and calculated to display them to the best advantage.

CAMBRIDGE.

THE BURNEY PRIZE.—This prize, for the best English essay "on some moral or metaphysical subject, on the existence, nature, and attributes of God, or upon the truth and evidence of the Christian Religion," has been adjudged to J. Todhunter, B.A., of St. John's College (Senior Wrangler, 1848). The subject was, "The doctrine of a Divine Providence is inseparable from the belief in the existence of an absolutely perfect Creator."

LAW.—The Regius Professor of Laws (Dr. Maine) will commence his Lectures on the Civil and English Law for Easter Term, 1849, on Tuesday, the 8th of May. Subject, "The Law of Contracts."

MEDICINE.—The examination of candidates for the license "ad practicandum in medicina," and for the M.B degree, will commence on Monday, the 21st of May, in the schools under the Public Library.

THE PRINCE CHANCELLOR.—A grace has passed the Senate to affix the University seal to a letter of thanks (written by the Public Orator) to his Royal Highness the Chancellor, for the gift of himself, which his Royal Highness has graciously presented to the University

DEGREES OF AFFINITY.—The Vice-Chancellor has given notice of the holding of a Congregation on the following day, for the purpose of submitting to the Senate: To petition the Houses of Parliament against the [illegible] Commons, intitled "A bill to amend and [illegible] of King William IV., as relates to marriages within certain of the prohibited degrees of affinity." The following is a draught of the petition: "That your petitioners have learned with much concern that it is proposed to alter the Act of the 5th and 6th years of King William IV., so far as relates to marriages within certain of the prohibited degrees of affinity.' That it is the serious conviction of your petitioners that if such alteration becomes law, whilst the sanction of the Legislature will thus be given to marriages which have been uniformly prohibited by the laws of the English church and nation, the results will be highly injurious to society at large, and destructive of the purity and happiness of some of the most intimate relationships of domestic life. Your petitioners, therefore, humbly pray that no such alteration may receive the sanction of your honourable House."

THE NATIONAL DEBT.—The amount of all sums received and [illegible] the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, from the 10th October, 1817, to 20th November, 1848, inclusive, was £51,762,167 3s. 9d.: viz. from savings banks, £24,569,849; from friendly societies, £3,382,318.

The total sum paid by the Commissioners, including interest, within the same time, amounted to £37,565,626 17s. 2d. The sums paid for the purchase of stock, funds, and Exchequer Bills, amounted to £37,429,955 17s. 4d.; the interest and dividends thereon to £18,914,467 12s. 9d. The gross amount of interest paid and credited to savings banks and friendly societies up to and due upon the 20th November, 1848, was £20,465,070 10s. 2d. The sums paid to the Commissioners on account of military savings banks, from 10th September, 1849, to 5th January, 1849, was £66,172 12s. 7d.

GRAND BANQUET TO HER MAJESTY'S MINISTERS.

On Wednesday evening, in accordance with the usual custom on the Chief Magistrate during his year of office, a grand entertainment was given by the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House to her Majesty's Ministers, the Foreign Ambassadors, and the élite of the nobility. The attendance was more than ordinarily numerous, and included the French and Turkish Ambassadors; the Bavarian, Austrian, Netherlands, Portuguese, Prussian, and Danish Ministers; Baron de Schappingk, the Russian Minister at the Court of Lisbon; the Chevalier de Barbosa, the Portuguese Minister at the Court of Berlin; the Archbishop of Canterbury and Miss Sumner, the Archbishop of York and Hon. Mrs. Musgrave, Duke and Duchess of Norfolk and Lady Mary Howard, Duchess of Sutherland, Duke and Duchess of Argyll, Lord and Lady John Russell, Marquis and Marchioness of Lansdowne, Marquis and Marchioness of Clanricarde, Lord and Lady Cottenham, Marquis of Breadalbane, Earl and Countess of Minto, Lady Charlotte Elliott, Earl and Countess Grey, Earl of Carlisle, Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, Sir George and Miss Barlow, Lord Campbell and Baroness Stratheden, Sir Charles and Lady Mary Wood, &c.

The dinner was held in the Egyptian Hall. The substantial materials of the banquet were the most recherché in their character, including not only the delicacies of the season, but many of those which in the ordinary course of nature are not to be obtained at an advanced period of the summer. The musical arrangements, both vocal and instrumental, were complete; and the formalities of the never-failing loving-cup included were upheld with becoming dignity The cloth having been removed, and grace chanted, the usual loyal toasts were given.

The Lord Mayor then gave the "Health of Lord J. Russell and her Majesty's Ministers." The toast was drunk with three times three.

Lord John Russell responded. He said: My Lord Mayor, I rise to return you and to this company my most grateful thanks, and the grateful thanks of my colleagues, for the honour you have done us in drinking our healths on this occasion, and in so doing for myself, I must recollect that I have not only the honour of being a minister of the Crown, but I am likewise in your service, and have the honour of representing you a juvenile party in the Commons House of Parliament. (Hear, hear.) But, my Lord, you have referred to us in a manner for which I was totally unprepared; you have referred to the mode in which the duties of the ministers of the Crown have been discharged during the year which no one can deny have been those of great difficulty. Whatever may have been the success of our endeavours with respect to some of those difficulties which have now happily passed away, whatever may be hereafter our success with respect to others which are not yet overcome, I must always feel that it is not to our efforts only, but more to the providence of the Almighty, to the institutions of this country, and to the temper and spirit of the people of this country, that that success was owing. (Cheers.) My Lord, in the difficulties of the past year, amidst the convulsions which took place throughout Europe, it was true we had great authority and responsibility entrusted to us, it is true that we had vast means at our disposal, but those who had observed the events of that year must have seen that mere authority was broken, and that arms in the hands of the greatest and bravest of men fell powerless, at least for a time. It would have been madness, therefore, in us, under such circumstances, to have trusted our reliance solely on our own authority and the powers of the executive government. But we did trust it, and with a confidence which the result has shown was not misplaced, on the harmony of the constitution, and the union of every part of society, and of all classes of the community, for the preservation of peace and order. We knew that that union which had hitherto constituted, will continue to form her strength and our best security. We well know that in having the benefit of a monarchy, we enjoyed the blessings which that monarchy dispenses; we knew that in possessing an established church, the name of that established church was connected with the dispensation of religion, and with the spiritual comforts which it administered. We well knew that in having the law on our side, we had the sense of the people of this country that that law was fairly and equally administered by honourable, learned, and upright men. We knew these circumstances resulting on the feeling of this country, that if they sought for change, that change must be for the worse, not for the better—it was on this feeling that we placed our reliance, and not on any authority we could exert, however necessary it might be in some cases to exert authority to meet the exigences of the times. In the course of this period, it is true, also, that we had to consider the danger that might meet us from abroad, but we have had the satisfaction to find that the nations of Europe generally have been anxious to maintain their alliance with this country. From most of them we have received assurances of a desire to unite with us in maintaining the peace of Europe; and more especially have we received assurances of the continuance of that alliance which has already been entered to—the alliance between France and England, and of preserving that excellent understanding which has prevailed between the two Governments, and which is so essential to the peace of the world. (Cheers.) In speaking on these subjects, I must say that we think ourselves bound not only to keep in mind the excellence of the institutions of this country, but the fact that those institutions cannot be preserved by the attempt to uphold them by a mere superstitious reverence and veneration, and by refusing to adapt them to the changes which are going on in this as in all other countries." The surest and most beautiful temples neglected are subject to decay, all things of human origin require continual care and supervision; but with such endeavour, in whatever situations we may make in the institutions of this country, that they shall be made in the spirit in which those institutions were originally framed—in that spirit in which the great and wise men who founded our constitution sought to establish it—we should not only be able

Mr. Price's Lysimachus, 3 yrs, 8st 6lb	(R. Sherwood)	2

We have engraved the race for the great Metropolitan Handicap, and subjoin a few details of the sport:—They all got off well at the first word—Cockermouth, Lugar, Fugleman, Hagley, Eva, Maid of Lyme, Do-the-Boys, and Bagatelle, composing the front rank; in the rear being the two heavy weights, Fernhill, and New-Forest Deer. Cockermouth and Lugar cut out the work to the first turn, which the latter took so wide that he never afterwards had a chance of getting near the front. Maid of Lyme and Fugleman here showed in advance for a few strides, when the running was taken up at a great pace by Do-the-Boys, followed by Eva, Hagley, and Fugleman; in their wake, at a wide interval, coming Peep-o'-day Boy, Mogador, and the rush. On nearing the top of the hill, Eva ran up to Do-the-Boys, and raced for the lead, but was immediately shaken off, the horse going on with a rapidly increasing lead to Tattenham-corner: here he must have been six or eight lengths first, Peep-o' day Boy was second, and Fernhill third; Hagley and Fleteatcher next, but all were wide apart. Do-the-Boys swerved to the upper side, after crossing the road, and before he reached the distance was completely "used up." The race was now left to Fernhill and Peep-o-day Boy; the former taking the lead half way up the distance, and winning cleverly by half a length; the favourite, who challenged opposite the stand, never quite reaching him. Do-the-boys was beaten two lengths from the second, and was about as far before Hagley; Eva was a very bad fifth, and Fleteatcher sixth. Lugar, Trap, Mogador (who is said to have broken down), Fugleman, and Cockermouth were beaten a long way. Run in four minutes thirty-five seconds. Value of the stakes, £1994.

THE RECENT EXPLOSION AT ECKERNFORDE.

In our Journal for April 14, we so fully detailed the late affair at Eckernförde that we need only quote a portion of the account to accompany our representation of the explosion, from a sketch by a Hamburg artist.

"In the course of the engagement, the Christian VIII. managed to run again aground and to catch fire, and was at length compelled to strike to a Holstein battery of two pieces, aided by some Nassau light artillery. The surrender of the Christian VIII. was almost immediately followed by that of the Gefion; and the Danish sailors of the Gefion, aided by the German soldiers, set about to save the crew of the Christian VIII.; 400 men were saved, but at eight o'clock P.M., the vessel, which had been burning steadily all the while, exploded with the remaining 700 men. Of the crew of the Gefion, 250 escaped without injury, but the number of the killed and wounded was not less than 150."

Letters and papers subsequently received contain some further particulars of the engagement at Eckernförde, in which the loss of human life is asserted to have been very great, though no positive statement of the number of Danes missing has come to hand. Of prisoners there are no less than 1000—officers, sailors, and marines. It appears, from the accounts of the captured Danish officers, that, on the day of the battle, the two vessels entered the harbour of Eckernförde with a very favourable wind, which, of course, could not but be unfavourable to their leaving it. They relied on their steamers for the means of getting away in case of need. The German gunners, however, kept up a well-directed fire upon the two steamers, and disabled them. The result is on record. It appears that the Christian VIII. caught fire as early as 10 o'clock P.M., so that she burned almost 10 hours before she exploded. The Danes held out manfully to the last.

"CHRIST TEACHING HUMILITY."—PAINTED BY R. S. LAUDER, R.S.A.—FROM THE FREE EXHIBITION OF MODERN ART.

THE FREE EXHIBITION OF MODERN ART.

In the notice of the opening of this Exhibition, in our Journal for March 31, we pointed to Mr. Lauder's "finished study for a large picture" of "Christ teaching Humility," as one of the ablest works in the collection. We now engrave this very impressive scene, which we have already characterized as "a very thoughtful production, well sustained throughout, and conceived on higher principles of art than is commonly to be seen among our living British artists."

The second illustration is Mr. A. W. Williams's "Lowering Weather—Cader Idris, North Wales." This is a picture of very striking merit; the dark, inky, clouds, and the deepening rustle of the trees and high grass, cleverly indicate the approaching storm, whilst the massive majesty of Cader Idris adds to the sombre character of the scene. It is painted throughout with great vigour and ability. We are happy to learn that Mr. Crowick has purchased this clever picture—the price, £80.

EXHIBITION OF THE NEW SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

The Fifteenth annual Exhibition of the New Society of Painters in Water-Colours was opened at the old quarters of the Society in Pall-mall, on Monday last. Viewed as a whole, it may safely be looked upon as fully up to the mark of last year. The Society still suffers from the loss of men like Topham, Duncan, Dodgson, and Jenkins; and Mr. Weimer has not done justice to the expectations that were raised, not among his friends alone, but with the public generally, from his "Sculptor in Prison" and his "Sebastian Gomez." On the other hand, Mr. Warren and Mr. Haghe, the President and Vice-President, have here, in some respects, excelled many of their greatest efforts on earlier occasions; while Mr. Davidson continues to paint green lanes and green trees with a Leo and Creswick-like beauty; and Mr E. H. Corbould, in one very successful picture, has shown us how he can persuade critics and connoisseurs into the notion that Mr. Corbould and Mr. Haghe are one and the same artist.

Mr. Warren's picture is, as usual, an Egyptian scene, and represents "Joseph's Coat brought to Jacob." The patriarch is seated like a colossal statue on a stone outside his tent, with his face buried in his hands, while his sons kneel, and hold the coat of their brother before their father's face. The grouping of the sons is a little awkward; but the whole picture, as an attempt at high scriptural illustration, is superior to anything we remember to have seen on the walls of a Water-Colour Exhibition for many years. This, we regret to observe, is the only work which Mr. Warren has sent to the present Exhibition.

Mr. Haghe, the Vice-President, has two pictures: one, "Vespers in the Church of St. Anne, Bruges;" and the other, a domestic interior, entitled "The Veteran's Story." The effect of light, or, rather, of two lights, in the Church of St. Anne—the religious aspect of the whole place—the breadth and beauty of arrangement in the figures—and the rich deep sombre tone that pervades every portion of this noble triumph of Water-Colour art, have never been surpassed even by Mr. Haghe himself. It is "sold," as it deserves to be; and so, indeed is his other picture, a kind of conversation piece, which we shall engrave.

The deficiency in landscape art, which has long been felt, and still continues to be felt, as the leading defect of the New Society, and the principal difference between the Old and New Water-Colour Societies, Mr. Charles Davidson has done his best on this occasion to supply. He has eighteen works in all; of which the best, to our taste, is No. 68, "A Straw Yard;" a most exquisitely felt and rendered picture. The farm-house, a little in the distance, is placed most invitingly; while the trees are grouped and painted with an innate feeling for nature, and a taste and skill in art, which even the uneducated eye cannot but admire. His green trees, in some of his other works not from their execution but from their number—are somewhat monotonous; and we would suggest that on a future occasion, Mr Davidson would do well to give more variety of tint to his pictures. Nature is beautiful not only in the spring (Mr. Davidson's favourite season), but in summer and in autumn. Some of our greatest poets, Thomson, Burns, &c., have preferred autumn to spring; and the "Winter" o Thomson is the grandest of his four seasons.

No 132. A little picture, by Mr. E. H. Corbould, (who has not been so good for many years), is called "Happy as a Queen," and represents a gleaner returning from the field—not embrowned with the broiling sun, though she has toiled in gathering her scanty harvest—but an amateur gleaner, such as artists love to paint—a pretty face and pretty figure, in a pretty dress, with the emblems of autumn and the harvest field about her. There is a poetic feeling notwithstanding, and some delicate painting. Mr. Absolon, who contributes a Harvest Field, under the title of "Plenty" (No. 55), is truer to autumn and the country, and the class of English gleaners, even in Saxon times. There is real merit, too, in Mr. Absolon's picture.

Mr. Vacher is at a stand-still; but, then, he has already achieved some triumphs, and has carried his art to great excellence. But we look for varied and advancement. His "Pieces of St. Peter's on the morning of the Benediction - Rome" is not more wonderful for its minute detail than for the breadth and spirit with which it has been treated. We have seen better work of Mr. Vacher's; the same artist, "An Italian Pass," a small narrow strip of a picture, full of pictorial truth and true to Italian scene.

There are other pictures in the Exhibition which deserve and demand some notice at our hands. No. 35, by Mr. John Chase, "Fontainbleau in the fifteenth century—the Return from Mattua," is a clever interior, quite up to the mark of Mr. John Nash. No. 304, by Mr. Roberts, "Alexander at Madrid, Duke of Florence, in the studio of Benevenuto Celini," shows skill and taste, an eye alive to the difficulties of art. No. 396, by Mr. Howse, "The Fountain in the Place de la Pucelle, Rouen," is distinguished for pictorial and familiar truth. Miss Oliver (witness No 229) can catch the beauties of nature, which she knows so well how to appreciate. Miss Fanny Corbaux has painted the face of "Hagar with much [illegible] appeal, [illegible] flush, and Mr. W. Robertson, the excellent professor of drawing at the [illegible] House and the Royal Naval School, has, in two landscapes one a scene in Suffolk, the other near Capel Curig, in North Wales—caught many of those excellences which he understands so perfectly and teaches so well.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S

Little did those, the most learned in discerning the flickering lights and shades of theatrical enthusiasm, dream last year that the [illegible] night when public curiosity would be more piqued as regards Jenny Lind, and the "Sonnambula," perhaps the best, and also the most frequently repeated, of her parts, more attractive than on the night it was to the public. Now, indeed, every one without as well as within must feel how much increased curiosity and interest must be; months having been spent in speculation on the retirement of Jenny Lind from the stage, the topic, of conversation, during this lapse of time, of every journal, of every coffee-house, and every fireside.

The eagerness to behold the great Swedish vocalist is the greater, as no one knows, up to this moment, whether she retires this year or next—whether she will sing six nights, as agreed, or unto the remainder of the season. What may be most justly observed is, that Mdlle. Lind has done that which was said and just in returning to the stage for a few nights, at all events; and this entirely setting aside the interests of the great establishment, which had suffered injury from her withdrawal in the early portion of the season, and the loss of a new part from the stage,—on the stage she acquired her fame and fortune, on the stage she gave the most useful example of moral conduct, and through the stage she alone acquired means of benefiting.

There were, moreover, other attractions besides the reappearance of Mdlle. Lind at the Opera on Thursday—it was the first début in this country of Signor Calzaari, a tenor, whose reputation as a singer of Rubini's school, and of the more classical music of Italy, has long been very considerable. He is not handsome, he is not so finished and spirited an actor as most of his great contemporaries; and those who admire most the artificial notes of the secol di testa, which he eludes or dissembles, may experience some disappointment. However, with these exceptions, no real amateur but must listen to Signor Calzaari with delight. He has nothing of the harshness and roughness of the ready tone and strained force of those who have been the victims of that style which Meyerbeer first established, and Verdi "out-heroded." His intonation is true; his tones are soft, mellifluous, unforced, full of that feeling, grace, and breadth of manner, and with that elegance of phrasing which characterises the higher Italian school.

The next attraction of the night was the part of the Count, performed for the first time by Beletti.

On the opening of the doors there was a headlong rush of the well dressed crowd, never seen anywhere save at Jenny Lind's nights. On the entrance of the great vocalist, there was that applause, that cheering and enthusiasm expressed in all possible manners, such as, before her arrival in England, was never witnessed at any theatre. Her voice was in its highest perfection—every phrase drew forth the whispered nut rance, at least, of general delight. After the first act Mdlle. Lind was called for, but she did not come; still the applause lasted ten minutes at least. At the close of the next act, and on the final fall of the curtain, above all, the enthusiasm knew no bounds. Signor Calzolari at first trembled in voice, with emotion; and whilst the audience acknowledged its charm, they doubted its correctness and its power. But, in the second act, his singing of "Pasco sgnarda," and of the still more difficult and twice repeated passage, "Se possa odiarta," dispelled all doubt, and excited the greatest sensation. The applause given him was loud and repeated, accompanied with every expression of approval, and the encores were unanimous. Beletti, suffering under a severe cold, still managed to do justice to "Vi ravviso," and had an ample share in the spectators' approval. We may say, in a word, that this was in every respect the most thoroughly satisfactory performance that could be witnessed.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

"Semiramide," of the performance of which we gave an account last week, was repeated on Saturday with equal effect, the house b[illegible] and the applause as enthusiastic as on the preceding representation

On Tuesday the "Barbiere di Seviglia" was produced, for two reasons—that of allowing Rosconi to make his first appearance of the season in the part of Figaro, and of again bringing Mademoiselle Angri before the public, as Rosina. The lively barber is one of Rosconi's very best impersonations. Always a fine actor, his bearing as Figaro is so animated, and his gaiety so spontaneous and good-tempered, that he never fails to carry his audience with him to a remarkable extent. Hence his tremendous success whenever the character has been subsequently awarded to him. He was in admirable voice. His "Largo al factotum" was loudly re-demanded; and in the other well known pieces—the duet, "All' idea," the "Zitti, zitti," and the "Buona sera"—he was in the liveliest enthusiasm. The Rosina of Mdlle Angri, although played with great finish and extraordinary brilliancy, did not altogether create the impression that might have been anticipated. She can evidently produce greater effect in serious characters than in those of the class to which Rosina belongs; at the same time, her wonderful vocalisation and singular facility can never fail to rouse an audience to a pitch of excitement. Hence the applause throughout was immense, but it was given rather to her execution of the music than general conception of the character, which differed in some degree from that with which we are accustomed. In "Una voce" she produced a great sensation; and this was indeed her greatest "hit" of the evening—a substituted piece, in the scene of the lesson, calling forth comparatively little applause, despite the really wonderful and daring manner in which its difficulties were accomplished.

Signor Salvi was the Almaviva, and he appeared to great advantage in the part, singing the music in his usually admirable spirited manner. Signor Lablache was first Bartolo, his fine voice giving good effect to the airs allotted to him. Basilio was sustained by Signor Polonini, and he deserves honourable mention for the pains he took with so small a role. It is almost needless to say that the band, under Mr. Costa's direction, performed the overture in most splendid style, and that it was unanimously and loudly encored. At the conclusion of the opera Rosconi and Mdlle. Angri were loudly called for, and appeared to receive the renewed applause of a crowded audience.

PRINCESS'.

A three-act opera, under the name of "The Heart of Mid Lothian," has been produced at this theatre. It is an adaptation of an opera by Carafla, produced at the Opéra Comique, in Paris, in 1831. The arrangement and adaptation for the English stage is by Mr. E. J. Loder, the musical director of the theatre, who has interpolated some airs of his own, which, in justice, we must say form the most pleasing portion of the music of the opera. Great liberties are taken by the writer of the libretto, Scribe, with the novel of Sir Walter Scott, from which the plot of the opera is obtained; but the chief incidents are retained—the shame and trial of Effie, the devotion of Jeanie Deans, the mad vagaries and touching story of Madge Wildfire, and so on. But George Staunton is transformed into Duke of Argyll, and some other licence is resorted to, in order to accomplish a due melodramatic action, and an operatic dénouement.

The music of the opera is light and pleasing, but without originality—decidedly French in style. There are very few striking or beautiful passages, but the whole flows on easily, and without wearying the audience. [illegible] equally divided between the principal characters—Mdlle. Nau, as Madge Wildfire, to which character she gave much dramatic delopment, having full opportunity to display her florid vocalisation; Miss Poole (Jeanie Deans) giving full effect to some pretty ballads, in one of which ("In the days of happy childhood") she was encored; and Miss Lanza, as Effie Deans, being afforded full scope for her vocal and histrionic powers. Mr. Charles Braham, as George Robertson, sang one or two ballads in a very satisfactory manner; and Mr. Wass made a character, both as an actor and a vocalist, of Ratcliffe, the smuggler. The opera is highly successful.

The only novelty this week has been a successful farce at the STRAND Theatre, entitled "John Dobbs," produced for the first time on Monday evening. It is by Mr. Madison Morton, a gentleman whom we may regard as our most prolific, as well as our most fortunate farce-writer; indeed, had he never written anything else but "Box and Cox," that would have been sufficient to have established him as a great dramatic humourist. It is true his pieces are usually more or less adaptations from the French; but he clothes the skeleton plots with English flesh and blood, so that we are not disposed to quarrel with him on that account. A clever young countryman, John Dobbs, is in love with a lady considerably his superior in station; in fact, he is a kind of native Claude Melnotte. Of course his addresses are rejected by the family; but, by bringing all his talents into full play, and turning them to savory available account, he at length carries his point with everybody, even to the discomfiture of a rival. This is all; but the action is so ingeniously worked out, the plot so well developed, and the dilemmas so cleverly combated, that, with the excellent acting of Mr. Leigh Murray as the young farmer, and Mr. Compton as the rustic, the applause is continuous and hearty. The farce will have a long run, and, we expect, become a stock piece. Mr. W. Farren's appearance at this house continues to afford great gratification to his patrons.

The most important novelty in preparation is a new five-act play at SADLER'S WELLS, which will be immediately produced, with all the care and excellence that distinguishes everything brought out under that management.

The ballet of "Le Violon du Diable," in which Cerito and St. Léon made such a hit at the Académie Royale, in Paris, has been turned into a burlesque by Mr. Webster, and will be produced at the ADELPHI next week. Madame Celeste, of course, plays the chief character, and Miss Woolgar is the representative of the violinist. It will be brought out with great splendour. We believe Mr. O. Smith will perform the original owner of the violin.

"Romeo and Juliet" has been produced at the MARYLEBONE, Miss Fanny Vining playing Romeo, Mrs. Mowatt Juliet, and Mr. Davenport Mercutio.

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF SOCIAL LIFE.—On Monday evening, Mr. John Parry, whose popularity is as extended as his talent is varied, made his first appearance in London, at Willis's Rooms, in a new entertainment with the above title, written expressly for him by Mr. Albert Smith, of which we gave a report a week or two ago. The peculiar genius of John Parry is especially adapted to portray the several aspects of such a colored life: he has a natural turn for humour, his features are mobile, and his multiple voice is so flexible that he can at will modulate its tones to all and every register. His oddity is never sullied by vulgarity, and his musical knowledge, and consequent dexterity afford him a vantages never before possessed by any of his predecessors in this class of entertainment. From a singer of an original species of songs, with whom none other may be compared, he at once steps forth as an illustrator of various characters, and gives to them the truthfulness of the daguerreotype and the vitality of nature. Of course, the songs form a salient point of the "Lights and Shadows," and, notwithstanding he was labouring under the disadvantage of hoarseness, he imparted to them an excellence seldom exceeded even by himself. During the entertainment, and at its conclusion, the applause was enthusiastic as it was unanimous. The entertainment will be repeated on Monday, the 7th of May. The room was inconvenient, crowded, although the sale of tickets was stopped on Saturday, and several hundred persons were turned away from the doors.

MUSIC

PARIS, APRIL 7.—The fourth representation of the new opera, Meyerbeer's "Prophète," takes place to-night at the Théâtre de la Nation. Owing to a slight indisposition of Viardot there was no performance on Monday. On the third time, however, and the "Prophète" was given the last Friday, the enthusiasm was greater than on any preceding occasion. Some pieces of music, which were omitted at the last moment, owing to the length of the opera, including a chorus of women and a march, are to be executed at the Conservatoire.

Every true lover of art will rejoice that justice has, at last, been rendered to Berlioz by the Société des Concerts; for in the seventh programme, selections from his "Faust," including his "Marche Hongroise," were performed. We know that his works have been once heard, it is to be hoped that exclusiveness has received its death-blow in this classic institution. Meme. Pleyel, the pianiste, and Batta, the violoncellist, give a concert next Saturday.

MUSICAL EVENTS.—The Sacred Harmonic Society gave, on Monday, a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," conducted by Costa. The Misses A. and M. Williams, Miss Dolby, Messrs. Reeves and Machin, were the principal vocalists. On the 27th the oratorio was repeated.—The 22nd Concert at Exeter-Hall, on Wednesday, was for the benefit of Mr. Willy, the leader of the band. Miss Ellen Day and Mr. Lindsay Sloper were the pianists; and Misses Lucombe, A. and M. Williams, Dolby, E. Lyon, and Messrs. Whitworth, Allen, Irving, T. Williams, and Binge, the vocalists.—Mr. Hart, a clever composer and professor of singing, the master of Maria and Sima Reeves, gave a morning concert, on Friday, at the Hanover Rooms. We will supply a notice in our next Number.—Strauss, with his band, gave an evening concert on Monday, at the Hanover-rooms; and Mr. Charles Mullen[illegible], the pianist and composer, had a matinée musicale, on Wednesday, at the same locality.—The second classical matinée musicale of Miss Ellen and Mr. John Day took place on Thursday Mdlle. Lind sang at a concert on Monday, at Plymouth; conducted by J. Benedict Virtue, the baritone singer, was the hon. conductor.—Mr. Henry Wylde, the pianist, commenced, on the 20th, a series of classical concerts at Blackheath.—The Fourth Philharmonic Concert will take place on Monday; the third meeting of the Musical Union, on Tuesday, and the fifth concert of the Amateur Society, on Wednesday.

COUNTRY NEWS.

SHAKSPEARE'S BIRTHDAY, Monday, at Stratford-upon-Avon, the members of the Royal Shakspearian Club held their annual meeting—Dr. Thompson in the chair. The annual report stated that the committee of the purchase of Shakspeare's house and premises was the first point in importance in the proceedings of the past year, the committee in connexion therewith having to express their regret that the subscriptions had not enabled them to [illegible] on the deeds of the property from the Stratford Bank of £470, and, until this sum was repaid, no steps could be taken as to the ultimate conservation of the property. The committee felt sanguine that when the considerable position in which "a relic so essentially national" was placed, the small amount required to release it, and place it under the care of Government, would speedily be supplied. For the satisfactory contributions, the report stated that a twenty-[illegible] person was placed in the birth-place of the bard, which was open to all visitors [illegible] charge; and a subscription-book being kept in the room, and there being rents derivable from adjoining property, it was hoped from these sources the interest upon the money advanced by the bank, and the expense of the occupant of the premises, would be defrayed. Considerable sums had been acknowledged, and the fund raised by Mr. Dickens and his friends, by their amateur theatrical performances, for the purpose of enclosing a churchyard of the house, which amounted to £1900, had been paid into the hands of the trustees of Charles Dickens and John Forster, Esqs. The club accounts show a deficit of £[illegible]. A handsome mulberry-tree cup had been presented to the members by the widow of Mr. Ian Bell, [illegible] Wash, in reply, remarks: "I beg to state, for the information of the Commissioners, that I do not feel myself at liberty to comply with the request. The above-named children were received from the workhouse to be brought up and educated at the [illegible] and Home. A charge so sacred and responsible I cannot voluntarily abandon. It is supposed that the Commissioners will rest content, as it seems they have not the power of [illegible] a compliance with their wishes.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

EAST INDIA HOUSE.—VOTE OF THANKS TO THE INDIAN ARMY.

On Tuesday a special general court of proprietors of East India stock was held at the Company's house in Leadenhall-street, Major-General Sir Archibald ... loway in the chair. The minutes of the last court were read.

The Chairman acquainted the court that it had been made special for the purpose of considering motions of thanks to the Governor-General, the Commander-in-Chief, and the officers and men of the army in India, for their services in the recent military operations in the Punjaub. It was a peculiar pleasure to him, at so early a period after being appointed to the chair, to have to announce to the court the achievement of a great and decisive victory of their army in India, under their Commander-in-Chief, Lord Gough, on the 21st of February, and over the combined forces of the Sikhs and Afghans, near Goojerat. It was his duty to propose a resolution, embracing a vote of thanks to the Governor-General, to the Commander-in-Chief, and to the general and other officers and privates who had in their several stations been instrumental in obtaining so great and decisive a victory. The present was the sixth time, within the last ten years, that the court had been called upon to return thanks to their army in India for their great zeal and services. The army in India had won for them an empire, and had earned for themselves an imperishable renown. The last glowing eulogium on the conduct of the Governor-General (Lord Dalhousie), on Lord Gough, and the general officers under him, also on Lieutenant Edwardes, the artillery force, the engineers, the native troops, &c., the chairman proposed the following resolutions:—

Resolved unanimously, "That the thanks of this Court be given to the Right Hon. the Earl of Dalhousie, Knight of the Most Ancient and Most Noble Order of the Thistle, Governor-General, for the zeal and ability with which the resources of the British empire in the East Indies have been applied to the support of the military operations in the Punjaub."

Resolved unanimously.—"That the thanks of this Court be given to General the Right Hon. Lord Gough, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Military Order of the Bath, Commander-in-Chief of the Forces in the East Indies, for the conspicuous intrepidity displayed by him during the recent operations in the Punjaub, and especially for his conduct on the 21st of February, 1849, in the battle of Goojerat, when the British army obtained a brilliant and decisive victory."

Resolved unanimously.—"That the thanks of this Court be given to Major-General Sir Joseph Thackwell, Knight Commander of the Most Honourable Military Order of the Bath; to Major-General Sir Walter Raleigh Gilbert, Knight Commander of the Most Honourable Military Order of the Bath; to Major-General William Samson Whish, Companion of the Most Honourable Military Order of the Bath; and to Brigadier-General the Hon. Henry Dundas, Companion of the Most Honourable Military Order of the Bath; Colin Campbell, Companion of the Most Honourable Military Order of the Bath; Hugh Massey Wheeler, Companion of the Most Honourable Military Order of the Bath; and James Tennant; and to the several officers, European and native, serving under their command, for the indefatigable zeal and exertions exhibited by them throughout the recent campaign."

Resolved unanimously.—"That the thanks of the Court be given to the non-commissioned officers and private soldiers, European and native, for the services rendered to the British empire by the signal overthrow of the numerous and gallant combined in arms against them; and that the same be signified to them by the commanders of the several corps."

Resolved unanimously "That the thanks of this Court be given to Major-General William Samson Whish, Companion of the Most Honourable Military Order of the Bath, for his eminent services in conducting to a successful issue the siege of the fort and city of Moultan."

Resolved unanimously—"That the thanks of this Court be given to the several officers, European and native, under the command of Major General Whish, and to the officers of the Indian navy ship cyed upon that occasion, for their gallant conduct during the siege of Moultan."

Resolved unanimously.—"That the thanks of this Court be given to the non-commissioned officers and private soldiers and seamen, European and native, for the bravery and fortitude manifested by them during the siege of Moultan, and that the same be signified to them by their several commanders."

Mr Lewin rose to move an amendment; but the purport of it was lost in the confusion that arose. He said he thought it was in bad taste to carry a vote of thanks to an officer whom they had suspended not more than a fortnight ago. Not one in or out of that court believed that the Court of Directors were sincere in the compliments the chairman had just paid to Lord Gough—an officer whose conduct had been universally condemned.

The amendment was not seconded, and the first resolution was put and carried. On the second resolution being read,—

Mr. Lewin said the Directors thought more of praising themselves than Lord Gough; but the confusion that ensued prevented his further observations from being heard.

The resolution was agreed to, as also were the others, which were put seriatim from the chair, and the proceedings terminated.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY.

The Earl of Rosse, the newly-appointed President of the Royal Society, gave his first conversazione to the fellows of that learned body on Saturday evening last, in the apartments of the institution, at Somerset House.

An unusual degree of interest attached to this meeting, in consequence of the noble President having determined that the conversazione should take place in the ... ginal apartments of the society. The facilities afforded for the display of rooms, the wa ls of which are decorated with the efforts of many bygone artists, whose names ... the Society of Antiquaries, whose apartments, adjoining those of the Royal Society, were thrown open by express permission of the Council, for the greater accommodation of the noble Earl's guests. The whole of the rooms were crowded with models of works of art and other scientific inventions, many of the late President, Lord Northampton's private mansion have always been; and but few of the latter were absent on the present occasion. Of the silence the noble President, there was no variation whatever from the arrangements which have rendered these meetings so popular and attractive under Lord Northampton's auspices.

The meeting derived additional importance from the presence of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, who arrived shortly after ten o'clock, attended by Lord George Lennox and Colonel Seymour. His Royal Highness, on descending from his carriage, was received by the noble President, who wore the insignia of the order of St. Patrick.

The general company began to arrive shortly after nine o'clock, and comprised members of distinguished circles in the aristocracy, the learned professions, the arts, sciences, &c.

The most interesting objects in the saloons, perhaps, were models of the noble President's two colossal telescopes. These excited great curiosity, and were minutely inspected by the Prince Consort, to whom the reconstruction of the tube was explained by the noble Earl. A very clever model of a machine for block-cutting, an improvement on the present machinery in Portsmouth Dockyard, was also shown by the inventor. The admiralty, the Board of Trade, and the general meeting, and some interesting specimens of photography, contributed to the evening's entertainment. Mr. W. G. Rogers, the eminent carver on wood, brought one of his recent works executed for her Majesty the Queen, which was greatly admired; and altogether the evening passed in a very gratifying manner. Refreshments of the most recherché character were served during the evening.

The Prince Consort took his departure shortly after eleven o'clock, and the general circle broke up before midnight.

ART-UNION OF LONDON.—The annual general meeting of the subscribers of the Art-Union of London was held on Tuesday in Drury-Lane Theatre, for the purpose of receiving the council's report, and for the distribution of the amount subscribed for the purchase of works of art for the year 1848. On the stage the chair and the apparatus for effecting the drawing of the prizes was arranged. The attendance, especially of ladies, was numerous. The Duke of Cambridge was to have been the chairman on the occasion, but was prevented by indisposition; but Lord Lansdowne had promised to preside in the absence of His Royal Highness, was detained by business at the House of Lords. In consequence, Mr. Sergeant Thompson, a member of the council, undertook to act as chairman.—The Secretary read the report, which stated, in reference to the renewed correspondence with the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade since the date of the previous report, that at the general meeting in 1846 the question between the Board of Trade and the council was, whether the council should select the prizes for the prizeholders, or the prizeholders select them for themselves; and the council, strengthened by the unanimous opinion of the meeting, had determined to omit no effort to maintain for the prizeholders this right of choice. [illegible] opposition of the [illegible] ations were subsequently [illegible] from the Board of Trade, interfering with the freedom of choice of the prizeholders, and the meeting in council, objecting on various grounds to these alterations, was set forth at length in the report. The result of these communications with the Board of Trade was a letter from Sir D. Le Marchant, in which he states "that their Lordships are reluctant, at least at present, to urge their views against the deliberate sentiments of the London Art Union, which were expressly in favour of the right of choice, but that it must be distinctly understood that they do not relinquish the right of subsequently requiring these, or any other amendments, in the existing system, as circumstances may appear to them to render expedient." The total amount subscribed for the current year was stated to be £10,991 17*s.* and it was then thought, that each subscriber's guinea sufficed to produce the engravings for the year; and that, after paying all necessary and incidental expenses, half the total amount subscribed was distributed in the shape of prizes at the annual meeting. The prizes were enumerated and described the works of art which have been contracted for by the council, and stated the names of the artists to whom they had been entrusted, and the probable period when they shall be ready for distribution. The report concluded with an eloquent appeal to the public to support the Art-Union, as an effective and inexpensive auxiliary for promoting the love and knowledge of art, and the appreciation of artists. The report was adopted, and the proceedings closed with the drawing of the prizes.

THE GOVERNESSES' BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—On Wednesday, the sixth anniversary dinner of this institution took place at the London Tavern. The Earl of Harrowby filled the chair, and was surrounded by about 120 friends of the charity. There were also a large number of ladies present, who manifested the interest taken by them in the charity, by remaining to the close of the [illegible]. The cloth having been removed, and the customary leading toasts duly honoured, the Chairman, in proposing the toast of the evening—"Prosperity to the Governesses' Benevolent Institution," observed that upon the establishment of the institution the committee proposed a number of objects to themselves, which they had endeavoured to carry out by degrees. They had commenced by administering assistance to ladies in temporary distress; and in the last 7 years which had elapsed since the foundation of the institution, they had received 670 applications for relief, and met them by the careful disbursement of £3630*s.* 6*d.*, up to December last. Their next step was to provide assistance for those who during their lives had not had an opportunity of establishing small annuities for ladies who had reached 50 years of age without having done so to make a provision for themselves. There were now [illegible] ladies receiving such annuities, from the dividends on vested capital only [illegible] to the distribution of the income of the society. In order, in some measure, to prevent destitution, they had established a provident fund, and no less than 485 ladies had already taken that means of securing their earnings, and had deposited £42 3*s.* 6*d.* 9*d.* in their hands, to be invested in Government securities in the names of the ladies themselves, the expenses of its proceeding being defrayed by the society. Three years since a house was taken and furnished as a respectable home for ladies in the intervals of their engagements. About 2 0 ladies had been a ready received, and few had left without expressing a hope that at some future opportunity the same comfort and kindness might be afforded them. In addition to employment and a daily increasing system of registration, without any expense to employer or employed, it was carried on, at about 300*l.* per annum less than [illegible] would enable themselves of it, of whom it is [illegible] that one in every two was [illegible] with a situation. To render it certain that the class for which so much interest was shown should prove equal to the duties they undertake, a college had been established under Royal patronage, to give certificates of qualification, and to afford a cheap education to those who were defective in [illegible] of the many branches of knowledge at present called for in instructors. The proposed objects would be completed when the [illegible]um for the aged was opened at Kensington. The chairman concluded his observations with an appeal to public generosity on behalf of the institution. The toast having been duly honoured, Mr. S. C. Hall announced that he had been commissioned by Jenny Lind to present the charity with the munificent sum of £500. This announcement was followed by a universal demand for the health of Jenny Lind, which was promptly given by the chairman, and the toast was drunk with enthusiasm. The Rev. D. [illegible], the treasurer of the institution, announced the total of the subscriptions to be £18, including donations from the Duchess of Kent, £20; A Lady, £300; [illegible] Lind, £500, Marquis of Northampton, £20; Earl of Harrowby, £30; Earl Manvers, £20; Lord Saye and Sele, £20, &c.

CITY OF LONDON GENERAL PENSION SOCIETY.—The anniversary festival in aid of the funds of the above society was holden on Tuesday last, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street. The Lord Mayor, who was to have taken the chair on the occasion, was prevented by indisposition from being present; his place was, however, supplied by James Thomson, Esq., a director and honorary member of the society, who performed the duties so unexpectedly required from him with great ability. About 150 persons were present, and the subscriptions announced by the treasurer were considerable, the last being headed by her Majesty, and the Queen Dowager. The dinner was excellent; the musical arrangements of a superior kind, and the toasts were prefaced with brief but seasonable remarks, which the chairman's love for the writings of Shakspeare was well seen. The beauty of the tout ensemble was heightened by the presence of the fair ladies who graced the galleries and other parts of the room appropriated to them.

FEMALE AID SOCIETY.—On Wednesday, the annual meeting of this society was held at the Hanover-square Rooms, the Earl of Harrowby in the chair. The object of the institution, as stated officially, are "First, to afford shelter and protection to servants and other unprotected young women of good character; and, secondly, to provide a asylum for fallen but penitent females. There are thus anything one is called "The Home for Friendless Young Females of Good Character;" the second, "The Home and Registry for Female Servants;" and the third, "The Home for Penitent Females." Into the first, 120 young persons have been received during the past year; of whom 19 have been placed out in service, 8 have returned to their friends, and 11 have left of their own request or been dismissed. 134 lodgers have been received into the second asylum, called "The Servants' Home;" of whom 104 have since obtained situations; 974 names have been placed on the registry, and 397 families have been provided with servants. 168 females have been received into the "Penitent Home" during the year, of whom only 49 have been dismissed. The expenditure for the year had amounted to £3064; the receipts exceeded that sum by upwards of £60. The [illegible] on the fact that the Queen Dowager had condescended to patronise the institution; and observed that experience had proved that the effort to reclaim females of bad character was not impracticable, and that there was every reason to expect continued satisfactory results. Resolutions were passed declaratory of continued confidence in the society.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL BENEVOLENT [illegible] SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.—On Wednesday evening the annual general meeting of this society, established to [illegible] the purpose of relieving persons educated at Christ's Hospital, their widows and orphans, was held in the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street; Hughes, Esq., presiding. The minutes of the last meeting having been read and confirmed, the Secretary proceeded to read the 80th half-yearly report, from which it appears that since the establishment of the society, there had been no less than 1890 applications for relief, 860 of which had been granted, and the permanent relief afforded. The amount so disbursed was upwards of £4000, each of a pension not exceeding £ s per annum. The number of pensioners at present on the lists is eighteen; the sum given this year amounting to forty five. The annual statement showed the receipts for the last half-year to be £ including £ from the Queen Dowager, and £ from Mr. Samuel Smith, leaving a balance in the hands of the treasurer of £101. The amount of stock invested in Three per Cent. Consols, the interest of which is to be exclusively applied to pensioners, is now upwards of £6 00. The report and balance sheet having been unanimously received, adopted, and ordered to be printed, the meeting separated on passing a vote of thanks to the chairman.

HOSPITAL FOR CONSUMPTION, BROMPTON.—Through the generosity of the Rev. Sir Henry Foulis, Bart., the building committee of this institution have determined to proceed with the [illegible] recently as early as possible. The plans and elevations, &c. have already been submitted and approved of; the architectural style will harmonise with that portion of the hospital already erected. When the wing of Prince Albert, on the 29th of May last, the institution has been visited by some of the most distinguished of the English [illegible]y. The coming festival, on the 2nd of May, will, it is hoped, form a memorable [illegible] Darnell, Esq., M.P. and the very numerous list of stewards affords a goodly augu ry of a substantial augmentation of the funds of the charity.

LICENSED VICTUALLERS' ASYLUM.—"THE LADIES' WING."—His Royal Highness Prince Albert [illegible] patron of the Licensed Victuallers' Society, has [illegible] consented to lay the first stone of the new wing which it has been determined to add to this valuable institution. It is proposed that the interesting ceremony shall take place on Tuesday, the 29th of May, which will be the twenty first anniversary of the laying of the first stone of the original portion of the edifice by the late Duke of Sussex, the then patron of the society.

GRAND MASONIC FESTIVAL.—On Wednesday evening a the annual grand festival of the Masons of England took place at Freemasons' Hall, Great Queen-street. The Earl of Zetland, Most Worshipful Grand Master, presided, supported by Lord Suffield, R. Alston, Esq., W. F. Beadnell, Esq., and [illegible], with about 400 brethren, attired in full masonic costume, sat down to a most excellent repast. The evening was enlivened by vocal and instrumental music, under the direction of Mr. J. W. Hobbs. The Countess [illegible] about 100 ladies were in the gallery.

THE ALLEGED LUNATICS' FRIEND SOCIETY.—The general meeting of this society was held on Tuesday last, at their offices, Craven-street, Strand, when a report was read of the proceedings during the last year, and of the cases in which the society's interference had been beneficial. The thanks of the members were stated "to be pre-eminently due to the public press, which had conducted in a most powerful manner the abuses existing under the present law of lunacy." A petition praying for a commission of inquiry was also agreed upon and signed, and will be forthwith presented to both Houses of Parliament.

ROBBERY.—On Tuesday afternoon, some thieves entered the house of Mr. Maurice Fry, wine merchant, Cornelia-street, Strand, and stole his cash-box, containing upwards of £500, in notes, gold, silver, and [illegible].

BARBAROUS CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.—On Wednesday evening, some lads, leaving the Grecian School, Great Queen street, Lincoln's Inn-fields, discovered a basket in Middle [illegible] the top of the basket [illegible] containing six or seven cats [illegible] skins, and yet alive. The poor animals were forthwith [illegible] their misery, in the presence of the [illegible] agony, till some labourers, who were passing, [illegible] them from their torture. The object of this cruelty is to procure the glossy appearance on the skins of the animals, as they would be otherwise valueless for the furrier.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—Mr. Tuxford, of Elm Bank Cottage, Barnes, was returning home from town, between eight and nine o'clock on Tuesday evening, accompanied by a young lady, named Rogerson, in a chaise, when the horse took fright in passing through Kensington, and became quite unmanageable. In its headlong career it knocked down two cabs, named Boucher and Connell, who were seriously injured. The phaeton then came in contact with one of the leaves of an omnibus, the pole of which struck Mr. Tuxford, who was dangerously hurt. The lady is rescued from the phaeton, but, melancholy to relate, she almost instantly expired—evidently from [illegible] fear. The horse subsequently [illegible] from the fright; it was of an exceedingly nervous temperament [illegible].

EXPLOSION.—On Tuesday [illegible] noon the boiler of a steam-engine at the [illegible] saw Mill, belonging to Mr Keys, [illegible] Deptford, exploded. During the early part of the morning the boiler, technically speaking, "fired singularly," but no accident was anticipated. Between ten and eleven o'clock, however, the engineer had left the stokehole, the fire was burning as low as it could be, as the discharge a park of artillery would produce, destroying everything in the immediate neighbourhood; and [illegible] ing with terrific force masses of brickwork, ponderous beams, and immense fragments of machinery, for not wide. Several of the adjacent houses were blown down, and many were injured by the falling ruins. Providential[illegible] there was no loss of life, but an aged man walking along the road had both [illegible] broken by a piece of iron which struck him; the arm of a boy passing through Church-lane was fractured by a large piece of brickwork; and a woman was carried in the arms of her house, but by the exertions of the neighbours was rescued in a deplorable condition, very much scalded and bruised. The sufferers were conveyed to the London Hospital. It is singular that the persons employed in the establishment should have escaped uninjured. The cause of the explosion has not been ascertained.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS FOR THE WEEK ENDING APRIL 21.—The births registered are 1348; the deaths, 1029. The latter number shows an excess of 126 on the weekly average of spring. The zymotic or epidemic diseases exhibit an increase on the average, the two numbers being 248 and 193; but it is important to observe that most of the fatal complaints in this class—measles, scarlatina, cholera, typhus—have produced this week a mortality scarcely exceeding the usual amount. Smallpox was fatal to 8 children and 4 adults, which is the average in number of persons of all ages who died of this disease in 91. The deaths from diarrhœa and dysentery were 23, or 9 more than the average; only one is ascribed to cholera. The excess of mortality is ascribed to hooping-cough, bronchitis, and phthisis, which number respectively 89, 76, and 165, the averages being 36, 37, and 145. effects which are probably due in great measure to the late mild coldness of the weather.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—The temperature of the air, taking one day with another, has been, since Sunday the 8th instant, less than the mean temperature of the same time on an average of seven years, by 6 deg. 7 min. This difference, on Thursday, the 19th, even amounted to 14 deg. 5 min. The mean temperature of the week was only 37 deg. 1 min. The highest temperature did not rise on any day above 49 deg. 2 min. It was lowest on Thursday, namely 36 deg. 3 min.; on which day, also, the lowest mean occurred, and was only 32 deg. 4 min. The mean reading of the barometer in the week was 29.626: it was highest on Saturday, being 29.741.

LOMBARD-STREET AND THE OLD CITY.

How different is the appearance of the Lombard-street of the present day, when contrasted with the period of Elizabeth, when Sir Thomas Gresham built his stood on the spot now occupied by the banking-house of Messrs. Stone and Martin, long before its quaint sign of the grasshopper towered above the heraldic lions, as the emblem of Honour and Faith among our old merchant Princes, or Keats had thrown around the "grasshopper among the grassy hills," that splendid line,

> The poetry of earth is never dead.

Yet the eye of the imagination can picture the past; and we can fancy what a stir there was in the Money Market of that day, when the Company of Ironmongers received the Virgin Queen's peremptory note, commanding them to send her £50; and if they had not so large a sum by them, to borrow it, and pay the interest themselves. What a running to and fro would there be, on that occasion; and many, no doubt, would wish that they had Mary still alive, and her treasury marquis in banished—to buy with her heretics to meddle with the contents of their strong boxes. What "Lack a days," and "God wots," and "Marry, what nexts," would be uttered by those primitive shopkeepers, as they went from door to door to borrow the money.

Through poor old Stow, the City chronicler, who, instead of a literary pension, received a license to beg, we are enabled to obtain a view of those ancient merchants who assembled twice a day, "in all extremes of weather—heat and cold, snow and rain," to transact business in the open street, before the Exchange was built, or those narrow "alleys" about Cornhill purchased for the site of that "palace of merchants." We see that grand carouse, when the richly embossed silver cup passed round, and Sir Thomas Gresham took Sir Wm. Garrard by the hand as he talked of his wealth, and promised that within a month after the splendid building was finished he would present it to the City. A King's honour and word would not have passed so soon, or have been so readily taken as security, as this old English merchant's, who began business in that quaint, overhanging gable-ended, little shop, with its grasshopper over the door, in London-street.

We can imagine some of the topics and cries of the sundry [illegible] moved and floated over this ancient neighbourhood, nearly three centuries before the Great Fire laid it low in ashes. We can fancy we hear the cry of "Sweet rose and rosemary" on a certain day in a month after the splendid building was finished he would present it to the City. What a roaring and barking there must have been in those narrow thoroughfares in bygone days, when the bear was followed by all the dogs "from some four parishes," as Ben Jonson has narrated. What a stir there was on that merry morning when Kemp set out from the house of the Lord Mayor to dance all the way to Norwich, accompanied by his tabourer, Thomas Sly, or when Banks (the Duncow of the Elizabethan period) exhibited his wonderful horse, named Morocco, in the London streets, and many of the simple citizens believed that both he and his marvellous steed dealings with the old gentleman who manages the fire office below. What cramming and jamming there must be about the Exchange on the day Queen Elizabeth ordered it to be opened by sound of trumpet, what motions and notes-shows, and antics of wooden puppets, such as Hogarth has preserved in his picture of "Southwark Fair," and the hands of the treasurer of £101. The amount of stock invested in Three per Cent. Consols, the interest of which is to be exclusively applied to pensioners, is now upwards of £6 00. The report and balance sheet having been unanimously received, adopted, and ordered to be printed, the meeting separated on passing a vote of thanks to the chairman.

HOSPITAL FOR CONSUMPTION, BROMPTON.—Through the generosity of the Rev. Sir Henry Foulis, Bart., the building committee of this institution have determined to proceed with the [illegible] recently as early as possible. The plans and elevations, &c. have already been submitted and approved of; the architectural style will harmonise with that portion of the hospital already erected. When the wing of Prince Albert, on the 29th of May last, the institution has been visited by some of the most distinguished of the English [illegible]y. The coming festival, on the 2nd of May, will, it is hoped, form a memorable [illegible] Darnell, Esq., M.P. and the very numerous list of stewards affords a goodly augu ry of a substantial augmentation of the funds of the charity.

LICENSED VICTUALLERS' ASYLUM.—"THE LADIES' WING."—His Royal Highness Prince Albert [illegible] patron of the Licensed Victuallers' Society, has [illegible] consented to lay the first stone of the new wing which it has been determined to add to this valuable institution. It is proposed that the interesting ceremony shall take place on Tuesday, the 29th of May, which will be the twenty first anniversary of the laying of the first stone of the original portion of the edifice by the late Duke of Sussex, the then patron of the society.

GRAND MASONIC FESTIVAL.—On Wednesday evening a the annual grand festival of the Masons of England took place at Freemasons' Hall, Great Queen-street. The Earl of Zetland, Most Worshipful Grand Master, presided, supported by Lord Suffield, R. Alston, Esq., W. F. Beadnell, Esq., and [illegible], with about 400 brethren, attired in full masonic costume, sat down to a most excellent repast. The evening was enlivened by vocal and instrumental music, under the direction of Mr. J. W. Hobbs. The Countess [illegible] about 100 ladies were in the gallery.

THE ALLEGED LUNATICS' FRIEND SOCIETY.—The general meeting of this society was held on Tuesday last, at their offices, Craven-street, Strand, when a report was read of the proceedings during the last year, and of the cases in which the society's interference had been beneficial. The thanks of the members were stated "to be pre-eminently due to the public press, which had conducted in a most powerful manner the abuses existing under the present law of lunacy." A petition praying for a commission of inquiry was also agreed upon and signed, and will be forthwith presented to both Houses of Parliament.

ROBBERY.—On Tuesday afternoon, some thieves entered the house of Mr. Maurice Fry, wine merchant, Cornelia-street, Strand, and stole his cash-box, containing upwards of £500, in notes, gold, silver, and [illegible].

BARBAROUS CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.—On Wednesday evening, some lads, leaving the Grecian School, Great Queen street, Lincoln's Inn-fields, discovered a basket in Middle [illegible] the top of the basket [illegible] containing six or seven cats [illegible] skins, and yet alive. The poor animals were forthwith [illegible] their misery, in the presence of the [illegible] agony, till some labourers, who were passing, [illegible] them from their torture. The object of this cruelty is to procure the glossy appearance on the skins of the animals, as they would be otherwise valueless for the furrier.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—Mr. Tuxford, of Elm Bank Cottage, Barnes, was returning home from town, between eight and nine o'clock on Tuesday evening, accompanied by a young lady, named Rogerson, in a chaise, when the horse took fright in passing through Kensington, and became quite unmanageable. In its headlong career it knocked down two cabs, named Boucher and Connell, who were seriously injured. The phaeton then came in contact with one of the leaves of an omnibus, the pole of which struck Mr. Tuxford, who was dangerously hurt. The lady is rescued from the phaeton, but, melancholy to relate, she almost instantly expired—evidently from [illegible] fear. The horse subsequently [illegible] from the fright; it was of an exceedingly nervous temperament [illegible].

as he thought of his stern task-master; then, like Ferdinand, in "The Tempest," exclaimed, as he conjured up the image of his beautiful young mistress—

Oh! she is ten times more gentle than her father's crabbed.

At the present day there is nothing either grand or striking in this wealthy street. You see, here and there, a name on a common brass-plate, which, in the commercial world, is "a tower of strength:" excepting this, there is no visible sign of the "unsunned treasures" that lie within. The houses have a plain, substantial look—a kind of commanding solidity, which seems in accordance with their unostentatious owners. Enter, and you tread the true "Californian" regions, where the gold is ready minted: bring a good cheque, and you need neither spade nor shovel; the "digging and the washing" are not required there. What a staff of clerks! all busily engaged! What numbers of ledgers are in use! And after the day's business is closed, all those account-books are stowed away in a fire-proof room underground, and brought up again in the morning, and placed in readiness before the banker's clerks arrive; and in some of these houses expensive machinery has been fitted up, to facilitate the lowering and raising of the bulky ledgers into and out of the fire-proof vaults below. Look at that young man, with his banking-case chained under his arm! the roll of cheques and notes he holds in his hand probably amounts to thousands; he only catches the eye of one of the clerks, calls out the amount, hands the bulky bundle over the brass railing, and departs, leaving the sum to be counted over at leisure. See how carelessly the cashier handles that heavy bag of gold: he has no time to count it, but thrusts it into the scale as a coal-heaver would a sack of coals: so long as it's weight, that's all he cares about; he then shoots it out into his large drawer, and throws the bag aside as if he did not mind a straw whether a sovereign or two stuck inside or not: this done, he begins to shovel it out, and pay away. He counts sovereigns by twos and threes at a time; you feel confident that he must have given you either too many or too few, he appears so negligent: you count, and there they are to one—he never makes a mistake.

Go and pay in a sum of money, or take up a bill, with gold that looks light, and you will see another of his "sleight-of-hand" tricks. His jerks the one out of the scale without touching it, excepting with the sovereign he puts in, with such rapidity that you cannot catch the action, cannot see how it is done; the sovereigns seem to fly in and out as if by magic. You might try for months and never be able to catch that peculiar jerk. You fancy that he must be weary of counting sovereigns; that a good pile of dirty brown coppers would be a great relief to him, equal at least to a change of diet. You wonder his countenance is not yellow through bending over such piles of coins, and that, like the buttercups in the meadows steeped in sunshine, his face does not Give back gold for gold.

Sometimes these clerks are kept for hours beyond their usual time to rectify an error of sixpence in the balance, when during the day thousands of pounds have been entered. The mistake rests somewhere, and must be discovered before they quit the banking-house: and column after column is gone over again; that weary array of figures is summed up and up, and compared, and called over until the mistake is righted. They would gladly pay the amount twenty times over to get away, but that would be the ruin of a system the very stability of which rests upon its being correct to the "uttermost farthing."

With the following picture of an old-fashioned banker, which we select from a recent work on "Banks and Banking," we conclude the present sketch:—

"He bore little resemblance to his modern successor: he was a man of serious manners, plain apparel, the steadiest conduct, and a rigid observer of formalities. As you looked in his face, you could read, in intelligible characters, that the ruling maxim of his life, the one to which he turned all his thoughts, and by which he shaped all his actions, was, that he who would be trusted with the money of other men, should look as if he deserved the trust, and be an ostensible pattern to society of probity, exactness, frugality, and decorum. He lived the greater part of the year at his banking-house, was punctual to the hours of business, and always to be found at his desk."

rooms, given in our representation, shows a fire-place of stone, in the Tudor style: the spandrils are enriched with a rose, from which proceeds or extends a large leaf-shaped ornament, terminating in a snake's tail. This fire-place was, until lately, hidden from view by plaster, and is the only one of the kind in the house.

The front of the old building is one of the projecting character, supported by a narrow pier at the side, and a bolder one somewhat out of the centre; near to which is the entrance to what was lately the bar. As the house has just

THE CATHEDRAL, FREDERICTON, NEW BRUNSWICK, NORTH AMERICA.

The Diocese of Fredericton, which comprises the whole of the large province of New Brunswick, was included, until A. D. 1845, within that of Nova Scotia. In that year the Rev. Dr. Mabley was consecrated first Bishop of the newly-formed Diocese; and, shortly after his arrival, laid the foundation-stone of his contemplated Cathedral. Owing to various obstacles, the works were suspended until 1847.

It was originally intended that the edifice should be built after the model of St Mary's, Snettisham, Norfolk; but the peculiarity of the site and other circumstances necessitated a change in the design, which has probably given it a more cathedral-like aspect. The nave and aisles are 80 feet long by 57 feet wide, and 60 feet high to the apex of the roof. The choir is 70 feet in length, and is separated from the nave by a lofty chancel arch and an open screen. The transept, formed by north and south towers, as in Exeter Cathedral, is 100 feet long. The total height of the towers is about 180 feet. The walls are built of an excellent stone, quarried near Fredericton; and the pillars, niches, quoins, &c. are of a hard freestone from the Bay of Fundy. The windows and doorways are of Caen stone, executed in Exeter, and thence shipped to their destination, where they arrived with very trivial injury, such a cargo having, perhaps, never before left the British shore.

The building is beautifully situated on the banks of the St. John, one of the noblest rivers in British North America. It is one of the first attempts in the colonies to rear a temple to God after the model of those which are the glory and ornament of the "old country;" and will doubtless cheer the sad heart of many a wanderer from his native land, as he gazes on what may be but the faint reflection of the hallowed minsters of England, but which may nevertheless be vivid enough to recal to his remembrance the haunts of his childhood, and the "blessed memories" of his home.

The architect of the Cathedral is Frank Wills, Esq., of Exeter, who left England for the purpose of superintending the construction.

THE PRESIDENT'S GRAND BALL, AT PARIS.

MONUMENT TO DAVID ROSS DIXON.

This interesting memorial has been erected in the Churchyard of St. Saviour's parish, to the memory of Mr. D. Ross Dixon, who lost his life by a fall of stones after the explosion of a mine in St. Catherine's Bay, Guernsey, on the 14th of March, 1848. Mr. Dixon was much respected as the overseer of the works in the harbour of refuge which her Majesty's Government is constructing at Guernsey.

The Monument (a pedestal and broken column) is of Caen stone. It has been built by subscription of the labourers to express their respect for the memory of the deceased.

On the pedestal of the column is the following inscription engraved on a marble tablet:—

MONUMENT TO DAVID ROSS DIXON, AT GUERNSEY.

In memory of
DAVID Ross DIXON,
[illegible],
who met his death while [illegible] on the Harbour-works,
St. Catherine's Bay, on the 14th March, 1848, in the [illegible] year of his age.
The workmen under his charge and [illegible] of their affectionate Chief and [illegible],
Have raised this Monument (evidence [illegible]
as a tribute of respect to [illegible].

And promised brighter things to bear;
Death struck when he was least aware,
And now in ruins he lies."

PARIS FASHIONS FOR MAY.

lettes do not display their attractions less in our most fashionable soirées than which appear to have taken advantage of the interval by producing very attractive novelties. Light tissues do not appear, but they are ready: barèges will still be in demand; they will be worn of large twining patterns, or in detached flowers, on a dark ground, such as a deep blue ground, with small flowers; as will, also, striped taffetas, shot with every shade, and zebra silks, such as are indicated in the engraving. The form of the dresses varies but little; the fulness of the skirts continues increasing; flounces are more in use; but trimmings, fringes, &c. are much in request. Less small morning dresses are trimmed up the front with ruches, which are quite the rage; they are cut à l'empereur, and placed on dresses, mantles, and bonnets. Ribbons of the kinds of gros de Naples, tulle, crape, and are lighter and prettier than ribbon quilled à la ruche, which was worn last year, but created the great inconvenience of being nests for lint.

Mantles are made of shot silk, and are trimmed with a double row of deep lace; the shape is hollowed out in front, so as to display the form of the shoulders. They are worn shorter, and more to the figure, than heretofore. In warm weather they will be adopted with white muslin, as our grandmothers wore them. The form of the bonnets is very open; they are trimmed with broad ruches of tulle, over and under the brim. Common straws are very simply trimmed. Rice straws are ornamented with spring flowers, such as snow-balls, hawthornes, and hawthorn. Garden flowers, such as the new purple figure, are rather uncommon, but little worn; they are rather an attempted innovation than an adopted fashion.

Collars are worn small; muslin chemisettes are much covered with broidery; cuffs are always in puffings or guffered quillings. For morning, some ladies have adopted revers of stiffened cambric, called bayadères, formed in the front with closed gold buttons, or with boutons de perles; the cuffs are the made of cambric, in gauntlet shape, and are fastened with two buttons similar to the bayaderes chemisette. This morning costume is becoming to very young persons.

The dress's dress is more attended than ever: plaid ribbons are much in vogue for blouses, to be cut square at the back a cut, with full sleeves. These blouses are trimmed with broad velvet at the top and bottom; a wide velvet band forming the brace, with rounded lappets, adjusts this blouse on the shoulders. Under it, either very cambric sleeves, fastened up to the bread like chemisettes, or have large sleeves, drawn in at the wrist. Their hair is usually cut à la Edouard.

In this illustration the bonnet is of rough straw, and worn with flowers. The manclet is of black silk, with two volants of black lace, and the robe of gray [illegible].

The bonnet en capote is of white gauze, with rows of satin of the same color. The col and manchettes are quite new, à la mousquetaire, single, and without any ornament; the former has six or seven buttons of jasper, &c., the latter two buttons.

A grand ball was given on Saturday night at the Elysée, by the President of the Republic, in celebration anniversary of his birthday. The Elysée Palace having completed his 41st year. There were about 1800 persons present. Dancing commenced at nine o'clock, and the President of the Republic opened the ball with the Princess Gallitzin; one of the Princesses Murat; the Princess Mathilde, Lady Value, and the Duke of Trévise (Oudalincourt), taking part in the same quadrille. The Prince was most particular in his attentions to the Marechalate of Londonderry. At twelve o'clock the Princess Mathilde, the cousin, the Princess Mathilde, and proceeded to the supper-room. The coup-d'œil, as the company ascended to the supper-room, was magnificent. Four quadrants were laid out for refreshments, and in each were five tables covered with all the del cacies of the season. After supper dancing was resumed, and kept up till four o'clock. The display of diamonds was magnificent. All the Ministers, with the exception of the Marquis of Normanby and the Duke of Sotomayor, were present. Amongst the most distinguished personages were Prince Paul Wurtemburg, the Princess of Lichtenberg, who was literally covered with diamonds, the Princess Dowager of Moskwa, the Duchess of Grammont, Lady Alcsbury, Madame Drouyn de Lhuys, the lady of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, General Fabvier, who has just returned from Denmark [illegible].

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF INVESTIGATION.

The report of the Committee of Investigation into the affairs of this Company was issued late on Thursday afternoon. The Committee state that after a preliminary examination of the accounts, they did not consider it necessary to carry it examination further back than the 4th of January, 1844. At that date the capital of the Company was £2,905,780. After that date the capital rapidly increased, so that, according to the statement published by the Directors on the 31st of November, 1848, it amounted, on the Eastern Counties Railway, to £10,851,693; and on the Norfolk Railway, to £2,387,863; making a total nominal capital of £13,239,556, including the 10s. per share paid on the £1 087,003. With the branch lines, the total length of the Eastern Counties and Northern and Eastern Amalgamated Railway is 228 miles. The Norfolk Railway, worked under lease by the Eastern Counties Company, is 97 miles; the Newmarket, 18 miles; and the St. Ives and Huntingdon branch of the East Anglian Railway, worked by the Eastern Counties Company, 5 miles: making a total length of line worked by the Eastern Counties Company of 117 miles. The Eastern Union Line, of 92 miles in length, and the East Anglian, of 64 miles, are also worked in connexion with the Eastern Counties Company, making an aggregate length of 273 miles. Instead of the three lines working and competing together, as their mutual interests would point out, a spirit of hostility and retaliation has prevailed in many of their transactions. To which the Committee think if time and shall be put, "so that the shareholders in the respective undertakings may receive the profits to which they are entitled, without seeking to take away those belonging to their neighbours." The promoters of the Harwich Steam-packet Company informed the Committee that they did not want any advance of money from the railway company, and the Committee are of opinion that no such advance should be made to them. The Committee think [illegible] establish a steam-packet communication between Harwich and the Continent; but, believing that the station will be of great importance to the railway, the Committee think that every reasonable facility should be given in the first instance, be given to the transit of passengers and the conveyance of the mail.

The Eastern Union Company are to make the line to Harwich at a cost not exceeding £200,000, and the Eastern Counties Company have agreed to lease it in perpetuity at 4½ per cent. on the outlay, and granting powers to the Eastern Union Company to run trains upon the line, dividing the mileage receipts after deducting thirty-three per cent. for working expenses. The larger portion of the agreement, however, requires the sanction of the Eastern Counties proprietors. By the act of amalgamation with the Northern and Eastern Company, £1000 per annum is allowed to six directors of that Company, who are also paid as Eastern Counties Directors, although they hold no shares in the Company. The Committee doubt whether this arrangement is productive of any benefit to the Company, and submit that all payments beyond the £1000 to those gentlemen shou d cease. The Committee think it inexpedient to proceed with the Wisbeach and Spalding line. After studying the plan of the line, the Committee state that the amount expended on "stations has been very great," "much of the money has been improvidently spent," and the extravagance appears to the Committee "quite unjustifiable."

NORFOLK RAILWAY. After viewing the line, and taking evidences on the subject, the Committee have resolved to recommend the carrying out of the amalgamation between the Norfolk and Eastern Counties Companies, expressing an opinion that if the opposition to the amalgamation bill should succeed, "irreparable injury will be done to the Eastern Counties Company, without a countervailing benefit to the Norfolk Company."

NEWMARKET AND CHESTERFORD.—The Committee do not recommend the carrying on the arrangements which the Company have hitherto adhered to proposed (three per cent. on the capital for the first two years, and three-and-a-half per cent. per annum after that time in perpetuity), but they think that an arrangement mutually satisfactory may hereafter be made with a much greater return.

FAST MANAGEMENT. The Company was formed in 1835, from which period it was directed by a Board, without material change, until October, 1849; and from a cursory examination of the accounts to that period, the Committee see no reason for suspecting any culpable neglect on the part of the Directors. The last half yearly meeting, held August 26, 1845, a dividend of 3s. per share was declared, which appeared to have been duly earned. In the course of the following half-year Mr. Hudson and Mr. Waddington joined the direction, it being understood that the former gentleman was to have the "entire control and management of the affairs of the Company," while the latter was appointed so as to give Mr. Waddington "the management of the traffic." On the 22d of December, 1845, it was resolved to declare a dividend of 9s. per share, but when the accounts were made up they did not show any such dividend had been earned, and accordingly "the traffic accounts were altered, and the expenses were squared to suit the dividend, and not the dividend to suit the expenses." This system has been followed, so that up to the 4th of July, 1848, the amount to which these arbitrary differences ascend was £115,278 8s. 8d., while the amount paid in dividend was £575,714 8s. 8d., so that twenty-one per cent. more was paid in dividends than the accounts warranted. In addition to the sum of £115,278 8s. 8d. just mentioned, the accountants employed by the Committee report further sum of £205,294 7s. 5d. has been charged [illegible] that which ought fairly to have been charged to revenue, so that, instead of £714 8s. 8d., only £236,141 12s. 6d., ought fairly to have been applied to dividend. The Committee refer to the statement of facts for the foregoing. They appear to be "various sums under the head of rents which were apparently [illegible] citations, and created for the purpose of increasing the revenue, and to aid in giving a good appearance of stability to the Company in the opening dividends which it was considered policy to declare." In 1846 and 1847 there appears to have been charged under the head of parliamentary expenses £29696 17s. 6d., the precise character of which the Committee do not state, but a further sum of £600 to Mr. Waddington "for services rendered to the Company." The management of the Company has been so arranged as to leave it "almost exclusively in the hands of Mr. Hudson and Mr. Waddington," and the Committee [illegible] to the shareholders to judge whether "this constitution" of the management "be either the best or a wise one."

PRESENT POSITION OF THE COMPANY. The Committee consider, that, before application of capital to current expenses [illegible] there has been, in many instances, expenditure which has greatly augmented the cost of the [illegible] which must permanently diminish the profits to the shareholders. [illegible] a considerable amount must be added to the capital account before it can be closed, it appearing, from statements made by the officers of the Company, that the liabilities of the Company exceed the assets by about £500,000. The Committee, from the best inquiries they could make, are of opinion that £100 per mile per annum, or about £32,200 per annum, will be necessary to be set aside for the maintenance of the permanent way; and they recommend that the rolling stock should be "kept up and renewed out of the earnings of the Company," in preference to any depreciation fund being created for that purpose. On the subject of the half-yearly dividend, the Committee say "The account, as exhibited to the last general meeting, gives a sum of £236,887 as the net profit of the half year; but your Committee regret they cannot acquiesce in its correctness, payments to the total amount of £97,364 14s. 3d., which ought to have been defrayed from the revenue account, having been put to the debit of capital account, which, if properly charged in the books of the Company, would have diminished the balance of the half year to £65253 8s. 7d. So that the real result of the half-yearly [illegible] of the earnings of the Company," in preference to "remaining is too small for any dividend, and must be carried forw rd towards that of the ne[illegible]."

FUTURE PROSPECTS OF THE COMPANY.—The Committee do not wish to allude to what may be the probable dividends hereafter, but they venture to make some practical recommendations as to the future administration of the affairs of the Company: 1. That steps be taken to settle all liabilities of the Company and close the capital account. 2. That the number of Directors be reduced, to secure more [illegible] than usual; but they be more liberally paid than hitherto, as the Committee are of opin on "that the services of properly qualified persons of commercial attainments cannot be readily secured at the present payment, unless future objects were the inducement." 3. That provision be made for the efficient audit of the accounts by accountants of no nuisance. 4. That the law expenses already incurred be taxed, and a law clerk appointed at a fixed stipend. 5. That a revision of the number and speed of trains take place, and every economy carried out in the working of the line that can be "without detriment to public convenience or to the safe and efficient working of the railway." The Committee conclude their report by stating, that they have received every facility in conducting their investigations from the Chairman, Directors, and every officer of the Company.

ARNOLD AND THE GRAND JUNCTION.—A Report is a postscript, which states that, while the Committee declare no dividend can be paid, the accountants' report shows that 3s. 4d. could be paid. The Committee, however, recommend that this sum, arose from a sum of £64,748 9s. 3d. for rolling stock, improperly charged to capital account, having been left to the Committee to deal with as they thought proper, the accountants not thinking it right that the whole charge should fall on one half-year; but the Committee, considering that, to meet the liabilities of the Company, the borrowing powers must be resorted to, and the importance of maintaining the credit of the Company, are of opinion that the whole amount should be at once disposed of.

WISBEACH, ST. IVES, AND CAMBRIDGE JUNCTION.—In a second postscript to their report, the Committee state that their attention has been called to a transaction connected with this line, which they think it necessary to lay before the shareholders. One-third of the shares were originally allotted to the Eastern Counties Railway Company, and the two-thirds were subsequently purchased at a premium of two pounds per share. On examining the books it was discovered that £2000 was paid to Mr. Hudson, and £200 to Mr. Waddington, for which no voucher could be found. Whether those gentlemen ever paid their deposit upon those shares, the Committee have endeavoured to learn; but it is possible they did, because there stands to the credit of the Wisbeach and St. Ives account, in the books of the Company, the sum of £2000, against which there is no explanation.

The report, of which the above is an abstract, fills fifteen closely-printed royal octavo pages, and has attached to it upwards of fifty pages of evidence and explanatory appendices. In one part of the evidence, Mr. Waddington states, on Mr. Hudson properly, that he was present when the half-yearly dividend, on July 4, 1848, be remonstrated; but Mr. Hudson was determined, and, in order to declare the dividend, directed the accountant so to alter the accounts as to carry £10,000 from the revenue to the capital account, stating that when the Midland line was opened to Peterborough the traffic would considerably increase, which, with certain savings to be effected in the expenditure, would enable them to make good, out of the future profits of the Company, the amount so omitted from the half-year's accounts.

REGULATION EXTRAORDINARY.—NOVEL CAPTURE.—The parties in a chemical manufactory in Glasgow having from time to time missed in an unaccountable manner some of their most valuable compounds, at length suspected that they had been appropriated by one or other of their numerous customers. With the view of detecting the offender, a minute thread, communicating with a hand-bell, was attached to one of the bottles, which it was thought probable would be selected by the unknown thief. Of course the moment the thread was sufficiently tightened the alarm would be given, and it was hoped that by this means a discovery would be made. The result justified the steps which had been taken, for early on Tuesday morning the bell was seen in the habit of making purchases from the manufactory in question, was in the shop. After buying some articles, he was in the act of turning to leave the premises, when the bell was heard to ring violently, and he was at once in the party. A criminal officer having been sent for, the bottle which communicated with the bell was found in his pockets, and on further search at his residence a great number of valuable drugs, which had been missed, were found, and also got there. The party is respectably connected.

PAPIER MACHE.—Messrs. Jonnens and Bettridge have manufactured for the Queen of Spain a complete set of furniture of papier mache, the value of which was forwarded to Madrid on Thursday. The form is novel, and the Arabesque designs are enriched with mother of pearl; whilst in the centre of the table is beautiful specimen of British art was inspected by Her Majesty and Prince Albert, by whom it was much admired.

The system adopted in the streets of the west end of the metropolis of cleansing the thoroughfares by means of street orderlies, has met with the approval and support of several of the heads and authorities of the Government offices. The Ordnance and India Boards have each subscribed £5 to the funds

Mr. Grubam, of Mr. Cooper's Observatory, Markree Castle, Sligo, and Mr. Gerigan, of Mr. Dawes's Parks, have written to Mr. Hind, of Mr. Jones's observatory, Regent's Park, notifying their discovery of two new comets—Mr Graham's being at present situated in Bodes, and M. Goujon's in the constellation Crater. Both comets, it is said, are in very favorable positions for observation during the absence of moonlight.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Consols have scarcely fluctuated during the week, and the business done has been nearly confined to speculative transactions. The opening price on Monday was 91¼ to 92¼, closing at 92, remaining at the same quotation during Tuesday (once only receding to 91¾), but advancing on Wednesday to 92⅛, closing at 92⅛. On Thursday, however, a reaction reduced the quotation to 91⅞, but from which price since rallied. Exchequer bills continue firm, and East India Bonds have advanced from the demand consequent upon their being the only floating security paying 4¾ per cent. But little has been done in the heavy Stocks, the closing quotations of the week being, for Bank Stock, 194; Reduced, 90¾; Consols, 91⅞ Now 3½ per Cent. Annuities, 91¼; Long Annuities, to expire Jan. 1859, 9 9-16; Ditto, 30 years, October 1874, 9⅝; India Stock, 264; India Bonds, £1000, 68; Ditto, under £1000, 67; Consols for Account, 92; Exchequer bills, £1000, June, 48.

The attention of the Foreign Market has been principally directed to Spanish and Mexican, which have both advanced during the week. The Five per Cent. Spanish Active Stock opened on Monday at 19¼, and gradually declined since altered the quotation nearly 1 per cent. The Three per Cents on Monday were 32¾ to ¾, but selling for realisation has since reduced the quotation to 32. Mexican on Monday was 20½ to ⅝, closing at 20 to 20. On Wednesday, however, quotations ranged to 20¾, 21, 21½, in consequence of large purchases; and on Thursday morning it transpired that by the West Indian packet Messrs. Schroder & Co. had received permission from the Mexican Government to apply the sum in their hands to the payment of 2 of a dividend, which of course relieves the bondholders from the obligation of paying interest on the arrears, as it was proposed, and from the subject worthy of comment, and closes at—Austrian Five per Cents., 79; Brazilian Bonds, New, 1843, ; Equador Bonds, 4; Grenada Bonds, One per Cent., Deferred, 2½; Mexican Bonds, 5 per Cents, 19¾; Mexican, Five per Cent., 21; Ditto, Account, with Coupons, 21½; Portuguese, Five per Cent., 75; Ditto, Four per Cent. 59½; Ditto, Account, 59½; Russian Bonds, 104; Spanish, Five per Cent., 1840, Account, 17½; Ditto, Three per Cent., Account, 32; Venezuela Bonds, Lane-and-Quarter per Cent., 25; Ditto, Deferred, 8, Dutch Four per Cent Certificates, 71 Shares continue dull from absence of business, and the disposition to hear, while the public do little to support the market. THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE. During the present week, the arrivals of English wheat for our market, both coastwise as well as by land carriage, have been on a very moderate scale, yet they have proved quite equal to the wants of the buyers. All kinds have met a very slow inquiry at barely stationary prices. Foreign wheats have ruled dull, at a decline in the value of 1s per quarter. Barley—the quantity of which on offer and coastwise continues moderate—has met extreme moderate inquiry, but has commanded very [illegible] produced in a very inactive state, at barely late prices. All other articles of grain have moved off slowly at unaltered prices. In flour, very few sales have taken place.

English—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 40s to 50s; ditto, white, 42s to 54s; Suffolk, red, 38s to 48s; ditto, white, 40s to 50s; rye, 22s to 27s; grinding barley, 22s to 25s; distilling ditto, 26s to 28s; malting ditto, 29s to 34s; Norfolk and Lincoln malt 32s to 36s; brown ditto, 26s to 30s; Ringston and Ware, 38s to 56s; Chevalier, 38s to 42s; Lincolnshire and Yorkshire oats (coarse), 15s to 16s; ditto (fine), 17s to 18s; Dunghal and Cork, black, 15s to 17s; ditto, white, 18s to 19s; beans, new, 22s to 24s; old, 26s to 28s; grey peas, 30s to 34s; maple, 32s to 34s; white, 28s to 30s; harlots, 35s to 38s, per quarter. Town made flour 43s to 45s; Suffolk, 36s to 38s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 32s to 36s per 280 lbs.—Foreign: Dantz red wheat, —s to —s; white, —s to —s; barley, 15s to —s; oats, —s to —s; beans, —s to —s; per quarter. Flour, American, 20s to 22s per barrel; Baltic, [illegible].

The Seed Market.—So little business is doing in our market that prices are almost nominal. Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 50s; Baltic, crushing, 38s to 40s. Rapeseed, [illegible] Mediterranean, 38s to 40s. Hempseed, 32s to 34s per quarter: [illegible] to 36s. Canary seed, 40s to 42s. Coriander, 12s to 13s. Tares, old, 10s to 12s. Trefoil, [illegible] to 30s. Carraway seed, new, £36 to £38 per last of ten quarter [illegible]. Rapecake, English, £9 5s to £9 10s; ditto, foreign, £9 to £9 5s per 1000. Linseed cakes, £4 5s to £4 10s per ton. Canary 12os to 12os per quarter. English Clover-seed, red, 4s to 5s; extra, —s to —s; white, —s to —s; extra, 6s to —s. Foreign, red, —s to —s; extra, —s; white, —s to —s; extra, —s.

Provisions.—Very little business doing in this article and the prices of which are fairly supported. Good ordinary Cevlon has sold at 31s to 32s 6d; and real good Ord, 32s to 33s per cwt.

Coffee.—There is rather more doing in this article and the prices of which are fairly supported. Good ordinary Ceylon has sold at 31s to 32s 6d; and real good Ord, 32s to 33s per cwt.

Sugar.—[illegible] though the public demand has advanced [illegible] than last week, the business doing in our market is small. P.C.O., on the spot, is quoted 34s 6d to 35s per cwt for refinery. During the last three months, 45s 6d per cwt.

Oils.—Linseed oil is very generally, is fast. For barne lso, scarcely any sales have taken place, and the export demand has almost wholly ceased. Prices are decidedly lower.

Coals.—Coals: Hartleys, 13s 6d; Wylam, 13s 6d; West Hartley, 13s 6d; Cassop, 12s 6d; Brandyll's, Hetton, 13s, Thornley, 12s, and Hartley, 14s per ton.

Tallow.—Town Tallow: Stearine hay, 42s 6d to 43s; very finest ditto, 43 6s to £4 15s; and straw, 41 6s to £4 10s per load.

Spirits.—The market for rum is [illegible] very dull state, and prices are with difficulty supported. Proof Leeward Islands, 1s 6d and East India, 1s 8d per gallon. Brandy dull, without [illegible] rates are quite as dear.

Wool.—The accounts from the manufacturing districts being unfavorable, the wool trade here is heavy, at barely last week's prices. Large public sales of colonial are expected to take place next month.

Potatoes.—The best samples [illegible] dy, at 100s to 180s per ton. In the middling and inferior kinds, very little is doing.

Smithfield.—The supplies of fat stock having been considerably on the increase, the general demand has ruled dull, to the currency of the quarter, at several trifles below the quotations of the last Monday.

RETURN OF THE PRESIDENT OF LIBERIA.

THE PRESIDENT OF LIBERIA.

We have been favoured by an officer of the Amazon corvette with the accompanying Sketch of the return of the President of Liberia, whose embarkation in the above vessel from Plymouth, it will be recollected, was illustrated in our Journal of December 16th last. Appended to the Engraving will be found a brief notice of the colony.]

By our Correspondent's letter, it appears that the President landed at Monrovia, on the 31st of January last; and the Sketch shows the locality and leading incidents of the return. To the left is seen the town, and on the right Cape Mesurado, with its lighthouse, and the Amazon and Decatur, gaily dressed. The President has just landed, and is listening to the address voted to him, and being read by a native; Captain Trowbridge, of the Amazon, and Captain Byrne, of the Decatur, being also present. The guard is composed of the Liberian fencibles, under Colonel Hull. There was also a crowd of colonists, and a band of music, to receive the President.

Our Correspondent adds, the Colony is a very fertile place, indigo and coffee growing in the very streets; but there was great difficulty in getting supplies.

IMPERIAL PRESENT.

We have been favoured with a Sketch of the magnificent Gold Enamelled Snuff-Box, set in brilliants, value 1000 guineas, which has been lately presented to Mr. Joseph White, of Cowes, shipbuilder, through his Excellency the Baron Brunnow, the Russian Minister, by command of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias. The Box bears no inscription, but was accompanied by a letter, containing sufficient indication of the object of the gift, viz.—"As a testimonial for services rendered to the Imperial Russian Navy during the year 1848." Those services, we learn, were the appropriation of two Imperial line-of-battle ships for the auxiliary screw, and which are now in the course of alteration, at the Imperial Arsenal at Cronstadt, from the designs and plans furnished by Mr. White.

It has been inferred by some of our contemporaries that the present had reference to the splendid schooner yacht the Queen Victoria, built by Mr. White, for the Emperor, in 1847, and engraved in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.) Such, however, is not the fact. Fine examples of Mr. White's skill as a shipbuilder are before the public, several of his lines having been introduced into our own navy, as well as those of foreign powers. We have only to instance the two late flag-ships of the Royal Yacht Squadron, the Watersnich and the Kestrel, as also her Majesty's brigs, Daring and Comet, each of 12 guns; and the new 50-gun frigate Phantom, lately constructed at Deptford, and about to be commissioned as one of the experimental squadron of heavy frigates for the ensuing summer.

We learn also that Mr White has been directed by the Austrian Government to furnish lines for a large frigate, which, on approval, will be constructed at his building-yard, at Cowes.

The Box has been shown to her Majesty and Prince Albert, who were graciously pleased to express their approbation of the magnificent present.

In the centre of the Snuff-Box is an exquisite painting in enamel, intended to represent the Temple of Peace, surrounded with a circle containing twenty-one large diamonds, set in silver; and on either side are two massive diamonds, to form roses, with leaves and flowers corresponding—all composed of brilliants. Our Engraving shows the exact size and detail of this very superb testimonial.

THE "ELFIN" STEAMER.

THIS steam despatch-boat has been built to run between Gosport and the Isle of Wight. She was launched from the Royal dockyard, at Chatham, on February 8, when Mrs. Allen, sister of Mr. Lang, the builder, named the boat. The Elfin is a beautiful little vessel, and the following are her principal dimensions, viz.

		ft.	in.
Length, between perpendiculars	.. ..	103	6
Length of keel for tonnage	.. ..	93	11
Breadth extreme	.. ..	14	6
Breadth for tonnage	.. ..	13	4
Depth in hold	.. ..	7	3
Burden in tons (new)	.. ..	180	0
Burden in tons (old)	.. ..	165	14
Smaller tonnage	.. ..	43	261

Her draught of water, on being brought up to the sheer hulk, was 2 feet 4½ inches afore, and 9 feet 3 inches abaft.

On Friday last, the Elfin made an experimental trip: after leaving Blackwall, she proceeded to Halfway Reach, and then returned to Blackwall, to land Captain Ellice, comptroller of steam machinery; and Mr. Lloyd, chief engineer of the Admiralty. The Elfin accomplished the entire distance from Blackwall to Chatham in 3 hours and 17 minutes; and her engines, two of 20-horse power each, on the oscillating principle, by Messrs. George and Sir John Rennie, were worked for some time at the rate of 66 revolutions per minute. There was no opportunity of testing the speed of the Elfin at the measured mile, which is usually done by running four or six times up or down the measured distance in Long Reach.

INCREASED COMFORT FOR EMIGRANTS.—A mode of fitting emigrant ships, according to a plan proposed by Lieutenant Hedder, R.N., Government Emigration Officer at Liverpool, is thus described:—The trouble and expense of fitting these ships has been always very great, whilst the comfort afforded to the passengers has been extremely limited. By the proposed mode, however, the space which is appropriated for the sleeping berths of eight persons is converted, during the day, into an extremely comfortable mess place, with table and seats for the accommodation of the same eight persons. This is effected by having the bed-places formed of a network of plaited web, resembling horse-girth, extending between two horizontal iron rods, placed one at the foot and the other at the head of the bed: the beds being placed, as at present, in two tiers. These, during the day, are rolled up, and are stowed in a very small compass in the central part of the deck; and in the space thus cleared by their removal a portable table and benches are erected in a few seconds, forming a comfortable mess-place during the day. The advantages of extra cleanliness and increased ventilation gained by this arrangement can only be fully understood by personal inspection, as well as the perfect simplicity of the plan, and the facility with which the changes are effected. Some Australian emigrant ships have been thus fitted.

THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH IN THE LATE STORM.—MR. C. F. Walker, superintendent of telegraphs on the South-eastern Railway, in a letter to the daily papers, thus describes the damage which occurred to the telegraph poles on that line of railway from the snow-storm of Thursday week, between Pluckley and Ashford, Hythe and Folkestone, and especially between Ashford and Hythe:—"At 6 P.M. frost attended the snow, and it began to congeal with the rain about the telegraph wires. This process continued until the wires along their whole length were each enclosed in a coating of snow about the thickness of a man's arm. This accumulated weight required little aid from the wind (which, indeed, blew a gale) to bear down the poles. Before midnight some 60 or more poles, either singly or in sets of two, three, and in some cases four or five, were broken short off at the ground, and as many more were overthrown. I visited the various scenes of the accident the following morning, and, from the examinations I was able to make of the snow cylinders, I believe that each yard of wire was surrounded by not less than 10lb. or 12lb of congealed snow. Each pole had to sustain a weight of from 2000lb to 3000lb, and in some cases double this. In places where the poles withstood the pressure, the wires were so extended by the weight as nearly to touch the ground. On the snow leaving them they nearly recovered their original position—an interesting proof this of the value of iron wire. In the cases where lengths of copper wire were exposed, they have not recovered their original position."

THE PROGRESS OF REVOLUTION IN PRUSSIA.

There has lately been an apparent lull in the revolutionary storms of Germany. A period of comparative quiet succeeded those eventful days when Marshal Windischgrätz reduced the Viennese into subjection by the red right arm of his physical power; and when the King of Prussia, by agencies equally irresistible, placed his turbulent capital under military law. But the outward calm of the nations of Germany has only been skin deep. The passions have been at work underneath, and have only awaited an opportunity for a new explosion. It would now seem that the opportunity has arisen, and that the first act of the drama having been played out, and a decent interval of repose having been allowed to elapse, the curtain is about to rise upon the second. Europe looks on, a highly interested if not alarmed spectator; and even France, engaged as she is in her own revolutionary comedy, turns her attentive eyes to that serious drama in which Germany is playing her part for the instruction and warning of the world, no less than for her own great purposes of national and social development.

At Berlin, at Frankfort, and in the plains of Hungary, three great and correlative agencies are in motion. In Berlin the Revolution and the King are in open conflict, striving for the mastery. In Frankfort the Revolution has the upper hand; but is without force to back its pretensions, except the force of ideas. In Hungary, the Revolution—represented not by theorists and demagogues, but by soldiers with arms in their hands—is for a while triumphant; and Austria, that a few months ago seemed to have thrown off the mask of decrepitude and senility, and to have assumed with her youthful looks a youthful vigour for which the world had long ceased to give her credit, has relapsed into her ancient helplessness. One of her two strong men, Windischgrätz, has failed her in her need; the other, Jellachich, has betrayed views of his own, which render him an unsafe reliance: and Kossuth, once decried and despised as a rebel and an adventurer, assumes the gigantic proportions of the representative of an ancient and high-spirited nationality, who may be treated with, but who cannot be conquered.

The great events now agitating Middle Europe, and which, in their course, may draw within their vortex the whole Continent, are twofold; and are expressible by the desire of the Germans on the one hand, and of the Sclavonian nations on the other, to assume a definite shape in the great Commonwealth of Europe. The conduct of the King of Prussia at the early period of the Revolution has not only brought a deluge of difficulties upon himself, but has greatly aggravated both of these questions. His dynastic ambition, no less than his personal generosity of character, led him into the error—always fatal for a King—of attempting to head the Revolution. His famous declaration that the time had come for the absorption of Germany into Prussia, or of Prussia into Germany (for it will read either way), placed him in a position full of peril and difficulty with his own people, with the Germans generally, with the Emperor of Austria more particularly, and with the whole of Europe. It would be premature to assert that from this position there are no safe and honourable means of rescue. There is, assuredly, one way by which his Majesty may extricate himself with safety, if not with dignity. The King of Sardinia gave the most recent, though not the greatest, example of the only means by which Sovereigns who have undertaken tasks beyond their capacity or their fortune, can manage to die in peace; and the probability is that, sooner or later, a similar denouément will wind up the eventful and ambitious career of Frederick William. He is at present in a position in which to advance, to recede, or to stand still may be fatal. The Frankfort Assembly has offered him the Emperorship of Germany, but he dares not stretch forth his hand to accept the splendid misery of the gift. Neither has he given an absolute refusal to the offer, without having brought upon himself dangers to the full as serious as those which would have surrounded his acceptance. Austria, Bavaria, and Wurtemburg have severally protested against his elevation to such a dignity; although Wurtemburg, in consequence of a popular movement, has since given expression to a contrary determination. The revolutionary party represented at Frankfort desire his acceptance of it—not for his sake, not for the sake of any King or Potentate whatever, but simply as the first step towards the establishment of the German Republic. Unhappily for his Majesty, it was too late for his own repose that he awakened to the consciousness of these facts. Ever since that period he has been engaged in the task of combating the Revolution, to which, in the unhappy days of March, 1848, he lent the high influence of his name and his authority. Still more unfortunately, his new course of policy has not conciliated the Sovereigns of Germany, while it has complicated all the internal difficulties of his situation. The King, who strove to guide a revolution—who gave his people a free democratic charter—whose sympathies were liberal, and whose aspirations were high and generous—has overleaped his mark. Instead of leading Revolution to a prosperous and splendid issue, he is engaged in combating it with all the energies of his mind, and all the resources of his power. His capital is in a state of siege; the free Constitution is virtually defunct; he rules by coups d'état and military force; and he has become the personification, not of constitutional progress as he desired, but of that ultra-absolutism which he once hoped to overthrow in all Germany. Berlin was, a few days ago, on the brink of a new insurrection, which the merest accident might have transformed or aggravated into a revolution. Nor has the danger passed even now. The middle classes do not support the Government: they look on coldly; and the immense military force which rules the capital alone preserves it from insurrection. The Brandenburg ministry threatens to be to King Frederick William what that of M. Guizot was to Louis Philippe. The King himself rules in the name of that administration, and the responsibility attached to the nominal will, sooner or later, fall upon the real Minister. The very ability of the

...ed him into the error of governing by means of puppets. Louis Philippe, from the same cause, did so, and we know the result. In the case of the King of Prussia, education and long habit that he was the great personage of the State. Under the system which the Revolution overthrew the King was his own Prime Minister; he superintended everything; governed everything; required into everything; and acted for himself, with no other responsibility than to God and to his conscience. It is not easy for a King who has once occupied this high position to accommodate himself to the more shadowy royalty which constitutionalism requires. If it were difficult for Louis Philippe, on account of his very talent for government, to do so, it must be still more difficult for King Frederick William. But in the vitality of revolutions men must sometimes pay the penalty of being too able or too wise. The recent coup d'état, by which his Majesty abruptly dissolved the National Assembly, has brought him into a far more formidable collision with the revolution than any that have preceded it. The King of Prussia, hated by every Sovereign of Germany—estranged from Austria, with whom it was his interest to remain in close alliance, if he really expected to make head against internal faction—goaded by the Parliament of Frankfort to do that which he would like to do, but dare not do, and in open warfare with the liberal party in his own dominions, is, to our thinking, more to be pitied in every way than any other man in Europe. For the sake of his good intentions, no less than for the sake of Germany and Europe, it would be well if he could surmount the enormous perils that surround him. We greatly doubt, however, whether fortune has such a reward in store for him; and incline to the belief that, ere a very lengthened period shall elapse, the man who aspired to be Emperor of the Germans will simply be remembered as the ex-King of Prussia.

CIVITA VECCHIA.

The French troops under General Oudinot, who have gone to aid in the restoration of the Pope's authority, landed at Civita Vecchia on the 24th ult., and took military possession of the town. They were well received by the inhabitants and the National Guards. Nothing certain has yet become known as to their further progress, though there are abundant rumours of a most contradictory character as to some detachments having been pushed on to Rome. The Republican Government has of course protested against this armed intervention, as they were unable to resist it.

The port of Civita Vecchia has, accordingly, become a point of considerable interest; and we have engraved the fine view upon the present page from an original sketch. The town lies on the south coast of the Papal States, thirty-six miles north-west of Rome. The harbour is formed by two piers of marble blocks, first raised by Trajan as the entrance to a small artificial or breakwater, formed of pieces of rock thrown into the sea, under the reign of the same Emperor. The harbour is the only safe one on the coast; there is a lazaretto for ships coming from infected countries. There are also docks, and a prison for galley-slaves. The lighthouse and citadel were built by Michael Angelo. The present town of Civita Vecchia was built by Pope Leo IV., and is regularly fortified.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The all-absorbing topic still is the approaching elections for the Legislative Assembly. It is generally believed that the Socialists will be unable to effect much in favour of their candidates.

The Socialists of Paris have adopted Jean Baptiste Bolchet, sergeant-major of the 7th Regiment of Light Infantry, and Edmund Huttier, sergeant of the 48th Regiment of the line, as two of their candidates for the representation of the Seine in the Legislative Assembly.

On Saturday and some preceding evenings there were great assemblages on the Boulevards, at the old classic locale of insurrection, the Portes St. Martin and St. Denis, strongly remaining spectators of the attroupements which were the prelude of the insurrection of last year; but the police having on Saturday day apprehended between 200 and 300 persons in the crowd, including some members of the National Assembly, and detained them in custody during the night, a heavy blow and great discouragement was dealt to those tumultuary meetings, and they have since ceased altogether. Law proceedings are to be taken against the parties apprehended, for having refused to obey when summoned by the authorities to disperse. On Wednesday the National Assembly passed a project of law allocating a credit of 200,000f for the celebration of the anniversary of the proclamation of the Republic on the 4th inst. (yesterday). A discussion arose on the second article, granting an amnesty to the transported insurgents of June, which was opposed by the Government, as an implied censure on the severity of their sentence, observing that the Government and the committee were agreed on the necessity of clemency, but that the former objected to this "blind and cruel clemency," on account of the dangerous effect which it would let loose on society. The labor was then called for, and the result of the scrutiny was the rejection of the amnesty by a majority of 339 to 285.

The cases of cholera in the hospitals of Paris, from its first appearance, on the 7th of March to the 30th April, amounted to 2936, of which 1623 proved fatal. The number of deaths in the city, during the same period, was 6950.

The Moniteur announced, a few days since, that the closing prices of Government rentes on the Paris Bourse would be communicated daily by electric telegraph to the principal towns in the department of the North. It appears, however, that the measure has been abandoned, in consequence of a petition presented against it by upwards of 300 bankers and stockbrokers.

SPAIN

The Carlist cause has sustained a great blow in the loss of Cabrera, whose wounds had become so serious as to oblige him to take refuge in France in order to recruit. The French authorities have availed themselves of the right of detention with respect to the legitimist chieftain. He arrived at Toulon on the 26th ult., and he will be incarcerated in Fort Lamalque, where already Ametller is confined.

ITALIAN STATES.

PIEDMONT.—Matters have begun to assume the appearance of a peaceful adjustment between the Austrian and Sardinian Governments. The Austrian troops have been allowed to enter the fortress of Alessandria, while the Imperial Cabinet, it is understood, has agreed to modify some of the harsher terms of the armistice.

TUSCANY.—In Florence and all the leading towns affairs are in a train preparatory to the triumphant return of the Grand Duke to his hereditary dominions. Leghorn still holds out on the Republican side.

GERMAN STATES

The Frankfort Assembly has passed a series of resolutions, by which it declares that the acceptance of the German supremacy by the King of Prussia will involve a recognition of the Imperial Constitution as a matter of course, and calls on the Governments who have not yet recorded in their declarations as to the Constitution, the Emperor question and the law of election, as well as the choice of an Emperor, to do so immediately. The Assembly has also since passed the following resolutions (on the 27th ult.):—

"The German Parliament resolves, viz.

"1. To pass a vote of censure against the Prussian and the German Governments for dissolving the respective Diets of those States.

"2. To summon the said Governments to issue at once writs for another general election.

"3. To express to the remaining legal organs the Parliament's expectation, that they will candidly, boldly, and quickly inform the Government of the sentiments of the people."

The question of the recognition of the Frankfort Constitution has also been fatal to the existence of the Hanoverian and Saxony Chambers, both of which were dissolved by Royal decree, the former on the 7th and the latter on the 28th ult.

PRUSSIA.

Events have taken a sadly serious turn in Berlin, some blood having been again shed in its streets. The hostile attitude assumed by the second Chamber towards the Government on the questions of the acceptance of the Frankfort Constitution, and the assumption of the state of siege in Berlin, having been crowned by majorities in favour of both measures, the Cabinet resolved on the dissolution of the lower House and the adjournment of the upper, and a Royal decree to that effect was read in the Chamber on Friday week.

As soon as the event became known the excitement throughout the city was excessive. Towards evening crowds gathered on the Dombof Platz, opposite the Chambers, and on the London and as they assumed a threatening appearance some bodies of soldiers endeavoured to disperse them. At about eight o'clock an officer was struck with a stick—it is nearly that he was carried away senseless. The soldiers immediately fired on the group, and one man fell dead, two others severely wounded.

The populace then attempted to erect barricades on several points, but failed by the exertions of the citizens and the militia. On the Penn Platz the soldiers were compelled again to fire. The casualties in all were four persons killed (one of whom is a woman) and five wounded. On Saturday the crowds were assembled, and detachments of cavalry were employed to clear the Dombof Platz several times during the day. Many persons were wounded by sabre-cuts. No organised resistance was anywhere attempted by the people, yet great alarm prevailed, which was not a little augmented by the occurrence of a fire, at noon, in the village of Rixdorf, near Berlin, which was completely destroyed.

The latest accounts represent tranquillity as quite restored.

An important declaration by the Prussian Government to the Diet was in Plenipotentiary at the Court of the Highness the Regent at Frankfort, has been published, in which the King of Prussia's Government makes a final and positive declaration respecting the hereditary Imperial dignity, as offered by the Frankfort Parliament, which it refuses to accept. This document bears the date of the 28th ult., and is signed by the Prussian Premier, the Count Brandenburg.

AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY.

The cause of the Magyars continues to prosper. In a two days' battle at Gran they defeated the Imperialists, and opened the road to Komorn, into which city have thrown a detachment. On the 24th ult. they entered Pesth, and the negotiations of the inhabitants. General Welden has been in consequence obliged to evacuate Ofen on the opposite side of the Danube.

DENMARK AND SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

The Holstein Government having prohibited the publication of all news relative to the movements of the troops, the accounts are scanty from the seat of war. It is known, however, that nothing of importance has occurred since the battle at Kolding.

UNITED STATES.

The arrival of the Niagara with the mails from New York to the 17th ult. on Monday, brought no news of interest, there being, in fact, no domestic intelligence of a character to call for notice.

The United States naval force in the Mediterranean is to be forthwith increased. Commodore Morgan, who is now on the command of that station, solicited a line-of-battle ship, but it has been determined to send out three frigates and the Mississippi, in addition to the force now there

CANADA.

The Canadian advices are likewise unimportant. The province was tranquil. The signature of the Governor-General had not been affixed to the Indemnity Bill: it was supposed his awaited instructions from home. Preliminary proceedings had been held at Montreal for the organization of a national convention of the two Canadas, to take into consideration the present condition of those colonies, and the propriety and necessity of changing their existing form of Government either in an independent form or in union of all British America, or ultimate annexation to the United States. It is to be called the "British League," and is evidently directed against the French portion of the population.

There has been a tremendous conflagration in Toronto. The greatest part of the city is in ashes, and the loss is estimated at about 600,000 dollars. The magnificent cathedral of St. James, erected a few years since on the same spot, was one of the first consumed; and which was destroyed by fire ten years ago, is included in the conflagration.

Navigation is expected to be opened to Quebec in a few days.

WEST INDIES.

Intelligence was received on Wednesday by the usual mail steamer.

From Jamaica, the accounts are to the 8th ult. The weather was fine, some grateful showers of rain having fallen.

From Kingston papers it appears that, on the 24th of March, a violent tumult amongst the Negroes took place at Old Harbour Market, in which the police were very roughly handled, and many very serious results anticipated. A force was kept under arms all night. The causes of the outbreak arose in the refusal of the mountain Negroes of St. Dorothy and St. John's to pay the market dues fixed by the justices and vestry of the former parish. Several of the ringleaders were apprehended.

The accounts from Demerara are to the 5th ult. The Combined Court was again sitting, and had consented to resume the financial business of the colony, and a perfectly good understanding seems to have been restored between Governor Harkness and the Court.

The news from Barbadoes is very little to the purpose. It has been made since the departure of the previous mail.

The small-pox having appeared in Martinique and Guadaloupe, the Governors of the various West India islands were making preparations to prevent the disease from being introduced to the British Isles. One very decided case had occurred at Antigua.

INDIA.

The advices anticipatory of the Overland Mail, which reached town during the week, convey intelligence of more than usual importance and interest. The war in the Punjaub is virtually at an end. The latest date is from Bombay to the 4th of April. The insurgent chiefs, Chuttur Singh, Shere Singh, and thirteen others of minor importance, have surrendered at discretion to the force under General Gilbert; and the remnant of the Sikh force, amounting to 16,000 men, have been disarmed and disbanded; at the same time, 41 guns were given up to the British authorities.

General Gilbert has advanced to the Indus, having reached Attock, the Affghan fortress on that river.

Mrs. Lawrence, and the other prisoners who had been in the hands of the enemy, had returned in safety to the camp of the Commander-in-Chief.

The latest accounts from the seat of war state that the remnant of the army, which has learnt that immediately after the defeat of the Sikhs at Goojerat, General Sir W. R. Gilbert, with a force of 15,000 men, with 40 guns, crossed the Jhelum, and proceeded without delay in seizing the Bukreeah Pass, beyond Rotas, which it was, at one time, thought the Sikhs would make a stand. Negotiations between the British political agents and the Sikh leaders had also been opened in two different directions, with the view of hemming in the enemy, concurred in impressing the propriety of surrender on Shere Singh and his father, Chuttur Singh; but they had immediately refused to submit to terms generally, with all their followers, and to give up the whole of their guns. On the 7th of March, Ahun Singh Majetea, with 500 men and three guns, arrived in a camp, and early the following day Lieutenant Lumsden and other confidential servants, with Lieutenants Bowie and Herbert, and all the rest of the prisoners, made their appearance. Shere Singh himself encamped towards evening, as certain arrangements had to be made for the delivery up of the ordnance, he was allowed to return to his own camp. On the 14th, Sirdars Chuttur Singh and Shere Singh, with eleven other chiefs of note, arrived in General Gilbert's camp, and gave up their swords. Forty-one pieces of artillery were also surrendered, and 16,000 Sikhs laid down their arms, each man being allowed to retain his horse, and receiving a rupee as subsistence money.

The latest intelligence from the camp of General Gilbert intimates the arrival of the army at Attock, which they reached just in time to seize the fort, and prevent the Affghans from burning the boats which they had used in crossing the Indus.

IRELAND.

EMIGRATION BY ORGANIZED COLONIES TO AMERICA.—From distress in the neighbourhood of Dublin, we learn that arrangements are in progress to a systematic emigration, on a vast scale, from Ireland; and by a class apparently not much affected by the prevailing embarrassments, the object last intended being to establish an Irish colony in the United States, composed of substantial farmers and farmers from the counties of Carlow, Kildare, and Meath. Several Roman Catholic clergymen, including parish priests, are to give up their parishes in those counties, in order to enter upon the duties of the new field. The number of emigrants are said to be 1000. The project has been on foot for a month or two, and is to be conducted quite systematically. Returns are in preparation of the number disposed to join in the enterprise, the amount of their means, and all other necessary details. Some of the intending emigrants are extensive farmers and graziers on a large scale, who have recently been losing their capital in consequence of high rents and local taxes, altogether disproportioned to the present prices of corn and cattle.

RATING OF RAILWAYS IN IRELAND.—At the county of Dublin Sessions, on Saturday last, Mr. Kemmis, presiding chairman, after making a list of deductions for current expenses, interest on capital, tenants' profits, insurance, &c., amounting to £47,124, stated that this amount, compared with the gross income of the company for the past year, £44,789, showed an excess of allowances over income of £2338. There was, consequently, no rateable interest for Poor-law purposes, and the rate appealed against should be annulled. This is, in fact, deciding that the Dublin and Drogheda Railway Company are to pay nothing in the shape of rate for the support of the poor.

THE AUSTRALIAN MAILS.—The contract for conveying the Australian mails by sailing packets ceased the latter end of March. Since that period the correspondence to and from Australia have been conveyed by private merchant ships. In November last the Admiralty advertised for tenders for conveying the Australian mails between Sydney and Singapore by steam. It appears that the tender of the India and Australian Steam Company was accepted, and the contract was to commence this month. It is now stated that the company have since come to official notice of the Government of their having relinquished the contract. There has never been much doubt but what the Peninsular and Oriental Company will have the contract, as being the only parties competent to undertake it. Singapore will shortly become a most important mail-packet station, from which will be forwarded mails for China, Austral s, the Philippine Islands, Java, and Borneo. An active and intelligent gentleman has just been sent out to Singapore by the Peninsular and Oriental Company as their superintendent at that port. The distance from Singapore to Port Essington, in Northern Australia, is about 2000 miles, and from the latter place to Sydney the distance is about 2700 miles. It is generally known that the Peninsular and Oriental Company have a contract with the Spanish Government for the conveyance of Spanish and Manilla mails to and from Gibraltar and Singapore. The conveyance of mails to Sydney throughout by steam by way of Egypt and India, is looked forward to with great interest by the commercial world for, independent of its establishing a quick communication between Great Britain and her vast Australian colonies, it will greatly improve her intercourse dependencies in the Indian Archipelago, and be of great convenience to our New Zealand colonies, and particularly our settlements at the Auckland Islands, where Mr. Enderby is about to proceed to facilitate the means for British enterprise and capital being engaged in the South Sea whale fishery.

GRAND MEETING OF PROTECTIONISTS AGAINST THE REPEAL OF THE NAVIGATION LAWS.

An aggregate meeting of the agricultural, colonial, commercial, manufacturing, and shipping interests was held on Tuesday, at the Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle-street (adjourned from the London Tavern, the large room there not being considered large enough to accommodate the numbers expected to attend); the object being to form a general and united association of all the great interests of the country, for the purpose of resisting the progress of the Free-Trade system, and re-establishing Protection. From 800 to 1000 persons were present.

The Duke of Richmond presided. The front row of seats on the platform was occupied by the following noblemen and gentlemen:—The Marquis of Downshire, Marquis of Winchester, Earl of Eglinton, Earl of Malmesbury, Marquis of Granby, Lord Charles Manners, Lord Sondes, Lord John Manners, Lord Talbot, Lord Wilton; Mr. Newdegate, M.P.; the Hon. Mr. Law, M.P. (the Recorder of London); Major Beresford, M.P.; Colonel Sibthorp, M.P.; G. R. Robinson, Esq., M.P. (Chairman of Lloyd's); G. F. Young, Esq.; Sir G. Burrell, M.P.; A. Bonsquet, Esq.; P. Miles, Esq., M.P.; Alderman Sidney, M.P.; J. Fosket, Esq.; and on the seats behind the chair were several landowners, farmers, and others connected with agriculture and the West India interest.

The Chairman, on rising, was received with loud and general marks of approbation. When the applause, for which his appearance was the signal, had subsided, he spoke as follows:—I must commence by congratulating the friends of the great principles which have brought us to-day to advocate upon the large and influential meeting which I see now around me. I have ventured to take the chair on the present occasion at the request of the chairmen of London, not because I felt myself entitled to do so from any talent that I possess, but, yielding to none in my desire to see a fair, a just, and adequate protection to British industry, I felt that I might be considered lukewarm in the cause if I did not consent to occupy the station which I hold to-day. (Cheers.) It is well known to most of you that I advocated protection not only to agriculture, but that I advocated it also for the subsidiary interests—I advocated it for the silk weavers of Spitalfields—(cheers)—and I do at this moment conscientiously believe that this country cannot continue in the course which it has been pursuing, of encouraging the prosperity of the foreigner at the expense of our own population. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I therefore thought that it might be desirable to see whether we could not associate the great interests of the country—the agricultural, the colonial, the shipping interest, too—because I hold that, with the exception of a small knot of Stockport and Manchester manufacturers, the interests of manufactures, of commerce, of the colonies, and of agriculture must go hand in hand. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, I have felt, and I now feel, that great distress exists in the agricultural interest—I wish to Heaven I could say that it only existed amongst that class of the natives of this country. Go to the shopkeepers in the town throughout the country. Ask them what they have gained by free-Trade, and then there will be a sufficient answer, I think, even to its strongest advocate, to the subject of protection to domestic industry. Parliament can, if it think fit, and I say it must think it before long. (Cheers)—I say it must—go back to that fair and due protection to British industry. (Cheers.) But we cannot, because we have engaged in treaties which we cannot break. (Cheers.) Therefore, I say, it behoves every man who wishes the welfare of his country, to hold up his hand against so destructive a proposition. It is not necessary for me to tell you that without a commercial marine it is impossible for you to man the decks of your men-of-war. Well, to be sure, some say that we are to have associations for universal peace (a laugh), and, therefore, that we do not want a navy. Why, was ever such humbug spoken? (Cheers.) I would give those gentlemen of the universal peace-society a little experiment to try before they begin with nations. I would send them to Ireland, and would let them see whether they could prevent the factions from fighting at Donnybrook fair. (Cheers.) They ought to try that before they tell us that our wooden walls are unnecessary. For one, I never will consent to vote for the destruction of the wooden walls of England. (Cheers.) I must apologise for having so long trespassed on your attention, and I will now call upon the gentleman who have been appointed to move the resolutions to address you; and I have no doubt you will give them all fair play and a fair hearing.

The speeches were of the usual character of Protectionist meetings the following no doubt familiar to the readers of the principles of Free Trade and Protection. The following are the resolutions, which were unanimously agreed to, together with the names of the movers and seconders:—

First resolution.—Moved by the Marquis of Granby, M.P.; seconded by Augustus Beaumont, Esq.: "That it is the opinion of this meeting, that the adoption of a Free Trade policy has failed to produce the universal benefits predicted by its promoters; that by that policy injury to many of the great interests of this country; that a reaction in public opinion is widely diffused, and is rapidly extending in favour of the principles of Protection to the agricultural, commercial, manufacturing, and shipping interests should be united in resistance to the further progress of experimental legislation."

Second resolution.—Moved by Mr. Bell; seconded by Samuel Baker, Esq.: "That, with this view, an Association be now formed, to be called 'The National Association for the Protection of British Industry and Capital,' and that all individuals throughout the country, connected with agriculture, colonies, trade, commerce, manufactures, and shipping, whose sentiments are in accordance with the principles on which the Society is proposed to be founded, be invited to become members thereof."

Third resolution.—Moved by Mr. Alderman Sidney, M.P., seconded by Paul Foskett: "That the following gentlemen Mr. R. Baker, Mr. Edward Ball, Mr. Samuel Baker, Mr. Beaumont, Mr. James Bell, Mr. Robert Brooks, Mr. John Chapman, Mr. Duncan Dunbar, Mr. John Elliman, Mr. Paul Foskett, Mr. Alderman Finnis, M.P., Mr. G. Gwilt, Mr. N. Gould, Captain Higham, Mr. George Marsden, Mr. Stephen Mills, Mr. M. M'Cleary, Mr. J. J. Macqueen, Mr. W. Mullins, Mr. J. D. Powles, Mr. Alderman Sidney, M.P., Mr. W. Tindall Mr. Alderman Thompson, M.P., G. A. Thompson, Esq., Mr. Anthony Rudy, Mr. Morgan Wigram, Mr. J. F. Young, with power to add to their number, be requested to act as a provisional committee, for the purpose of framing rules and regulations for the management and government of the Association. That they prepare and circulate an address, explanatory of the principles on which the Association is established, and enforcing its claims to support: and that they be empowered to adopt such other measures as they may deem advisable for giving effect to the objects of the present meeting."

Fourth Resolution.—Moved by Earl Talbot; seconded by George F. Young, Esq.: "That the meeting views with serious anxiety and alarm the bill introduced into Parliament by her Majesty's Ministers, intituled, 'A Bill to amend the Laws relating to British Shipping and Navigation,' deprecating the measure as pregnant with consequences the most destructive to the maritime marine, uncalled for by the people, and repugnant to their feelings: introduced at a most inauspicious period, and dangerous to the safety of the State."

The proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the noble Chairman.

THE CHILD'S CAUL.—(From "David Copperfield," by Charles Dickens.) No.1.—"I was born with a caul, which was advertised for sale in the newspapers at the price of fifteen guineas. Whether sea-going people were short of money about that time, or were short of faith and preferred cork jackets, I don't know, all I know is, that there was but one solitary bidding, and that was from a stingy old bachelor in the law-drysalting business, who offered two pounds in cash, and the balance in sherry, but declined to be guaranteed from drowning on any higher bargain. Consequently the advertisement was withdrawn at a dead loss—for an honest grocer, who lived over the way, and had been drinking at our house ever since he was established in business, made a bid, but refused to honour it when I was put up to auction for the second time, on account of his declining to be answerable for my not being drowned. Various genteel connexions have since offered themselves at sea-side inquiries, but my poor dear mother's own sherry was in the market then—and ten years afterwards the caul was put up in a raffle one night at a coffee-house, containing fifty members at half-a-crown a head, the winner to spend five shillings. I was present myself, and I remember to have felt quite uncomfortable and confused, at a part of myself being disposed of in that way. The caul was won, I recollect, by an old lady with a hand-basket, who very reluctantly produced from it the stipulated five shillings, all in halfpence, and twopence-halfpenny short: as it took an immense time and a quantity of saw, and filing, actually to get the money, without any effect, to prove to her. It is a fact which will be long remembered as remarkable down there, that she was never drowned, but died triumphantly in bed, at ninety-two. I have understood that it was to this caul, her property, that she never had been on the water in her life, except upon a bridge, and that over her tea (to which she was extremely partial) she, to the last, expressed her indignation at the vagary of mankind who would go and be presumptuous to go "meandering" about, when he would. It was in vain to represent to her that some conveniences, perhaps included, resulted from this objectionable practice. She always remained, with great emphasis and with an instinctive knowledge of the strength of her objection, "Let us have no meandering.

THE FLOATING RAILWAY BRIDGE FOR THE FRITH OF TAY.—This novel specimen of naval architecture underwent its trial down to Greenock and back Saturday last, on an experimental trip. The peculiar build of the vessel, of large size, and comparatively small power, do not admit her for quick speed, and she went down and back almost in a walk, although the paddles were not recently immersed to obtain the full power of the engines. Her unusual appearance as she steamed along, created much astonishment and curiosity among the river craft and the passing steamers; and she was loudly cheered passing by the numerous workmen in the various ship-building yards. In two months, it is expected, the floating rings will be ready to lay on the piers; and no doubt it will be found a great convenience for the traffic to and from the north by that route.

NEW CONVENT.—The Catholic chapel in the London-road is now being converted into a convent, in which is to be located a branch of the order of the Sisters of Mercy. At present there are only two nuns resident in the convent, namely, Miss Agnew, niece of the late Sir A. Agnew, and another lady of her name as the "Reverend Mother" of the establishment. Two sisters of the order in question are not confined to the convent, but go about visiting the sick, &c., and in the school of the convent they impart instruction of a useful description to female children.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—SATURDAY, APRIL 28.

The Speaker took the chair at twelve o'clock

The report on the Poor-laws (Ireland—Rate in Aid) Bill was brought up, and the bill, as amended, was considered, and agreed to. The bill was ordered to be printed, and read a third time on Monday.

Mr. Bernal brought up the report of the Committee of Supply.

The Exchequer Bills (£17,786,700) Bill went through committee, and the report was ordered to be brought up on Monday.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER gave notice that he would, on Friday next, move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to consider the advances to be made to Ireland.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Highways Bill, and the Turnpike Trusts Union Bill, were read a second time, and referred to the same Select Committee. The Cruelty to Animals Bill passed through Committee.

TREASURES OF ART FROM ROME.

Lord BROUGHAM again moved the privileges that was going on in the great depositories of art in the Roman capital, stating he had heard that the Minister of Finance (MANZONI), under what was called the Government de facto of Rome, had departed from that capital with inestimable valuable remains of ancient and modern art, the cameos of the Vatican, medals, and coins, some of wh ch were beyond price, being unique, and also some va uable manuscripts, with the intention of disposing of them in Paris and in London, or of raising money upon them by way of loan. He hoped the notice which had been given of this plunder would put all persons upon their guard, so that they might not unwittingly receive stolen goods.

NAVIGATION LAWS

Lord STANLEY, on presenting numerous petitions against the Navigation Bill, referred particularly to one of them from Liverpool, signed by 47,313 persons, nine-tenths of whom were electors for that borough. He thought their Lordships would attach importance to the fact, that there existed all but entire unanimity on the part of the representatives of commerce in Liverpool, in praying that their Lordships would not inflict on them, by passing the Navigation Bill, that which might be said by some persons to be a benefit, but which they considered would turn out a most serious injury.

Lord WHARNCLIFFE moved for certain returns relative to the steps taken or to be taken for the relief of destitution in certain parts of Ireland, and referred to the present condition of that country, when hundreds of thousands of the population were all but starving, and thousands of acres of land were deserted.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE did not object to the returns, which were ordered, and their Lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

Mr. LABOUCHERE, in answer to a question from Mr. WYLD, stated that a railway audit of accounts bill would shortly come down from the Lords, but, if not agreed to in that House, he should then feel it his duty to introduce another measure on the subject.

RATE IN AID BILL.

The order of the day for the third reading of the Rate in Aid Bill having been read,

Captain JONES moved that the bill be read a third time that day six months.

Sir J. WALSH expressed his intention of having another blow at the bill in this its last stage.

Lord CASTLEREAGH entered at some length into statistical details, with the view of showing that Ireland paid a larger share of taxation, both public and local, than England, and proceeded to detail the progress of her manufacturing and agricultural population in the two countries, with the view of showing that Ireland lost three times as much as England by the withdrawal of protection. If there were no pressing dangers with regard to relations with foreign countries —if there were no difficulties with regard to colonial policy, then Government might proceed to tax Ireland; but in the existing state of things they ought to pause before they overburdened and utterly ruined wretched people, to whose attachment they were in the habit of looking in times of trouble and danger.

Lord J. RUSSELL repeated at some length observations that he had made on a former occasion, particularly with reference to his having said that not more than £6000 would be issued from the civil contingencies as an advance on the rate in aid; but with the accounts then before him and now before him, and seeing that the progress of the bill in the House of Lords would necessarily occupy some time, he did not think he should be justified in keeping within that limit. With respect to the conclusion at which the noble Lord the member for Liverpool had arrived, as to the effect which the Rate in Aid would produce in Ireland, he was not alarmed, because he happened to have seen a most excellent letter, written by the Marquis of Londonderry to a tenantry in Ireland, stating that, whatever might be the objections to the Rate in Aid, obedience to the law was so well-rooted, that if the bill should pass into an act, there would be no resistance to the law of the land. He thought the expression of those opinions of the Marquis, as being probable credit to the noble Marquis. Considering the reluctance which was exhibited in the grant of £50,000, he did not see any other mode of providing for the existing distress than that of imposing a Rate in A.d.

Lord CASTLEREAGH: By the time the bill passed, the people would have all gone to America.

Lord J. RUSSELL: Then the resistance in Ireland will not be very great.

Mr BANKES referred to the increased state of distress, by quoting a letter he had received from a large landed proprietor, stating that his agent in travelling in a car had been delayed in his progress, in order that the bodies of persons who were dead or dying on the road might be removed. After contending that some security ought to be given for the money advanced, the hon. member proceeded to urge his previously expressed arguments that that security might have been found by levying a rate in aid on foreign countries, by protective duties, or by increasing the rate of postage.

Mr. B. COCHRANE referred to Lord J. Russell's tragedy of "Don Carlos," in which the author spoke of "scanty means," which phrase of the noble Lord were those which the noble Lord and his Government had applied to Ireland. The loss of Ireland would doubly detract from the dignity and character of England; but, if there were no alternative, the loss of the dignity of England, or the loss of a famishing people in Ireland, he must support a repeal of the union, if he thought it would benefit and save the people from perishing.

Mr. H. SCARGILL detailed his reasons for opposing the bill in its last stage, and proceeded to point out the necessity of employing the people in the reclamation of waste lands

Mr. E. CRAWFORD, on the ground that the rate in aid would add to the existing evils in Ireland, should vote against the bill

Mr. H. GRATTAN contended, that if Ireland had had a domestic legislature it would at once have recalled all absentees, stopped the distilleries, and prevented the exportation of corn. The hon. member conjured the House to do something which should prevent the Irish from dying by thousands or emigrating; at the latter course the French and Americans might rejoice, but it would certainly, in the end, be as destructive to England as to Ireland

After some general observations from Mr. J. O'CONNELL,

Colonel DUNNE expressed his conviction that the present condition of Ireland was consequent upon the mis-government of England. England had destroyed her manufactures, and by recent legislation, in respect of the corn laws, and the introduction of free-trade, had destroyed the staple trade of Ireland—her agriculture

On a division, the third reading was carried by a majority of 74, the numbers beir g 125 to 55.

A further discussion on the title of the bill took place, and after an amendment proposed by Col. RAWDON, which was agreed to without a division, the bill passed.

The House then went into committee on the Navy Estimates, the votes discussed being the salaries of officers of the naval establishments at home; the vote for defraying the wages of artisans and labourers in the naval establishments at home, the expenses of naval stores; the grant of £291,534 for naval establishments, upon which Sir W. MOLESWORTH moved an amendment, in reference to the works at Keyham, to reduce the vote by the sum of £120,000. In this and previous votes Mr. GORDON detailed his views of the reductions of the naval expenditure, as regarded ships, docks, and stores, and ultimately the committee divided, when the original grant was affirmed by a majority of 74 the numbers being 87 to 101. On the vote to defray the expenses of half-pay, Mr. M. GIBSON defended a former opinion expressed by him, as to the comparative number of officers in the navies of England, France, and America, contending that steps ought to be taken in order to bring the number in this country within proper limits.

Sir F. BARING said Mr Hume had given a notice of motion on this subject, but was too unwell to attend the House; he should be glad, however, on a future occasion to enter upon the discussion of the point in question.

On the vote £748,296 to defray the charge of the packet service, being put, a debate on "postage reform" ensued, in which Mr. FAGAN, Mr. COWPER, Mr. Cobden, Sir F. Baring, Mr. Henley, Mr. Brigh, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer took part, at the termination of which the vote was agreed to, as also was the vote of £12,685 for defraying the expenses of the North Star, engaged on the service of the Polar expedition.—Adjourned at a quarter-past twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

LAW OF PRÆMUNIRE.

The Bishop of EXETER presented a petition from the clergy of the rural deanery of Torrington against the section of the Criminal Law Consolidation Bill relating to præmunire.

Lord BROUGHAM said the bill in question proposed to leave the matter precisely as it was under the existing law, but he did hope Parliament would apply itself to the subject, and remove that which was an opprobrium to the statute book.

The Bishop of EXETER intimated that on every occasion of the confirmation of a Bishop it must become a question whether the Archbishop was allowed to make a stringent inquiry into the doctrines of the party nominated to the bishopric, and if he made such inquiry whether he was or was not resisting the prerogative of the Crown. If that House should be called on to legislate on the matter, he thought it advisable that their Lordships should ask for the assistance of the judges to determine what the law really was.

RAILWAYS.

Lord BROUGHAM drew the attention of the House to legislation with respect to railways, to the mania of speculation which they had originated, and to the system of mismanagement which had been recently exposed. The noble Lord (without meaning names) and substituting, with a view not to commit a breach of order, the Canadian for the British House of Commons, proceeded to detail the offered to members in order to induce them to become railway directors, stating that it would be a most interesting inquiry to ascertain how the money had been disposed of in passing railway bills. He should never rest on his bed until there was a committee sitting at Quebec to inquire into these practices. This transference of the scene existed the visibility of the House in no small degree. The fools and knaves Lord, in continuance, said he was sorry to say that the damning mania of speculation was still existing, and he almost despaired of the people of this country being cured of it; nevertheless, that was no reason why they should not do all they could to prevent it, by arraigning and stabbing such guilty to all the affairs of railway companies In conclusion, the noble and learned Lord expressed his hope that Lord Monteagle would at once proceed with his promised measure for the more stringent control of railway accounts, as everything depended on a speedy exposure, which must be done within a month or six weeks.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE, on behalf of her Majesty's Government, observed that they were fully impressed with the grave importance of the subject, and felt that the time had arrived when steps must be taken to prevent a recurrence of the system so graphically described by the noble and learned Lord. After referring to the fact that many railways were conducted in the most satisfactory manner, and carried out with the most laudable objects, the noble Marquis proceeded to say that no man ought to be condemned without a careful examination of his conduct; but in the railways to which reference had been made, no one could entertain the least doubt that their affairs were most fraudulently carried on. In his opinion, the best mode of correcting effectually the existing abuses would be the establishment of a power to be vested in Parliament to examine and audit railway companies' accounts, so that it might be ascertained that the conditions on which they had obtained their acts of Parliament had been faithfully and properly fulfilled. With such a measure the Government would be prepared by the end of the year, when in possession of all the necessary details bearing on the question, but, admitting the necessity for an immediate remedy, he trusted Lord Montagle would produce his measure, when the Government would afford him every assistance—the matter could not be in abler hands.

Lord MONTEAGLE thanked the Government for their proffered support, but should infinitely prefer that the subject should be taken up by them. He hoped, however, the measure he intended to introduce would meet the zealous and wellarmed support of the railway proprietary themselves, as many of the pernicious provisions of the bill he introduced last year would be omitted, but it would be more stringent in some particulars.

Lord BROUGHAM should be sorry if it was understood that he had attacked all railway companies indiscriminately; he had not done so, he had not the least intention of confounding the innocent with the guilty.

Earl GRANVILLE, after referring to the necessity of a better system of audit, said the Government would lose no time in the introduction of a measure, if Lord Montagle declined to proceed.

Lord BROUGHAM thought the bill's passing might be rendered more secure by its introduction as a Government measure. The noble and learned Lord then placed a paper in the hands of the Lord Chancellor; but whether it was a motion or not did not appear, as no question was put

Adjourned to Thursday

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

PARLIAMENTARY REPORTING. PRIVILEGE.

Mr. J. O'CONNELL brought forward a question of breach of privilege alleged, against the Times for making him say what he had noticed on the previous evening, on the third reading of the Rate-in-Aid Bill, and for not reporting his speeches more fully, and moved that the printer be called to the bar of the House this day

Mr. SCULLY seconded the motion

Mr. F. O'CONNOR had as much reason to complain of being misrepresented in the Parliamentary reports as any honourable member, but never thought it necessary to take such a course as suggested on the present occasion, and hoped the motion would not be press d

Sir GEORGE GREY considered the motion hardly fair towards those who reported the Parliamentary debates. He was not in the habit of reading them, but had perused the long observations that Irish members were given at great length in the daily papers, and considered the summary which preceded the leading articles a most useful and accurate abridgment, done in a fair and impartial manner. He was of opinion that the hon. member would do well not to press the motion.

Mr BROTHERTON complimented the Times on the accuracy of its reports, and proceeded to refer to a mis-statement in the Daily News of Thursday last, as to his having said, on the debate of the Archbishop of Canterbury Bill, on the previous day, that his elections had cost him £4000, which was wholly untrue, they never having cost him a single shilling But he had not considered it necessary to take any steps in the matter consequent upon this mis-statement, and did not care about it, as his friends knew perfectly well that such was not the case

Mr. J. O'CONNELL, after asserting his determination to call upon the House to enforce its rule in case the offence of which he complained was repeated, consented to withdraw his motion

Mr. CLAY (Pontefract) suggested to the hon. member the expediency of sending copies of his speeches to the papers h mself

The motion was then by leave withdrawn

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in reply to Mr. WILLIAMS, stated that the salaries of the Judges of County Courts were £1000 a year, with travelling expenses to those who went the Welsh circuits; and, in answer to Mr. W. Patten, that a short explanatory bill would be introduced in the present session to alter the purposes of clearing up some doubts as to the priority of writs issued by the various jurisdictions.

Sir J. FARNINGTON asked whether it was the intention of the Government to assist Mr. Layard in his discoveries at Nineveh by any grant of money, and, if so, to what amount?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER replied, that, on receiving an application from the trustees of the British Museum for the sum of £3000 on this head, he had agreed to appropriate the sum of £1000 for the purpose named during two years. Subsequently, however, a further application was made to the Treasury for more money, to which, however, no answer had been given.

ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Mr. EWART moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the punishment of death

Sir G. GREY opposed the motion. He did not think the time had yet come when the punishment of death could in all cases be abolished

Mr Bright, Mr. S. Drummond, Sir E. Buxton, Mr. Brotherton, Sir G. Strickland, Col. Thompson, and Sir H Verney, shortly addressed the House.

A division then took place:—

For the motion	..	..	..	..	..	51
Against it	..	..	..	..	..	55
Majority against the motion						4

Mr. KEOGH called attention to the general management of Crown Prosecutions in Ireland at assizes and sessions, and to the expenditure incurred in these prosecutions, and moved for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the subject.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL opposed the motion on the ground that the question had been brought by the late Attorney-General, who had framed the rules by which the expense of Crown prosecutions had been already reduced one-half, and who was determined to reform the management and expenditure of these prosecutions in the most economical manner. The right hon. gentleman recommended the withdrawal of the motion.

Mr. O'FLAHERTY, Mr. HENLEY, and Mr. MONSELL made a few remarks.

The motion was then withdrawn.

Mr KEOGH obtained leave to bring in a bill to facilitate the transfer of land to railway companies for railway purposes in Ireland.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL obtained leave to bring in a bill for granting relief against defects in leases made under powers of leasing in certain cases

Adjourned at nine o'clock

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House of Commons sat from noon till six o'clock

CANADA.

Mr HERRIES inquired of the Prime Minister whether any extracts or minutes of the proceedings of the Legislative Assembly of Canada, relative to the bill for granting an indemnity for losses sustained during the rebellion in that colony, had been received at the Colonial Office, and, if so, whether they would be communicated to the House Also, whether copies or extracts of correspondence between the Government and Governor-General of Canada in reference to the said bill would be laid on the table. The right hon. gentleman likewise desired to be informed whether the sanction of the Crown had been given or refused to the bill which had passed the Legislative Assembly of Canada

Lord J. RUSSELL replied that no extract of the votes and proceedings of the Legislative Assembly of Canada upon this bill had been received, nor had a correspondence on the subject a question passed between the Governor-General of Canada and the Home Government. The noble Lord at the head of the Colonial Office had, however, received several private letters from the Governor-General of Canada setting forth that he was not in the habit of writing any public despatches on this subject at present, because, should he do so, and should they be laid before Parliament, considerable excitement might thereby be created in Canada, which it was desirable to avoid, as the sentiment that had prevailed in the colony had been in some measure allayed. With respect to the last question, Lord J. Russell replied that when the bill referred to should come before the Governor-General of Canada, he would be ready to exercise his deliberate judgment on the measure. Lord J. Russell added that the Government had the fullest confidence in the discretion of the Governor-General of Canada, and felt satisfied that he would act for the promotion of the best interests of Canada.

Mr GLADSTONE required to know if it were usual for colonial bills to be reserved for certain period before they were sent up for the assent of the Governor-General.

Lord J. RUSSELL said the bills were immediately sent up to the Governor General, but it was not usual for him to declare his assent to any measure until towards the end of the session. As soon as the Governor-General should form his opinion upon the bill in question, he would doubtless forward a despatch home stating his reasons for the decision.

Mr. HENLEY asked if the correspondence between the Governor-General and the Colonia. Office was carried on by means of private letters, and not by public despatches.

Lord J. RUSSELL answered . No; but the Governor-General did frequently state in private letters matters upon which he considered it inexpedient to write a public despatch. The noble Lord added that, from his own experience in the Colonial Office, he knew that great inconvenience and much angry feeling were frequently excited by the communication of despatches to the House, and through the House to the public

Mr BOURKE moved the second reading of the Cattle and Sheep (Ireland) Bill, the object of which was to put a check to the crime of sheep steal ng, &c., in Ireland.—After a short discussion, the House divided: For the second reading of the bill, 67; against it, 86; majority, 19. The bill was consequently lost.

CLERGY RELIEF BILL.

On the motion for going into committee on this bill,

Mr. LACY moved that it be an instruction to the committee to make provision for per-ons in holy orders being relieved by the said bill without such persons being obliged to declare themselves Dissenters from the United Church of England and Ireland

Mr. M MILNES seconded the amendment.

Mr. BOUVERIE objected to the amendment, because, as the bill was intended to be a simple remedy for a specific grievance, the instruction would compel the introduction of a general law to relieve clergymen who might wish to give up their clerical profes ion without ceasing to be members of the Church. That was a very wide question, which, if incorporated in the b ll, would endanger it.

Sir G. Grey remarked that no one could be found in which a clergyman had been prosecuted for abstaining from officiating; there was, therefore, in that respect, no practical grievance to remedy. He did not think it would be prudent to encumber the bill with such a provision as the instruction would necessitate

After a discussion, in which Mr. Spooner, Mr. W. J. Fox, Mr. H. Drummond, Mr. C. Thompson, Mr. R. Palmer, Mr. Clay, Mr. Bright, Mr. Gladstone, and other hon. members took part, the House divided.—For the instruction, 69; against it, 132; majority against the instruction, 63.

The House then went into committee on the bill, and the clauses up to 5 were agreed to. The 6th clause was divided into two, and the second portion was rejected, on a division, by 118 against 87.

Progress was then reported.

The Chattels Partition and Sale Bill, and the Bankruptcy (Ireland) Bill, were read a second time

The Sequestrators' Remedies Bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).

The Bishop of CASHEL, in presenting petitions from above 40,000 Protestants in Ireland, and about 1000 of the clergy of the United Church of England, in favour of scriptural education in Ireland, took occasion to find fault with the present system of national education in Ireland, which led to a short discussion in the course of which,

The Archbishop of DUBLIN and the Marquis of LANSDOWNE strongly defended that system.

Their Lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

IMPROVEMENT OF LANDED PROPERTY IN IRELAND.

On the motion of Lord J. RUSSELL, leave was given to bring in a bill authorise advances to be made out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for facilitating the improvement of landed property, and the extension and promotion of drainage in Ireland

MARRIAGES BILL

On the order of the day for the second reading of this bill, the object of which is to permit of marriage being contracted with a deceased wife's sister,

Mr. GOULBURN strongly opposed the measure, as uncalled for, and as being detrimental to morality. He moved as an amendment that it be read a second time that day six months.

Lord SHAFTESBURY supported the bill

After some discussion, the debate was adjourned

The House shortly afterwards rose.

BIRTHS, MARRIAGES, AND DEATHS IN ENGLAND.

The first number of a new series of reports has just been issued by the Registrar-General, and affords the following particulars. The quarterly returns hitherto published have comprised the deaths in 582 of the 2163 sub-districts into which England is divided. The present return includes, first, the births and deaths registered in the whole of the sub-districts (except two, for which returns are incomplete), during the quarter ending March 31st, 1849; and, second, the marriages in above 12,000 churches and chapels, 2869 registered places unconnected with the Establishment, and 603 Superintendent Registrars' offices, during the quarter ending Dec. 31, 1848.

MARRIAGES

The marriages in the year 1848 were about 137,135; which is more than were returned in 1847, but 8929 less than took place in 1845. Only 14,824 men and 118,825 women were married in 1842; the smallest portion, allowing for increase of population, registered in any of the eleven years 1838-48. From that year the number has nearly increased, and were 123,316, 122,349, 143,742, 140,232, in the four years 1843-4-5-6; in 1847 they suddenly fell to about 130,170, which is in nearly the same proportion to the population as the number 137,135 in 1848

The marriages are unequally distributed over the year, but the fewest people marry in the first, the most in the last quarter, whic follows harvest, includes Christmas, and is the marrying season in England. About 41,572 marriages were celebrated in the last, and 28,303 in the first quarter of 1848

It was established in the 8th and 9th Annual Reports, from an examination of the marriages in the 91 years 1756-1846, that the returns serve as a sort of barometer of the prosperity of the country. Marriages go on in all seasons, and at all times of public excitement makes them fluctuate, so that the more and the less indicate the feelings with which "the great body of the people regard their prospects in the world."

The returns of the five autumn quarters 1844-8, show that the marriages in London have slowly declined since 1845. The marriages in London are always most numerous in the quarter ending September—after the metropolitan harvest.

BIRTHS

The births in each of the years 1847 and 1848 were less numerous than in the year 1845, when the high number of 372,825 were registered. The births in the quarter ending March, 1849, were 15,706, or 8579 more than the births in the first quarter of 1846. It is the greatest number of births ever registered in the March quarter, or in any quarter in England, for quarter in the quarter in which the greatest number of births takes place. The popu ation increased, by the excess of births over deaths, 47,639.

STATE OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH

The deaths in the quarter ending March 31, 1849, were 105,056. Upon correcting for increase of population, the mortality for this quarter is found to be at the rate of 2·443 per cent per annum; were the mortality to remain at the same rate through a year, 2443 persons would die to every 100,000 of the population. The annual rate of mortality was the same as in the corresponding quarter of the nine years 1839-47; and less by 0·01, 0·07, 0·050, than in the winter quarters of 1847, 1846, and the average of the twelve years 1838-49. In 1846, a season for the worst took place in the public health, after the failure of the potato crop, the winter of 1847 was severe, wheat high. In a quarter, the mortality at the rate of 2·830 per cent annually; influenza broke out epidemically at the close of 1847, and was exceedingly fatal in London and in some towns during that and the following winter quarter of 1848, when the mortality was at the rate of 2·779 per cent. per annum. The mean annual rate of mortality in the four quarters of the eleven years, 1838-48, was 2·320 per cent; 2·980 per cent, in the winter of 1846; 2·427 per cent., or highest, in the year 1847. The mortality in the first is highest in the winter quarter, comprising January, February, and March; in the second in the summer quarter, comprising June, July, and August. The winter of 1846, remarkable for early severity and wildness, was an excep ion to this rule; the mortality was at the rate of 3·144 per cent. annually. But the high mortality of the latter was more than a compensation for the saving of life in the former half of the year.

Although epidemic cholera has been in England since October, 1848, and has prevailed more or less up to the present time in parts of the country, the general mortality has been and is considerably below the average. This is encouraging, and should stimulate all sanitary improvements; for summer is the season in which the epidemic is most to be dreaded

LONDON

The mortality of London in the seventeenth century was highest in the summer quarters (July, August, and September); it is now lowest in summer and highest in winter, and the relative change in the mortality of the seasons has arisen from the disuse of plague, dysentery, and the other diseases of hot weather and the increase of scrofula, and hooping-cough prevailed in London; typhus and fever, or low fever, is less by 253 than in the winter of 1848. Cholera, of which 4, 7, 3, and 9 died in previous winters, carried off 615 persons of various ages; making 1284 during the epidemic. 1791 persons died of bronchitis, 1209 of consumption—all less fatal than in the winters of 1846-8—constantly among the causes of one-fourth of the whole deaths. 21 persons died of intemperance, 41 of calomel irritation, casual by the effect of drinking spirits, 15 of poison, 76 of burns and scalds; 36 of hanging and suffocation; 66 of drowning; 114 of fractures and contusions; 26 of wounds; and 16 of other violences.

IRREGULAR PRESENTATIONS AT HER MAJESTY'S LEVEES.—The Lord Chamberlain has issued a notice, in which it is stated that some irregularities during these places, it is notified that no gentleman to be presented to the Queen at a levee can be admitted to the state apartments for that purpose who presentation card has not been previously sent to the Lord Chamberlain's office, according to the regulations, in obedience to the Queen's command, announced in the Gazette. The name of any gentleman not adhering to the regulations must be excluded from the presentation book, and the reason entered for so doing viz. the contravention of the regulations above alluded to GENERAL RULE.—EASTER TERM, 1849.—It is ordered that where a verdict or judgment as in case of a nonsuit shall have been discharged on a peremptory undertaking to try at the next or future assizes or sittings, if the plaintiff shall make default in proceeding to trial, pursuant to his undertaking, the defendant shall be at liberty, if the plaintiff has not drawn up the rule, to draw it up at any time before moving for judgment, and thereupon to move for judgment without serving a copy of the rule on the plaintiff.

"THE BERLIN PROPHETESS."

THE BERLIN PROPHETESS.

THE inhabitants of Berlin have recently had their attention diverted from politics by the appearance of a "Prophetess" and worker in miracles, in the person of a young girl, who, strange to say, has found hundreds of believers, even in the city that is the very centre of German nationalism and enlightenment, and particularly boasts its freedom from superstition and prejudice.

The house of her parents has been beset by crowds of persons of all ranks, and at last had to be protected by the police. Peasants from the country came in with sick and diseased relatives laid on beds in waggons, in the firm conviction that the "Prophetess" had the power of healing them. Many instances of such cases were related; but, on the close medical inquiry that has been instituted, not one authentic case has been established. The following is the child's history:—Her name is Louise Braune, and she is the daughter of the foreman or inspector of an extensive wood-yard in the Schiffer-strasse. She is between 11 and 12 years of age, ordinary in appearance, tall, and evidently suffering from a kind of nervous disease, during the attacks of which she has dreams or delusions, which, as frequently happens in such cases, have taken a religious colouring. Notice was first attracted to her by the extraordinary things she used to relate to her young schoolfellows, that she was attended by a spirit, named "Gonahum," who had shewn her Heaven and the saints in glory; of which her descriptions seem to be recollections of passages in Klopstock's "Messiah" and the "Book of Revelations" strangely mingled together. At last, she declared she had, through the intercession of her guide or spirit, the power of healing diseases. She was expelled from the school; but it did not prevent a rumour of her self-asserted powers from getting abroad: and the little house in the Schiffer-strasse was soon the object of a pilgrimage, differing little from the pious processions of the middle ages. Some, however, came to scoff; and two parties were formed, the believers and unbelievers, who from abuse of each other at last came to blows: this led to the stationing of a party of constables before the house to keep the peace. Whenever the "Prophetess" appeared at the window, she was reverenced by the fanatic crowd like a saint. She did not touch the sick and diseased persons brought to her; but merely telling them to have "faith," promised them, by the help of her spirit, a cure in three days. The scandal of the scenes enacted was so great, that the authorities were urged to interfere to prohibit it: but they preferred letting the absurdity wear out of itself. There is no reason to suspect any deliberate attempt at imposture, as neither the girl nor her parents took any money from the many pilgrims to the house; it is simply a case of self-delusion finding a mass of blind believers.

Our Cut gives a correct view of the house in the Schiffer-strasse, and a sketch of the crowd by which it was beset for weeks together.

INTERVIEW AT THE BOGUE FORTS.

WE are enabled, by an obliging correspondent, to illustrate the recent meeting between her Majesty's Plenipotentiary, Mr. Bonham, and Sen, the Imperial Commissioner and Governor of Canton, in the accompanying very characteristic Engraving. The interview took place on the 18th of February, in a Chinese boat anchored in a creek, behind the Bogue Forts. In the Illustration, we have Sen entertaining Mr. Bonham, both being seated upon a raised couch, and Admiral Sir Francis Collier, of her Majesty's ship Hastings; whilst servants are handing round tea.

After passing an hour in this boat, Sen handed in Mr. Bonham to dinner, which was served in an adjoining boat. The repast comprised eighty-eight dishes, including the celebrated Chinese luxuries, bird's-nest soup and shark's fins.

The conference lasted long, and must have been important. The result has not transpired; the subject was the question of opening the city of Canton, for the final orders of the Emperor respecting which it is reported that Sen has sent to Pekin.

It is stated that nearly all the respectable part of the native community at Canton will be glad to have the matter settled, as they are getting tired of it, and it is not argued by them now with the same angry feeling as on former occasions. The fear of the Ladrones and of the idle portion of the working-classes seems to be the chief cause of alarm, and not the question of the right of opening the city gates to us. The authorities can and must be made to carry out the convention, or the consequences, indirectly, may be injurious to British interests, not only at Canton, but at all the other ports. There is a general feeling of confidence in the firmness and determination of her Majesty's Plenipotentiary to accomplish this and other important points. Trade has felt the effects of the agitation; but, once this question is set at rest, it will improve, and the feeling that it will be settled gains ground.

JOHANN STRAUSS.

THIS celebrated composer was born in 1804, in Vienna. His parents, observing him from early childhood to be extremely fond of music, had him taught to play upon the violin, without entertaining, however, any intention of making him a professional musician. But, a commencement being thus made, his natural bent led him on to such untiring exertions, that he speedily acquired considerable proficiency on his instrument; and he may boast of it having been the means of his support since his sixteenth year. He and his brother in art, Lanner, performed publicly concerted pieces from operas, as well as dances, with much success.

Meanwhile, Strauss earnestly pursued his studies of the science of music, particularly under the learned Professor Drechsler, of Vienna. His earliest attempts at composition were some waltzes which he had amused himself with; and these, being performed in public, were so successful, that he was urged to publish them. Thus encouraged, he followed with other compositions of the same class. They are full of deep emotion, yet are light and sparkling; and the crowds of Vienna were enraptured, and Strauss was at once acknowledged the adopted child of Terpsichore.

Strauss and Lanner now separated, each forming a distinct line of his own. Strauss's compositions becoming celebrated throughout the musical world, he resolved upon making annual excursions with his band, and his success has been co-extensive with his exertions. There is scarcely a courtly circle in Europe before whom Strauss's band has not performed. Eleven years ago, his band visited London, and contributed greatly to that truly festal season. With this endearing prestige the master and his men have once more come amongst us.

HERR STRAUSS.

STRAUSS'S band is now performing in the metropolis with marked success. On Monday they attended at her Majesty's State ball at Buckingham Palace, when they performed the following pieces: [illegible] (composed for the occasion), Kaiserin Josefa, Fortuna Polka, Neue Polka, Les Wandelnde Lebewohl Walzer, Sorge-freier Walzer, Die Schwalben Walzer, Aether Traume Walzer, Eldorado Quadrille, Militaire Quadrille, Louisen Quadrille, Haut Volées Quadrille, Schafer Quadrille.

On Monday morning, Strauss and his band played at the Hanover Rooms; and on Wednesday night at Willis's Rooms. The characteristics of this orchestra are a clock-work precision and strong accentuation, which, in waltzes and other exhilirating dance music, are very effective.

ROYAL CHINESE JUNK.—On Saturday their Serene Highnesses the Princess Amelie and Eliza of Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst, her Serene Highness the Countess Erbach Schoenberg, and his Serene Highness the Prince of Hesse Philippsthal, attended by the Hon. Miss Mitchell and Capt. Bedford, visited the Royal Chinese Junk, Keying, and expressed themselves much delighted with the extreme novelty and interest of the exhibition. The Mandarin, Hesiag, had the honour of being presented to their Royal Highnesses.

CONFERENCE BETWEEN HER MAJESTY'S PLENIPOTENTIARY AND THE VICEROY OF CANTON, AT THE BOGUE FORTS.

PALERMO.—FROM AN ORIGINAL SKETCH.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.

MR. SHARMAN CRAWFORD.

MR. WILLIAM SHARMAN CRAWFORD is one of the few members of Parliament connected by birth, property, and residence with Ireland, who has been returned from an English hustings to the House of Commons. The hon. gentleman has sat for the borough of Rochdale since 1841. He previously represented the Irish borough of Dundalk. Although the representative of an English constituency, Mr. Sharman Crawford is principally known in political life by his strenuous exertions on the Liberal side in the thorny field of Irish politics. In the palmy days of the Repeal agitation, under O'Connell, he appeared in the ranks of the opponents of the Union; his opposition, however, to that Imperial measure being of a modified character, not extending to the purpose of the great Agitator of restoring the Irish Parliament as a Legislature independent of the British Parliament, but rather aiming at the attainment of a Legislative body for Ireland, solely for local purposes, and having merely a federal rank and character.

There are few more frequent speakers in the House than the hon. member for Rochdale on all questions involving considerations of civil and religious liberty, and of reform, political, financial, or municipal. He has always been an ardent advocate of the most liberal reading of "the Constitution," and is one of the most rationally advanced of the school of "Radical Reformers." Amongst his most persevering and consistent efforts in furtherance of the doctrines of that school, have been his exertions to obtain an enlarged Parliamentary franchise. In the Anti-Corn-Law agitation the League obtained his advocacy and support; and in general he has always been identified with the English Radicals. In the present Session of Parliament, he has taken an active part against the Government Poor-Law measure of a Rate in Aid for the benefit of the destitute unions in Ireland, opposing it on every stage of its progress through the House; and on Monday night, on the occasion of the third reading of the bill, he crowned his opposition to the measure in a speech which was highly characteristic of the man, and is valuable as presenting the tendency of a most competent authority on the policy of a measure relative to which great difference of opinion and much doubt prevail. He asked if hon. gentlemen had read the accounts just received from Mayo. If they had, it was impossible for them to believe that the utmost amount to be raised under the bill would be at all adequate to the growing increase of distress. Three-fourths of the unfortunate inhabitants of Mayo were without clothing, houses, and employment. In such a state of things, the rate in aid would have the effect of increasing the evil, and of stopping employment, because a greater number of substantial people would be driven out of the country. In his opinion, assistance could best be rendered by the Government undertaking large works of public improvement, so as to give an immediate stimulus to employment. He was utterly astonished at the course pursued by the English Liberal members, by the advocates of popular liberty, and those who contended that there ought to be no taxation without representation, in supporting a bill that violated every principle of constitutional liberty. He had himself proposed an amendment on this bill on a recent occasion, and he found that not one single Liberal English member divided with him. The present case was an extra one; it was a case of famine, and as such it ought to be provided for not by the Poor-laws, but out of the Imperial Exchequer. He was quite willing that Ireland should bear her fair share of the general taxation, but so long as the union existed he could not consent that Ireland should be exclusively taxed for what were justly imperial purposes. (Hear.) They had been told that by opposing this measure they contributed to increase starvation and want. If he thought that the measure would save the people from starvation, it should have his support were it even ten times more unconstitutional than it was; but when he saw that the money already granted had not that effect, but that death from starvation was still advancing with rapid strides throughout the land, he did not want to allow this money to be expended in a similar manner. He thought that other steps ought to be taken. They were well aware of the fearful extent to which the enactment system added to the mass of pauperism in Ireland; but if they thought it wrong, why was that system allowed to continue? (Hear, hear.) He believed there never was a measure more calculated than the present to deprive this country of all moral weight among the Irish people, and believing, as he did believe, that it was also most unconstitutional, he felt it to be his duty, not merely as an Irishman, but as an English representative, to give it his most decided opposition. (Hear.)

Mr. Sharman Crawford can scarcely be called an effective speaker, notwithstanding that his speeches are usually marked by appropriate diction and much sound common-sense. His voice is weak, making him difficult to be heard, and his efforts to overcome that defect, impart to it a strained tone, which falls painfully upon the ear; while his manner, though not lacking earnestness, is tame, and devoid of animation.

The honourable gentleman is the owner of considerable landed property in different parts of Ireland, principally in the county of Down. He assumed the surname of Crawford in addition to his family name of Sharman, in accordance with the will of the late John Crawford, Esq., to whose estates he succeeded.

Mr. Sharman Crawford, it should be added, enjoys the reputation of being one of the best and most considerate of the landlords of Ireland.

MAY-POLE IN THE FOREST OF DEAN, GLOUCESTERSHIRE.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

SURRENDER OF PALERMO.

THE fall of Catania and the other disasters to the Sicilian arms which followed so close on each other discouraged the Government at Palermo to such a degree, that, to save the city from the useless horrors of the consequences of a battle, they submitted to the Neapolitan General, on the 21st ult. The various members of the late Government, their General, Mieroslawski, and other parties not compromised, have made their escape, some to Malta, others to Marseilles.

According to the Times Correspondent's latest communication, the Arial French steamer arrived at Palermo, on its return from Gaëta, on the 21st ult., and it was at once announced that the proposed mediation had failed, and that the King of Naples would listen to nothing short of an unconditional surrender, similar to that made at Syracuse and Nota. Despatches were at the same time received from the Admiral, explaining that any further hope for the insurgents remained, and recommending that a deputation should be at once sent with the keys of the city to General Filangieri. Letters likewise came to hand from Mr. Temple, instructing Mr. Goodwin, the Consul, to assist by all means in his power the steps taken by the French agents to advance a sort ement, and prevent a further effusion of blood. In consequence of these communications, great excitement prevailed in the city, and the cry of "Viva [illegible]" was loudly renewed; but the new Provisional Government soon [illegible]

MAY-POLE AT ST. BRIAVEL'S, IN THE FOREST OF DEAN, GLOUCESTERSHIRE.

Hards is his barte that with nought
In May, whan al this earth is wrought;

CHAUCER'S Romaunt of the Rose

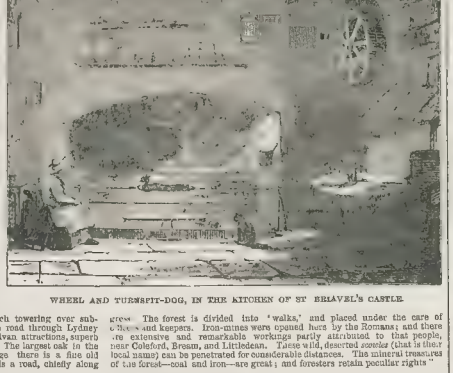
So completely are objects connected with old English customs being removed, in consequence of our rapid improvement and change of habits, that we take the opportunity of illustrating one of the few remaining May-poles—that in the village of St. Briavels, in the picturesque Forest of Dean, in Gloucestershire



WHEEL AND TURNSPIT-DOG, IN THE KITCHEN OF ST BRIAVEL'S CASTLE.

There are few places in England more interesting to the antiquary and lover of fine scenery than the Forest of Dean. This Castle, in which the accompanying sketch was taken, is situated on a lofty eminence which overlooks the valley of the Wye. The view is very beautiful, and is terminated by the distant Welsh mountains. The Castle is of immense strength, and was, until lately, used as a prison and court connected with some ancient privileges held by the freemen of Dean The church, in front of the Castle, contains memories of early Norman architecture: and the old May-pole is still standing in the village at Clearwell Green.

A short distance from St. Briavels is a simple cross, of early date: indeed, the Forest of Dean abounds in Roman remains, ancient and most curious [illegible] mural monuments, &c. In some of [illegible] the stocks and whipping-posts may still be seen. The forest coal and iron districts are also of much interest.

In the second edition of Mr. Cliffe's [illegible] "Book of South Wales" we find the [illegible] attractive details of this district, which our tourist considers to have been strangely overlooked by writers on the Wye:—

"Those who visit the Buckstone, and possess curiosity or leisure, must feel moved by an impulse to penetrate the vast region of scenery woods which stretches before them. A large forest is always invested with an air of mystery—sublimity. You may lose yourself in it. You may meet with some adventure. Wild animals or birds that shun the haunts of man are sure to cross your path. How fresh and soothing are the cool green woods! How deep the solitude! We recommend tourists to proceed through the town of Coleford to the Speech House, distant about eight miles from Monmouth; and to walk from thence—the path is often wet and miry—to the "White Oak," a monarch towering over subject woods. The scenery about Park-end, and along the road through Lydney by Bream, is also exceedingly beautiful; besides the Roman attractions, superb views are sometimes obtained of the Vale of the Severn. The largest oak in the forest (41 feet in girth) is at Newland, by which village there is a fine old church—strangers might return to Monmouth. There is a road, chiefly along the high ground, near the western edge of the forest from Monmouth to Chepstow, through Clearwell, St. Briavel's, and Tidenham Chase. St. Briavel's Castle—an interesting ruin was built by Milo Fitzwalter (temp. Henry I.) to curb the incursions of the Welsh. About a century afterwards it reverted to the Crown by forfeiture.—Offa's Dyke terminates at Beachley, and may be traced at a point where it crosses the road at Buckington Pump."

"This has always been a famous forest. In the middle ages it afforded a safe refuge to robbers, who used often to go afloat and plunder vessels on the Severn. The commanders of the Spanish Armada had orders 'not to leave a tree standing in it,' says Evelyn, 'they should not be able to subdue our nation.' Early in the reign of Charles I. the forest contained 43,000 acres; 14,000 of which were woodland, but the devastations committed were so great, that in 1657 only 200 large oak and beech trees were standing. 'To repair those wastes, 11,000 acres were immediately inclosed, planted, and carefully guarded,' and large additions have since been made. The plantations, during the last twenty years, in this magnificent nursery of navy timber (the quality of the oaks is the finest in England) have made very great progress. The forest is divided into 'walks,' and placed under the care of keepers and keepers. Iron-mines were opened here by the Romans; and there are extensive and remarkable workings partly attributed to that people, near Coleford, Broam, and Littledean. These wild, deserted scenes (that is their local name) can be penetrated for considerable distances. The mineral treasures of the forest—coal and iron—are great; and foresters retain peculiar rights" exaggerations, are quite appalling, and are unparalleled in the history of civilization. The Dublin Correspondent of a daily contemporary epitomises the sad history in a few words. He says that "matters are getting from bad to worse. The task of reading the provincial organs, Repeal and Tory, has become painful. They are all in the one story, and set to the same dolorous tune—bankruptcy in the upper and middle classes; the sons of the gentry squabbling for situations which the butlers of their progenitors would scarcely have deemed worthy of acceptance; Protestant clergymen reduced to the most pitiable state of destitution; the landlords being no longer capable of paying the tithe rent-charge; Roman Catholic priests shorn of their "dues," and flying to the relief-lists, their flocks being either inmates of the poor-house or the grave, or wanderers to other lands, in the hope of gaining that subsistence which is denied them at home." Add to this, that the land is uncultivated; that the peasantry die by scores on the wayside, and sometimes remain unburied for days; and that some parishes do not contain a population above a fourth as numerous as that which they counted even three years ago, and that these survivors are weak, dispirited, and almost entirely destitute, and we have a striking and too true picture of the present condition of Ireland. One little episode will complete the unhappy story. In the once thriving town of Newcastle, county Limerick, says the Dublin Evening Mail, "during the quarter-sessions just ended, there were over 1200 prisoners to be tried, and it occupied the Court but three days to try them all. And why? Simply because they all pleaded guilty, in the hope of being detained in prison; and two who were discharged were the next day accused of riot, and committed on an attempt to break into gaol." And this is the social misery, demoralization, and despair which we are to cure by an Irish Poor-Law and by a bill for facilitating the sale of encumbered estates!

THE victory of Goojerat has been followed, as was anticipated, by the surrender of Shere Singh and the Sikh leaders. There only remains the defeat and punishment of the Affghan auxiliaries, to complete the British triumph and to end the war. The overland mail of the 3rd of April brings full details of all the operations immediately consequent upon the defeat of Shere Sing. After flying in confusion from the field of Goojerat, the Sikhs directed their course towards Rhotas. General Sir Walter Gilbert pursued them at the head of 15,000 men. He reached the Jhelum on the 28th of February, and found that the river, swollen by rains and the melting of the snow on the hills, occupied five considerable channels, with islands between. He pushed across all these, with the loss of only one soldier, and a few camels. This operation employed five days. The General then advanced upon Rhotas, an old and extensive hill fortress, which he found to have been temporarily occupied by the Sikhs and abandoned. He continued his onward progress, the Sikhs still flying before him, and seized upon the Bukreash Pass. It now appears to have become evident to Shere Singh and Chuttur Singh that all chance of escape was at an end. They, therefore, opened negotiations for a surrender, pleading for the guarantee of their lives. The reply given to them on the same as had been previously given to Moolraj at Moultan—was, that the surrender must be complete, immediate, and unconditional. On the 7th of March, one of the principal Sirdars, with 500 men and 3 guns, arrived in the camp of General Gilbert, and threw himself upon the generosity of the conquerors. On the following day, Mrs Lawrence and family and the other British prisoners were delivered up; and in the evening the Sikh leader himself made his appearance. As certain arrangements for the delivery of the artil ery that had escaped our possession at Goojerat had to be made, Shere Singh was allowed to return to his own camp, to complete them. He did not, however, make his re-appearance so soon as was expected; and as there was both a possibility, and to some extent a belief in the British camp, that, notwithstanding his promise to surrender, he would make one last desperate effort for victory, General Gilbert continued his march, fully prepared for the encounter. On the 14th, however, this intention, if ever formed by the Sikh chieftain, was unhesitatingly abandoned. He and his father Chuttur Singh, with eleven others of the principal Sirdars, arrived in the British camp at Rawul Pindee, and delivered up their swords. Forty-one pieces of artillery and 16,000 stand of arms were at the same time surrendered. A proclamation issued by the Governor-General on the 17th notified these facts, stating at the same time that the war was not concluded, and that there could be no cessation of hostilities until Dost Mohammed and the Affghan army had been either driven from the province of Peshawur, or destroyed within it. General Gilbert was previously in full march upon Attock, which he reached on the 17th, having marched a distance of 41 miles in 36 hours, through a most difficult country, and over two or three rapid streams. When the army was about six miles from Attock, it was announced that the Affghans had just evacuated the fort, and crossed the Indus to Hyderabad, and that they were at that moment engaged in destroying the bridge of boats by which they had effected their passage. General Gilbert, with a small escort, and the whole of his staff, galloped forward at this announcement, and never stopped to take breath until they arrived upon the hill at the right of the Fort of Attock, which overlooks the river. Here they discovered the Affghan army, 7000 or 8000 strong, encamped on the other side of the Indus, while a detachment of about 100 men were engaged in burning and otherwise destroying the boats. On seeing the British, whom they imagined to be at least two days' march behind, their consternation was so great, that they hastily cut the ropes that bound the boats, and fled with the whole of the Affghan force. The boats drifted down the stream, but about fifteen of them were secured; and, at the date of the last advices from Attock, a portion of the force under General Gilbert had taken possession of Hyderabad, and the whole army was engaged in crossing the river. The Affghans were in full retreat towards the Khyber Pass; and if, as was probable, the Khyberries have impeded their progress, and stopped their passes against them, the Affghans must have been all made prisoners within a few days after the last intelligence was received from General Gilbert. There only requires this latter consummation to complete the moral effect of the war upon the enemies of our power in India.

Speculation is naturally rife, after such a victory as that of Goojerat, as to the future fate of the Punjaub. The Bombay Times states that there is no intention on the part of the British Government to annex it to our dominions, but that it is to be governed by a Council of Regency, in the name of the young Maharajah, with Sir Henry Lawrence as President. But, whatever may be the present intentions of the Governor General, so much will depend upon the view taken by Sir Charles Napier on his arrival, that no opinion can be formed of the ultimate decision.

BENTINCK TESTIMONIAL.—The committee connected with the Notts Testimonial to the late Lord George Bentinck have at length decided upon the following inscription: "To the memory of Lord George Frederick Cavendish Bent nck, second surviving son of William Henry Cavendish Scott, fourth Duke of Portland, &c., whose ardent patriotism and uncompromising honesty were only equalled by the persevering zeal and extraordinary talents which called forth the grateful homage of those who, in erecting this mem rial, pay a heartfelt tribute to exertions which prematurely brought to the grave one who might long have lived the pride of his native county. He died September 21st, 1848, aged 46."

DIORAMA, REGENT'S-PARK.—With all our recollection of the successes of this unique exhibition, we do not remember a more beautiful one than the present views—the Valley of Rosenlaui, with the beautiful effects of a Storm in the Alps; and the celebrated Church of Santa Croce, at Florence, with the exquisite gradations of light and shade peculiar to this establishment.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETING.

THE NAVAL AND MILITARY BIBLE SOCIETY.—The sixty-ninth annual meeting of the supporters of the above society was held, on Monday, at the Hanover-square Rooms, the Earl of Chichester in the chair. The military secretary, Major Sotheby, read the report, from which it appeared that the issue of bibles and testaments was greater during the last than in any preceding year: 1841 had been distributed in the army, and 500 among the troops of the East India Company: 1276 had been divided among thirty of H.M ships, and 1100 had been supplied to the Royal Marines stationed at Woolwich and Gosport: 16,378 had, with few exceptions, been dispersed in merchant ships, at the reduced price of 2d. and 2953 to the boat and bargemen on the river. 1261 copies had been sold to the seamen at the London Docks—which makes the total number of bibles and testaments issued during the past year 23,210, and since the commencement, 850,093. The income amounted to £9439 9s. 8d., and after deducting the necessary charges a balance was left of £19

YORK BUILDERS' BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.—On Monday evening the supporters of this society held their forty-second annual general meeting, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate street. The report stated that the society was formed in 1807, and since that period 1221 persons and their pensions with pensions to the aggregate amount of £32,365 18s 4d. The number of pensioners during the past year, including 44 in the asylum at Camberwell, had been 362, and the amount of pensions distributed £1629 2s. 6d. The past year's receipts for the support of the society had amounted to £1861 5s. 9d., being a trifle less than the previous year; and the expenditure left a balance in the hands of the treasurer of £31 9s. 9d. After the unanimous adoption of the report, and the passing of the usual routine resolutions, a vote of thanks was given to the chairman, and the meeting separated.

HOME AND COLONIAL SCHOOL SOCIETY.—On Monday evening the supporters of this society held their forty-second annual general meeting, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate street. The report stated that the society was formed in 1836, and since that period 1221 male and female persons with pensions to the aggregate amount of £32,365 18s 4d. The number of pensioners during the past year, including 44 in the asylum at Camberwell, had been 362, and the amount of pensions distributed £1629 2s. 6d. The past year's receipts for the support of the society had amounted to £1861 5s. 9d., being a trifle less than the previous year; and the expenditure left a balance in the hands of the treasurer of £31 9s. 9d. After the unanimous adoption of the report, and the passing of the usual routine resolutions, a vote of thanks was given to the chairman, and the meeting separated.

HOME AND COLONIAL SCHOOL SOCIETY.—The examination of the children of the schools of this Society, and the annual public meeting of its subscribers and friends, took place on Monday, at the institution in Gray's-inn-road. The lessons were of unusually interest to the other children, bearing on the commerce and manufactures of the country. Amongst the visitors were the Earl of Harrowby, the Lord Henry Cholmondeley, &c. The Hon. and Rev. Montague Villiers presided at the meeting. The society has greatly enlarged its premises, and now trains upwards of 200 females annually. Its system of moral and religious training is highly popular.

CITY OF LONDON COMMON SEWER.—On Tuesday a Court was held, and the question of the reduction of the price of gas was considered. The City and the Chartered Gas Companies proposed to light the public lamps within the city of London upon the following terms: For batswing burners, £4 4s. per annum, three-hole burners £2 14s. ditto, upon the terms and conditions of the present contract, which requires them to keep clean and in repair the lanterns and fittings free of any charge to the City; and both companies severally acquainted the commissioners that it was their intention to reduce the price of gas to the private consumers in the city of London from 6s. 6d. to 6s. for the next year: the reduction to commence from the 24th of next June. The announcement was received with applause, and the offers of the two companies were accepted.

EAST INDIA HOUSE.—On Tuesday a ballot was taken at the East India House on the following question, viz.—"That it is Court is of opinion that the treaty concluded by the Bombay Government in 1819 with Pertabsihn, the Raja of Sattara, and subsequently renewed with his brother and successor, the late Appa Sahib, conferred upon and guaranteed to those princes the hereditary sovereignty in the principality of Sattara; and this Court being further of opinion that the heirs and successors to those princes, whether by adoption or in right of blood, are not tied to the inheritance under the terms and conditions of the said treaty: this Court considers it to be right and necessary to record its opinion, that no case has been made out to justify the annexation of the said principality of Sattara to the British territory." At six o'clock the glasses were closed and delivered to the scrutineers, who reported that there were For the question, 95; against the question, 297; majority against the question, 201.

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The annual meeting of this society was held on Monday, in Exeter Hall, Strand. The hall was densely crowded. Sir Edward N. Buxton took the chair at eleven o'clock. The report stated that the general state of the society's missions was decided and that the annual returns were such as to stimulate them to increase its exertions. The operations of the society derived great importance from remarkable character of the present times. The Wurtemberg mission was a feature as to be regarded with peculiar interest, as counteracting extensively the infidel principles sought to be inculcated there. In France the society had found a more effectual means of furthering their labours. The small increase of members in India and Ceylon was not deemed altogether unworthy of notice. In Austria the society was progressing. In New Zealand and Feejee the missions had been most successful. They had been proceeding most favorably in South Eastern Africa, until their operations were disturbed by the Kaffir war; but since that time they had the satisfaction of seeing that the zeal of the inhabitants had been re-awakened. The committee regretted that an accumulation of the funds did not take place, whereby their course of action would be eventually rendered easier, as they would be obliged to contract their operations within the limits of their funds. Some very large donations had been received, but the great facilities afforded last year by the Council for visiting the garden has resulted an increase of £800 in the receipts in nine months' committee had finally to the partial success of the present administration will prove the commencement of a new period of prosperity, since, for the first time in twelve years, the income has advanced an increase of the former over those of the preceding year. The report of the auditors having been unanimously approved, and a vote of thanks carried to those gentlemen, Mr. Mitchell (the secretary) read the report of the council, which stated that the number of fellows, fellows, and annual subscribers amounted to 1710. The sum collected last year was not only greater than that in 1847, but greater than that of any year since 1843, and the increase of 50,964 visitors presented a more favourable difference than in any two previous years, excepting 1835 and 1846, when it amounted to 83,300. The returns from the commencement of the new year were also extremely favorable, there having been, up to Saturday last, an increase of 5663 visitors over the corresponding weeks of last year, and of £134 13s. in the receipts. A considerable saving had been effected in the expenditure of provisions, amounting to £201 7s 10d., or ten per cent. on the amount expended during the past year, notwithstanding the great increase in the number of animals. The most serious casualties of the past year had been the loss of the male lion (which had been in the gardens thirteen years), the male giraffe, and the male arrocha. The increase of visitors during the year had been 50,048. The report was received and adopted, and a vote of thanks passed to the council; and, after some other routine business, the meeting separated.

ROYAL ORTHOPÆDIC HOSPITAL.—The anniversary festival of this excellent charity will be held on the 15th inst., at the Free-masons' Tavern—the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, V.P., in the chair—when a large attendance is expected. The committee state, that, thrown the wards of the hospital are full, and the number of out-patients is between 600 and 700, there are upwards of [illegible], whose admission as in-patients is indispensable. The successful [illegible] of the committee urgently appeal to the benevolent public for the [illegible] pending in charity.

BOOKBINDERS' FINISHERS' ASSOCIATION.—The second annual festival of the Bookbinders' Finishers' Association will take place at the Rough Tavern, Museum-street, on Monday next.

LANDED SOCIETY.—On Wednesday, the annual meeting of this society took place at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, in order to receive the report and on general business. Lord Braybrooke took the chair. The report stated that four works had been issued during the past year, and that are now on the list for publication. The total receipts, with Pertabsihn, &c., had been £3862 3s. 9d., and the expenditure £3865 1s. 11d., leaving a balance of £2 12s. 10d.; £10 had been invested in the purchase of £9 16s. 3d. Three per Cents, which has raised the society's stock to £7911 19s. 10d.

THE HOSPITAL FOR CONSUMPTION AND DISEASES OF THE CHEST, BROMPTON.—The anniversary of this institution was celebrated on Wednesday by a public dinner, given at the Albion Tavern. Mr. D. Disraeli, M.P., took the chair. The hon. gentleman was supported on his right by Lord Feversham, and on his left by M. Guizot. In the course of the evening Mr. Philip Rose (the Honorary Secretary) read the eighth annual report of the institution, from which we take a few extracts, as showing the great results of what was formerly considered an experiment, but which has been proved to be a matter of fact. The document refers to the events of the last twelve months: "They have been able during the year to open two additional wards, containing 12 beds. The total number of in-patients now admitted in the present building has reached to 81. Since the opening of the new building in November, 1846—676 patients have been admitted, of whom were relieved 466; died, 129; remaining in the house, 81. The attendance during the past year have been 3000, of whom 2324 were relieved. From the list of January last, the number admitted has been 95; of whom 11, or rather more than one-ninth, have died. With respect to the erection of a chapel, the building will be carried on under the direction of the committee. Sir Henry Foulis having kindly undertaken to supply funds as they are required. The cost of erection is limited to £1500. The funds, however, for the purpose of the erection of the chapel, as also the sum for the purchase of the land on the west of the hospital. M. Guizot made a short speech on proposing the health of the Duke of Richmond, president of the institution. There were [illegible] £1744 subscribed during the evening.

MEXICAN COMPANY.—The general meeting of this mining company was held on Wednesday, at their offices in Great Winchester-street, when the report of the directors for the past year was laid before the shareholders, together with the accounts of the company, from its commencement in 1825 up to the 31st of December last. J. G. Hanson, Esq., was in the chair. The secretary (F. R. Maude, Esq.) read the report, which stated that the war with the United States, and the disturbances thereby created, had destroyed all the expectations previously formed of the mines of Oaxaca; so great, indeed, was the anarchy that Mr. Pinchon, the agent of the company at Oaxaca, represented in his letters that it would require 1000 men at least to protect a conducta from Mexico to Oaxaca: in consequence of this state of things, the agents at Oaxaca declared their inability to continue their purchases, and this compelled the agent to enter into arrangements for the sale of the ores to the miners on payment of one half for their services. The remainder, however, failed in practice, and the supply of ores fell off, and the yearly produce of silver consequently decreased. Articles of supply rose in price and aggravated these losses; but the loss on the year's balance sheet is only £7141 7s. 3d., an amount which includes the London expenses of £2000. The year's loss on the Taxco is reduced to £134 7s. 3d. From the balance sheet of the company it appeared that the funds of the company abroad amounted to £18500, a stock of quicksilver equal to several years' supply, 150 cargals of supply, a good stock of iron and such stores, no doubt, no liability! The plant of the company abroad is valued at £18,830. The estimated value of the silver in hand is £3767 4s., making a total of £21,537 4s. The total receipts of the company from its commencement to December last, amounted to £1,394,639 1s. 11d., and a total disbursement of equal amount, leaving a sum of £1500 in the hands of the company at Exchequer Bills, cash at the bankers, and in hand. After some discussion the report was unanimously adopted, and it was determined that in the existing state of affairs it would be unwise to advance more capital than the sums themselves furnished for their current expenditure. At the same time, a vote of thanks was most cordially passed in acknowledgment of Mr. Finchon's able services for more than 20 years as the agent of the company. It was also stated that a run had been recently opened in the Jesu Maria, which promised very flattering results.

MANSION HOUSE.—We are requested to state, that, in consequence of her Majesty's concert at Buckingham Palace, the Lord Mayor is obliged to defer until a future opportunity the entertainment he proposed to have given on Wednesday next, the 9th inst.

CLERKENWELL COUNTY COURT.—WANTED A JUDGE.—On Saturday last, and six other days within the last fortnight, much dissatisfaction was expressed at this court, in consequence of 1100 cases having been put down for trial—that is, at the rate of 150 a day, but, owing to the death of Mr. Starkie, the late judge, the proceedings have been suspended, much to the inconvenience of a vast number of witnesses, &c. The evil is a very serious one, as affecting the general working of the bill. There are now upwards of 5000 plaints unheard, and the appointment of a judge, with an assistant, is anxiously looked for.

ATTEMPTED RENEWAL OF THE CHARTIST AGITATION.—On Wednesday night a meeting of the Chartist body was held at the British School-room, Cowper-street, City-road, for the purpose of adopting a petition to Parliament in favour of the people's Charter. It was expected that Mr. G. Thompson would have presided, but in his absence the chair was taken by Mr. William Davis, a working man. The speeches and resolutions were of the usual character of such meetings, but somewhat more guarded in their language than those of last year Mr. F. O'Connor was present, and made a speech, proposing a resolution, to the effect that the working classes having been heretofore used as tools by other parties, in the effecting of organic changes under a limited system of franchise, this meeting pledged itself that they would not advocate any political measure short of the people's Charter, but would stand firmly together as a distinct and separate class, contending for the natural rights of man, and their liberation from unnatural and destructive competition with each other.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—The births registered during the week ending April 28 amount to 1528, of which number 776 were males, and 752 females the deaths to 1058, the males being 533, and the females 525; which gives 98 more than the weekly average of saving; but the return shows a small decrease on the two previous weeks, in which the numbers were respectively 1566 and 1089 The excess on the average is chiefly manifested, as was previously shown, by bronchitis and hooping-cough, which were fatal—the former to 91 persons, though only 37 died one week with another in the corresponding quarter of former years—the latter to 51 children out of the usual average of 15; even more than usual Hooping-cough, however, shows a marked decline since the beginning of March, when the number returned was 89. Scarlatina caused 47 deaths, or 15 more than the average; diarrhœa and dysentery 18, or 4 in excess; cholera [illegible] the average; diarrhœa and dysentery 18, or 4 in excess; cholera [illegible] only 1. The mortality from typhus continues to decline, and is now remarkably low; the deaths from it were 34, the average being 42: in last February they averaged about 60, and in the same month of 1848 were returned to the present number. The mortality from small-pox is under, that from measles a little above, the average. The continued excess of mortality from bronchitis may be ascribed to the extreme fickleness of temperature in recent weeks

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—The temperature was less than that of the same week on an average of seven years by 3.7 deg. It was under this average during the whole period between the 23rd and 26th of April. It rose, however, considerably on Wednesday, and maintained its position during the rest of the week. On Thursday and Friday the highest temperatures was 58 and 59 deg., the daily mean 48 deg. The mean of the week was 49 deg. The mean height of the barometer was 29.516.

FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE.

On Wednesday night, about ten o'clock, a fire broke out at No. 57, King William street, City, in the joint occupation of Mr. Devereux, a hat manufacturer, and Mr. Dewey, a tailor. Mrs Devereux and two of her children were in the house.

The remains of two of the unfortunate inmates were taken out of the ruins. Mrs Devereux has since died from the effects of the injuries she sustained

After the discovery of the fire, and before the arrival of the escapes and engines, two females—Mrs. Devereux and one of her children—were seen at a dreadful height at the third floor window, screaming in a half frantic tone their imploring fate, and immediately afterwards Mrs Devereux threw herself out and fell upon her head on the flagstones in front of the house, blood streaming from the wounds inflicted by the fall. Before sufficient time had elapsed to remove the poor sufferer, her daughter followed, and striking in her descent the maiden gutter over the door she broke her left leg, and otherwise most fearfully injured. Little hopes are entertained of her recovery.

The escapes of the Royal Society, under the direction of Mr. Paddelly, the inventor, were on the spot in less than five minutes after the alarm was given, but unfortunately not in time to be of the least assistance to the inmates. In spite of the vast torrents of water scattered over the flames, they continued to rage with great fury until a quarter past five o'clock that they were subdued. During the whole time the lightning flashed vividly and the thunder roared loudly.

One of Mr. Devereaux's children made her appearance at a lower window, and, having broken the glass, succeeded in forcing her way partially through the aperture, when some one residing in Mr. Hudson's next door, with the aid of the police, managed to draw the poor creature through—but, in so doing, the flesh was dreadfully cut on her legs and other parts of the body.

The firemen and escape-men discovered the body of the third floor female, consisting of a few young women, apparently about 18 years of age; and near her the body of a child, about 9 or 10 years old, also fearfully burnt.

How the disaster occurred cannot at present be accounted for. The premises were closed between eight and nine o'clock, when everything seemed perfectly safe

Mr. Devereux was, at the time of the outbreak, at Windsor on business.

COUNTRY NEWS.

ADDRESS TO MR. HUDSON, FROM THE ELECTORS OF SUNDERLAND.—On Wednesday evening a deputation from the town of Sunderland waited upon George Hudson, Esq., M.P. for that borough, at Newby Park, with an address congratulating him on the services of their constituent to the private and public [illegible] individual. Mr. Hudson received the address with thankfulness. [illegible] Amidst the unjust aspersions that have been directed against [illegible] my character, to know that I possess the unbiassed confidence and the kind regard of those with whom I pass my daily life, imparts a consolation to my mind for which I never can be sufficiently grateful. You do me only justice when you express your conviction that I have never been actuated in any conduct I have pursued, in the [illegible] ment has passed away, I fear not the calm judgment and the indulgent consideration of an intelligent right-minded British community."

MR. WARD AND ELECTION OF SHEFFIELD.—MR. H. G. Ward, late Under-Secretary to the Admiralty, has issued a valedictory address to his late constituents in Sheffield, having resigned his seat in the House of Commons, consequent upon his appointment as Chief Secretary to the office of Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands In the course of this address the hon. gentleman, adverting to some votes of his in the House which had not given satisfaction, says—"In the exercise of his constituents, says I am," I admit, however, that upon many points my own views have been modified by a nearer acquaintance with the responsibilities of power. I am not ashamed to confess that the experience of the last three years has brought me in my difficulties in practice, which in theory I did not apprehend, and that, although I entertain as firm a belief as ever in those great principles of justice and good faith upon which all governments rests, those great principles of justice, honest men may differ honestly, and always must differ so long as the human mind is differently impressed by the times and circumstances amidst which each of us has to act."

THE SHEFFIELD ELECTION.—On Monday, a meeting of the electors and non-electors of Sheffield was held for the purpose of listening to an address from Mr. Roebuck, the candidate for the representation of the borough. The meeting was one of the most numerous that has been held in Sheffield for some years, there being not less than 10,000 or 11,000 persons present. A resolution was adopted, pledging the meeting to support Mr. Roebuck

FESTIVITIES AT GISBORNE PARK.—MAJORITY OF LORD RIBBLESDALE. On Saturday, the 28th ult., the Right Hon. Thomas Lord Ribblesdale attained his majority, an event which was celebrated with much rejoicing at his residence, Gisborne Park. In the morning and during the day merry peals were rung on the bells of the church, cannons fired at intervals, two bands of music played on different parts of the grounds, and in the evening the town was brilliantly illuminated. There was a splendid display of fireworks At all the inns of the village excellent dinners were provided for the tenants and friends of the youthful nobleman, and while the tenantry were feasted, the poor were not forgotten On Monday the wives of the tenantry and others were entertained with tea and coffee, an abundance of good old Jamaica being provided for those who like it. The [illegible], and the church bells rang merrily throughout the day

THE MANCHESTER LODGING-HOUSE ASSOCIATION.—An association under this title has recently been formed, of which the Bishop of Manchester is the patron, and which has for its object to carry into effect the abuses and evils of every kind that characterise many of the existing lodging-houses for the poorer classes

MAY LYRICS

BY [illegible], LL.D.

THE MAYING.

AN INVITATION.

I.

Fair May unveils her ruddy cheek,
And decks her brow with daisies,
And scatters blossoms as she goes,
Through fields and forest mazes.
The fragrant hawthorn, white with bloom,
Fills all the uplands airy:
The grass is dry, the sky is clear—
Let's go a Maying, Mary.

II.

I dearly love, in days like this,
When birds make music o'er us,
To roam with thee through wild wood paths,
And listen to their chorus;
To help thee over crags and stiles,
And take thy hand in leaping,
And out and in to see thy face
Through leaves and branches peeping.

III.

Ten years have pass'd since first I saw
Thy fresh and budding beauty,
And love has ripen'd with the years,
And link'd itself with duty.
In life's young spring I swore to thee
A truth that should not vary;
And now, in summer of my days,
I love thee better, Mary.

IV.

Time lays his finger light on thee,
Thy cheeks are red as peaches;
Thine eyes are bright as first they glow'd
To hear my youthful speeches.
Thine eldest boy is nine years old,
Thy youngest babe two summers;
And thou art blooming like a girl,
Mid all the little comers.

V.

Bring all the four into the woods—
We'll set them gathering posies
Of harebells blue and pimpernels,
Instead of garden roses.
Beneath the trees we'll have one day
Of frolicsome employment;
And birds shall sing and winds shall blow,
To help us to enjoyment.

VI.

Leave house affairs to shift awhile—
Leave work, and care, and sorrow;
We'll be the merrier to-day,
And happier to-morrow.
I would not greatly care for life,
If fate and toil contrary
Could not afford me, now and then,
A holiday for Mary.

VII.

And Fate is kind to those who strive
To make existence pleasant,
With harmless joys and simple tastes,
And kindness ever present.
We'll not complain; so come away,
And when we want a treasure,
We'll use these May-day memories
To buy forgotten pleasure.

THE IVY IN THE DUNGEON.

I.

The ivy in a dungeon grew
Unfed by rain, uncheer'd by dew;
Its pallid leaflets only drank
Cave-moistures foul, and odours dank.

II.

But through the dungeon-grating high
There fell a sunbeam from the sky;
It slept upon the grateful floor
In silent gladness evermore.

III.

The ivy felt a tremor shoot
Through all its fibres to the root;
It felt the light, it saw the ray,
It strove to issue into day.

IV.

It grew, it crept, it push'd, it clomb—
Long had the darkness been its home;
But well it knew, though veiled in night,
The goodness and the joy of light.

V.

Its clinging roots grew deep and strong;
Its stem expanded firm and long;

And in the currents of the air
Its tender branches flourish'd fair.

VI.

It reach'd the beam—it thrill'd, it curl'd—
It bless'd the warmth that cheers the world;
It rose towards the dungeon bars—
It look'd upon the sun and stars.

VII.

It felt the life of bursting spring,
It heard the happy sky-lark sing.
It caught the breath of morns and eves,
And woo'd the swallow to its leaves.

VIII.

By rains, and dews, and sunshine fed
Over the outer wall it spread;
And in the daybeam waving free,
It grew into a steadfast tree.

X.

Upon that solitary place
Its verdure threw adorning grace.
The mating birds became its guests,
And sang its praises from their nests.

X.

Wouldst know the moral of the rhyme?
Behold the heavenly light, and climb!
Look up, O tenant of the cell,
Where man, the prisoner, must dwell.

XI.

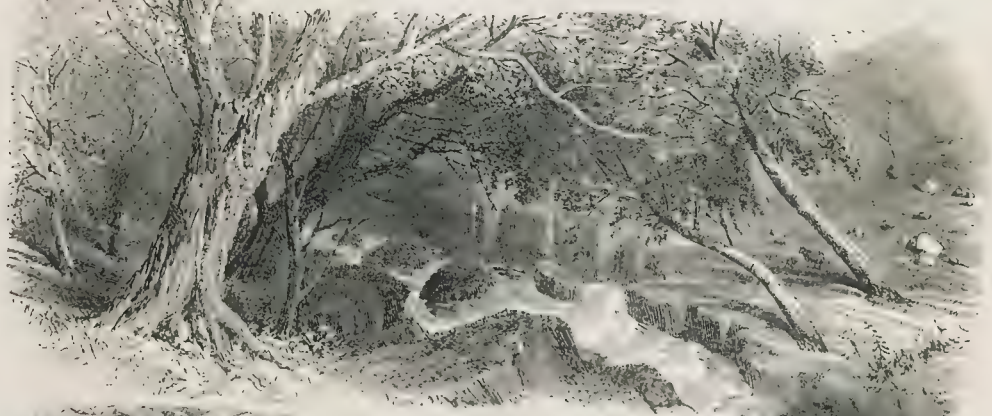
To every dungeon comes a ray
Of God's interminable day.
On every heart a sunbeam falls
To cheer its lonely prison walls.

XII.

The ray is Truth. Oh, soul, aspire
To bask in its celestial fire;
So shalt thou quit the glooms of clay,
So shalt thou flourish into day.

XIII.

So shalt thou reach the dungeon grate,
No longer dark and desolate;
And look around thee, and above,
Upon a world of light and love.



THE NAMELESS MOUNTAIN STREAM.

I.

Up from the shore of the placid lake
Wherein thou tumblest, murmuring low,
Over the meadow, and through the brake,
And over the moor where the rushes grow,
I've traced thy course, thou gentle brook.
I've seen thy life in all thy moods,
I've seen thee lingering in the nook
Of the shady, fragrant, pine-tree woods.

I've seen thee starting and leaping down
The smooth high rocks and boulders brown;
I've track'd thee upwards, upwards still,
From the spot where the lonely birch-tree stands,
Low adown amid shingle and sands,
Over the brow of the ferny hill,
Over the moorland, purple dyed,
Over the rifts of granite grey,
Up to thy source on the mountain side,
Far away—oh, far away.

II.

Beautiful stream! By rock and dell
There's not an inch in all thy course
I have not track'd. I know the well:
I know where blossoms the yellow gorse,
I know where waves the pale bluebell,
And where the orchis and violets dwell.
I know where the foxglove rears its head,
And where the heather tufts are spread;
I know where the meadow-sweets exhale,
And the white valerians load the gale.
I know the spot the bees love best,
And where the linnet has built her nest.
I know the bushes the grouse frequent,
And the nooks where the shy deer browse the bent.
I know each tree to thy fountain head—
The lady birches, slim and fair;
The feathery larch, the rowans red,
The brambles trailing their tangled hair.
And each is link'd to my waking thought
By some remembrance fancy-fraught.

III.

I know the pools where the trout are found,
The happy trout, untouch'd by me.
I know the basins, smooth and round,
Worn by thy ceaseless industry,
Out of the hard and stubborn stone—
Fair clear basins where nymphs might float;
And where in the noon-time all alone
The brisk bold robin cleans his coat.
I know thy voice: I've heard thee sing
Many a soft and plaintive tune,
Like a lover's song in life's young spring,
Or Endymion's to the moon;

I've heard it deepen to a roar
When thou wert swollen by Autumn rains,
And rush'd from the hill-tops to the plains,
A loud and passionate orator.
I've spoken to thee—and thou to me—
At morn, or noon, or closing night;
And ever the voice of thy mastery
Has been companion of delight.

IV.

Yet, lovely stream, unknown to fame,
Thou hast oozed, and flow'd, and leap'd, and run,
Ever since Time its course begun,
Without a record, without a name.
I ask'd the shepherd on the hill—
He knew thee but as a common rill;
I ask'd the farmer's blue-eyed daughter—
She knew thee but as a running water;
I ask'd the boatman, on the shore,
He was never ask'd to tell before—
Thou wert a brook, and nothing more.

V.

Yet, stream, so dear to me alone,
I prize and cherish thee none the less
That thou flowest unseen, unpraised, unknown,
In the unfrequented wilderness.
Though none admire and lay to heart
How good and beautiful thou art,
Thy flowrets bloom, thy waters run,
And the free birds chant thy benison.
Beauty is beauty, though unseen;
And those who live it all their days,
Find meet reward in their soul serene,
And the inner voice of prayer and praise.

VI.

Like thee, fair streamlet, undefiled,
Many a human virtue dwells,
Unknown of men, in the distant dells,
Or hides in the coverts of the wild.
Many a mind of richest worth,
Whether of high or of low estate,
Illumes the by-ways of the earth,
Unseen, but good: unknown, but great.
Many a happy and lovely soul
Lives beauty in the wilds afar,
Or, 'mid the city's human shoal,
Shines like a solitary star.

MY GARDEN GATE.

I.

Stand back, bewildering politics,
I've placed my fences round
Passion, with all your party tricks,
Nor tread my holy ground.
Stand back! I'm weary of your talk,
Your squabbles, and your hate.
You cannot enter in this walk—
I've closed my garden gate.

II.

Stand back, ye thoughts of trade and pelf,
I have a refuge here;
I wish to commune with myself—
My mind is out of gear.
These bowers are sacred to the page
Of philosophic lore;
Within these bounds no envies rage—
I've shut my garden door.

III.

Stand back, Frivolity and Show,
It is a day of spring;
I want to see my roses blow,
And hear the blackbird sing.
I wish to prune my apple-trees,
And nail my peaches straight;
Keep to the causeway, if you please—
I've shut my garden gate.

IV.

I have no room for such as you,
My house is somewhat small:
Let love come here, and friendships true—
I'll give them welcome all.
They will not scorn my household stuff,
Or criticise my store.
Pass on—the world is wide enough—
I've shut my garden door.

V.

Stand back, ye pomps, and let me wear
The liberty I feel.
I have a coat at elbows bare—
I love its dishabille.
Within these precincts let me rove,
With Nature, free from state;
There is no tinsel in the grove—
I've shut my garden gate.

VI.

What boots continual glare and strife?
I cannot always climb;
I would not struggle all my life—
I need a breathing time.
Pass on—I've sanctified these grounds
To friendship, love, and lore:
Ye cannot come within the bounds—
I've shut the garden door.

A FANCY UNDER THE TREES.

I.

Ye happy, happy trees,
That in perpetual ease
Stand on the soil where ye as saplings grew;
That lift your branches fair
To embracing air,
And feed on sunshine, rain, and morning dew:
I would that I could lead,
In all my thought and deed,
A life, ye happy trees, as fruitful as you.

II.

To build your fabric high
No breathing creatures die;
Your bursting buds that open to the spring
Require no food from death;
Your leaves that woo the breath
Of the sweet summer, and your boughs that swing
To breezes overhead,
Demand no life-blood shed,
Or tribute of a pain from meanest living thing.

III.

In cloud-caressing length,
In beauty and in strength
Ye live and grow, ye people of the woods.
Not idly do we deem,
In waking fancy's dream,
That in your green and busy solitudes,
Ye may, to men unknown,
Have pleasures of your own,
And feel sweet sympathies with all dear Nature's moods.

IV.

To everything that lives
The kind Creator gives
Share of enjoyment; and, while musing here,
Amid the high grass laid
Under your grateful shade,
I deem your branches rustling low and clear
May have some means of speech,
Lovingly, each to each,
Some power to understand, to wonder, to revere.

V.

I deem that all your leaves,
In morns, or noons, or eves,
Or in the starry stillness of the night,
May look to Heaven in prayer,
Or bend to earth, and share
Some joy of sense, some natural delight,
That root, and branch, and stem,
Partake the joy with them,
And feel through all their sap God's glory infinite.

VI.

I deem the song of birds'
May speak to you in words,
And give you pleasure in your silent hours.
I deem that storm and hail,
The thunder and the gale,
The softly-dripping, health-restoring showers,
The sunlight and the dews
May secretly infuse
Emotions of pure joy to all the groves and bowers.

VII.

I deem that all night long,
When hush'd is every song,
And the cold frosty stars wink in the sky—
When the winds droop to rest
On Earth's forgiving breast—
That ye still wake, and hold communion high
With the o'erarching spheres,
Disclosing to your ears
The truths in tables told of heavenly harmony.

VIII.

I deem, when winter cold
Howls o'er the birth wold,
And all your boughs rock naked to and fro,
That unto you is given,
By ever-watchful Heaven,
Strength to endure, and calm under woe,
That He who rules the wind
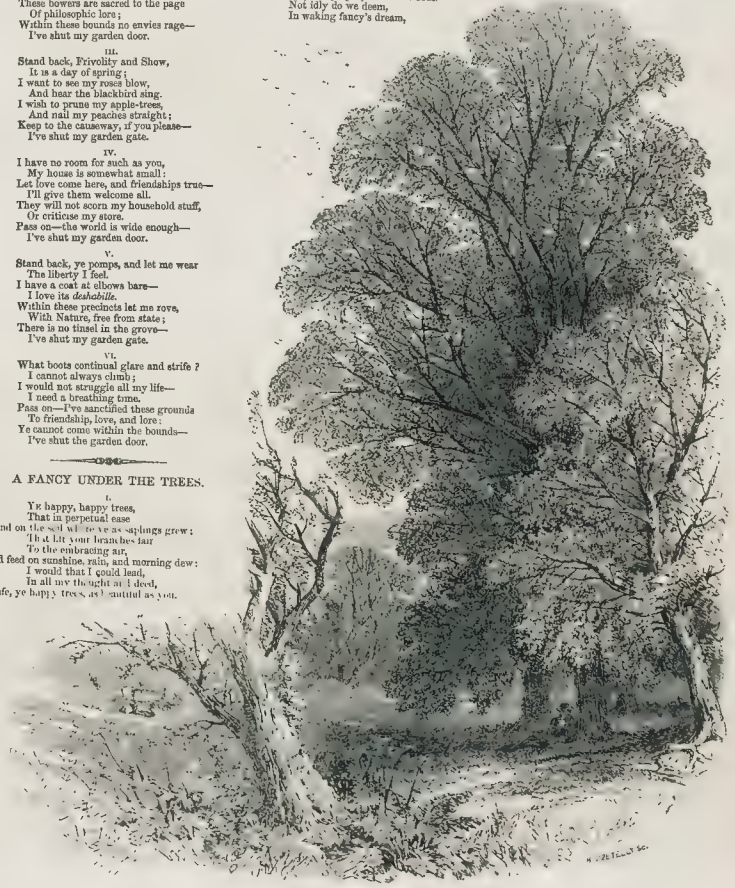
Tempers its wrath unkind,
And guards your lives, as ours, when bitter tempests blow.



IX.

I deem ye speak aloud
To the careering cloud,
And that your deep toned hymns, to fervour wrought,
When dark December roars,
Voiced like the hilltop shores,
Is the expression of religious thought;
And that, with distant waves,
Ye chant harmonious staves—
A psalmody sublime, with adoration fraught.

O happy, happy tre-s!
Ye make no enemies
All things that live and know you are your friends.
Enjoying and enjoy'd,
Your harmless lives are void
Of all the sorrow that on ours attends.
Your day is long and fair,
Your life is sweet to bear,
And Nature has decreed no suffering when it ends.

XI.

Ends—when restored to earth?—,
Perchance. If constant birth
Springs but from constant changing and decay,
The life that moved your sap
May live again, mayhap,
And bear new beauties in the grace of dis.
Oh, mystery of Death!
Unspoken of our breath!
We feel, but know thee not—we can but hope and pray.

MUSIC.

CONCERTS.

The scheme of the fourth concert of the Philharmonic Society on Monday night, was one of the whole, heavy two symphonies, two overtures, a pianoforte concerto, and violin concertino, with vocal gleanings of the severe school, tax the attention too much in one sitting, especially when there is no very prominent artistical genius in the solo singing. Haydn's symphony, Hiver-T, and the picturesque symphony in E of Beethoven, No. 8, were, on the whole, finely executed, by the orchestra of the Conservatoire band in Paris inclosed as to wish for further improvements in our Philharmonic of expression, delicacy and sweetness. Lindpaintner's "Faust," and Weber's "Euryanthe," were smoothly played—in particular the fine overture in Euryanthe is irresistable Mrs. Anderson performed Mendelssohn's concerto in D minor: she has a cla-sical conception of the work, but it required greater physical powers than she imparted to the full justice in its masculy details. The playing of Mr. Blagrove in Mayseder's concertino was steady and sure: a little more warmth of style would have rendered it perfect. A Viennese singer, Mdlle. Jetty de Treffy, who played in the General in of Balfe's "Bohemian Girl," sang Cherubini's cheering air from Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro," "Ilr, dis ihr trahn" (Voi che sapete), and an elegant song by Meyerbeer, "Kennst du das alsas Lied" Her voice and method are essentially German, but she is a decided representative of that school. Miss Bassano gave Gillck's "Che farb," from "Orfeo;" and with Mdlle. Jetty de Treffy, the duo from Mozart's "Clemenza," "Come il pace." The next concert will be on the 14th of May.

One of the greatest musical treats ever experienced was at the third meeting of the Musical Union, on Tuesday. The programme comprised Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat, Op. 44, No. 3, and Beethoven's No 8, Op. 59, in E minor, with his Sonata in G major, Op 96, for piano and violin. When it is stated that Ernst, Deloffre, Hill, and Piatti were the executants in the quartets, and that Ernst and Charles Halle performed the sonata, it will be readily guessed that the intellectual gratification was unalloyed by any single hitch or drawback. It was pleasing to the connoisseur in the course to notice three of the four greatest musical countries—Italy, Germany, France, and England: Ernst being a German, Piatti an Italian, Deloffre a Frenchman, and Hill an Englishman. The wondrous powers of Ernst were never heard in greater perfection—the poetry of his style, and the impassioned sentiment he infused into the adagios, raised the enthusiasm of the amateurs to the highest pitch. The exquisite touch of Hallé, [illegible] now at the head of the classical school We have reason to be proud of the tenor-player, Hill—his rich unctuous tone is unrivalled; whilst Piatti's violoncello playing in chamber music is justly appreciated for its captivating qualities. The scherzo in Mendelssohn's quartet was encored with [illegible] of the instrumental scheme was over. Mr. Ella, in his director, agreeably surprised the company by introducing some Hungarian songs, who sang a quartet by Mendelssohn with exquisite taste, feeling, and precision—having remarkable pure-toned voices, which blended beautifully in the hundred performers.

The compositions executed at M. Alary's Concert, at the Hanover-square Rooms, are of a nature to pique curiosity. He is known as a professor of singing, having to boast as pupils Mario and Grisi, the greatest tenors of the age. M. Alary does not seem to confine himself to any one school, for his overture in A is German in character, whilst the "Romanda" Overture is French, and the "Serva Padrona" is Italian. Mario and Grisi, the greatest singers of the day writing induce us to hope to hear, sooner or later, an opera from him. Two airs sung by Reeves, "The Savoyard's Return" and "Il Lamento della Luna," were encored, and are graceful compositions. On Tuesday morning, Miss Fraser Bartlett gave a concert at the Hanover Rooms, at which [illegible] were executed. Compositions by Miss Bartlett were also executed. The Hungarian Singers and other vocalists also assisted in the scheme, of which Benedict was the conductor.

Mdme. Dulcken's third matinée musicale took place on Wednesday, at which Molique, the composer and violinist, played.

The London Wednesday Concerts terminated their second series of entertainments at Exeter Hall on Wednesday night, for the benefit of Mr. Stammers, the managing director. There was, as usual, a complete overflow. There have been in all twenty-three concerts, and another batch is announced. It is, perhaps of little use to suggest, when such decided success has attended the present scheme; but we hope for the sake of art, as well as for the fame of artists, a higher purpose will be exhibited in the future programme than has been the case Mdlle. Jetty Treffz was encored in Balfe's ballad "I dreamt that I dwelt in Marble Halls," from the "Bohemian Girl;" but we prefer Miss Rainforth's version. In one of Kucken's ballads, a modern German song writer, she was not at home, and one of the romances executed on encore. The solo instrumentalists were, Mr. S. J. Noble, pianist; T. Harper, junior, trumpet; Victti Golaze, violin; and G. Collins, violoncello. Mr. Willy was the leader, and Lavenu and Rockstro, accompanyists; the singers being Misses Dolby, Lucombe, Poole, A. Taylor, Messent, A. and M. Williams, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Weiss, A. Irving, T. Williams, Hagen, and Master Stephens.

On Wednesday night the fifth concert of the Amateur Musical Society was given at the Hanover-square Rooms, a very numerous and fashionable assemblage being present. The aristocratic amateurs acquitted themselves as very creditably in the execution of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony a work which, but a few years since, the most experienced professors were fearful of performing. Moran's symphony in D, No. 4, Mendelssohn's chorus from "Athalia," Hérold's "Zampa" overture, and a fantasia on themes from Donizetti's "Elisir d'Amour," were also included in the scheme—the principals of the wood and brass bands being professors. There was a novelty in the concert of a MS. overture in A, by Mr. G. A. Osborne, the pianist and composer. It was greatly applauded, and deservedly so, for the composition is that of a clever musician, who understands orchestral effects, and who has fancy suggestive of [illegible]

At the Beethoven Rooms, in Harley-street, on Thursday morning, under the patronage of the Duke of Cambridge, Mdlle. Garcia, a pianist, who enjoys considerable continental fame, gave an agreeable concert, at which she performed pieces by Hiller and Chopin and some melodic studies of her own composition with great ability. The room was filled with a fashionable company, who were liberal in their approbation of the fair pianiste's exertions. Mdlle. Garcia had the valuable co-operation of Mdlle. Vera, Miss Rafter, Miss Rowland, Signori Nappi and Coras.

MUSICAL EVENTS.—The seventh and last meeting of the Choral Harmonists will take place on Monday. On the same evening, the German company will commence at Drury-Lane Theatre. In the morning will be the first concert at the Royal Italian Opera. The concert of the Society of Female Musicians, and Mr. John Parry's entertainment, [illegible] Tuesday will be the concert of Miss Dolby and Mr. Lindsay Sloper.—On Wednesday, the first meeting of the Beethoven Quartet Society.—On Tuesday, the Sacred, and Saturday, Italian Opera at Her Majesty's Theatre and the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden; and English Opera [illegible] Theatre. French Opera and German Opera three nights per week, at the St. James's and Drury-Lane Theatres.——Mr. N. J. Sporle gave a concert last Monday, at Crosby Hall.——The prize of 20 guineas, given at the Glee Club, by Sir Fel x Booth, was gained by Mr. King; the prize of 10 guineas, given by W. Dixon, Esq., was won by Mr. Martin; and the prize of 5 guineas, given by J. Smith Esq., was gained by Mr. Turle.——Signor Bottesini (a great contrabassist), Herr Bohrer (a violoncellist), and M. Mortier de Fontaine and Herr Molthoff (pianists), have arrived in London.—The English Operatic Company at the Royal Lyver Theatre, Liverpool, is meeting with good patronage. The acting and singing of Miss Anne Romer (a cousin of the Miss Romer of Drury-Lane) are warmly recognised by the local Journals, as Lucia, Marian in the "Daughter of the Regiment," and Amina in the "Somnambula." Mr. Howard Glover's début as a tenor, in "Lucia," evinced promise: a new opera, entitled "Amrita," by him, was to be produced. Mr. Delavanti and Mr. Gregg were the basses, and Mr. E. L. Hime the other tenor, and Miss Sara Flower the contralto.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

Tuesday was a night for a real lover of music, who knows that as long as art is to rem in an object of general culture and of constant progress, the general principle of lyrical effect must be maintained, and every peculiar practice that could absorb its "manner" to its strenuously avoided; what the full development of contour and details is no less strenuously to be sought. On this ground we commend the production of the opera brought out on Tuesday, embracing as it cast not only Parodi, Coletti, and Sanderi, but with Labloche in a secondary part, rendered by him of first importance; and, for the sake of one beautiful quartett, the singer employed to name the manager of all the characters, who was first tenor during the last season of the Italiens, in Paris. No lyrical work merited more to have the self-evident precepts applied to it than "La Favorita," given on Tuesday. This is the only opera which has been transferred from the French to the Italian lyrical stage without some lowering of the standard of value in the transmutation Mdlle Parodi, in the opera, was not put forward to out-star and eclipse her lyrical colleagues and the general beauty of the work: but to show that in "La Favorita" she was not la Norma, that she possessed that power of identification with a part, that versatility, which characterises genius. The portraiture of Leonora was beautifully traced. In the first two acts, amid her [illegible] her new-born love, there was in her tone and manner the shadow of painful reflection at her situation, and that peculiar melancholy of those who feel themselves foredoomed by destiny. There were no attempts at theatrical clap-traps, no premature force, no violent anticipation of the catastrophe to follow destructive of illusion, such as we behold in many tragedy-queens, who come on the stage with their muscles strung, and their features ready made up for [illegible] doings. Her two cavatinas were admirably sung, and loudly encored; [illegible] scene of dramatic despair and adjuration, and [illegible] expression of the bliss with which Leonora dies when once pardoned, that the genius of the lyrical actress was displayed in all its charm, although studied and revealed only in the most delicate shades. Gardoni, as the lover, has the advantage that, whilst he retains the soft style and beautiful phrasing of the Italian school, he has been educated for this part, a part of energy—of the Académie itself, where this opera was first produced. He is, therefore, the best of Fernandos. Coletti sang the celebrated "Pour tant d'amour" perhaps the most beautiful song Donizetti ever wrote—with all the mastery and the pathos of which he is so highly capable. The effect was immense. Lablache, as the High Priest, displayed alternately the mellow dignity of one above all passion, consoling and supporting humanity; whilst his delivery of the anathema, in the singing "Ah, fuyenta ti furor," possessed an energy and a melodic volume which made the deepest impression. The concerted pieces in the principal singers were almost a triumphantly successful. Costa, now under the direction of the celebrated Milanese Professor Ronconi, displayed their extraordinary efficiency in the two most beautiful and difficult pieces—the finale, sung [illegible] Gardoni the taunts, the gibes, and the outbursts of envy of the courtiers. Bartolini, in the grand quartett, and in the Luther's chorus, showed the importance of introducing a superior singer in a secondary part. The performers were recalled after every act, and Mdlle. Parodi reaped new figurative laurels, whilst she encountered a shower of real bouquets.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

One of the most perfect performances at the above establishment is the ensemble presented in Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia, for the admirable precision of the choral singers and the exquisite playing of the orchestral accompaniments are combined with a most powerful cast; all the minor parts which are of essential importance in the concertation of the opera being sustained, whilst the principal artistes have acquired the greatest celebrity in their respective domestic as. Grisi's Lucrezia has always ranked as one of her finest vocal and histrionic displays: and her personation on Tuesday night was overwhelmingly grand and impressive. She was in beautiful voice, and accomplished her daring divisions with delightful ease and grace She never, indeed, executed a passage more finely in the finale of the second act than on Tuesday night. Her attitude, as she stood at the door through which Gennaro has escaped, was surpassingly fine, and the house rang again and again with acclamations, her Majesty, who honoured the theatre with her presence, accompanied by Prince Albert, applauding with great earnestness, when the great lyric tragedian was called before the curtain.

Anerii's Orsini presents that part quite in a new light. It is the first time that it was ever known in the country assuming, as it were, a [illegible] It is a study, it appears, studied in order to accord to Persiani the full development of herself for the "Brindisi" alone, but develops the attributes of Orsini's character throughout the opera. Her singing of the air, in which Orsini describes his discovery of [illegible] was marked by the keenest sensibility, and every word in the recitatives was delivered with intellectual meaning and force. At the conclusion of the scene, [illegible] she exclaims, "Ah, I am poisoned—I feel death here, and the veil of night falls on me," and the [illegible] of the scene, a shudder seemed to go through her frame, and the forced attempt to shake off the presentiment of evil was admirably done. Altogether, the Orsini of Anerii's remarkable performance, and one that must have increased her rising reputation immensely. There is a melodiousness and purpose in her acting, as well as fire and energy, and she is an actress of the highest order: nor contradict her ever yet executed such violin passages as those which Angri pon s forth with such amazing velocity.

Mario sang with great feeling and effect, although of recent indisposition he was apparent, and he was unable to give the whole of the air in the third act [illegible] Duke is a splendid artistical study, and in the trio he was very effective; but time is making ravages in his once noble and incomparable organ. We missed the thundering tones of Marini in the prologue, which was encored; but as he has now made his début, he will resume his part of Apostolo this evening (Saturday), when "Lucrezia" will be repeated, on account of the crowded state of Tuesday's house.

On Thursday (the seventh night) "Norma" was revived, with Grisi as the Druidical priestess, and Mario as Pollio. Mdle. Corbari made her début appearance this season as Adalgisa; and Marini also appeared, for the first time, as Oroveso.

FRENCH OPERA.

Hérold's popular opera, "Le Pré aux Clercs," was produced on Wednesday night at the St. James's Theatre, our Majesty, the Duchess of Kent, and Prince Albert honouring the house with their presence. We do not intend to enter into a lection or this work was judicious for this establishment, which is wanting in the scenic and decorative resources required for an effective mise en scène. Nor was the execution of the pieces at all unsatisfactory; and the artistes did not work together with that completeness we are accustomed to from a French company. A very prepossessing débutante made her first appearance in the character of Isabelle. It is one of the most charming works on the French operatic stage—full of sparkling melodies and brilliant orchestration. The Commerce of Couderc was spirited, but not sufficiently subdued; and Mdlle. Darcier sang so many ad libitum passages that her voice will permit. Mdlle. Charton has not the traditions of the Hérold school, but she acted prettily. The clever trio, sung by Mdlle. Charton, Mdme. Guichard, and Octave, was encored.

On Thursday evening, two new pieces were produced, both taken from the French, the one at the HAYMARKET being an adaptation of the drama of M. Alexandre Dumas's "Les Demoiselles de St. Cyr," and that at the LYCEUM of the "Mari Anonyme," of Messrs Dumanoir and Deurey, the accomplished authors of "Don Cesar de Bazan" and many other popular pieces. The haymarket piece had much in common with that at the LYCEUM—each exemplifying a constructed plot, neatly-turned dialogue, with one of those ingenious Spanish intrigues running through it, which, whilst they are always entertaining to the audience, defy lucid description in print. It is called "The Runaway Husbands," and has been very well adapted by Mr. Buckstone, to five acts having been compressed into three, with much curtailment of the dialogue, and several gratuitous made, consistent with this condensation, in the construction. It affords scope for some excellent acting by Mr. Buckstone, Mr. Wallack, and Mr. Howe; Mrs. Fitzwilliam and Miss Reynolds; and was received throughout with very kind applause, being announced for repetition every evening until further notice, by the first-named gentleman, amidst renewed acclamations. We may add that the house was very full.

The LYCEUM piece is called "The Husband of my Wife," and is the first attempt of a young gentleman whose father holds a high position in the foreign department of the Post-office, and who has long and secretly contributed to the [illegible] of which he is a member. It was produced on Thursday night, and received with very great favour by the audience, who were liberal in their approbation of the fair pianiste's exertions. Mdlle. Garcia had the valuable co-operation of Mdlle. Vera, Miss Rafter, Miss Rowland, Signori Nappi and Coras.

Elaborate preparations are making for the production of the new burlesque spectacle, the "Devil's Violin," at the ADELPHI, on Monday.

On Monday Mr. Anderson and Mrs. Warner appeared at the SURREY in "Macbeth," and were very warmly received by a crowded pit and gallery. They played throughout with great spirit, and did fair to achieve a very profitable engagement, both to the manager and themselves. The tragedy was played with the incidental "Witches' music, which has for years been highly popular with a Surrey audience.

At the MARYLEBONE, a new classical drama, on the story of "Virginius," we believe an adaptation by Mr. Stanford, is in rehearsal, and will forthwith be produced. Mr. Davenport has been playing Hercules, and William in "Black-Eyed Susan" (two somewhat different roles), every evening this week, and each with good effect.

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

EASTERN COUNTIES.—THE DIRECTORS AND THE COMMITTEE OF INVESTIGATION.

A reply to the report of the committee of investigation by the board of directors has been issued to the shareholders. It is entitled "Observations of the Directors of the Eastern Counties Railway Company upon the Report of the Committee of Investigation."

The directors—after stating that they have no wish to extenuate their conduct in respect to those matters where blame can be placed upon the board as a body, while they regret that they did not earlier oppose the influence which led to erroneous measures—state that, whenever Mr. Hudson was thwarted in his views, he threatened to leave the direction of the company, and it was considered that it would not be agreeable to the proprietors that he should do so. Therefore his wishes were concurred in and carried out by the board. That various sums have been [illegible] charged to revenue has been carried to capital, now unquestionably appears but, at the same time, it is undeniable, that to state the amounts charged to capital, as improperly so charged, at £320,573, is a great exaggeration. It is true, for instance, that sums to the extent of £84,000 and upwards, forming a portion of the £320,573, have been charged by the directors to capital instead of revenue, as the interest of impro[illegible] equal. But whether this be right or wrong, it has been a practice pursued by all other railway companies; it is defensible upon substantial grounds, and the shareholders have themselves been parties sanctioning the charge, any other course, forming as it does upwards of £100,000, also forming portion of the £320,572, and chiefly connected with the rolling stock, have been treated during the last three years as chargeable to capital, which, they properly were. These sums the committee of investigation seek to bring back against the past revenue, whereas the true complaint on their part should, in the opinion of the directors, have been that no depreciation fund had, during this period, been formed out of revenue. As to this point, the directors have to remind the shareholders that, before Mr. Hudson joined the board, the principle of a depreciation fund had been established, at the credit of which stood the sum of £6340, and it was the intention that a half-yearly addition should be made to this sum; but Mr. Hudson disapproved of the principle; the matter was discussed at the general meeting of February, 1845; and the shareholders having then adopted Mr. Hudson's view of the subject, all further additions to the fund were abandoned, and the existing reserve of £6340 was, in the following half-year, made use of, on the face of the related accounts, in assisting to pay the dividend. The matter was, however, forced upon the consideration of the board when they had to prepare a financial statement of the company, in November last, and they considered that they ought not to avoid mentioning the question of the depreciation fund, and they brought it forward contrary to the wishes of the then chairman.

The directors having thus stated their views upon some of the charges made in the report of the committee, abstain from comment on any questions touching individual conduct. These, they say, will be best dealt with at the public meeting, where such personal explanations as may be required will be given. In reference to an expenditure, however, of £7605, which is referred to in the Committee's report, the directors think it right to say that it was made to bring about important benefits for the Company, by assisting a Committee in April, 1846, called the Size-line Committee, formed for the purpose of carrying out the scheme of amalgamation with the Eastern Counties and London and York interests, which had been proposed by Mr. Hudson at the meeting in 1845, and which had been received with such unbounded satisfaction by the shareholders as that that Committee succeeded, an enormous amount of expenditure, Parliamentary and otherwise, would have been saved; and that these objects were legitimate and proper, are sufficiently evidenced by the fact that a gentleman of such respectability acted upon the Committee.

Referring also to the capital and liabilities of the Company, the directors, with [illegible] to the £320,573 [illegible] to the £320,573 [illegible] to the £320,573

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

On Sunday morning her Majesty and Prince Albert, the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended divine service in the private chapel of Buckingham Palace. The Honourable and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated.

On Tuesday the Queen held a Court and Privy Council, at three o'clock, at Buckingham Palace. At the Court a deputation from the Society of Friends had an audience of the Queen, to present an address on the subject of the African slave trade and slavery. The deputation consisted of Samuel Gurney, William Forster, George Stacey, and Peter Bedford. Her Majesty was accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the gentlemen in waiting introduced by the Right Hon. Sir George Grey, Bart., her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, and presented the address in the Royal closet, to which her Majesty was pleased to return a most gracious answer.

HER MAJESTY'S STATE BALL.

The Queen gave a State Ball on Tuesday evening, at Buckingham Palace, to a party of sixteen hundred, comprising the Royal Family, foreign Princes in this country, the whole of the diplomatic corps and their ladies, the Ministers and members of the Administration, the ladies and gentlemen of the household of the Queen and Prince Albert, the Queen Dowager, and the rest of the Royal Family, and many of the nobility and gentry.

The distinguished circle all appeared in Court dress, the ladies having on a dresses of great elegance and beauty, the officers of the army and navy and ordnance wearing their respective uniforms, and Ministers of State and others of the Royal household being habited in their official costumes, and the Knights of the several Orders of Knighthood wearing their respective ensigns.

At nine o'clock the company began to arrive, and continued coming for an hour and a half. Passing up the grand staircase, the distinguished visitors were ushered into the magnificent picture-gallery. The guard of the Yeomen Guard presented arms as the approaches, under the command of Mr. Edward Belchier, the Exon in Waiting; Sir Seymour Sadler, Exon of the Yeomen Guard, was also present.

The entire suite of state saloons were opened for the fête, and were most brilliantly illuminated, while groups of the most beautiful and fragrant flowers filled all the recesses.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge, and their Royal Highnesses the Hereditary Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh Strelitz, arrived at half-past nine o'clock, attended by Lady Augusta Cadogan and Mr. Edmund Mildmay.

His Royal Highness Prince Leopold, Count of Syracuse, was attended by his Excellency General Prince Castelcicala and the Chevalier Colonna.

Their Serene Highnesses the Princess Adelaide and Duke of Hohenlohe-Schillingsfurst, and Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar were also present.

The Queen received the Royal Family in the Yellow Drawing-room.

Shortly before ten o'clock her Majesty and Prince Albert entered the saloon, accompanied by their Royal and illustrious guests. The Queen wore a dress of pink tulle, with two petticoats, trimmed with pink and white gauze ribbon, ornamented with pink and white roses, green leaves, and diamonds.

Her Majesty's head-dress was composed of a wreath of pink and white roses, green leaves, and diamonds to correspond to the dress.

Her Majesty was attended by the Duchess of Sutherland, the Marchioness of Douro, Lady Caroline Somers Cocks, Hon. Matilda Paget, Lord Byron, Colonel the Hon. A. N. Hood, and Colonel Buckley.

Prince Albert was attended by Lord George Lennox and Lieutenant-Colonel Seymour.

The Lord Chamberlain and the Lord Steward immediately preceded the Queen and the Prince, and conducted her Majesty and his Royal Highness through the saloon into the ball-room, the general company following the august circle. The Lord Chamberlain formed a set for a quadrille, and her Majesty opened the ball with his Royal Highness the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz. Waltzes and polkas followed.

Herr Strauss and his band attended in the ball-room.

Dancing was commenced in the Throne-room, which was fitted up as a second ball-room, and where a quadrille band of thirty performers, led by Mr. Charles Coote, was stationed.

Her Majesty visited the ball-room during the evening, and sat occasionally in the elevated seats prepared in both apartments for the accommodation of her Majesty and of her illustrious visitors.

The Green Drawing-room was appropriated for refreshments, which were served throughout the evening; and in the dining-room the supper was served in the usual regal style of splendour and magnificence.

HER MAJESTY'S LEVEE.

The Queen held a Levee on Wednesday afternoon in St. James's Palace. Her Majesty and Prince Albert arrived from Buckingham Palace, attended by the Royal staff, and were received by the Lord Steward, the Lord Chamberlain, and the Master of the Horse.

Sir Edmund Lyons, her Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary at the Swiss Confederat on, had an audience of her Majesty in the Royal closet, and was presented to the Queen on his arrival from Athens by Viscount Palmerston, her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

The Serene Highnesses Prince Ernest and Prince William of Hesse-Philippsthat attended the levee. The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by their Serene Highnesses, and attended by the Royal suite, passed from the Royal closet into the Throne Room.

Her Majesty's train was composed of Nottinghamshire lace over blue satin, trimmed with bows of blue satin ribbon. The petticoat was of Nottinghamshire lace over white satin, trimmed with bows of blue satin ribbon to correspond. Her Majesty's headdress consisted of diamonds.

The Foreign Ambassadors and Ministers were introduced, when several gentlemen had the honour of being presented to her Majesty and the Prince Albert in the diplomatic circle.

Her Majesty the Queen, having purchased a large space of ground in the Kensal-green Cemetery, has ordered to be constructed, for the Royal Family, an elegant mausoleum, to which will be removed the remains of the late Royal Highness the Princess Sophia, now deposited in the company's catacombs. The site, which was selected by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, is in a conspicuous part of the cemetery, opposite the monument of his late Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON'S BIRTHDAY.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Lieut.-Col. the Hon. A. Gordon, honoured the Duke of Wellington with a visit at Apsley-house on Tuesday, to offer his congratulations to the noble Duke, on the auspicious return of his natal day. His Grace has completed his 80th year. A numerous party of gentlemen assembled to celebrate the occasion, at the Albion, Aldersgate street, where a very elegant entertainment was provided by Messrs. Staples. W. Field, Esq., presided, and the vice-chairs were ably filled by W. Cubitt, Esq. M.P., and H. Graves, Esq. The toast of the evening, "the health of the distinguished hero," was drunk with the greatest enthusiasm, and the festivities were prolonged to a late hour.

The Regius Professor of Divinity proposes during the Term to read the "Scriptum Ex enustecum Græcum" of Dr. Hinch.

The Sedleian Reader in Natural Philosophy began a course of lectures in Newton's "Principia" on Thursday, the 3rd of May.

The Savilian Professor of Astronomy is continuing his lectures on the Elements of Ariadne.

The Boden Professor of Sanscrit will commence his lectures on Monday, the 14th of May, at the Clarendon, at two o'clock.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The fiftieth annual meeting of this society was held on Tuesday last at Exeter Hall. In the morning the chair was taken by the Earl of Chichester, and in the evening by the Marquis of Chelmsdaley. Among the very numerous distinguished persons who took part in the proceedings were the Bishops of Winchester, Norwich, and Oxford, the Rev. Dr. Smith, bishop designate of Victoria, Hong Kong, the Rev. Mr. Morrison, Bishop designate of Rupert's Land, Archdeacon Beaufry, &c. The room was filled to overflowing on both occasions. Twenty thousand pounds were to be appropriated to the support of disabled missionaries, and to the education of their children.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.—On Wednesday the anniversary of this institution was held at Exeter-hall, the Marquis of Cholmondeley presiding. The chairman, in opening the proceedings, congratulated the meeting on the fact that recent events had removed many barriers to the circulation of the scriptures on the Continent. The Rev. A. Brandram read the report, from which it appeared that the entire receipts of the year ending March 31, 1849, amounted to £109,933 5s. 1d. [the usual distinguishable to the general purposes of the society was £74,571 10s. 9d., including £7,000 for special contributions and £34,361 14s. 4d. for contributions to the Scriptures in foreign tongues, and £28,991 4s. 3d. for contributions to auxiliary societies abroad, as against those in that item of £695 11s. 1d. The receipts for bibles and testaments amounted to £43,358 11s. The issues of the society for the year amounted to 1,107,175, from the depôt at Bloomsbury, 607,193, from the depôts abroad, 309,383. The total issues of the society now amounted to 21,973,355. The expenditure during the past year had been £86,831 1s. 2d., and the society was under engagements to the extent of £57,694 0s. 11d. The Bishop of Norwich moved the adoption of the report, and expressed his continued confidence in the management of the society, one of whose chief holes upon his affection was its thorough catholicity. Mr. Pumpreus, M.P., seconded the resolution, which was carried nem. dis. The second resolution, expressing satisfaction at the proceedings of the past year, was moved by the Rev. H. Stowell, and seconded by the Rev. H. Hannedy. Other resolutions in accordance with the object were proposed and carried without opposition.

The Bishop of Manchester has licensed the church at Worsley for the performance of marriages, under 7 & 8 Vic. c. 94. Also the church of St. Simon and St. Jude, in the city of Manchester.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Mr. Layard, with whose labours in bringing to light the works of Assyrian antiquity the public have recently become familiar, has been appointed a paid attaché to the British Embassy at Constantinople, at a salary of £2,000 a year! The trustees of the British Museum have, it is understood, voted Mr. Layard the sum of £3000, divided into two equal annuities, to be appropriated by him to excavations on and about the site of Nineveh in this and the ensuing year: a small sum so great an undertaking.

Mr. Barrow, the English Vice-Consul at Villers-sur-Mer, has addressed a letter to the Pilote on Calvados, in which he records the heroic conduct of M. Gérard, a young man of eighteen, son of the Lieutenant of the Customs, in saving, on the British, at the risk of his life, carried a cord to a shipwrecked English vessel, the Thistle, whereby to crew, who had sought refuge in the masts, were saved. His subsequently took the poor fellows to his house, and clothed and fed them.

Three powerful war-steamers are now building at Bristol, said to be for the service of the German Confederation. A British naval officer is superintending the construction of them.

The subscription for the widows and children of the sufferers in the late colliery explosion at Darley Main amounts to upwards of £2000.

The re-issue of the war medals for the army will be delivered in about two months. The absence of the delivery has to be the cause of the delay, as the medals are already at the Horse Guards. The Board of General Officers must authority to consider the new claims that have been sent in since the first delivery took place.

At a ball for the Royal Infirmary, in Edinburgh, on Tuesday week, an officer (Mr. Dickins) of the 31st appeared in a strange "fancy" dress. On the right side he appeared as a lady, with flowing ringlets and elegant muslin dress, and on the left as a gentleman; and on either view the profile was admirable. The combination of the hat and lady's cap on his head was very cleverly managed, and even to the fan the delicacy was kept up.

The Danish war continues seriously to affect the shipping trade of Hull. The large steam vessels, which used to sail for Hamburgh three or four times every week, are now lying empty and unemployed side by side in the Humber dock. The foreign steamers, which used to ply to other ports on the Elbe, are also idle; whilst all the bustle attending the discharge of an equal number of steamers, and many more sailing vessels, is now hushed.

Mrs. Jermy and Eliza Chestney both continue to progress so favourably, that it is expected they will be able to leave Stanfield Hall in a few days. The subscription for Eliza Chestney now amounts to £706 6s. 6d. The Duke of Cambridge has sent £10. The subscriptions for Emily Sandford amount to £535 8s. 6d.

The prohibition on the introduction of foreign iron and steel in the districts of the port of Trieste, and others of Istria, has just been removed by the Austrian Government.

It appears from the list of causes published with the Lord's Votes, that the case of the Queen v. W. S. O'Brien has been set down for hearing on Thursday, the 10th inst., and the Judges have received notice to attend.

On and after the 1st inst., the following receiving offices, under Portsmouth, are opened for the issue and payment of money orders:—Landport, Portsea, Southsea.

The Great Western Railway Company, finding the discontinuation of the return tickets to have operated against their interest, have resolved to again issue such, for the day only, on and after Tuesday last, May 1.

On Saturday night, or early on the following morning, the dwelling-house of Joseph Chaffy, Esq, of Martock, near Bridgwater, was burglariously broken into, and robbed of two flitches of bacon and several pieces of pork. The thieves unlocked and unbarred three doors. This is the third burglary that has been committed in this gentleman's house very recently; not the slightest noise was heard by either of the inmates.

M. de Lamartine has declined the representation of Paris, in a letter addressed to the electors, in which he tells them that if returned for Paris and for Lyons, a department, he would sit for his own department.

The British Museum closed on Monday afternoon for the purpose of cleaning, &c., and will be re-opened to the public on Wednesday, the 9th instant. From that period to the 1st of September next, the Museum will close at seven instead of four p.m.

On Saturday the parochial authorities of St. Matthew, Bethnal-green, offered rewards for the apprehension of no fewer than 47 weavers who have absconded, leaving their wives and 141 children to be maintained by that parish.

The loss of lambs throughout New Romney Marsh, during the snow storm of Thursday se'nnight, is roughly calculated at about 5000. From the melting of the snow, the fields in many instances presented a sheet of water, which for some days retarded all agricultural pursuits.

On Sunday morning last an eloquent sermon was preached in Grosvenor Chapel, South Audley-street, by the Bishop of Oxford, in behalf of the Adult Orphan Institution, Regent's Park; after which a liberal contribution, amounting to upwards of £110, was made to the funds of this excellent charity.

The depreciation sustained within the last few years by West India property was recently evinced to a remarkable extent by a sale at the Liverpool Bankruptcy Court (on Friday week), of two sugar plantations in Barbadoes, containing an aggregate of 630 acres, the property of Mr. Jonathan Higginson, of the late firm of Barton, Irvine, and Higginson. There were but two bidders, and the estates were bought by Thomas Lee, Esq., of Liverpool, for £15,250. Only seven years ago Mr. Higginson purchased the estates for more than twice that sum, paying £32,000.

The Record states that the Bishop of Oxford, on representations made to him of the injurious effect of his connexion with the Sterling Club, in consequence of the skeptical opinions entertained by its founder, the late Rev. John Sterling, has withdrawn his name from the Society.

EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

Any man who fell asleep after the exhibition of the Old Water-Colour Society, in 1830, and, after his sleep was over, the first thing he saw was the exhibition of the Society for the present year, might be excused for fancying that he had not been asleep at all—that ten years had not elapsed, and that the two exhibitions were actually one and the same. Though the picture we have drawn is perhaps somewhat aggravated, yet it must be confessed that the several exhibitions of the Old Water-Colour Society have, of late years, been too much alike—that the practised eye can tell beforehand how the walls will be hung, and with what they will be hung. Every tenth picture will be a Copley Fielding—every eighth a W. Hunt—every seventh a Samuel Prout—every sixth a David Cox—every fifth a [illegible]—every fourth a Frederick Taylor—and so on to the end of the catalogue. Nor must we complain very much of this: we shall be sorry indeed to see the time when Copley Fielding, and Hunt, and Prout, and the rest of the great names constituting the Society, shall have ceased to exhibit; and though young men may, and will, we trust, rise up, who are their equals in many respects, yet the pleasure which we derive from the works of old favourites is not easily made good (to the older generation at least) by the works of the younger men. We know, indeed, an excellent judge of art, who is so much with the old school, and so entirely in the past, that he seldom sees a water-colour drawing without a sigh for Girtin's loss, and a comparison very much to the advantage of his favourite painter.

It is without the least wish to depreciate the present Exhibition that we have made these remarks. If we could but forget the former efforts of the self-same artists, we should see as much originality as we certainly see of merit in the majority of the pictures forming the Exhibition of the present year. Copley Fielding was never greater or better; and when we consider the fertility of his pencil—he has forty-three works in all—he must carry the palm away from all his competitors. No. 14, "A Moor Scene in Argyllshire," is a marvellous specimen of his skill in local truth, and his dexterity in exemplifying all the resources of his art. An oil picture could hardly be more perfect. Would that both were equally enduring. Nor are his Sussex Downs at all inferior to his Highland scenery. This great master in his art is equally at home in whatever county, or fertile or barren region, he may select for the subject of his pencil. But we are not to write an eulogium on Mr. Fielding or to re-echo the praises which we have in common with our contemporaries bestowed most willingly upon him from year to year. Nor is Mr. Prout on the present occasion at all different from his former efforts, or in any way less successful. He has all his former command over architecture, old houses, still older market-places, and the picturesque dresses of our continental neighbours, and is still so deservedly a favourite with the public and with the real judges, that all his better class pictures are marked, we were glad to observe, as "sold." This is as it should be. Mr. de Wint delights as before in long narrow views of Lincolnshire scenery, with the river Witham, and the noble cathedral of the county rising grandly up in the middle distance. Better he could not be; nor has Exeter, we may remark, afforded him an equally good subject for his pencil. He has evidently felt this himself—he is quite at home in Lincolnshire; but in Devon he seems to want that certainty to please on which he would seem so properly to rely when painting the great fen county of his choice. The fruit and flowers of Mr. W. Hunt are so exquisitely truthful in tint, quality, and colour, that they are like, as far as words can describe them, a sort of combination of Covent-Garden and Van Huysum. It is impossible to imagine so many simple bits of nature more poetically treated or more artistically rendered. There is a poetry about his commonest effort when primroses and birds'-eggs are his subjects. He has an eye sensibly alive to the most beautiful touches in nature, and selects at all times (in this way exhibiting his inventive powers), with all the subtle discrimination of a naturalist and a poet. His female faces are not so happy. He treats a woman's cheek like a downy plum, and dips his brushes in elder-berry juice, when he wishes to perpetuate the York and Lancastrian roses of English beauty.

"MAKING NETS."—PAINTED BY F. W. TOPHAM.

If Mr. Cattermole has not advanced, he has certainly not gone back. In his own unequalled way, indeed, he has in very few instances been better. His figures are grouped, as heretofore, in the same broad and artistic manner. Baronial halls and chapels are peopled, as of old, with men in armour and monks at their devotions. He carries the mind back to former times; and, while we admire the skilful antiquary, we applaud at the same time the equally skilful artist.

The centre of the west wall contains a very noble effort by Mr. Joseph Nash (No. 32), "Interior, at Levens, Westmoreland, the seat of the Honourable Mrs Colonel Howard." Here we see the effect of Mr. Haghe's example. The chandelier—every touch, indeed, breathes of Mr. Haghe, while the whole arrangement exhibits all Mr. Nash's own excellencies to very great advantage. This is a very fine interior, and a most desirable specimen of a favourite master.

Mr. Topham has been reserving his strength on this occasion, and contributes only two pictures. Both are good. The largest is called "The Fisherman's Home"— and paints with great natural truth and beauty an Irish coast scene in the style in which the late Mr. Collins painted the habits of English fishermen on Cromer Sands and Meadfoot Bay. This is a cabin interior, with six figures, and realises one of those domestic pictures which come home to the prepared sympathies of every one; while, in point of colour and execution, it gratifies the artist, and is very masterly.

> The dawn of the morning saw Dermot returning;

His other picture is an upright oval, called "Making Nets," or, as Mr. Frank Stone would call it, "The Duet." A brush-of-a-boy, of 17 or 18, is looking love unutterable love, even to an Irish tongue—at a pretty Irish girl of the same age—perhaps a year younger (Mr. Topham must settle this)—who is making a net at her cabin-door. The girl is not insensible to Paddy's tender appeal of attitude and eye, and returns an encouraging look, most sweetly caught by Mr. Topham. This little incident in every-day life is told (as our readers will in some measure see by our Engraving) with all that truth of nature which art requires when she would appeal successfully to the emotions of the spectator.

Mr. Joseph J. Jenkins has returned to his fanciful subject—Scenes in Life in Brittany. No. 15 is "The Rival's Wedding—Brittany;" a pretty girl contemplating at a distance the marriage procession (in small) of her successful rival. No. 135 is "Going against the Stream—Brittany." Not unlike one of his popular pictures in a recent exhibition at the New Society; we, however, prefer, in many respects, his "Devotion" (No. 206), containing, as it does, higher qualities of art in sentiment certainly—perhaps in execution as well—than we have been enabled to trace in his more striking efforts, and with which, we believe, the public are more generally pleased.

Mr. David Cox's best picture is his view of "Barden Tower, Yorkshire"—a little in Constable's manner; and yet with all his own peculiar characteristics, which many admire more warmly than we confess we have ever been able to do. Mr. Frederick Taylor is less ambitious in point of size, and his defects are therefore fewer. Some of his hunting scenes "in the olden time" (hardly of the time of Charles II. we think, Mr. Taylor) are full of elegance and spirit.

Mr. Dodgson, too, has advanced, and in "A Sunshiny Holiday," engraved for our present paper, has imagined a scene in a manner something between Watteau and Stothard, giving us a classic temple, a Boccaccio-like fountain, groves like Versailles, with people making merry, and all united together so as to compose one pleasing and harmonious whole.

THE NEW BALLET OF "ELECTRA," AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

WHEN ballets and masques were assisted by the verse of Ben Jonson, or devised by Molière; when the Grand Duke of Florence or the Grand Monarque of France danced the part of the balletory heroes—even then, they were the performances tasking most unreasonably the power of self-illusion in the spectator. Every successive year has demanded more assistance from the sister arts, and combinations new and varied of every description, as the insuperable conditions without which choregraphy must decline and disappear from the circle of intellectual amusements. The application of philosophical resources to choregraphic scenery is this year the new condition of its existance and triumph. The last scene of the ballet of "Electra"—a ballet purposely composed to display this new power—will be found represented in the present page. The figures, representing embodied stars, each diffusing light in a concentrated form, but from ordinary source, are seen to rise in the azure firmament as they are represented in the allegorical creations of the great masters of Italian pictorial art, and particularly in the designs of Giovanni da Udine, of Giulio Romano, and of the immortal Raphaël Sanzio, copies of whose enrichments, by the by, decorate the ceiling of her Majesty's Theatre. Then from the cloud below light is seen to project upward in starlight rays, and a centre figure rises into the scenic heavens darting out that intense light so long the secret of nature, and which is the only luminous power to eclipse the theatrical light of gas—the previous conquest of the philosophical researches of our age. The effect produced upon the audience when this scene is first beheld is one of mixed astonishment and delight. The first thought of it was the important point. The success was infallible, provided it was employed appropriately and pictorially. No sooner was it known in France that such a device was proper, than it was adopted at once at the first National Theatre; and as no ballet or other fitting spectacle was at the moment contemplated, it was introduced in the new opera, to relieve the tedium of the ponderous score which occupies the whole night in its performance.

THE PHILANTHROPIC FARM SCHOOL.

On Monday, his Royal Highness Prince Albert laid the foundation-stone of the new buildings of the Farm School, at Redstone Hill, near Reigate, whither the Philanthropic Society have, in part, transferred their Establishment for the Reformation of Juvenile Offenders by Religious and Industrial Training. The interest attached to this new scene of the Society's operations, and the distinguished patronage they have received, was evident by the very large attendance of the most influential persons connected with the above charity, and others alike interested in schemes of active benevolence. The presence of royalty, and the position of Redstone Hill, likewise contributed to the number of visitors, who came from the metropolis, as well as from the neighbouring country, to witness what proved an impressive ceremony

Among those present were the Duke of Richmond, President of the Philanthropic Society; the Marquis of Westminster, the Earl and Countess of Fitzwilliam, Earl Somers, the Earl of Harrowby, Viscount and Viscountess Bracknell, the Bishop of Winchester, the Bishop of Norwich, Lord Eastnor, the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, the Sheriffs of London, the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone and Mrs. Gladstone, the Earl of Denbigh, the Earl of Chichester, Sir Benjamin and Lady Brodie, Lady Sarah Lindsay and Colonel Lindsay, Sir W. and Lady Jolliffe, the High Sheriff of Surrey, Lady Mary and Lady Jane Fielding, Lady Caroline Cocks, the Archdeacon of Surrey, Lord George Carroll, Lord Thomas and Lady Downman; Mr. H. Drummond, M.P.; Mr. H. T. Hope, M.P.; and Colonel Colquhoun. A great number of the clergy of the county were also present in their robes.

The interest excited by the ceremony of Monday will be better appreciated by our stating the views of the Philanthropic Society, in their removal to the new locality at Redstone. The Society has now been established 36 years, for about 50 of which they have been located in St George's Fields, Southwark. Their plan has been, from the first, one of simple philanthropy—to offer an asylum to criminal children who showed a willingness to return to honest pursuits, and to protect the offspring of convicted felons. This has been accomplished by a course of industrial education; and with what success, is best answered by the fact, that, of 1800 children received in the Establishment since their establishment, upwards of two-thirds have been reclaimed from their evil ways or uniformare accordition, by the disciplined life while inmates. The simple means taught in these Industrial Schools include tailoring, shoemaking, and mat, brush, and basket-making; they have, however, commercially speaking, long been upon the decline, and have thus clogged the effective operations of the Society. This has naturally suggested a new sphere; more especially as emigration (originally a feature in the Society's plan) has of late assumed a greater degree of importance. Accordingly, a routine of education to fit the boys for agricultural pursuits has recommended itself; and, with this view, the property at Redstone has been taken. Meanwhile, the trades likely to be most available by emigrants will not be neglected, but will continue to form part of the plan.

Redstone Hill is situated on the South-Eastern Railway, about a mile from the point at which it diverges from the Brighton line. The situation is pre-eminently beautiful, it being on the elevated ridge of the North Downs, which overhangs the Weald, and offers a rich succession of picturesque undulations, which few parts of England present; variegated by such noble heights as Box Hill and Leith Hill—presenting, in the words of Dr. Mantell, the geologist, "a magnificent landscape, displaying the physical structure of the Weald, and its varied and beautiful scenery." Every one must be struck with the benefit likely to accrue to the health of the Philanthropic boys by removal to such a spot as Redstone; and how superior must it be to St George's-fields, now no longer deserving that suburban designation. "No slight importance, also (it is well observed by a contemporary), is attached in the new experiment to the influence of country labour upon minds prematurely developed in vice by a town life, and by the effect of pure air and healthy exercise upon bodies weakened by an infancy of want, misery, and exposure.

The Farm has been leased to the Society for 150 years, by Mr. Tilley, the celebrated engine-builder; it comprises 132 acres of land, somewhat poor, but with a pleasant aspect to the south. The re-buildings already on the property accommodate 60 boys, and houses are to be erected for 120 more, besides a chapel and schoolroom. It is contemplated to increase the number of boys to 500. The cultivation of the land is to be principally by the spade; the elementary rules of farming, gardening, at a stock-feeding are also to be taught; and for these purpose, the said will be appropriated to the raising of green crops and barley for cattle, and vegetables for the boys themselves. They are to be employed in three classes: first, neglected and destitute lads who have been discharged from prison; secondly, children of parents in the Union; and thirdly, their parents for reformation; and, third, convicts under fourteen years of age who have obtained a conditional pardon. Wherever practicable, parents are made to pay something towards the support of their children; and the ordinary prison diet is of the plainest kind, and improved only as a reward of merit. The lodging has no superfluous comfort; and the clothing is the common smock frock, and a hat round the whole. And, as a further check upon excess of this sort, all the boys are to be sent out to our colonies, those only exce, ted for whom their friends make provision.

It is much to be wished that some portion of the expenses were defrayed by the respective parishes to which the boys belong. To quote a letter addressed to the Times of Wednesday, by the excellent Secretary of the Philanthropic Society, the Rev. Sydney Turner, "Neither the county nor the parochial rates can at present be applied to the prevention of crime, though so freely taxed for its detection and repression. We are citizens, and as citizens are entitled to establish good schools of strict reformatory and industrial discipline for the young and friendless offenders who are now cast helpless and uncared for on the world, when dismissed from gaol at the completion of their sentence, a great economical as well as a vast moral saving would be effected, and more done towards the diminution of the number of juvenile delinquents than can ever be hoped for from the more deterring fear of punishment."

These preliminaries may appear lengthy, but they are requisite to enable the reader to understand the importance associated with Monday's proceedings.

A large party of visitors arrived at the farm by a special train from the metropolis, at two o'clock, by which hour many hundred others had assembled in the grounds, and in the adjoining fields were crowds of spectators. The arrangements for the ceremony were admirably planned. The company were set down at a temporary station, liberally erected by the South Eastern Railway Company; it led to a circular reception-tent. From thence a platform was laid to the opposite side, where a spacious marquee was raised over the preparations for laying the foundation-stone of the chapel; here 300 or 400 persons were accommodated with seats, to view the ceremony. To the left of the circular reception-tent, upon the highest point, has been completed a house of all English de-ign, for the resident chaplain; close to which was set up a large marquee, in which luncheon was prepared for the company. Flags, streamers, tents, &c., were dight with various flags, and the grounds altogether had a very gay appearance.

At three o'clock, his Royal Highness Prince Albert arrived from the town by special train, accompanied by the Duke of Richmond, the Bishop of Winchester, and chief patrons of the Society. In the reception tent, an address from the borough of Reigate was presented to Prince Albert, thanking his Royal Highness for his kindness in coming down to lay the foundation-stone of an object of the day; the address was read by the High Bailiff, Mr. Martin, who was introduced to the Prince by Lord Somers and the Hon. T. Somers Cocks, the Member for Reigate.

His Royal Highness was then conducted in procession to the spot where the stone was to be laid. First came the band of the Royal Artillery; next, the committee, with wands and banners; then the Prince, and the clergy followed, in their homely smock frocks. They were accompanied by a number of respectably-dressed young men, who had left the school, and had turned out well in life. The clergy followed in their robes; and after them came the medical officers of the Society, and the architect with his plans; the Society's moving preacher followed, and after him the governor and vice-governor, bearing the trowel, the coins, the brass plate, and the wine and corn. To these succeeded the President, the High Sheriff of Surrey, the Bishop of Winchester, and the Prince with his suite. The lovely Mayor, Sheriffs, and others closed the procession, which, as it moved along, was saluted by the cheers of the spectators, who were collected in a dense mass on the brow of the hill. We have engraved this stage of the proceedings, in order to include a representation of Le Society's Farm.

On the Prince reaching the tent, his Royal Highness was received with demonstrations of loyalty and attachment by the company. The ceremony commenced with an ode in honour of his Royal Highness, sung by the boys, assisted by a choir, under the direction of the Society's organist. The foundation-stone, which was suspended in the usual way, was then raised, and the cause of the present reign, with a list of the President and Patrons' names, and a brass inscription plate, deposited in the cavity prepared for them. The Prince spread the mortar, and the stone having been gently lowered into its place, his Royal Highness tapped it twice with the mallet at each angle, and declared it well laid. The Bishop of Winchester offered up a solemn and impressive prayer, invoking the blessing of the Almighty upon the Society and its efforts. A hymn was next sung by the boys; and his Royal Highness then poured out from silver cups upon the stone corn and wine, as emblems of prosperity. An anthem was sung by the children and choir. The party of youths who had left the institution then came forward, and one of their number read to the Prince the following address:—

"May it please your Royal Highness. In the name of the youths who have been inmates of the Philanthropic in former years, we humbly ask permission to address our earnest and most respectful thanks for your Royal Highness gracious condescension in laying the first stone of the Society's Farm School. We have ourselves, may it please your Royal Highness, experienced the benefits of the religious and industrial training which the Philanthropic gives its objects. We ourselves have suffered in early life from the want, and ignorance, and error from which it seeks to rescue them; and fervently do we trust that the work which your Royal Highness has this day sanctioned may be blessed, and prospered for years to come; and that, by means of the Farm School this day founded, many thousands of our young, and destitute, and erring fellow-country men may be saved from ruin, and be trained up to piety to God, loyalty to our Queen, and usefulness to our country. That your Royal Highness may receive the fulness of divine blessing, and may long live to be the friend of the fatherless and he-pless, is the most humble prayer of, may it please your Royal Highness, your Royal Highness' most humble and loyal servants."

"The address which you have just presented has been particularly satisfactory to me, as the fact of your having come here to-day expresses particularly satisfactory to me, as the fact of your having come here to-day expresses particularly satisfactory of the benefits which you have derived from your training under the care of this institution, and which is the best proof of its practical effects. There can be nothing more gratifying than to see the success of that noble and philanthropic effort which attempts to reclaim, from the earliest steps towards ruin, those unhappy children whom poverty and misfortune, more than their own dispositions, have led into crime, and I earnestly trust that, by the progress of civilization and of a true Christian feeling, society will day by day overcome any prejudice which may have stood in the way of receiving them back with cheerfulness and trust, after the training they have received in it- and similar institutions, and of extending to them a readily asking hand in their struggles to regain a position of equality with their brethren."

The choir and boys then sang "God save the Queen," in which all the company heartily joined, and the ceremony was finished.

His Royal Highness then walked across the field, amidst the loud cheers of the spectators. The Prince next proceeded to examine minutely and enquire into the building plans, and the systems of education and discipline pursued by the Society, with which his Royal Highness expressed himself highly satisfied adding that he should come down again to look at the School when its completion permitted.

His Royal Highness soon after returned to town by railway.

THE LUNCHEON

Immediately after the departure of Prince Albert, the visitors ascended to the ground-floor adjoining the new house, in the temporary parochial school of the Society, appointed collation, provided for the occasion by Mr. Relf, of the White Hart Hotel, Reigate. The large marquee was completely filled with guests; and the presence of many elegantly dressed ladies gave a splendid appearance to the scene.

The Duke of Richmond presided; and his Grace having proposed "The Queen," a toast received with the most enthusiastic applause, rose again, and gave "The health of his Royal Highness, and many thanks for his having honoured us with his company to-day." (Cheers.)

The Duke of Richmond then proposed "The Queen Dowager and the rest of the Royal family," which having been duly responded to by the company, his Grace gave "The Bishop of Winchester and the clergy who have honoured us with their presence."

The Bishop of Winchester returned thanks, and said, The sentiments which you express the clergy rejoice to be able to respond to, and I, for one, deeply interested as I am in every thing connected with the Society, have heard, in the removal of its local establishment it has not been found necessary to transfer it to another part of the country. I have been connected for many years officially with the institution; I have marked the direction with which it has been managed; and I hail in its increased prosperity and its removal to this locality, an answer to the often repeated prayer, such that our old institutions are not adapted to the wants of the times. (Cheers.) The right rev. Prelate proceeded to pass a high eulogium on the resident chaplain of the Society, the Rev. Sydney Turner, and concluded by promising to visit the Farm-school and watch over its progress.

The next toast proposed was "The Navy and Army," to which Captain Williams responded on behalf of the latter, and Captain Gladstone on behalf of the former service.

The Duke of Richmond then proposed "Prosperity to the Philanthropic Society." His Grace dilated on the noble objects which the Society had in view, and adverted to the success which had attended similar institutions abroad, and particularly at Mettray, in France, and concluded by compliing, in highly complimentary terms, in the name of the Sar. of the health of the lady

The Earl of Harrowby returned thanks.

The next toast was "The Lord Mayor and the City of London," which the Lord Mayor acknowledged, proposing, in return, "The health of the Duke of Richmond," which was drunk with enthusiastic cheers

The proceedings then terminated.

The musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. R. Limpus, Organist to the Society, and some gentlemen of St. Paul's Cathedral.

THREE YOUNG MEN DROWNED.—On Monday evening, three young men, named George Booth, John Tinling, and Edward Jones, last Manchester in a light boat or skiff, to proceed from Manchester by the river Irwell, to a fete, at the Pendleton Colliery, on the Bridgewater Canal. In crossing the river called Ekrosle Nest the boat was upset. All three of the unfortunate youths sank into the water and could be rendered from the shore, and perished.

COLLIERY EXPLOSION.—On Saturday last took place at the Agecroft New Coal Mines, about four miles from Manchester, resulting from an explosion of carburetted hydrogen gas which has been created in the mines. The mines are the property of Mr. Clowes, and are worked on the estate situated between the highway and railway, leading from Manchester to Bolton. The approach to the mines, two in number, is by a shaft upwards of 900 feet deep, and from 90 to 100 men and boys were employed in the pit at the time of the explosion, and were nearly equally distributed in the two mines, when about eight o'clock a loud explosion was heard, which caused the four-feet mine, and from colliers who soon came rushing to the foot of the shaft, anxious to escape further danger. It was discovered that a quantity of carburetted hydrogen gas had been ignited in one of the old workings, and was carried forward by a lighted candle to it. The great body of the colliers were drawn from the mines without suffering from the explosion; but a young named Jacob Barker, and his brother Israel, were both very severely burnt, and the former almost blinded. Another, named Henry Price, the boy through whose imprudence the gas was ignited, and who worked with the Barkers, was knocked down by the explosion, and is badly hurt and much scorched about the face and hands.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

There has been more firmness in the Consol Market this week than has existed for some weeks past, accompanied by a rise in prices of nearly one-half per cent. This improvement is to be mainly attributed to the satisfactory nature of the Indian news, as well as the conclusion of peace between Asia and our Peninsula. Consols, on the arrival of the Indian mail on Wednesday, advanced from Monday's prices of the 23rd ult. and on Thursday further improved to 91⅞ ⅞. The news from Prussia was also regarded as favourable; and the continued abundance of capital, without any prospect of its being in demand at all tended to keep the money value of stock, which must have again improved. Exchequer Bills continue at about last week's quotation. There was considerable firmness in the market at the close of the week, the following being the current quotations:—Bank Stock, 216; Reduced Annuities, 91; Consols, 92⅞; New 3½ per Cent. Annuities, 91⅞; Long Annuities, to expire Jan. 1859, 8⅝; Ditto, 30 years, Oct. 10, 1859, 8 5-16ths; India Bonds, under £1,000, 70 pm.; South Sea Stock, Ex. Div. per Account, ⅞; Exchequer Bills, £1000, June, 47 p.; Ditto, Small, June, 47 p.

Monday in the Foreign Markets was principally occupied in adjusting the half-monthly account; and Tuesday (1st of May) being a holiday, a large portion of and in all the stock markets, Wednesday may be said to have commenced real business for this account; operations were, however, only on a limited scale, Mexican proving the most attractive stock for speculation. The price, with coupons, advanced to 32 to ⅝ for money, and 32⅛ to ⅜ for account. These prices have since been pretty well maintained, and no further movements of consequence has occurred, the following being the latest quotations:—Rio de Janeiro, Small, 79; Granada Bonds, One per Cent., 18¾; Mexican, Five per Cent., 1840, with Coupons, 32⅛; Ditto, Ditto, Ditto, ex Coupons, 32⅛; Ditto, Deferred Account, 30¾; Portuguese Five per Cent., 77; Russian Bonds, 104¾; Spanish Five per Cent., Account, 17¼; Ditto, Three per Cent., 33¼; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent., 56⅝; Ditto, Certificates, 57.

At the commencement of the week the Share Market was extremely depressed, but it has since partially rallied, the Eastern Counties direction, despite of the accuracy of the report issued by the Committee of investigation, stating that after reserving £14,000 to the credit of a depreciation account, a just dividend of 6s per share may be declared; the adjourned general meeting next Thursday will, however, doubtless warm the subject. In the meantime the sloping of several large bearing operations have allowed the price of the shares to approach nearer to their public estimated value, 8½ to ⅞ being the last quotation. The closing prices of lines last week in our memorandum 18:—Ditto, Preference, 2¾; Birmingham and Oxford Junction, calls duly paid, or with a guarantee, 20; Ditto, without guarantee, 23¾; Caledonian, 27⅛; Ditto, Quarters, 6¼; Ditto, New, £10, Preference, 11¼; Chester and Holyhead, 16½; Eastern Counties, 8¼; Ditto, New, Guaranteed Six per Cent., 11; Ditto, Extension, Five per Cent. THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Very limited supplies of English wheat have appeared on sale here during the present week. Still, however, the demand for that article has continued in a very inactive state, as I prices have given way quite a per quarter. Foreign wheats have also been very dull, at 1s to 2s per quarter less money. In fact for barley has somewhat fallen off. In the value we have no change to notice. All kinds of malt have ruled dull, at barely late rates. The best oats have supported previous currencies, but the middling and inferior kinds have ruled dull. Beans, peas, Indian corn, and flour have sold slowly, at unaltered quotations.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 38s to 42s; ditto, white, 41s to 45s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 40s to 43s; ditto, white, 44s to 47s; grinding barley, 23s to 25s, distilling ditto, 26s to 28s; malting ditto, 29s to 32s; Norfolk and Lincolnshire malt, 54s to 56s; Yorkshire ditto, 48s to 50s; Kingston and Ware, 52s to 56s; Chevalier, 52s to 60s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 18s to 20s, potato ditto, 22s to 24s; Scotch and Irish potato ditto, 21s to 23s; Dutch and Hamburgh, 20s to 22s; Tingstad and Cork, black, 18s to 20s; white, 22s to 24s; fine ditto, 26s to 28s; grey peas, 30s to 34s; maple, 32s to 34s; white, 36s to 38s; boilers, 38s to 40s per quarter. Town-made flour, 40s to 44s; Suffolk, 36s to 38s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 35s to 36s per 280 lbs.—Foreign: Dantzig red wheat, 40s to 42s; white, 42s to 44s; barley, 23s to 25s; oats, 16s to 18s; beans, 34s to 36s; peas, 34s to 36s per quarter. Flour, American, 32s to 36s per barrel; Baltic, 30s to 32s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Canary and clover seed have sold steadily, at very full prices. In other seeds scarcely any business is doing.

Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 50s; Baltic, crushing, 38s to 40s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 36s to 38s. Rapeseed, 35s to 36s per quarter. Coriander, 16s to 18s per cwt. Brown Mustard-seed, 8s to 11s; white ditto, 9s to 12s 6d. Tares, 4s 6d to 5s 6d per bushel. English tlaxseed, new, £20 to £22 per last. Foreign not quoted. Linseed cakes, English, £9 5s to £10 10s; foreign, £8 0s to £8 10s per 1000: Rapeseed cakes, £4 5s to £4 10s per ton. Canary, 50s to 52s per quarter. English Clover-seed, red, 42s to 48s; white, 48s to 60s; Cowgrass, 40s to 44s; Trefoil, 16s to 20s; Rib-grass, 40s to 44s; Carraway, 30s to 32s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 6½d to 7d, of household do. 5d to 6d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 46s 9d; barley, 29s 10d; oats, 17s 9d; rye, 27s 3d; beans, 34s 3d; peas, 32s 9d.

The six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 44s 6d; barley, 28s 9d; oats, 16s 10d; rye, 25s 0d; beans, 32s 7d; peas, 30s 9d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 1s 0d; barley, 1s 0d; oats, 1s 0d; rye, 1s 0d; beans, 1s 0d; peas, 1s 0d.

TEA.—A very moderate business is doing in this market, yet prices are mostly supported. The show of samples of both black and green has somewhat increased.

Sugar.—The transactions in this article are limited to parcels of actual need for, or prices of, any kind of raw sugar. Refined goods are dull, at 50s for brown, and 54s to 55s per cwt. for fine lumps.

COFFEE.—All descriptions are a very slow inquiry and somewhat easier to purchase.

RICE.—This article is dull. Bengal, 9s 6d to 10s; Carolina, 12s to 13s per cwt.

PROVISIONS.—Notwithstanding that the supplies of foreign butter have increased to some extent this week, a fair average business is doing in that article, at about stationary prices. Fine Friesland, 84s to 85s; fine Irish, 82s to 84s; fine Kiel, 82s to 83s; and inferior qualities, 66s per cwt. Irish butter—the supply of which is good—moves off slowly. In prices we have no change to notice. Carlow, Clonmel, and Cork, 76s; Kilkenny, 74s; Limerick, 66s to 68s; Waterford, 70s to 86s; and Sligo, 54s to 68s per cwt. English butter is a dull sale, at barely last week's prices: fine new Dorset, 90s to 92s, middling ditto, 78s to 86s per cwt, and fresh, 8s to 10s per dozen lbs. Irish bacon is selling briskly, at an advance of fully 6s per cwt. Prime Waterford, singed, 64s to 66s; middling and good, 57s to 60s; lumpy, 54s to 55s. Limerick, sizeable, 54s to 56s; and lumpy, 52s to 54s per cwt. Cheese is dull. American bacon is firm, at 46s to 48s per cwt.

Tallow.—A very moderate business is doing in our market, yet prices are barely supported. P.Y.C. on the spot is quoted at 38s 6d to 38s 9d; and for forward delivery 39s 3d to 39s 6d per cwt. Town tallow, 3s per cwt net cash.

OILS.—For nearly all descriptions the demand is wholly in retail, at barely last week's quotations.

Spirits.—Very little is doing in the rum market. Proof Leewards, 1s 4d to 1s 4½; and proof Kast-India rum, 1s 4½ to 1s 5d per gallon. In other kinds of spirits a dull business is doing.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £2 10s to £4 0s; clover ditto, £3 0s to £4 15s, and straw, £1 6s to £1 16s per load.

COALS.—Coast Carriage: Hartley, 14s 6d; Tanfield Moor, 14s 0s, Wylam, 13s 9d; Walker, 14s 6d, Lambton, 12s; Morrison, 14s 6d; and Stewart's, 17s 6d per ton.

Metals.—Scotch pig-iron is in fair request, at full prices. In other kinds next to nothing doing.

Wool.—Nearly 4000 bales have arrived from our colonies since our last report. As large public sales are expected to take place this month, the private consumer demand is heavy, at barely stationary prices.

Potatoes.—The supplies of potatoes being small, the demand is active, at prices varying from £3 to £12 per ton.

Smithfield.—Our market has been in a very pressed state this week, and prices have further given way.

Beef, from 2s 8d to 3s 6d; mutton, 2s 6d to 4s 0d; lamb, 4s 10d to 5s 10d; veal, 3s 2d to 4s 2d; pork, 3s 2d to 4s 2d per 8lb, to sink the offals.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—For each article the demand continues heavy, on the whole terms.

Beef, from 1s 10d to 3s 0d; mutton, 2s 2d to 3s 8d; lamb, 4s 8d to 5s 8d; veal, 3s 0d to 4s 0d; and pork, 2s 8d to 3s 6d per 8lbs, by the carcase. ROBERT HERBERT.

In two thick [illegible] edition, in two [illegible]
The London edition of Flugel's Dictionary is unquestionably superior to every other with the exception of Flugel's own, which is comprehensive and costly to command more than a very limited sale. The great advantages which it possesses over the original German edition are that we save over all other editions published in Germany [illegible] that it has been thoroughly revised, and adapted to the wants of English students by competent scholars in the country, and although, in point of size, former editions may have appeared more expensive than some [illegible] yet this edition being [illegible] 28s. is now much cheaper than the bulk of the latter editions as being, in most cases, produced by the compound [illegible] of a mass of [illegible] words and useless phrases, which serve rather to embarrass and perph[illegible] assist the student.

ace gauze ribbon, and having an elegant deep lace bertha, trimmed in a similar style.

One of the chief novelties of the season, suitable for promenading or for evening wear, is the Poncho, a description of shawl mantilla, somewhat resembling, in shape, the mantilla worn by the Spanish senoras. It is made either in black or white lace, of richly-embroidered pattern. There are neither sleeves nor openings of any kind for the arms, and, when worn, it has to be drawn on over the head. As it hangs in loose

Chapeau No. 3 is of open fancy straw, with puffings of green gros de Naples: the interior trimmed with flowers.

Chapeau No. 4 is of yellow crêpe, with a wreath of flowers falling over the left side, and with a lining of white satin.

The mantelet nayade is of glacé nankin et noir, trimmed with gauze ribbon of the same colour and black lace. The chapeau accompanying it, is of fancy straw trimmed with pink gros de Naples.

Chapeau No. 1 is of delicate white crêpe lisse and tulle plissé, trimmed with marabout chenillie.

Chapeau No. 2 is of maize silk, divided by rows of blonde. A wreath of flowers inside.

PARASOL.

The robe du matin is of richly figured green and drab silk, with trimmings of brandebourgs and grelots up the centre.

Mr. Sangster, of Regent-street, seems to have put forth, as usual, the greatest novelty in the way of parasols. The one we have engraved, styled the Swiss Parasol, which is made of Alpaca lined with silk, and is perfectly unique in its way, has been selected from his stock.

ROBE DU MATIN.

His Royal Highness the Duke Augustus of Saxe Coburg Gotha visited the Queen and Prince Albert on Monday, at Buckingham Palace.

On Saturday a dinner was given by the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress to a party of upwards of fifty of their private friends.

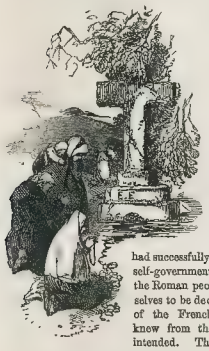
FRENCH INTERVENTION IN ITALY.



THE French Republic took an extraordinary, a dangerous, and an unprincipled step when it sent an armed expedition to Italy. The ostensible object of the expedition was to defend Italian liberty, menaced by Austria. Its real object seems to have been in conjunction with Austria, Naples, and Spain, to restore the Pope to his revolted subjects, and to force him, as a secular ruler, upon a people who had successfully vindicated their right of self-government. But the leaders of the Roman people never allowed themselves to be deceived by the fair words of the French Government. They knew from the beginning what was intended. They knew that French intervention was not friendly, and that the landing of General Oudinot at Civita Vecchia was a hostile invasion of the Roman territory. They took their measures accordingly. They denounced the landing of the expedition. They called upon the Romans to resist an interference which was as treacherous as it was cruel; and appealed, in eloquent terms, from the French Government to the French nation. The Romans responded to the call of their triumvirate. An enthusiasm which is represented as perfectly unprecedented took possession of them, and preparations for resistance were made, which, whatever their ultimate issue may be, have enlisted, on behalf of the Roman Republic, the sympathies of all who honour the independence of nations, and who acknowledge the right of a people to choose their own form of Government in defiance of foreign dictation. Even now, before any decisive blow has been struck, the military laurels of the French have been tarnished, and shame has been brought upon the men who have endeavoured to crush liberty in the name of liberty, and who, forgetting the origin of their own power, have turned the arms of the French against that constitutional cause of which France ought to be the foremost defender and the most earnest champion in Europe.

M. Odillon Barrot, when called to account by the opposition in the National Assembly for the conduct of General Oudinot, in disarming the National Guard of Civita Vecchia, in placing that town in a state of siege, in marching a portion of the French troops to Rome, and in suffering them to be repulsed in one of the suburbs, and very severely handled by the indignant Romans, persisted in the farce of alleging that the intervention was a friendly one. General Oudinot, however, told a different tale to the Civita Vecchians. When informed, soon after landing, by deputations from the National Guard and Municipality of that town and of Rome, that Rome would repel force by force, that the citizens had already prepared for the death struggle by undermining the Vatican, the Quirinal, St. Peter's, the churches and public buildings, and that they would perish to a man rather than admit the French, he replied that his instructions were precise, that he was to proceed to Rome either by good-will or by force, that the Pope would be a mere slave without temporal power, and that his object was to restore Pius IX., re-establish order, and maintain the liberal institutions granted by that Pontiff. Between M. Odillon Barrot and General Oudinot there is a difference scarcely to be reconciled; and, as the words of the invading General have been confirmed by his acts, the Romans do well to resist the invader in defence of the sacred principle of their independence, and to appeal to France against the French Ministry, and to all friends of constitutional freedom against them both.

Of all the parties who are leagued together in the task of thrusting the Pope and a sacerdotal Government upon the unwilling Romans, France is the only one whose interference may be considered as utterly impolitic, unprincipled, and atrocious. Roman Catholic Austria acts on behalf of the Pope, for the strongest of all reasons, that of self-interest. It is not so much because the religion of Austria is papist, as because Lombardy is one of the fairest portions of her dominions, that she joins in the crusade against the liberty of the Romans. Italian independence is the knell of Austrian power. The Republic of Rome gives strength to the Republic of Venice, and keeps Lombardy in the disquietude of hope deferred. Austrian interference, therefore, is perfectly intelligible. The interference of the King of Naples is explicable on the same grounds, which are partly religious and partly political. The Republic in Rome is a troublesome and unsafe neighbour for the Monarchy of Naples; and the religious motive for intervention but crowns and completes the political one. But neither France nor Spain has any such pretexts to interfere in the affairs of Italy. Neither the one nor the other is threatened with the loss of power territory, or influence, by the political independence of that country generally, or of the Roman States more particularly. Spain, as yet, has not stirred in the matter; but is understood, in the interest of the Roman Catholic religion, to wish well to the efforts of those who are engaged in the task.

France stands alone, therefore, in the position of committing a gross outrage on the natural rights of a large portion of the Italian people, for the sake of the Chief Priest of Roman Catholic Europe. Religion and statesmanship pull together in the case of Austria and Naples; but irreligious France, for the sake of a priest, throws statesmanship to the winds, belies her own traditions and principles, leagues herself with her enemies, acts with cruel treachery to her friends, dishonours the Republican form of Government, in the name of which she sends her legions to overawe, coerce, and oppress a Republic as legally constituted as herself, and renders the principles of her statesmen a by-word of contempt in Europe. It is in vain for M. Odillon Barrot to allege that the intervention of France was determined upon solely with the object of counterbalancing that of Austria and Naples. His words and his deeds are at variance. His tongue tells one story, but his hand another. If Austria and Naples determined upon intervention, in order to crush the liberties of the Italian people, it was the true policy and duty of France to take the other side. France has not done so

[COUNTRY EDITION.]

France will not do so, if M. Odillon Barrot continues in her Government—from his own mouth we learn it. General Oudinot having received a check (a check richly merited, but not half severe enough), M. Odillon Barrot considers that "the best course for the French expedition is to march upon Rome, and, whilst causing the French flag to be respected, to save Italian liberty as much as possible." As much as possible! when the Pope is to be restored by the force of French gunpowder, and when Austria and Naples are to lend their bayonets to the enterprise! The possibility will, indeed, be small when such are the agencies that are to work it. M. Odillon Barrot is somewhat moderate, however. While he is of opinion that the Pope must be re-established in Rome sooner or later, he thinks his temporal power should be modified. It is, doubtless, kind of M. Odillon Barrot to consent to the modification; but it is no less impertinent. It would not be a whit more impertinent on the part of M. Mazzini if he were to declare his opinion that sooner or later Henri V. must be re-established in Paris; and not in the slightest degree more unprincipled (provided he were strong enough) if he sent a Roman expedition to Toulon for that purpose. The relative strength of the parties makes no difference in the principle, as even M. Barrot might acknowledge, if the Emperor of Russia, having settled the Hungarian business, should take it into his head to do for France what France is now doing for the Romans.

But we suspect that the events of Italy will seal the doom of the present Ministry in France. Already the National Assembly has expressed its disapproval. They may even have deeper consequences. Should the French army meet with any reverses more serious than that which they have already experienced, it would be difficult to estimate the effect they would have upon the fortune of the French Republic. Already, the slight reverse which happened in the suburbs of Rome has given the extreme Republican party more life and energy than it has displayed or felt since the days of June, 1848; and it is not too much to anticipate that the defeat of General Oudinot would so humiliate and exasperate all parties in France, and so encourage the ultra-Republicans, that a new Revolution would be imminent.

"In destroying the Roman Republic," says an eloquent address issued by the Roman people to the French army, "you will destroy your own. If you wish to combat against Republican arms, cease to be Republicans yourselves, or confess that you are the satellites of tyranny and hypocrisy." Tyranny and hypocrisy are the words that truly express the conduct of Louis Napoleon and his Ministers in this business; and it will require all his popularity, and more than all their wisdom and tact, to prevent evil consequences to him and them. What the French are more sensitive about, is military renown. Tarnish that, and not even a Bonaparte will atone for the calamity.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The interest of all other subjects, even that of the approaching elections, is merged in that of the news which arrived in Paris during the week of the French troops under General Oudinot having been repulsed with considerable loss by the Roman soldiers. In the National Assembly, the question has been the cause of a ministerial defeat. A committee having been appointed to examine the instructions given to General Oudinot, and to report at once, the Assembly met a second time on Monday, viz. at nine o'clock at night.

M. Sénard read the report of the committee, to the effect that the majority of the committee considered that the direction given to the expedition was not conformable to the idea in which it had been conceived and accepted. The instructions given to the General commanding the expedition appeared to the committee to be different from the declarations made in the Tribune by the Government. The General appeared to them also to have gone beyond his instructions, since he had attacked the Roman Republic. In consequence, the committee proposed the following resolution:

"The National Assembly invites the Government to take without delay the measures necessary that the exped tion to Italy shall not be any longer turned aside from the object for which it was designed."

The motion was strongly opposed by M. Dupuy de Lhuys, in the name of the Government, but after several amendments had been rejected, it was carried by 328 to 241; majority against ministers, 87.

The result was received with loud cries of "Vive la République!' from the Opposition.

The interpretation put on this decision of the Assembly was, that the expedition should be ordered back to Civita Vecchia, and the following letter, which has been addressed by the President of the Republic to General Oudinot, being regarded as countermanding that disposition, has been considered, and pretty generally, as a most unconstitutional step of the President, and the ferment created thereby has added not a little to the excitement which has resulted from the wound inflicted on the national honour by the repulse of the troops from Rome. The letter is dated Tuesday, and was despatched by a special messenger on Wednesday. It is as follows:

"My dear General,—The telegraphic news announcing the unforeseen resistance which you have met with under the walls of Rome has greatly grieved me. I had hoped, as you know, that the inhabitants of Rome, opening their eyes to evidence, would receive with confidence an army which came to give them to accomplish a friendly and disinterested mission. This has not been the case. Our soldiers have been received as enemies. Our military honour is engaged. I will not suffer it to be assailed. Reinforcements shall not be wanting to you. Tell your soldiers that I appreciate their bravery, and take part in what they endure; and that they may always rely on my support and my gratitude. Receive, my dear General, the assurance of my sentiments of high esteem

"LOUIS NAPOLEON BONAPARTE."

M. Odillon Barrot on Wednesday defended the letter, as being solely a private communication.

The Government sent an envoy to Rome on Tuesday, with instructions to collect accurate information re ative to the real feeling of the Roman populat on with respect to the French expedition. Such reinforcements have been sent to General Oudinot s corps. They consist of 3000 men, with two batteries of heavy guns.

The arrest of Sergeant-Major Boichot, of the 7th Light Infantry, whose name figures on the list of the Socialist candidates of Paris, was the cause of a riot in that corps, on Friday and Saturday morning (week). In the Invalides. He has been transferred to the fortress of Vincennes, to prevent a repetition of any similar attempt at the barracks of the Invalides, and the regiment itself has been ordered out of Paris.

The Moniteur announces that the President of the Republic has determined to grant an amnesty to a great number of the insurgents of June. The total number of the insurgents had originally amounted to 26,000 and 30,000. Of these, 1220 of the worst class are still to be retained at Belle Isle. Of the remainder, 183 have been ordered to be set at liberty, on the recommendation of the committee sent to consider their cases, and 1926 are now to be pardoned and set at liberty by order of the President of the Republic, in honour of the anniversary of the 4th of May. This measure is to be carried out gradually, for fear of the consequences of setting so many idle persons loose upon society. In the meantime, the Government will endeavour to find employment for them.

The funeral ceremony of the anniversary of the death of the Emperor Napoleon was performed on Saturday, in the church of the Invalides. All the members of the Bonaparte family were present, as also a large number of the most distinguished general officers of the army now in Paris. It was the first time that all the members of the family met together at the tomb of the Emperor. There were very few preparations made in the chapel. A simple catafalque was erected in the middle of the chapel, and the walls were hung with black. The old soldiers of the hotel were formed in a double line from the great entrance to the door of the chapel, wearing their ancient uniforms; and a guard of honour, composed of each of the veterans as were decorated, was stationed at the catafalque. The interior of the chapel was reserved for the veterans of the Imperial army not residing in the establishment, but who never fail to attend the ceremony on the 5th of May. They also were their old uniforms of the Grand Army; 12 Grenadiers à cheval, Chasseurs, Dragons de l'Impératrice, Mamelukes of the Guard, Light Cavalry, the Foot Grenadiers, Fusiliers, &c.

Among the ceremony Louis Napoleon received the veterans of the Imperial army in the cour d'honneur. He stopped for a few minutes to converse with many of the old men. Those to whom he paid particular attention were such as were mutilated. He promised the cross of the Legion of Honour to an old officer who had had one arm, and who, on inquiry, informed the President that he had set it at Waterloo. "Vive Napoleon!" was heard on all sides, received with cries of "Vive Napoleon!" and some were heard of "Vive l'Empereur!" "Vive le Neveu de notre Empereur!"

ITALIAN STATES.

ROME.—The "Eternal City" is the great central point of attraction in the affairs of the Peninsula at present. The Italian Republicans have opposed and successfully, too (!), for the nonce—the French troops under General Oudinot, whose intervention they have resented, rather as an act of hostility, than one of any other character. The Roman authorities having resolved to oppose force to force, the following proclamation was issued, on the 28th ult., by order of the Triumvirate:—

"Romans, a military defence is organised. The militia of all ranks are doing, and have fulfilled their duty. It remains for the people to perform theirs. All the streets of the city are to be defended. In every quarter representatives of the people, specially appointed, will adopt energetic means to defend our territory inch by inch. They will provide ammunition and stores. All the windows are to be illuminated during the night. The Government will supply the people with arms at the proper moment. Let every man labour to render his quarter of the town inaccessible. The chief of the quarter and the representative of the Assembly will give the instructions necessary for the construction of regular barricades, and that the communications necessary for the defence be not interrupted. The Roman Municipal Council, republican like yourselves, have taken measures to supply the city with provisions. Preparations have been made to relieve the brave wounded in this struggle. The bells of the churches of the Capitol will sound the alarm. People of Rome, we have much glory to conquer. We will defend our country, our republic, and Italian honour. Be firm and courageous, and Rome will be saved. People, to arms!—THE TRIUMVIRI."

I was while this state of things existed within the city, that General Oudinot, having left a garrison at Civita Vecchia, appeared before the gates of Rome on the 29th, when he proceeded to occupy a position some leagues off, hoping that the presence of the expeditionary corps would excite a movement against the Government of the Triumvirs. He was disappointed in his expectations. A company of the 1st battalion of riflemen, sent forward to the gates of Rome, were received with musket shots, and retired; and immediately afterwards a portion of a division of the French army was marched forward, and penetrated into the suburbs, where they found the streets barricaded. The troops were received with a well-supported fire of musketry, and by a shower of projectiles thrown from the roofs and windows of the houses. The 58th regiment of the line, marching in front, suffered severely, and a company of Voltigeurs of that regiment were almost entirely destroyed. General Oudinot, finding it impossible to continue a contest which threatened to become fatal, commanded a retreat, and the French took up a strong position a few leagues from the city. There were about 300 men killed, including some officers, and amongst them an aide-de-camp of General Oudinot; and several hundred wounded. The General's brother is among the prisoners.

Upon the preceding page our Artist has represented the March of the French Troops to Rome.

The latest intelligence states that General Oudinot subsequently entered and took military possession of Rome, the people and the King of Naples at the head of a body of troops having led to an arrangement between the Triumvirate and the General.

By accounts received at Paris, we learn that on the 3rd inst., by order of Radetzski, 27,000 Austrian troops were on their march to the Roman territory; some had already entered Pisa and Lucca. The King of Naples crossed the Roman frontier on the 29th ult., at the head of 9000 men. He was received at Terracina with acclamations, the people crying out "Viva Pio Nono!"

PIEDMONT.—From Turin, under date of the 30th, it is stated that General Hasmorin., who had been tried for treachery previous to the late battle of Novara, with the Austrians, had been condemned to death. A report was current in Turin that the army was about to be reduced to the peace establishment. Accounts from Milan announce the departure from that city of the Austrian Minister and negotiator, Brück. Marshal Radetzsky had likewise quitted, together with General Hess, to direct the operations against Venice. It is understood that matters have been accommodated, and that the negotiations for peace have been successful.

TUSCANY. As Florence Count Serristori is appointed Provisional Regent of Tuscany, with a ministry composed of the friends of the Grand Duke. A new Provisional Government has been appointed at Leghorn.

NAPLES AND SICILY.—Letters from Palermo, dated the 26th ult., confirm the unconditional submission of that city and of the whole of Sicily. General Filangieri entered on the 29th

GERMAN STATES.

SAXONY.—The people of Dresden, supported by their Legislative Chambers, during that the King would not revoke his refusal to recognise the Frankfort constitution, broke out into open insurrection on the 30th ult., and, up to the date of the latest intelligence (the 7th inst.), maintained their ground against the troops, who fought desperately in the cause of the King. The city is covered with barricades. Each night the combatants rested on their arms, and, on the approach of morning, renewed the struggle. There is no account of the numbers who have been killed or wounded, but they must be considerable.

PRUSSIA.

The intelligence from the Rhenish provinces is threatening. On the 8th instant the Deputies, to the number of five hundred, assembled in the hall of the Casino at Cologne, to deliberate what measures nothing should be adopted, in consequence of the Prussian Ministry having dissolved the Second Chamber after a debate of fourteen hours, the Assembly resolved to oppose every act which should be hostile to the Frankfort Parliament—to demand the immediate dissolution of the present Prussian Cabinet—and to protest against, and to insist upon the revocation of, the late royal summoning of the Landwehr. The greatest excitement prevailed in the public streets during this protracted sitting; and every one was apprehensive that tranquillity could not long be maintained.

AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY.

On the 14th ult. the Hungarian Parliament assembled at Debreczin, and proclaimed the deposition of the imperial family from the throne of Hungary.

Ladwig Kossuth, the senior commissioner for the defence of the country, addressed the House, and reported on the battles which had been won, and the progress which the Hungarian arms had made. He concluded by moving that the sons for Hungary to free herself of the fetters which she had worn these 300 years—to take her place among the states of Europe—and to settle her accounts with that fatal tyranny which, during the last three centuries, had so long and so impiously forced upon her the burdens of the war of liberation. The gallant army which had staked their lives on the safety of the country claimed no other reward but that one resolution; and that resolution, moreover, imperiously demanded by the condition of Europe and of the Hungarian country. He (Kossuth) would move that the House, viz. The Hungarian nation declares as follows:—

"1. Hungary, together with [illegible] all parts, countries, and provinces [illegible] is and shall be a free and independent European state.

"2. The House of Hapsburg-Lorraine, by its treason, perjury, and armed aggression of the Austrian army, and further by having employed foreign troops to divide the area of the country, to separate Transylvania and Croatia from Hungary, to annihilate the independent political existence of the country, and to raise an armed power for the purpose of murdering the nation—by these and many other gross crimes and enormities has the House of Hapsburg-Lorraine broken the Pragmatic Sanction, and every other tie which joined the two countries of Austria and Hungary. In consequence of which, this perjured House of Hapsburg-Lorraine is and shall be excluded, and deposed and banished, now and for ever, from the dominion, sovereignty, and enjoyment of the territories of Hungary, as well as of the provinces, and all the parts, countries, and provinces thereunto appertaining. And the said House is and shall be declared in the name of the nation to have forfeited the throne, and to be excluded and disowned and banished.

"3. The said Hungarian nation enters, according to its inalienable natural rights, as an independent and free state, into the family of European states; and the said nation resolves to declare and maintain, as they now does declare and [illegible], viz. that it will live in peace and amity with all other states that shall abstain from violating its rights, but peculiarly with those with which its interests were joined with the said nation under a common Sovereign, as well as with the Turkish Empire and the states of Italy

"4. The future system of government in all its details shall be provided for by the Parliament; and until that work shall have been consummated the country shall be governed by a President, assisted by a Cabinet of Ministers, to be appointed by the said Parliament, under the personal responsibility of the said Prese dent and of the said Ministers.

"The execution of the principles contained in these resolutions is confided to a committee of three persons."

Kossuth's motion was adopted by the unanimous vote of the Parliament, amidst the most enthusiastic cheers of the people

In Vienna, the news has created the greatest consternation, party spirit running very high for and against the Magyars.

From the seat of war we learn that the communication between Pesth and Buda is cut off, and the Hungarians are masters of the right bank of the Danube, between Pesth and Comorn.

Here is the position of the contest, and is taking measures to prevent the entry of the Russians into Transylvania by the defiles of the mountains. It is confirmed that the army of Jellachich has been completely destroyed near Peterwardein, in the south of Danube.

"From 50,000 to 60,000 Hungarians are about to penetrate into Gallicia, near Jablunka, in order to execute an insurrection there, as in Poland and in Posen.

FOREIGN WATERFOWL.—On Tuesday, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Captain Gordon, visited H. ers. Baker's Pheasantry, Beaufort-street, Chelsea, and inspected the numerous and beautiful foreign waterfowl on their establishment, among which is a pair of mandarin ducks, the only specimens in this country. His Royal Highness expressed himself much gratified with selected several specimens for removal to the ornamental water in the gardens of Buckingham Palace.

HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY, CHISWICK.—On Saturday last, the first of the four exhibitions, for the present year, of the Horticultural Society, took place at their gardens at Chiswick. The morning was full of promise, but shortly after two o'clock the sunshine was succeeded by a thunder shower, which deluged the neighbourhood, and greatly marred the beautiful appearance which the gardens had previously presented. The unfavourable change in the weather had also the effect of preventing so numerous an attendance as usually characterises the exhibitions of the Horticultural Society. Every possible provision was made for the contingency of unfavourable weather, and ample protection from the rain to the fashionable promenaders was afforded by a new marquee of enormous dimensions and elegant appearance, erected by Mr. Benjamin Edgington, of the Borough. A very fortunate circumstance, as some of the older tents could not resist the fierce rain which the torrents of rain descended. Among the persons of distinction present were Prince Albert (accompanied by the Hon. Mr. Anson), the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Devonshire, the Duke of Northumberland, the Earl and Countess of Harrowby, Lord and Lady Grey, Lord and Lady Ashburton, Lord Bridport, the Duchess of Sutherland, &c. The exhibition was not equal, either in quality or variety, to those of former years.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

THE NAVIGATION LAWS.

A great number of petitions having been presented by the Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Londonderry, the Earl of Harrowby, Lord Stanley, and several other Peers, against the repeal of the Navigation Laws, and one by the Marquis of Londonderry, from Manchester, signed by 448, in favour of the repeal,

The Marquis of Lansdowne moved the second reading of the Navigation Bill. He said that he knew he had opposed to him on this occasion the feelings and prejudices of those who feared that the passing of this bill would be detrimental to the maintenance of that force upon which this country relied, and ought to rely, for the preservation of its maritime power; and he would feel it incumbent on him to discuss those feelings and prejudices, and to show to them that this bill would have no such injurious effect as they apprehended. He believed that many of their Lordships, and most of those who petitioned the House on this matter, were under the impression that the commerce of this country was clothed with a complete suit of protective armour; but the Navigation Laws afforded to our commerce a garment of shreds and patches, as incongruous and ragged as it was possible to conceive, and one that gave no real protection whatever. The noble Marquis traced the history of the Navigation Laws and the reciprocity treaties, and contended that, by superior energy and enterprise, the British merchants and the British shipowners were able to compete successfully with all other nations in the world. A great step towards free trade in shipping had been taken when this country departed from the rigid principles of the Navigation Laws, by entering into reciprocity treaties with foreign powers; and the results of these treaties, as they affected British tonnage, clearly proved that neither the British shipowner nor the British seaman had anything to fear from foreign competition. Our foreign tonnage successfully competed, not only with the shipping of the United States, where, though timber was cheap, labour was dear, but also with the shipping of the Baltic states, where both labour and timber were cheap and abundant. Trade being then no gainer by what remained of our Navigation Laws, and neither the navy nor the mercantile marine having anything to dread from their total abolition, there were very cogent reasons why they should be abolished without delay. The attitude of foreign powers with respect to the subject, and the wants and wishes of the colonies particularly those of Canada, whose vital interests were involved in the issue of the bill—pointed to the immediate removal of the restrictions which still remained a clog upon the trade and shipping of the country. He warned their Lordships not to delay till it was too late. The system could not much longer be sustained, bolster it up as they might. Let them now yield, before concession became useless. Should the House refuse to pass the bill, not only would the condition of the country, in regard to all its trading interests, not be better than now, but it would be infinitely worse. He trusted, therefore, that their Lordships would agree to the second reading of the measure. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley), exclaimed Lord Lansdowne, in concluding his speech, "has announced that he is prepared for the consequences of the rejection of this bill; and I also announce, on the part of the Government, that we too are prepared for the consequences of the rejection of it."

Lord BROUGHAM said that in the course he was about to take on this question, he was solely influenced by a regard to the highest interests of the country. He had been, within a few days, taunted for inconsistency in refusing to place the crowning capital on the pillar of Free Trade. Accustomed as he was to extraordinary evolutions, that taunt, coming from the quarter it did, was one that caused him the utmost astonishment. In fact, he gloried in that taunt. But his answer to it was, that the Navigation Laws had nothing to do with Free Trade. The noble and learned Lord proceeded to deal with the statistical returns prepared under the direction of the Board of Trade, and relied on by the advocates of the bill as arguments in its favour, and demonstrated the unsoundness manner in which these returns were "cooked;" showing, in some instances, figures one hundred and fifty times more than the true figures. The noble President of the Council talked of this measure as a removal of fragments; but the Navigation Laws were splendid fragments that must not be treated with that contempt with which their Lordships were asked to treat them. The noble Marquis who moved the second reading had avoided to touch upon the gist of the whole question—the policy of the Navigation Laws, which, through all their modifications, were preserved. That object and that policy were to encourage the formation of a mercantile navy as the only sure foundation for our military marine. He warned Lord Lansdowne against the question as it bore upon our great colonial ship-building and commercial interests, should the repeal of the Navigation Laws would work incalculable damage to these great and vital interests, and he warned their Lordships not to lay rude hands heedlessly upon them. This was no time for making noweeping changes as that proposed. Their Lordships could not take the step the Government would induce them to take, because it was a step which, if once taken, they could not retrace. A shadowy threat of consequences had been held out by the President of the Council, and he (Lord Brougham) did not consider them of importance, that consideration would have great weight with him (Lord Brougham), especially at the present critical time; but after the fullest consideration he could give to the question, he felt compelled to oppose the measure, as a Peer of Parliament, and as an honest man, to oppose the further progress of this bill.

Earl GRANVILLE defended the bill and the Board of Trade returns.

On the motion of the Earl of CARNARVON, the debate was adjourned. The House rose at a quarter past twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

AFFAIRS OF THE EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. CHARTERIS drew attention to a portion of the report of the committee of shareholders of the Eastern Counties Railway, appointed to investigate the affairs of that company, which referred to the payment of £7606 17s. 6d., in 1846, under the head "Parliamentary Expenses," and with respect to which Mr Waddington and Mr. Duncan stated to the committee that the sums in question had been disbursed through them for services rendered, but in a manner which did not leave them at liberty to give particulars, as they could not do so without implicating other parties, and asked Lord John Russell whether his attention had been drawn to this report, in so far as it was calculated to affect the general character of the House. His interference he was not, as was erroneously supposed, directed against an individual member of that House, but for the purpose of putting an end to rumours that the money in question had been expended in what was termed "facilitating the passage of bills through Parliament;" or, in plain English, bribing members of that House. Calculated as these rumours were to damage the character of the House, which ought to be above suspicion, and to call it over upon the private and individual honour of every member of it, he thought some inquiry ought to take place.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL agreed with the learned gentleman that the words to which he had referred did tend to excite suspicions affecting the character and credit of the House. He did not give the slightest belief to the rumours to which allusion had been made, but fully agreed in the opinion that it would not be right to let these words, put forth by a committee of persons known to be men of character, pass by without an inquiry. Thinking that the matter would be best investigated by the hon. member for the same numbers of the Government, he trusted, after consultation with other hon. members as to the best mode of doing so, that the hon. gentleman would undertake the conduct of the inquiry, and not let the matter rest until the whole truth should have been elicited.

Mr. WADDINGTON claimed indulgence while he offered a few observations, and proceeded to refer to the committee's report in reference to the subject in question, and as to the evidence given before them by the directors in reply thereto; assuring the House, as a man and a gentleman, that there was not a member of that House who directly or indirectly benefited one single shilling in reference to the £7606 17s. 6d. in question. He was not opposed to the inquiry suggested, and thanked the honourable gentleman for bringing the matter forward; at the same time it was due to the House to say, that, if any allusion had been made in the committee in his presence, he should have felt himself bound to say something to check the spirit of Christian unmanliness. Being unable to see any force or conclusiveness in the arguments against the bill, he should follow in the course of constitutional precedent and an enlightened policy by giving his hearty support to the measure.

Mr. ROEBUCK should vote for the bill, not because it contained an oath, but because it was a relaxation, and because it was consonant with the principle of [illegible] legislation, which he believed to be the most acceptable mode of proceeding to the people of England.

On a division, the second reading was carried by a majority of 93—the numbers being, 278 to 185.

The question of the second reading of the Lunatic Asylum (Scotland) Bill led to a division, Mr. F. MACKENZIE moving the adjournment of the House, which proposition was negatived by a majority of 45, the numbers being 24 to 69, and the bill was read a second time.

A discussion on the question of the second reading of the Public Health (Scotland) Bill led to a second division, on the adjournment, which was negatived by a majority of 14, the numbers being 19 to 33; Mr. MACKENZIE objecting to the principle of the bill on the ground that the area of taxation was not sufficiently defined, the second reading was postponed, and the House adjourned at half-past 10 o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

Their Lordships met at five o'clock.

NAVIGATION LAWS—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Some petitions having been presented against the Repeal of the Navigation Laws,

The adjourned debate on the second reading of the Navigation Bill was resumed by the EARL OF CARLISLE, who urged their Lordships to agree to the bill, although he admitted that in recommending them to do so he ran counter to the feelings and early prejudices and dispositions. Should this measure peril the continuance of our naval power? He and those who brought it forward were not actuated by any such unpatriotic motive, but by unmixed and true patriotism, and by a desire to extend our commerce and create commerce, which would promote our mercantile marine, which was the best plan to secure the efficiency of our naval greatness. He agreed with the noble Earl, that the bill was calculated to increase the sole good of a single class, but the good of the whole of the nation and was that species of wealth which employed the greatest number of the people. He had carefully read out in detail the injury which the measure would do to trade by the repeal of the navigation laws, and expressed that instead of that injury being realised, there was a confident expectation that their repeal would increase our trade and commerce more economical management in the navy, and would have been productive of more economical management in the navy, and would have been productive of more economical management in the navy, and would have been productive of and attended by the parochial clergy of the capital and the students of St. Sulpice, descended the steps of the Madeleine, and moved slowly along the Rue Royale to wards the obelisk of the Place de la Concorde. The National Guard, who formed the lines on both sides, presented arms as the cortège passed, and the venerable Prelate administered his benediction as he went along. Almost simultaneously with his arrival in the centre of the square, the standard-bearer of the Executive Chamber presented the arms of the Republic, and the Chief Magistrate of the State—and the President of the Republic, wearing the costume of a Chief of the National Guard, with the tri-band and star of the Legion of Honour, accompanied by General Changarnier, who rode at his right hand, with other general officers, and followed by a numerous and brilliant staff, made his appearance.

At the same moment, another cortège arrived in the direction of the Pont de la Concorde. It was composed of the representatives of the people, with M. Marrast, their President, the six Vice-Presidents, and the Questors of the Chamber, at their head. They were all dressed in black, and each deputy wore his tri-coloured scarf, ornamented with gold fringe, with the red rosette of deputy at the button-hole of the left breast. The whole arrived nearly at the same moment, and the Archbishop and his clergy ascended the steps of the platform erected at the base of the obelisk, and which were covered with a green carpet interspersed with flowers. In front of the high altar were placed three superb fauteuils. The centre one, which was intended for the President of the Republic, was more elevated than the others. The Archbishop advanced to the altar; the clergy and students of St. Sulpice, dressed in soutanes and white surplices, ranged themselves round the platform. The President of the Republic assumed his place in the centre. On his right hand sat M. Marrast, President of the National Assembly, and on his left M. Boulay de la Meurthe, Vice-President of the Republic, and next to him M. Odillon Barrot, President of the Council, and the other members of the Cabinet. The representatives of the people were placed in due order round the platform. The altar was [illegible] with a gorgeous canopy of crimson velvet and [illegible] damask, [illegible] placed, with a rich embroidery of gold and [illegible] flowers, and [illegible] with a deep gold fringe. From the summit of the obelisk floated a long tri-coloured flag. From the base to the summit were placed emblems representing the Virtues; and flowers, flags, and stars were strewed all over it in abundance. Five colossal statues, in a sitting position, round the chapel of the monument, represented Religion, Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity. Our Artist has pictured this splendid scene.

The Archbishop approached the altar, and began the religious ceremony, which consisted of a low mass. The music was performed by the members of the Conservatoire, and a military orchestra directed by M. Landelle, who performed in the most exquisite style the "Salutaris Hostia" at the elevation, and the "Domine salvam fac Rempublicam," as also the "Te Deum," all of which pasted the solemn passage of the mass when the consecration takes place, and fear and the communicants, was most impressive. At the moment of the elevation, the President of the Republic, the President of the National Assembly, the Ministers, the attendant clergy, and all who were in or near the platform, fell on their knees, and bowed their heads to the ground; while, at a given signal, the whole of the troops presented arms, and the cannon of the Invalides thundered in the distance. The performance of the act of thanksgiving, the "Te Deum," was also most impressive. The chaunt was again responded to by a salute from the artillery of the Invalides, and the troops again presented arms. But the concluding portion of the ceremony was the venerable Archbishop blessing the people; when again the solemn music rose, and the cannon of the Invalides answered.

After the ceremony, the prelate descended from the altar, approached the spot where Louis Napoleon was standing, and conversed with him for some minutes; and then—still preceded by his acolytes and cross-bearer, and accompanied by his clergy—he descended from the platform, and returned to the Madeleine in the same order he had set out. The President of the Republic also descended, mounted his horse at the lowest step of the platform, and having gracefully as uted all who were about him, returned to the Palace.

The illuminations in the evening are truly magnificent. At about eight o'clock, the whole of the vast space comprised between the Madeleine, the National Assembly, and the Place de la Concorde, on the one side, and the Champs Elysées on the other, was lighted up as if by enchantment. This vast illumination rendered the finest portion of the city like an island of flame in the vast expanse. The front of the Madeleine was splendidly decorated with gorgeous chandeliers of gilt bronze, which shot forth a flood of light; the steps were also illuminated. The whole of the Rue Royale was illuminated by columns formed of tri-coloured lamps; and from their summits floated streamers with the Republican colours. The Place de la Concorde was literally bound in a circle of flame. All around were columns representing the departments and colonies, and covered over with variegated lamps. They were united together by wreaths of flowers and festoons of lamps; while in the middle towered the ancient obelisk, with its altars and its Oriental draperies, all brilliantly illuminated. The fountains in the square were covered with lamps, and the water, in which was reflected the blaze of light, gave life and freshness to the scene as it flashed through the interstices. The usual gas-lamps had been removed, and were replaced by rows of light, clusters of tri-coloured flags fluttering in the night-breeze imparted life and variety to the whole. The Artist has represented this gorgeous spectacle. In front, the Pont de la Concorde, which had been gorgeously ornamented with colours, flags, and statues, was lighted up in a similar manner; while the graceful outline of the Chamber of Deputies was rendered distinctly visible by thousands of variegated lamps. Far to the right extended the Champs Elysées, a perfect avenue of light, bounded in the distance by the Arch of Triumph and the Barrière de l'Etoile, and the effect of the light gushing through the rich foliage of the trees was enchanting. A revolving electrical light, presenting now the appearance of a globe of white flame which lighted up all around it, now a mass of red fire, now extending to a vast size, and now diminishing to a point, terminated the view in that direction. To the left was seen, like a gigantic beacon, the summit of the Palace of the Legion of Honour, exhibiting the cross of the order; while still more to the left rose majestically the dome of the Pantheon and the towers of Notre Dame, which shed their variegated splendour over all. All along the quays on both sides of the river the illuminations were equally brilliant.

The whole of the diplomatic corps were provided with places on the platform under the canopy. Lord Normanby, however, witnessed the ceremony from a private house in the Place de la Concorde.

The decorations of the whole space over which the troops were spread were those which are displayed on similar festivities; and the railing of the Tuileries fronting the Place de la Concorde, the square itself, the Rue Royale, the Pont de la Concorde, and the avenue of the Champs Elysées were literally covered over with statues, flags, and garlands. The column of the Place Vendôme was similarly ornamented, and four long tri-colour banners floated from the summit, and immediately under the Emperor's statue. The day continued throughout most beautiful.

At the Barrière de l'Etoile there was a grand display of fireworks, followed by a magnificent bouquet at the fountain in the Avenue. There were also fireworks on the same grand scale at the Barrière du Trône. The hotels of the Ministers, all the public buildings, the gardens of the Tuileries, the lamp manufactory at Chaillot, &c. were also illuminated in a much more magnificent style than in previous years. In a word the fête of Friday week was the finest Paris has witnessed for many years. A countless multitude of all classes of society thronged the streets in every direction. The most perfect order was preserved.

VICTOR EMMANUEL, KING OF SARDINIA.

THE CITY OF TURIN.

THE accompanying View of the capital of Piedmont, and the residence of the King of the Sardinian States, shows the position of the city, as well as its remarkable regularity of plan. It lies on the left or western bank of the Po, in a wide and fertile valley, between the lower offsets of the Cottian Alps on the west, and the hills of Monferrato, which rise immediately above the right or eastern bank of the Po. The valley opens to the north-east into the wide plain of Lombardy.

Turin is one of the most regularly built towns in Europe; most of the streets being in straight lines, and intersecting each other at right angles, the squares being also of a regular form. The buildings, though massive and lofty, are, generally speaking, plain. The town is about a mile and a quarter in length, and little more than half a mile in its greatest breadth. The citadel, which is regularly constructed, and is one of the strongest in Italy, lies outside of the town, to the westward.

Turin has many important public buildings, as the modern Royal palace, the cathedral, the great theatre (one of the largest and finest in Italy), and the university. The churches are numerous, but few are remarkable for their external architecture. In the right-hand foreground of our Illustration is shown the suburb on the right bank of the Po, facing the bridge, with a portion of the fine new church "Della gran' Madre di Dio," raised by the municipality of Turin, in memory of the restoration of the dynasty of Savoy, in 1814. It is in imitation of the Pantheon of Rome: it is cased with marble, and adorned with marble pillars. From this point is a splendid view of the plain of Turin, the town, and the river, and of the crescent of the snow-capped Alps, from the lofty pyramid of Mount Viso on the west, to the picturesque group of Mount Rosa on the north-east.

TURIN.—FROM A DRAWING BY LORD MAIDSTONE.

THE KING OF SARDINIA.

IT will be recollected that immediately after the disastrous battle of Novara, on March 24, King Charles Albert signed his abdication in favour of his eldest son, who ascended the throne under the title of Victor Emmanuel. We now present to our readers a portrait of the new Sovereign, which we have obtained by the courtesy of T. B. Heath, Esq., Consul-General of Sardinia.

The young King, Victor Emmanuel Albert Eugène Ferdinand Thomas (formerly Prince Royal and Duke of Savoy), was born March 14, 1820. In 1842 he married the second daughter of the Archduke Reynier, the former Viceroy of Milan, who had himself married the sister of Charles Albert. Thus, the new King is cousin-german to the ex-Emperor Ferdinand, and first and second cousin to the present Emperor Francis Joseph.

Some interesting traits of the young King's personal courage at Novara are related in the accounts of the battle. Some touching details are likewise given of the abdication of Charles Albert:—

"In the evening, after the battle, the King, sad but calm, returned to the Rellini Palace. At 9 o'clock he sent for the Dukes of Savoy and Genoa, the Commander-in-Chief, the Minister Casema, and the Lieutenant-Generals and commandants of division at Novara. The rumour of his abdication had already spread in the palace, and when he entered the room in which the Council had assembled, the emotion of the persons present showed that they had penetrated his secret. The King advanced with dignity, and said, 'Gentlemen, fortune has betrayed your courage and my hopes; our army is dissolved; it would be impossible to prolong the struggle. My task is accomplished, and I think I shall render an important service to my country by giving a last proof of devotedness in abdicating in favour of my son, Victor Emmanuel, Duke of Savoy. He will obtain from Austria conditions of peace which she would refuse if treating with me.' The persons present burst into tears, but no emotion was visible in the face of Charles Albert, and all the efforts of the Duke of Savoy to shake his resolve were vain. The King embraced him and the Duke of Genoa, and all who were present. He thanked them for the services they had rendered him, and said, 'Gentlemen, I am no longer your King; be faithful and devoted to my son, as you have been to me.' He then withdrew to write to the Queen, and charged the Duke of Savoy to deliver the letter of adieu with his own hand."

On March 26, Victor Emmanuel received the deputation from the Chamber of Deputies of Turin, charged to inform the King that the representatives of the nation continued to promise him all the means they could dispose of to carry on the great work begun by his father. King Victor Emmanuel thanked the deputation for their grateful memory of his father; he then gave several details on the late disastrous campaign, and mentioned several corps of the army which had fought bravely. He said his father, Charles Albert, had determined to abdicate, in consequence of the heavy conditions imposed by the enemy, and which broke his heart. The King then added—"I have already obtained a considerable mitigation of the conditions, and I shall do my best that these conditions may be reduced." The King then spoke still more of the war; he willingly accepted the generous offer of the nation to continue the war of independence. In this question he said he would not quit the footsteps of his honoured father; the nation might be assured that he had nothing more at heart than the honour of the country.

EXCEEDINGLY ANCIENT LITERATURE.—Morrison mentions a dictionary in the Chinese language, of 40,000 hieroglyphical characters, as having been compiled 11,000 years before Christ.

THE AUCKLAND FAMILY.—There have been four extraordinarily afflicting deaths in this noble family within the last fifty years. William Eden, the first Lord Auckland, died in 1814, suddenly, while he sat at breakfast with his family; and his Lordship had the misfortune to lose his eldest son in a very melancholy manner in 1810, the body being found in the Thames, near Milbank, after having been missed above a month. His Lordship's second son, the late Earl, whilst shooting, was attacked with paralysis, which terminated fatally within two days (Jan. 1, 1849); and this noble Earl's younger sister, the Hon. Frances Eden, was seized with paralysis on April 22, and expired on the 26th.—(From a Correspondent.)

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SCHOOL SOCIETY.—On Monday the annual meeting of the friends and supporters of this society took place in the large room at Exeter Hall, which was crowded in every part. The Earl of Carlisle occupied the chair; and amongst those present were the Bishop of Norwich, the Bishop of Manchester, Lord Monteagle, Sir E. N. Buxton, W. Tooke, Esq., S. Gurney, &c. The report stated that 103 new schools which were attended by 10,000 children, had been established during the year in seventy-eight different localities. The model school at Bristol had been attended by 919 boys throughout the year, and by 31,939 since its commencement. The relative number of girls in attendance was 450 and 18,294. The auxiliary home branches and the foreign operations of the society were also reported on most favourably, and were stated to be fully up to the mark of any previous year. The receipts from all sources for the year were £11,711 18s. 8d., the whole of which sum had been expended in carrying out the various objects of the society.

ORPHAN WORKING SCHOOL.—The commemorative festival to celebrate the 91st anniversary of this charity was held on Wednesday at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, Samuel Morton Peto, Esq., M.P., one of the Vice-Presidents of the charity, in the chair. The Chairman, in proposing "Prosperity to the Orphan Working School, and may it continue to flourish for ever," acquainted the company that the institution was formed in 1758, 91 years since, for 20 boys. It had now under its care 200 children, viz. 129 boys and 71 girls. The average annual admission to 1830 was 15; from 1836 to 1840, 19; from 1840 to 1845, 30; and during the last two years 100 children had been admitted The annual subscriptions were:—

The objects sought to be benefitted by this charity were poor orphan and other necessitous children, who were admitted between 7 and 11 years of age, and of any part of the kingdom, provided they were in good health and had never been the inmates of a prison or a workhouse. They remained in the school until they were 14 years of age, when the boys were placed out as apprentices, with a premium of £5, or clothing to that amount; the girls were trained for domestic service, and were provided with situations, each girl having a suitable outfit of the value of three guineas. During the seven following years, to encourage them to persevere in good conduct, they are annually rewarded with sums varying from five shillings to one guinea, on producing satisfactory testimonials from their employers. Altogether, 1373 poor children had been admitted into the schools, most of whom, after receiving a religious, useful, and suitable education, had been placed in situations, in which they had, by industry and steady conduct, obtained a comfortable livelihood, and some of them had risen to influential stations in society, and become governors of the charity. The first thing to which he would call their attention was the perfect catholicity of the institution of the charity itself. No denominations or distinctions were known. The only thing required was that the children should be orphan and necessitous; they obtained a sound religious education without sectarian bias, and the industrious habit which was necessary for the development of the system of every child. Various other toasts were given; and, after the announcement of subscriptions to the amount of £430, the company separated

THE FISTULA INFIRMARY.—The thirteenth anniversary of this institution was celebrated on Tuesday evening by a public dinner, given at the London Tavern, where about 180 gentlemen sat down to dinner. The chair on the occasion was taken by the Right Hon. Sir James Duke, the Lord Mayor. The Chairman, in proposing the toast of the night, expressed his anxious desire to promote the cause of the institution; while he admitted that the chief magistrate of the City was precluded by his multifarious duties from presiding with due effect over such meetings, he considered that it was one of the primary duties of the Lord Mayor to encourage all charitable institutions, and it afforded him the deepest pleasure to preside on the anniversary of that institution for the cause of which they had assembled together (Hear, hear.) On an institution like the present, all party feeling and all party strife merged into the feeling of doing good for their fellow-creatures. (Hear, hear.) He was happy to say that the institution was so firmly established that it required no further assistance from him to prove its efficiency, and he was gratified, in proposing the toast of its prosperity, to be able to add to it the name of his colleague, who had been so long connected with the institution, and who had ever been foremost in providing for its interests. He referred to the name of Benjamin Bond Cabbell, (Loud applause.) He was happy to state that the gentleman had evinced a liberality almost unprecedented, by giving a piece of land, value 4500, for the erection of a hospital, the condition being that the institution should take the title of the "St. Andrew's Hospital." The right honourable chairman, after a few further observations, proposed "Prosperity to the Infirmary," and coupled with the toast the name of B. B Cabbell, M.P. During the evening the contributions in aid of this very estimable society were announced to be £1060 18s.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—A numerous and exceedingly agreeable reunion of the members of this University took place on Wednesday evening, in the academical apartments of a college in Somerset House. The University, as many of the readers of the Illustrated London News must be aware, has now granted degrees for some years past, under the powers conferred upon it by Royal charter, and the graduates having at length become a very numerous body, the noble Chancellor (the Earl of Burlington) a short time since suggested to the council his desire to assemble such of the members of the University as could conveniently attend at a soirée, where he might have the gratification of meeting them. The project was at once entertained, and Wednesday evening having been fixed for the réunion, the noble Earl dispensed a right courteous hospitality to a circle of nearly 600 guests, including, in addition to those graduates referred to, the heads of King's College, and many other academical institutes with which the University of London is connected. The Duke of Wellington, Chancellor of Oxford University, was expected, but his Grace was prevented attending, owing to his presence having been commanded at Buckingham Palace. Viscount Mahon, Lord Brougham, and several other distinguished noblemen were present, as well as all the leading members of the literary and scientific world. Altogether, the meeting was a most gratifying one, and it is to be hoped the noble Chancellor will make it an annual réunion.

ROYAL FREEMASONS' SCHOOL FOR FEMALE CHILDREN.—On Wednesday evening the 64th anniversary festival of the above charity was celebrated in Freemasons' Hall, when about 300 of the brethren of the craft, attired in masonic costume, sat down to an elegant repast, at which the Earl of Zetland, Most Worshipful Grand Master, presided, supported by Lord Suffield, Lord Milford, the Hon. D. Dundas, W. F. Beaden, Esq., Alex. Dobie, Esq., &c. The usual loyal and patriotic toasts having been duly honoured, followed by the accustomed courtesies to the chairman and officers, the noble chairman proposed the toast of the evening, "Success to the Royal Freemasons' Female School," and stated that the institution was founded in 1788, by Chevalier Raspin, whose great benevolence reduced him to comparative distress, and that two of his grandchildren were now in the school, in which were at present sixty-five girls. Out of the 600 children educated in the institution, 41 had turned out virtuous good girls. After eulogising the matron, who had held that office fifty years, the toast was given and drank with great enthusiasm. The collection of the evening amounted to about £580

PROTESTANT ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of this association was held on Wednesday, at Exeter Hall; J. F. Thompson, Esq., in the chair. The body of the hall was well filled, and there were also a great number of persons in the galleries. The chairman, in opening the business of the day, adverted at some length to the disturbed state of the Continent, contrasting the peaceful condition of Protestant countries with the anarchy and confusion which prevail in Roman Catholic countries. Amidst this state of things Popery remained unchanged—Popery, in its adversity, remained unhumbled. The chairman concluded by calling upon the meeting to uphold the pure principles of Protestantism, and thus to crush the vile blasphemies of Popery. From the report it appeared that the society is in debt to the amount of £600, to set against which there are assets amounting to £500. It was stated that premiums had been offered by the society for the best essays on various subjects connected with Protestant principles. Resolutions in accordance with the objects of the association were unanimously passed.

BRITISH ORPHAN ASYLUM.—The anniversary festival of this excellent institution will be held in a few days: after which, it is hoped, the directors will be placed in a position to commence the enlargement of the asylum, which the pressing demands upon the charity have rendered necessary.

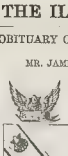
SALE OF THE LONDON AND BLACKWALL RAILWAY ENGINES.—At the Auction Mart, on Wednesday, Messrs. Pullen and Son submitted to auction the engines which have been employed on the Blackwall Railway to work the ropes, and disposed of in consequence of the alteration in the motive power on that line. The first lot consisted of a pair of engines at the Minories station, of 110-horse power each, but stated to be capable of greater power; they sold for £3350. Another pair, of similar make, and at the same station, fetched £1700, and five boilers £299. The engines at Blackwall, of 75-horse power each, and stated to have cost £7000 per pair in construction, fetched for one pair £2300, and the second pair £2200, and the boilers £311. All the lots were understood to be sold, and produced in the whole £11,710

HEALTH OF LONDON DURING THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, MAY 5TH.—The deaths registered in last week, which were 986, are more than the average estimated for increase of population; but show a decrease of about 70 on the month of April, when was unusually cold for the season. It appears to be observed that hooping-cough and bronchitis are the most active agents in maintaining the rate of mortality at the present mark the former increasing, though the latter declines. From hooping-cough the mortality—namely, 71 deaths—is double the average; while the 57 deaths from bronchitis are 20 above the average. The deaths from pneumonia are 77, or 16 more than the average; those from consumption 130, or rather less than the average. There were 12 from scrofula, or 7 more than the average; and amongst those enumerated under this head were four deaths of males, chiefly boys under fifteen years of age, ascribed to lumbar or psoas abscess. The mortality from scarlatina and measles continues slightly above the average; that from small-pox and typhus is still under it. Twenty-two persons died of diarrhœa and dysentery, but not more than in the same week of the last two years: 13 of these were children under two years of age. A girl, two boys, and a man died of cholera, the last in the Breadnought Hospital. A female of thirty-four years of age died in St. Clement Danes, and the cause of death is reported by the medical man to have been "exhaustion from grief," after an illness of five months. The number of births registered in the week was 1372.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

MR. JAMES TRACY, CLAIMANT OF THE TRACY PEERAGE.



THE sufferings and death of this unsuccessful claimant of the honours of the ancient family of Tracy, is another sad example of the misery so often attendant on Peerage causes. Few men are there foolhardy enough to claim property without some sort of rational pretension to it, whereas, amongst the many aspirants to coronets, very few indeed have any pretension whatever but mere traditionary gossip. Hence it is that so many Peerage claims brought hopefully before the Lords' House of Parliament terminate in utter hopelessness, and that so many suitors go forth from the Committee of Privileges, not Peers, but paupers. Mr. James Tracy, the son of humble parents, in the King's County, Ireland, was led to believe, from tradition, and an entry in the family Bible, that he had a good title to the Viscounty of Tracy, of Rathcoole. In vindication of that right he came to London, after disposing of his business as a wine-merchant in Dublin, and for fourteen consecutive years laboured with energy, the most indefatigable, and through difficulties of no common occurrence, to gain the prize on which he had staked his all. Day after day might he be seen poring over the dusty manuscripts of the British Museum, or investigating the musty parchments of Doctors' Commons or the Rolls Office. His disposition was most sanguine; and, until the last session of Parliament, he buoyed himself up with the hope of final success—but the decision the Lords then came to, invalidating the evidence of a tombstone, on which Mr. Tracy mainly relied, destroyed his last chance, and with it the hopeful spirit that had sustained the poor claimant through all his adversity. His heart was broken: from the moment of the judgment he gradually sank, until death terminated his sufferings. Independently of the title, Mr. Tracy claimed a considerable portion of the family estates, at present held by Lord Sudeley.

James Tracy's opponent, Lieutenant Benjamin Wheatley Tracy, R.N., is now the only claimant before the House of Lords.

THE HON. AND RIGHT REV. EDMOND KNOX, LORD BISHOP OF LIMERICK, ARDFERT, AND AGHADOE.

THE decease of this venerable prelate occurred at Birmingham on the 3d inst. His Lordship was youngest son of Thomas Viscount Northland, and brother of the late Earl of Dunkerrity. At the period of his death he had reached his seventy-sixth year. His education he received at Trinity College, Dublin. In 1831 he was raised to the episcopal bench as Bishop of Killaloe; and in 1841 translated to the see of Limerick, a diocese which includes the counties of Limerick and Kerry, with a small part of Clare and Cork, and which is enriched by the patronage of forty-four livings. Dr Knox married, 22d of February, 1791, Charlotte, fourth daughter of Sir Thomas Hesketh, Bart., and by her, who died September 25, 1827, had issue two sons, Edmond Dalrymple, Archdeacon of Killaloe, and Charles, besides four daughters, viz. Jesse Diana Jane, married to the Very Rev. John Thomas O'Neill; Harriet Ann, married to David Robert Ross, Esq., of Rostrevor; Fanny, married to the Rev. Marcus M'Causland; and Anne, married to Major Harry Smyth.

SAMUEL MAUNDER.

WE regret to record the death of this popular literateur, which took place at his house, at Islington, on the 30th ult. Mr. Maunder will long be remembered by the reading masses for his ably compiled series of "Treasuries," one of which (Natural History) appeared a few months since. As books of reference they are economical, of time, space, and cost, and rightly attest the editor's intelligence and industry. Mr. Maunder, too, in conjunction with the late Mr. Pinnock, published, many years since, the useful series of "Catechisms" now extensively used in schools.

CHARLES ST. BARBE, ESQ., F.A.S., OF LYMINGTON, HANTS, BANKER

FEW families in England can claim higher antiquity than that of St. Barbe. Its patriarch, Robert de St. Barbe, came over with William the Conqueror, as proved by the Battle Abbey roll, and there are still to be found in Normandy a town and two villages of the name. The senior line, seated at Ashington and Broad ands, in Hampshire, were raised to the degree of Baronets in 1663, but long since became extinct. Of a junior branch, the Duke of Wellington is a descendant in the female line. The St. Barbe's of Lymington are now the only surviving male representatives of the race

Mr. St. Barbe, whose death we record, was eldest son of the late Charles St. Barbe, Esq., a magistrate and Deputy-Lieutenant for Hampshire, and sixth in descent from William St. Barbe, Gentleman of the Privy Chamber to Henry VIII and Queen Elizabeth. He was born in 1776, and succeeded his father in 1826. He married Mary, daughter of the Rev. Thomas Foster, of Thwell, co. Rutland, and had four sons and one daughter, viz. Elizabeth, wife of Thomas Hayward Southby, Esq.

GENERAL SIR ROBERT THOMAS WILSON

THIS gallant and distinguished officer died suddenly of a disease of the heart on Wednesday. Sir Robert, on Tuesday, appeared in good health and spirits, and walked out. Shortly before 8, on Wednesday morning, he was taken seriously ill. Several medical gentlemen were speedily in attendance, but he expired after a few convulsive struggles. Of Sir Robert Wilson's eventful life we shall give an outline, with a portrait, next week.

SIR THOMAS BOURCHIER, K.C.B

THE death of this gallant naval officer was announced last week. His commissions bore date, Lieutenant's, 1808; Commander's, 1822; and Captain's, 1837.

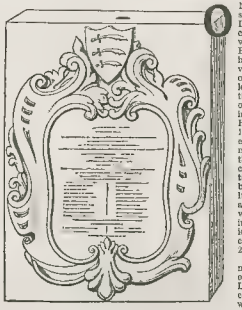
Sir Thomas was son of the late Major-General Bourchier, of Ardclony, county Clare, and descended from a branch of the ancient English family of the name. At the period of his decease he had attained his 58th year. In 1843 he married Miss Codrington, eldest daughter of Admiral Sir Edward Codrington, G.C.B. The Knight Commandership of the Bath he received in requital of his gallant services in the Chinese war.

HORACE TWISS, ESQ.

HORACE TWISS, a gentleman of well-known legal, political, and literary celebrity, was the son of a Mr. Twiss, an author of some note in his day, whose wife was the sister of John Philip Kemble. Consequently, Mr. Horace Twiss was nephew of that great tragedian, and of Mrs Siddons and Charles Kemble. Horace Twiss was called to the bar, by the Hon. Society of the Inner Temple, the 28th of June, 1811. He first practised on the Oxford circuit, and afterwards applied himself exclusively to the Courts of Equity. He also early sought fame in another path, that of literature. His lighter productions, such as "Years of Discretion," first appeared, and gained him some popularity as a wit. Frequent mention is made of him in Lord Byron's Journals in 1813 to 1815. Mr. Twiss's most important literary work was his deservedly renowned "Life of Lord Eldon." It was he who originated the plan of giving a summary of the Parliamentary speeches, which now usually precedes the leading articles of a daily newspaper. This summary, and other articles also, Mr. Twiss used himself to write for the Times. Mr. Twiss represented Wotton Basset, and, after the Reform Act, Bridport, in Parliament. His unsuccessfully contested Bury St. Edmunds in 1841 and 1847. His speeches in the House for the Catholic question, and for allowing counsel to prisoners on their trial, were much admired at the time. For a short period, Mr. Twiss was Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies. He was also a Queen's Counsel, and a Bencher of the Inner Temple. His last appointment was that of Vice-Chancellor of the county palatine of Lancaster.

Mr. Twiss died suddenly, on the 4th instant, while present at the annual meeting of the Rock Life Assurance Company, at Radley's Hotel, Blackfriars. "Had life and health," says the Chronicle, "been spared to him, he might have earned still higher distinctions, literary and professional; but we are, in all events, justified in commemorating him as a kind-hearted, honourable, and estimable man, of undoubted ability, who has left a host of friends to lament his loss, and not a single enemy to dispute his claim to the esteem and admiration of his contemporaries."

MIDDLESEX NEW PAUPER LUNATIC ASYLUM.



ON Tuesday, the first stone of a new Pauper Lunatic Asylum for the County of Middlesex was laid by his Royal Highness Prince Albert. In the presence of a very large assemblage of the nobility and leading gentlemen of the county. The site of the new building is in the hamlet of Colney Hatch, and parish of Friern Barnet, on an elevated plot of ground near the Great Northern Railway. The necessity for this additional building is proved by the fact of the Asylum at Hanwell only accommodating 1200, whereas the number of insane poor (including lunatic) exceeds, in the county of Middlesex, 2400

Early on Tuesday morning, the Marquis of Salisbury, Lord-Lieutenant of the county of Middlesex, with a large number of the county magistracy, arrived at Colney Hatch, to be in readiness to receive the Prince Consort. True to his appointment, the Prince arrived at a few minutes after twelve o'clock, attended by the Marquis of Abercorn and the Hon. A. Gordon. On arriving at the entrance of the grounds, his Royal Highness was received by the Committee and Visiting Justices, headed by Mr. B Rotch; and by the Marquis of Salisbury, at the head of the Justices of the county of Middlesex. A procession was then arranged, and moved to the platform, where a number of ladies and gentlemen had assembled. In the centre was suspended the foundation stone, sculptured with an ornamental scroll, bearing the following inscription: "This Foundation-stone was laid by Field-Marshal his Royal Highness Prince Albert, her Majesty's Consort, on the 8th of May, A.D. 1849, and in the 13th year of the reign of her most gracious Majesty. May God bless this work of charity." Then follow the names of the Committee of Visitors, and the Clerk; the Architect, Builder, and Clerk of the Works.

THE FOUNDATION-STONE.

The Prince having taken his position opposite the stone, the chairman of the visiting justices, Mr. B. Rotch, addressed his Royal Highness on the object of the institution, stating that what are formerly the horrors of lunatic asylums would be unknown there, where moral restraints only would be imposed

The Prince, in reply, expressed the pleasure he felt in taking part in the interesting proceedings of the day, and his great gratification at the advantages which the proposed institution offered to the afflicted poor of Middlesex

A glass vessel, containing the current coins of the realm, was here handed to the Prince by Mr. Fownall, and the Rev. George Hodgson Thompson having invoked the Divine blessing on the work,

Mr. Rotch presented a handsome silver trowel to the Prince, who immediately commenced his masonic labours by spreading the mortar, which operation having been completed, the stone was gradually lowered into its position. His Royal Highness then tried the level vertically and horizontally, and finding it to be correct, declared the stone to be laid.

The completion of the ceremony was greeted with loud cheers from the assembled spectators.

The Marquis of Salisbury here came forward, and said, he was desired to announce that the most generous Majesty had presented to the visiting justices a very liberal donation, to be invested and applied to the relief of those individuals who might hereafter be discharged from that asylum cured. (Loud cheers.)

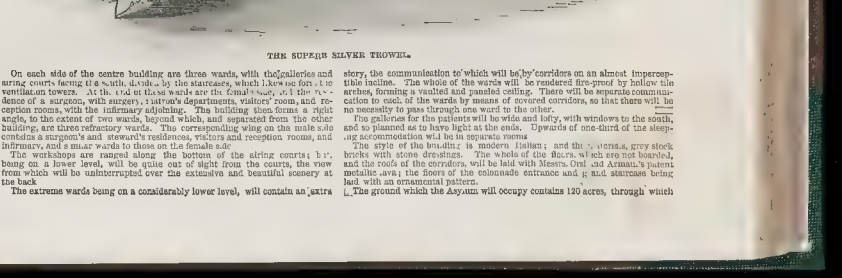
This announcement was greeted with very enthusiastic cheers from the spectators. The magistrates joined in the ebullition of feeling, and, on the hint of Mr. Rotch, the first verse of the National Anthem was sung by the company

Three cheers were subsequently given for the Queen, and three more for the Prince Consort and the Prince of Wales, after which his Royal Highness retired to the office of the clerk of the works, where an elegant luncheon, supplied by Messrs. Staples, of the Albion Tavern, was laid out; and the Prince, having partaken of coffee, drove off on his return to Buckingham Palace.

THE ASYLUM.

The building is to contain 1004 patients, namely 654 females and 480 males, and is in length 1884 ft., exclusive of workshops, wash-houses, and kitchen offices.

The centre building, which is seen in the annexed view, contains accommodation for the superintendent, housekeeper, deputy-matron, and head-nurse on the right side; and welting-room, committee-room, and rooms for the clerk, porter, and storekeeper on the left side; with the chapel in the middle, and grand staircase, over which is the cupola. Behind the chapel are the officers' dining-hall, assembly-room, school-rooms, teachers' apartments, and kitchen offices; beyond which is the washing establishment, enclosing the drying-yard.



THE SOUPER SILVER TROWEL.

On each side of the centre building are three wards, with the galleries and airing courts facing due south, divided by the staircases, which likewise form the ventilation towers. At the end of these wards are the female side, for the residence of a surgeon, with assembly, visitors' departments, visitors' room, and reception rooms, with the infirmary adjoining. The building then forms a right angle, to the extent of two wards, beyond which, and separated from the other building, are three refractory wards. The corresponding wing on the male side contains a surgeon's and steward's residences, visitors and reception rooms, and infirmary, and a similar wards to those on the female side

The workshops are ranged along the bottom of the airing courts; but, being on a lower level, will be quite out of sight from the courts, the view from which will be uninterrupted over the extensive and beautiful scenery at the back

The extreme wards being on a considerably lower level, will contain an extra story, the communication to which will be, by corridors on an almost imperceptible incline. The whole of the wards will be rendered fire-proof by hollow tile arches, forming a vaulted and panelled ceiling. There will be separate communication to each of the wards by means of covered corridors, so that there will be no necessity to pass through one ward to the other.

The style of the building is modern Italian; and the materials, grey stock bricks with stone dressings. The whole of the floors will each one board, and the roofs of the corridors, will be laid with Messrs. Ord and Arman's patent metallic lava; the floors of the colonnade entrance and grand staircase being laid with an ornamental pattern.

The ground which the Asylum will occupy contains 120 acres, through which e Great Northern Railway passes; and there will be a station to supply the Asylum with goods. The grounds in front of the Asylum up to the road will be ornamentally laid out; and the works will eventually embrace a chaplain's residence, engineer's house, lodges and farm buildings, besides gas-works.

The architect is S. W. Daukes, Esq., of Whitehall-place; and the builder is Mr. George Myers, of Belvedere-road. Head Clerk of the Works, Mr. C. J. Shoppee. The amount of the contract is £136,000.

Our view of the Asylum, from the north-west, shows part of the front, taking in the central building and one half only of the other portion, so that a faint idea may be formed of the enormous range of building the whole will present when built.

THE SILVER TROWEL,

Or rather, we should say, the piece of silver plate, given in compliment to Prince Albert at this interesting ceremonial, is represented in one of our Illustrations. The silver trowels manufactured for similar occasions being simply pieces of ornamental plate, and not used for spreading the mortar, the idea of varying the usual designs and purposes of the testimonial seems to us a very happy one. The trowels are useless, as pieces of plate, in after times, and are very often extremely questionable in point of taste in design, and therefore not altogether beautiful objects of sorts; but in the present case the piece is both an elegant and useful addition to the dessert table. It is composed of stems of vine, fastened together by their tendrils gracefully twined around them. Some small leaves upon the stems give richness and character to them, and a large leaf at the extremity serves as a kind of bowl. At the other extremity of the stems a small shield is introduced, having the arms of the county of Middlesex upon its front; at the back is the following inscription:—"Presented to H.R.H. Prince Albert, on his laying the Foundation-stone of the Middlesex Pauper Lunatic Asylum, at Colney Hatch, May 8, 1849." A crown is placed on the vine stems near the bowl. This Testimonial was made by Garrards, of the Haymarket, the design is due to Benjamin Rotch, Esq., the chairman of the committee.

ALBERT JELLACHICH AND THE SERRESHANS, OR RED-MANTLES

The prominent position which Albert Jellachich Von Buzim (the son of the Ban), at the head of the Serreshans, or Red-Mantles, has taken in the Hungarian war, will render the accompanying portraiture of immediate interest.

The Serreshans form a separate corps in the service of the military frontier of Austria, and have had, time out of mind, their peculiar duties and organisation. In them may be sought the germ of the old military inhabitants of the country; or they are probable successors of the old frontier-guard of Matthias Corvinus. They are in some measure the gendarmes of the frontier; and a small troop of them—a hundred or two hundred men—is attached to each frontier regiment. There are about a thousand of them, including a company on the Dalmatian coast: they are like bloodhounds in the pursuit of robbers and smugglers; and every officer takes some with him on his visit of inspection to his cordon. They are as well acquainted with the ground and with the people on the Turkish as on the Austrian side; know all the affairs of all their neighbours; have immediate information of any design that is set on foot on either side; and are respected and feared by friend and foe, besides being the heroes of most of the daring feats that are performed in the frequent skirmishes with the Turks. Like all borderers, the Serreshans give service without pay; it being, as the Austrians say, "robot," or feudal service. Curiously enough, their officers are called by the Turkish name of "Bassi;" the Colonel is Haram Bassi, or Upper Bassi the subalterns are Vice-Bassi.

Their very peculiar uniform has been, probably, modelled on some national costume, which has now become extinct. It consists of a close doublet, with four rows of glittering buttons, fitting like a coat of mail; and over this is red, wide cloak, with a hood, which, in rainy weather, is drawn over the head Their pantaloons are in the Hungarian fashion, very tight, of a sky blue colour and gaily embroidered. Their thick stockings are worked in coloured thread and their hair, like that of the Hungarian shepherds, is woven into thick plaits and hangs down over their ears. In their girdle they carry Turkish weapons—a yatagban and two long pistols. A cartouche-box hangs down before, and a rifle, highly ornamented in the Turkish fashion, is thrown over their shoulder Their whole dress and appearance is as picturesque and poetical as that of an ordinary peasant soldier is prosaic.

NEWSPAPER

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

"THE SIRENS."—PAINTED BY W. E. FROST, A.R.A.

WE have heard but one opinion expressed of the excellence of the present Exhibition, by people who will look neither despondingly nor too hopefully at anything—that it is an exhibition of more than average merit. Though some of the old men have lost ground, the young ones, both in excellence and number, more than supply the deficiency. It is not likely that Edwin Landseer, Leslie, Mulready, and Lee will achieve any greater triumphs in their art than they have already achieved; it is enough, perhaps, that they maintain their old reputations, and this they certainly do. It is for young men—like E. M. Ward, Frith, Egg, Creswick, Frank Grant, and others within the Academy to advance; and this, it is pleasing to find, they have done, almost beyond expectation; while it is equally to the honour and reputation of our English schools of art, that, what jockeys would call "the outsiders"—men like F. Goodall, Mjilais, Hunt, W. D. Kennedy, Collinson, Rankley, and other young men scarcely known beyond the pale of artistic circles, but well and favourably known—have advanced at a pace that leaves many competitors a long way behind, while it places them close at the heels of many who have had longer experience in contending with the difficulties of an art in which a continued and lengthened practice is of so vast an importance.

In order to do justice to the present exhibition, it is our intention to publish with our paper of the 26th inst. an entire supplement of picture illustration and criticism. Several pictures of acknowledged excellence are already in hand, and we have obtained the promise of others equally excellent. This arrangement will oblige us to postpone any detailed or lengthened criticism on the several works; but, that our country readers may keep pace with the London public, we shall endeavour to bring together, in as few words as possible, the more important pictures that distinguish the collection.

The places of honour in the Great or principal Room are occupied by Leslie's "Scene from Don Quixote;" by Turner's "Venus and Adonis" (wearing very much the look of an old master); by Herbert's "Lear and Cordelia," for the New Houses of Parliament; by Stanfield's largest and best work, his "Tilbury Fort;" by Edwin Landseer's "Free Church," and his "Forester's Family" (both small pictures); by Mulready's "Women Bathing," a kind of academy study carried out; by Webster's "Boys' Slide;" by Eastlake's beautiful study of a female head, which he calls "Helena;" by a fine picture of Mr. Egg, A.R.A.; and by one equally fine (hung as a companion), by Mr. Elmore, A.R.A. The line of portraiture includes a capital head of John Bright, M.P., by Mr. Knight, R.A.; a charming portrait in pink of Mrs. Fraser, by Dubufe, a French artist; a capital full-length portrait of Mr. Thomas Cubitt, by Pickersgill; and a large and by no means good portrait of Prince Albert, by Mr. F. R. Say.

The principal places in the Middle Room are occupied by Mr. Roberts's large picture of "The Destruction of Jerusalem;" by Mr. E. M. Wahd's "Bookseller's Shop" and "Daniel De Foe;" by Mr. Frith's only picture, but it is a fine one, "Coming of Age;" by Edwin Landseer's "Only Dogs;" by Mr. Creswick's "Passing Showers;" by Mr. F. Goodall's "Hunt the Slipper" (one of his best works, and in a new style); by "An incident from the early life of West the painter," charmingly rendered by E. M. Ward, A.R.A.; by a clever cattle piece by our English Cuyp, Mr. Sidney Cooper, of Canterbury; by Poole's "Triptich," from the "Tempest;" by Linnell's "Sandpits;" by Mr. S. Stone's "Duet;" and by four good pictures by four young men: "Lorenzo and Isabella," by Mr. Mollais; "Rienzi vowing to obtain Justice for the death of his brother," by Mr. W. H. Hunt; an interior of a church, with figures, called "Innocence and Guile," by Mr. A. Rankley; and "Italian image boys at a roadside ale-house," by Mr. J. Collinson.

In the West Room the eye is arrested and detained by one of Mr. Denby's most exquisite effects of morning light—(he was never greater); by one of Mr. Martin's blue expanses; by one of Mr. Linnell's scriptural landscapes; by Mr.

"BENJAMIN WEST'S FIRST EFFORT IN ART."—PAINTED BY E. M. WARD, A.R.A.

Herbert's "Outcast of the People;" by Mr. Kennedy's "Happy Hours—Italy as it Was;" by two of the best Portraits in the Exhibition, Mr. F. Grant's "Marquis of Granby," and Mr. Watson Gordon's three-quarter portait of "Principal Lee." A "Moonlight Scene off the Receivers," by Clarkson Stanfield, and an "Evening Scene in the Highlands," by Edwin Landseer, add to the varied interest of the room.

As yet we have done little more than look into the Octagon Room, where forty-one pictures are rather concealed than seen. It is never a pleasing task to criticise the works of men who are struggling into reputation, and stand in need of every assistance which a good position can give them; but who are, unfortunately, by ill luck or ill favour, doomed to be exhibited where they lose the common advantages which all require.

Sir William Ross and Mr. Thorburn maintain their supremacy among the miniatures; and in the Architectural Room, certainly the most striking and instructive drawing is Mr. Cockerell's "Professor's Dream," in which he has grouped with great skill, and beauty, and effect, all the glories of architecture, from the Pyramids and St. Peter's, at Rome, to the steeple of Bow Church, and the interior of St. Stephen's, Walbrook.

In the Sculpture Room, the central position is taken up by Mr. Bally's marble group of "The Graces." Mr. W. C. Marshall contributes his marble statue of Campbell, the poet; and Mr. Milnes his marble bust of Sir William Allen. Young Mr. Westmacott, the R.A. elect, has sent a couple of busts; while Mr Thomas, of the Houses of Parliament, contributes a "Musidora," and Mr. Wyatt, of Rome, "A Nymph of Diana leading home from a greyhound's foot."

We cannot close this brief notice of the Exhibition without expressing a regret very generally felt, that an artist of the fertile fancy and dexterous pencil of Mr. Maclise has abstained from sending even a single picture to adorn the walls. He is busy, we are told, at the House of Lords, and with Mr. Pete's princely commission; so that in another year we may have him even stronger than he has yet been.

That our readers, however, may not complain of waiting on this occasion, we have had two of the smallest and finest pictures reserved for our present Number. "The Syrens" of Mr. Frost, A.R.A., is one of those Comus creations for which this painter is so deservedly famed. It is altogether a lovely composition, warmly and delicately coloured, and full of the purity of the Art, without the insipidity of the late Mr. Howard. This is Mr. Frost's single contribution to the present exhibition. The finishing is most admirable!

Mr. E. M. Ward's small picture is called "Benjamin West Painting his First Picture in Art," and represents an incident most pleasingly related by Allan Cunningham in his "Lives of the Painters." It is said, when a boy, West was placed with a fly-flap in his hand to watch the sleeping infant of his eldest sister, while his mother gathered flowers in the garden. As he sat by the cradle, the child smiled in sleep; he was struck with its beauty, and seeking some paper drew the portrait in red and black ink. He had never seen a picture, it is said, at the time, not even an engraving. There is, we observe in the same room with Mr. Ward's picture, which is another thoroughly pleasing picture of the same subject, by Mr. Cumpton, but in every respect very inferior to Mr Ward's happy composition. Mr. Gibbons, of the Regent's Park, has had the good taste to secure Mr Ward's picture, which is another thoroughly, we may observe, with that quantity of finish so usual with this painter; while, as our readers will see by our Engraving, the incident is told in that manner which does not want words to make it intelligible.

MUSIC.

CONCERTS.

ROYAL CONCERTS.—There have been two concerts at Buckingham Palace this week. The first was on Monday night, when her Majesty's private band, directed by Mr Anderson, played the "Zauberflöte" overture. Herr Joachim and Herr Ernst performed violin solos, and Herr Krauss a notturno on the piano. The vocalists were Mdlle. Jetty de Treffz, Mdlle. Bubrieg, and Signor Sdgioli, a tenor. Mrs. Anderson accompanied the vocal pieces on the piano. On Wednesday night, at the second concert, M. Costa conducted. The vocalists were, Mdlle. Jenny Lind, Mdlle. Angri, and Mdlle. Parodi, Signor Mario, Tamburini, and Lablache. For the third concert, in June, Grisi and Lablache, Mario, Gardoni, and Lablache, are engaged.

The first grand Morning Concert of the season, at the Royal Italian Opera-House, took place on Tuesday, and was well attended. The first part of the scheme consisted of Rossini's fine work, the "Stabat Mater," beautifully executed, Mario singing the "Cujus animam;" Corbari and Angri the duo "Quis est homo;" Tamburini the recitative and "Eia mater;" and Persiani, with great power, the "Inflammatus." The quartet, without accompaniment, "Quando corpus," sung by Grisi, Angri, Mario, and Tamburini, was encored; it was a perfect specimen of part singing. The second part of the concert comprised Weber's "Oberon" overture; and the overture, scherzo, and wedding march from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" (admirably executed by Costa, band), and a miscellaneous selection, in which Miss Hayes received an encore for her brilliant singing of the polacca, "Oh! luce di quest' anima," and Mario for his famed serenade, "Com' è gentil." An apology was made for the absence (from indisposition) of Ronconi and Marini—Tamburini singing with great effect their two airs, "Largo al factotum" and "Non più andrai." Massoi sang with great spirit the air from the "Favorita," "Vieni Leonora," and the popular duet from "Masaniello," "O amor di patria," with Salvi. Grisi and Angri sang the "Semiramide" duo; and Miss Hayes and Mdlle. Marie their "Linda" duet. Lastly, Costa conducted Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," "Ein vain l'espère;" and Mdlle. Angri with vivacity "Una voce:" and all the above artistes, including Tagliafico and Polonini, were combined in Palestrina's chorus "Gloria in excelsis," a very attractive finale to entertainment. The next morning concert will be on Wednesday, the 30th inst.

The annual concert in aid of the funds of the Royal Society of Female Musicians, established in 1838, for the relief of its aged members, took place on Monday night, at the Hanover Rooms. Benedict and Mr. W. S. Bennett were the conductors, and Mr. H. Blagrove the leader. The vocalists were Mdlle. Henriette de Treffz, Mrs. Alexander Newton, Mrs. Williams, Bassano, Dolby, Mrs. Noble, and Mdme. F. Lablache; Messrs. Machin, Whitworth, and C. Braham, and Signor Marras. Miss Deakin, a pupil of Mrs. A. Shaw, made a very favourable impression by her singing of Spohr's "Rose softly blooming." Miss Kate Loder played Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Rondo in B minor, and was much applauded. Two new professors—M. F. Cossman, a violoncellist, and Herr Florshuim, a violinist—made their first appearances on this occasion, and proved themselves to be accomplished performers. There are three societies for musicians—the Royal Society of Musicians, the Royal Society of Female Musicians, and the Choral Fund; but it is a pity that the three institutions are not combined, so as to include everybody in the musical profession within their scope

On Tuesday Miss Dolby and Mr. Lindsay Sloper gave their Annual Morning Concert at the Hanover-square Rooms. Mr. Sloper performed Mozart's pianoforte concerto in C minor with a classic perception of the composer's intentions, and with a delicate touch and refined style. The rondo brillante in E flat major of Mendelssohn was also nicely executed by the clever pianist. Herr Joachim, as a boy violinist, created such a sensation in the musical circles, has returned a most excellent executant. He performed Spohr's "Scena Cantante" with the finest effect. He was warmly welcomed and immensely applauded. Mr. Bernhard Benedict was the conductor, and Mr. Willy the leader of a band, which played Cherubini's "Faniska" and Mr. Bennett's "Wood Nymphs." Miss Dolby sang Mr. W. H. Holmes's beautiful scena of the "Blind Flower's Girl," exquisitely, and she also sang Mendelssohn's Rosani, and Mr Sloper in charming style. Miss Lucombe and Mr. Reeves were the other leading singers

The second concert of the Royal Academy of Music was given on Wednesday, when a symphony by W. Layland, a canzonet by H. C. Banister, and a solo by Von Holst, all three pupils of the institution, were performed. Mr. Owen played a clarionet solo, Mr. Simmons a violin concerto, and Miss Watkins and Mr. T. C. Eales pianoforte solos. The vocalists were Misses Taylor, H. Ward, Owen, L. Baxter, the Misses Rosina, and Messrs. Swift, Bayliss, and Wallworth. Mr. Lucas was the conductor. Mr. Sainton princeps violin

MUSICAL EVENTS.—The extraordinary violin playing of Mdlle. Wilhelmina Neruda, a child artiste, at the Princess' Theatre, is exciting the admiration of amateurs. She executes the "Carnival of Venice," by Ernst, with marvellous skill. She is accompanied by her sister a pianiste, and brother a violoncellist—both remarkable children also.—The seventh and last concert for the season of the Choral Harmonists, an amateur society which has introduced much good music into this country, took place on Monday, at the London Tavern. The Castilian Society has revived Handel's oratorio, "Theodora."—Sir H. R. Bishop has commenced at the Whittington Club a series of four lectures on the scientific principles of harmony, with vocal illustrations.—At the fourth concert of the Beckhsath Classical Concerts, conducted by Mr. Henry Wylde, Thalberg and Jarret played pianoforte and horn solos; and the Misses Pyne and Mr. Reeves were the vocalists.—The fourth concert of the Amateur Society, conducted by Mr. Surman, has given a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Miss Lucombe taking the principal soprano music, and Miss Dolby the contralto part; Mr. Donald King, Mr. Lawler, Mr. Walker, Mr. Hesh, Mr. R. Smith, and Mr. Nobio being the other vocalists.—M. Rosellen, we regret to learn, owing to unforeseen difficulties, has been obliged to abandon the series of Beethoven performances this season.—Sainton gave a concert on Wednesday at Willis's Rooms, at which locality Mr. John Parry, on Monday, repeated his amusing entertainment.—A concert of sacred music will be given on this Monday, the fourth meeting of the Musical Union on Tuesday, and the sixth concert of the Amateur Society on Wednesday.—Mr Stammers begins a fresh series of the London Wednesday Concerts on the 16th inst.—The annual concert of the excellent institution, the Choral Fund, will take place next Friday, on which day Mdlle. Speyer will give a soirée musicale.—The next performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," conducted by Costa, will be at Exeter Hall on Friday, the 18th inst.—On Monday next Strauss and his orchestra will perform at a concert at Exeter Hall, at cheap prices. There will be vocalists at this concert, which is by the desire of the Lord Mayor, to be given on the Monday, the daughter of the celebrated author of the Logier system, has been giving two subscription concerts in Dublin, at which she performed pianoforte compositions of Haydn. Mrs. Allen was assisted in the schemes by Miss Allen, Miss Theodosia, Miss Louise, Miss Thomasine, and Miss Frederica—her daughters.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.—On the 14th ult., a new opera in four acts, entitled "Tony, oder die Vergeltung" ("The Revenge"), composed by the reigning Duke of Saxe-Coburg Gotha (brother of the Royal Highness Prince Albert), was produced with signal success. The score is described by the German critics to be elegantly instrumented, and full of charming melodies. The romance of the baritone, in the first act, the cavatina for the soprano, in the third act; a charming quatuor (a canon), and a delightful styrienne, are quoted as the most remarkable pieces, which are likely to be as popular in the chamber as on the stage. Mdlles. Agthe and Haller, and Herr Heder, Mülle, and Götze, were the principal singers. The renowned Liszt, the pianist, conducted the performance: he is chapel master to the Duke of Saxe-Weimar.——Meyerbeer's "Prophète" has reached the fourth representation at the Parisian Grand Opera, and increases nightly in popularity.——Mdme. Persiani and Mdlle. Alboni have been singing and playing at the principal towns in the south of France with immense success, and arrived down this month at Marseilles. The President of the French Republic conferred on Meyerbeer, the composer of "Robert le Diable," "Les Huguenots," and "Le Prophète," the rank of Commander of the Legion of Honour on the 3d inst.——The twenty-second season of the famed Conservatoire Concerts has just been terminated. The novelties have been a symphony by a lady composer, Madame Farrene, and the gleanings from Berlioz's "Faust" hitherto confined to living and native talent by the society. At the last concert a chœur des sylphes and a marche des jeunes filles étapes, excised from Meyerbeer's "Prophète," owing to its length, were performed. Madame Viardot, Madame Castellan, and M. Roger sang at this last concert.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The last performance this season of Mendelssohn's ever popular and attractive "Elijah," under the direction of Mr. Costa, will take place on Friday next, the 18th inst.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S

On Saturday, Mdlle. Jenny Lind repeated the character of Amina, in "La Somnambula;" on Tuesday, Marta, in "La Figlia del Reggimento," and on Thursday, Alice, in "Roberto il Diavolo," this being the last of the six performances given in lieu of the Six Classical Concerts. On each evening Her Majesty's Theatre was crowded to an overflow; and Mdlle. Lind was received with the highest enthusiasm, ovations of bouquets, and the most unbounded tokens of ecstatic admiration

In "La Sonnambula," on Saturday evening, Signor Calzolari, as Elvino, confirmed the highly favourable anticipations created by his first appearance. Signor Belotti, as the Count, was also very successful.

In justice to another artiste, we should state that the powerfully effective scene from the new ballet of "Electra," engraved in our Journal of last week, is painted by Mr. Marshall, whose name, as displayed in the scenic department of this theatre, entitle him to foremost rank in his art.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday night Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia" was given for the second time. Marini having made his début this season, resumed his original part in the prologue, which was encored, his voice towering above band and chorus like a monster upbuilding. Grisi was in magnificent voice, and acted and sang Lucrezia with her usual vocal and histrionic supremacy in this character. Mario performed the dying scene admirably; its astonishing the progress this great tenor is making every year as an actor. Angri gained the encore honours in the "Brindisi;" but the compliment was not so honourably earned as her inimitable acting of the part of Orsini, her by-play in which raises that part to prominent importance. The trio of the poisoning scene between Grisi, Mario, and Tamburini was demanded twice.

On Tuesday, Rossini's "Semiramide" was performed. It was the third time Mdlle. Angri appeared as Arsace; and although she was labouring under a slight hoarseness, she fully sustained the fame she has acquired in the youthful warrior. Her energy is untiring: in the long and trying duos and concerted pieces, she exerts herself as strenuously as in her cavatinas. She is evidently an enthusiastic, painstaking, and conscientious singer, and by her exertions and intelligence developed novel points in Arsace. Her share in the execution of the quatuor in the finale of the first act was quite an original and powerfully effective reading The "Giorno d'orrore," between Grisi and Angri, was rapturously encored. The duo was in splendid voice, and acted with astonishing force and grandeur

For the extra night, on Thursday, "Lucrezia Borgia" was given for the third time, with the second and third acts of "Masaniello."

Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable" is to be produced for the first time at this establishment this evening (Saturday), with Miss Hayes, Mdlle. Grisi, Madame Bellini, Signori Salvi, Mei, Soldi, Tagliafico, Massoi, Polonini, Rache, Rommy, Levia, Tolamo, Ref, and Marini, in the cast. For the scene of the resuscitation of the nuns, Mdlle. Walther being the Abbess, and for which Gruneo, it is stated, has prepared some new dim-magic effects, upwards of 100 dansenses are engaged.

Madame Persiani, retiring from the stage, will appear for a limited number of nights, in the part of Norma. Grisi will take place on Thursday next, when she will perform her popular part of Zerlina, in Mozart's immortal "Don Giovanni" Marini appears for the first time as Leporello, and Mario and Mdlle. Corbari, Tagliafico, Polonini, Tamburini, and Marco will resume their original parts.

GERMAN OPERA.

On Wednesday, the German company from Amsterdam, strengthened by the additional engagements of Herr Pischek, from Vienna, and the celebrated baritone, Pischek, from Stuttgardt, commenced a series of performances at Drury Lane Theatre. Nothing could be more unfortunate as to the selection of Auradieu Lortzing's "Night in Grenada" for the opening opera on Wednesday. It is the dullest work ever endured by mortal ears. "Das Nachtlager zu Grenada" ("A Night in Grenada") is the name under which it is said, to have been performed in Berlin, in 1834, and has had not only an extraordinary run in that capital but throughout Germany. The secret of its popularity has always been a mystery to us. The libel is singularly devoid of merit, and the music serves to prove that there is no longing to a shepherdess, Gabrielle (the losing of which dove is made the subject of a long and tiresome duo). She avows to the hunter her affection for Gomez, and hospitality is extended to the stranger in the ruins of an old castle, by the latter castle. The tedium of the night is relieved by three shepherds resolving to murder the hunter, whose life is saved by the timely warning of Gabrielle, and who in gratitude, and the belief of an affection for her false shepherdess, gives her Gomez in marriage, for the hunter is no less a personage than the Prince Regent of Spain, a scion of the house of Hapsburgh, when Austria ruled in Grenada. The gems are few, and the long recitatives, snatches of airs and duos, here and there relieved only by an effective concerted piece

The general execution of the work was careful and precise. The choruses are decidedly the most agreeable portion of the entertainment. The part-singing is admirable, and the expression of the sentiments beyond all praise. The orchestra is not by any means first-rate—in tone it is brassy, and the obligato bits, whether done by the stringed instruments, or the wood or brass bands, were neither remarkable for delicate execution nor fine intonation. The first violin in the obligato to Pischek's scenes in the first act was distressingly out of tune, and discomfited the singer sadly. Madame Marlow, the prima donna, beyond some remarkably upper notes, exhibited only an exaggerated method and exuberant action. The tenor, Erl, has a very disagreeable head voice. Pischek who, as a concert singer, has gained such glory in this country, disappointed us in his action. He walked the stage, and handled his gun, and wielded his sword with the awkwardness of a novice. He was labouring under hoarseness, to which may be ascribed the failure of the great scena in which the hunter is about to be attacked; but in the first act he sang with great spirit, a hunting song. He was most cordially greeted by the audience. The choruses in the first act were deservedly encored; and a trio in the last act is of great beauty, but it is very badly placed by the author of the libretto. Madame Marlow, Herr Erl, and Pischek were called before the curtain at the close of the opera; but, the sooner some other work is mounted, the better chance will the speculation have of success.

At the MARYLEBONE, the French play of "Virginie" (which Mdlle. Rachel introduced to the London public at the St. James's Theatre, some three years ago) has been very cleverly done into English by Mr. John Oxenford, the most versatile of our dramatists, producing the broadest farce and the most poetical drama with equal tact and success. There is something in the nature of the story of Virginia—that is to say the human girl, and not the conception of Paul Veronese, especially suits the Marylebone public; and the declamatory scenes between Virginius and his daughter, and the downfall of the wicked Appius, elicit thunders of applause. The principal characters are exceedingly well played by Mrs. Stirling, Mr. Davenport, and Mr Johnston; and their exertions, aided by some superb classical costumes and correct decorations, ensure the success of the piece.

One of those gorgeous pantomimes which the Olympic Theatre, from its earliest existence, been celebrated, was produced at the ADELPHI, on Wednesday evening, under the name of "The Devil's Violin," being, as we have before stated, an adaptation of Gounod's Faust and Marguerite. Our friends at St. Lo gained such honours in Paris. The old story of the evil one appearing to Tartini and playing the far-famed "Devil's Sonata," is well known; and this has been had hold of by the dramatist as the groundwork of his piece. The devil, how ever, gives him, Tartini (Miss Woolgar), a charmed violin, and by its magic music he wins the heart of Helena (Miss Celeste), but upon the usual conditions attached to such kind of presents—the surrender of his own soul. At a dangerous moment Freny Tuck (Mr. Paul Bedford) presents Tartini with another violin of less penetrable origin, and after that we lose the fortune of the story altogether. It, however, appears to terminate to the satisfaction of everybody but the Devil himself. Some of the loveliest effects we have for some time witnessed are introduced throughout the piece. The grand floral scene at the end, in which the flowers are animated, and revolt against the Gardener (Mr. Wright), being superior to anything o yet attempted, even at the Adelphi. The dance of the ribbons at the end of the first act was also very effective, and elicited loud applause.

KING'S COLLEGE HOSPITAL.—The Right Honourable the Earl of Carlisle has signified his intention of presiding this evening (Saturday) over the tenth anniversary dinner of this charity, which is to be held in the great room, the Freemasons' Tavern. The noble Earl's name is supported by a very numerous list of stewards, including the Premier, and several distinguished members of both Houses of Parliament.

ROYAL SOCIETY FOR THE PROTECTION OF LIFE FROM FIRE.—The anniversary meeting of this institution will be held in the Council Chamber of the Guildhall on Monday next; the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor in the chair, when the society's medallions and other rewards will be presented to several individuals for their intrepidity in saving life from fire during the past year. The various kinds of "Fire Escapes" built for the society will be exhibited after the meeting.

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY COMPANY.

The Eastern Counties Investigation Committee have issued a reply to the observations of the directors on their recent report. They point out that while the directors admit in general terms the truth of the charges brought against them, an attempt is made to represent that there has been great ex aggeration in stating the sum improperly placed to capital account to be £320,575, and in the mode of treating the traffic accounts of the last half-year; and, as it is upon their accuracy that the vital question of future dividend hangs, the committee feel that no misconception must be permitted. It is remarked that the objections taken by the directors to the charge of the committee regarding the £320,573 are that in respect of £84,000 for interest the placing it to capital is defensible (although the grounds of defence are omitted), and that all other railways have adopted the same practice; that in respect of £190,000 connected with rolling stock, it also properly comes under the same head; and, lastly, that the complaint of the committee should have been that no depreciation fund had been formed out of revenue during the period.

In answer, it is stated that the £84,000 for interest formed no part of the £320,573; and that, even if it had, the practice of all other railways would not necessarily justify a departure from the usual management of mercantile affairs. Next, that, upon a most careful re-investigation, the committee have satisfied themselves that the £.00,000 connected with rolling stock consists of disbursements, not for the establishment of the railway, but for its constant working, and that it must, therefore, be placed to revenue. And, lastly, that the remark of the directors about the formation of a depreciation fund, is a kind of truism in the shape of an attempted formal disinfection, without any practical bearing on the case.

With regard to the accounts for the past half-year, the committee go over each item of difference between themselves and the directors, maintaining their original views, and showing that, although, as they stated in their report, it would, perhaps, not have been necessary that the sum of £64,475, required for renewal of stock, &c., should all have been debited to the revenue account of the past half-year, if the affairs of the company had been properly kept; yet, with the facts before them, that, until now, no fund has been set apart either for renewal of stock or permanent way, and that, according to the estimate of the resident engineer, made previously to the investigation, the expense of renewing the sleepers alone during this and the next four years will amount to £246,000, or £49,289 per annum, they can recommend no other course.

In conclusion, the committee show the nominal assets of the company to be £4,254,979, which they do not expect more than half will be realised, and that not immediately, while the liabilities are £415,856, of which £312,561 are "immediate and pressing." There are also bonds fall ng due in 1849, for £171,300, and at various subsequent periods for £1,260,979, besides annuities connected with Wisbeach Harbour, &c., of £150,000, and in addition to these assets, large debts for work done "of which no accounts can be obtained until the whole are adjusted." "If, then," it is clearly announced, "the proposed dividend be paid, it must be replaced by borrowed money, and will therefore to be paid out of capital," and the committee accordingly appeal to the proprietors whether they will thus add to their liabilities and perpetuate the system which has brought them to their present state.

RESIGNATION OF THE DIRECTORS.

The adjourned half-yearly meeting of the shareholders of this company was held on Thursday last, at the London Tavern, to receive the report of the committee of investigation; Mr Waddington, M.P., in the chair—who, on entering the room, was received with the loudest groans, which lasted for a considerable time

The Secretary having read the advertisement convening the meeting,

The Chairman, amid much uproar and interruption, said he was at his post to redeem the pledge he had made at the last meeting, and he called upon them to conduct themselves as men of business, and listen to the explanations he was about to give them, as he had the most sincere desire to promote their interests. Their first business was with the members of the committee of investigation; and after they had heard them they could make any observations they thought proper. He would now call upon them to produce their report.

Mr Cash (chairman of the committee of investigation) proceeded to move that the report of the committee be received and adopted. Also, to sanction the agreement of the amalgamation of the Norfolk line, and that no dividend should now be paid; that the capital account should be closed as soon as possible; and, lastly, that the strictest economy should be observed in every department. The committee were unanimous in the recommendation of the amalgamation of the Norfolk line. He alluded to the sum of £7600, but this he added was about to be brought before the House of Commons. He urged most strongly the non-payment of any dividend, and trusted that they would shortly introduce a system which would satisfy the public.

Mr. Meek (of Lynn), a member of the committee, entered into a long discussion on the policy of the amalgamation of the Norfolk line. He said, a contract had been fairly entered into, and ought and must be completed. He next alluded to payment of dividend, which he most strongly opposed, and gave the committee's reasons for their recommending that no dividend should be paid. He had hoped that the committee would have been enabled to have given a full statement of the capital account, but they had been prevented. They had had to be a most strict and searching inquiry into the many mysterious and indirect means that had been used in the affairs of the company. He alluded to the sum of £2000 paid to Mr. Waddington as being altogether most unjustifiable; and also to the fact that Mr. Hudson and Mr. Waddington had actually received £20 a share premium on 250 shares of the Wisbeach line, although they had never had any shares allotted to them. He again urged them to have the courage to refuse the dividend, and then they might look forward to a return of that property in this company which nothing but a sound management of its affairs could produce.

Mr. Waddington replied, amidst continued uproar, at considerable length, stating that his reply which the directors had published to the statement of the committee had triumphantly shown that there was really a profit on the half-year of £105,000—(cries of "No, no!")—and that, therefore, they would be justified in paying a dividend of 8s per share, which would leave a balance for depreciation fund, which, he contended, would be amply sufficient. The hon. gentleman then defended his conduct with regard to the receipt of the £2000 voted to him for his exertions on the extension contests; and, with regard to the amount received by himself and Mr. Hudson, on account of the Wisbeach shares, they did so believing those shares to have been allotted to them on their application. (Oh, oh!) He trusted that in any future inquiries the committee would allow him to be present, to put such questions to the witnesses as he might think requisite to defend his character, and, if necessary, to produce other witnesses. (Hear, hear.) In conclusion he deprecated the continuance of agitation, and recommended that any further inquiry should be conducted by directors in whom the company had confidence. (Cheers and uproar.)

Mr. M'Murrin moved, as an amendment on the resolution, that a dividend of 4s per share should be declared.

Mr. Wyse seconded the amendment.

A long and most disorderly discussion ensued, the uproar being so great at some times as to prevent a single word being heard by the shareholders. Ultimately, Mr. Pryer was requested to withdraw the resolution, which was seconded by Mr. Box, that that portion of the report which recommended the carrying out the amalgamation of the Eastern Counties Company with the Norfolk Company be not adopted.

A vote being taken, both the amendments were declared lost, and the report of the committee adopted by a large majority, the announcement of the result being received with the loudest cheering. A ballot was then taken for and on the motion of Mr. Pryer, another scene of uproar took place, which resulted in the chairman declaring that the ballot would take place from six to ten that evening, ten to four the next day, and ten to four on Saturday, to which time the meeting stood adjourned.

The chairman then announced that the whole of the directors tendered their resignation, and only held office until their successors were appointed. (Loud cheers)

The directors then left the room, amidst the loudest groans, yells, and hisses.

Mr. Meek having taken the chair, it was resolved to appoint a committee of shareholders, to co-operate with the committee of investigation in selecting proper gentlemen for the direction; and the meeting, which throughout was of the most disorderly description, separated.

EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY SHAREHOLDERS' PROTECTION ASSOCIATION.

At a meeting of the members of this body held on Tuesday at the White Hart Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, a series of resolutions was passed, in which the report of the committee of investigation was characterised as an able and luminous report, and ordered to be entered on the minutes, and the thanks of the meeting were given to the committee for the zeal and ability which were manifested by them in eliciting the important facts contained in their report. An utter want of confidence in any and all of the present directors of the Eastern Counties Railway was declared; they were called on to resign their places with as little delay as possible and a confident belief was expressed that among the shareholders competent persons might be found to fill their offices. The opinion of the meeting was also declared to be in favour of a reduction of the number of directors of the company, and that the directors of the Eastern and Northern line should not receive more than the £1000 a year allowed them by the act of amalgamation. The practice which had obtained of directors participating in railway contracts was also censured, and the immediate removal of the solicitor of the company, in consequence of his complicity with the proceedings of the directors, was recommended. The withdrawal of the bill for the amalgamation with the Norfolk line was also strongly recommended; and the declaration of a dividend of 4s. 8d. by the directors, instead of the sum which the state of the accounts warranted, namely, 8s. 8d., was censured. A petition to the House of Commons, praying for inquiry into the conduct of such members of the House as were connected with the clandestine proceedings of the Eastern Counties Railway board of direction, was then adopted, and numerously signed by the shareholders present. A committee having been appointed for the purpose of selecting fit and proper persons to fill the present vacancies on the directory, and any which may hereafter occur, the meeting separated.

LORD BROUGHAM'S RAILWAY RETURNS.—The following are the important returns which have been ordered by the House of Lords on the motion of Lord Brougham:—"Ordered, By the Lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled, that there be laid before this House—Returns of the share capital of every railway in the United Kingdom: also, the capital authorised to be raised by their acts of Parliament; also, the number of shares issued and allotted to each director, commissioner, or other persons connected with the company; also, amount of each share; also, number of shares reserved, and for what purpose, and how disposed of, and to whom; also, when the calls on such shares became due; also, when received; also, the capital of moneys raised by each railway in the United Kingdom on loan or on the security of their debentures, or otherwise; also, when such debentures were issued; also, date of Act of Parliament sanctioning such issue of debentures; also, amount of such debentures; also, rate of interest paid to the lenders, and any other terms agreed on for the purpose of raising money; also, term for which such loan was made; also, commission or other sum paid by the railway companies to the broker or agent for obtaining loans on the security of debentures, or otherwise; also, cost of construction of each railway and each branch railway, exclusive of land purchases, Parliamentary expenses, and law charges; also, law charges, and stating whether taxed or not; also, money expended in purchases of land and property, dist nguishing the expenses and charges from the price of the land; also, Parliamentary expenses; also, engineer's charges; also, cost of railway plant; also, amount entered in each year's printed account for depreciation of plant; also, total annual receipts from passengers or goods from the first opening of any portion of the railway; also, total annual expenditure contingent upon the working of the railway, exclusive of the interest paid to the debenture-holders and others; also, mode by which the fixed dividends which have been paid to the various shareholders were ascertained; also, the sums made by each railway company to any other railway or person, to whom, and when, at what rate of interest, and when repaid; also, amounts of subscription paid and agreed to be paid, and guarantees given or agreed to be given, of capital or interest, by any railway company or person to any other railway company or person; when paid or given, or agreed upon, and for what purpose; of whom the shares were taken, and, also, the date of any Act of Parliament, or the powers and authorities of every railway company to subscribe to, or hold shares or interest in, any other railway company, and to what extent. JOHN GEORGE SHAW LEFEVRE, Dep. Chr. Parliament."

NATIONAL SPORTS.

In order that the betting fraternity may devote their whole attention to "comparing" and "squaring" their books on the two great events to come off on the 23rd and 25th inst. at Epsom, the magnates of the turf have wisely determined on keeping next week open, spending Saturday, as usual, in quiet retirement, or preparation, and we have no doubt will lead to some highly important changes in the positions of the favourites. At present, Lord Eglinton's formidable pair, the Flying Dutchman and Elthorne, are in high and general favour, and deservedly so, for not only have they strong public recommendations, but—at least as far as the noble Lord and his servants are concerned—they are certain to run "on the square." Surplice and Valiant are also being fancied in many quarters, and it seems probable that one of the Irish lot will, coûte que coûte, be made a "rattling" favourite: one of them—Chatterer—has joined the Derby lot; if he be as good as he is big, the Derby is over.

The second Spring Meeting at Newmarket showed the usual average of sport, but following so closely after the exciting week at Chester, was a dull affair. The weather was unfavourable

COUNTRY NEWS.

DISGRACEFUL OUTRAGE IN A CHURCH.—The parish of Fen Ditton about two miles from Cambridge, was, on Sunday last, the scene of one of the most abominable outrages upon religion, decency, and law, it has ever been our misfortune to record. It seems that some time since a man, named Smith, occupying the position of a gardener in the family of the Rev. Mr. James, fell under the sentence of the Arches Court, for a wilful defamation of Mrs. James, and he was in consequence condemned by Sir Herbert Jenner Fust to do penance in the parish church, on Sunday, May 6th. This becoming known amongst the lawless and disreputable inhabitants of the district, the church at an early hour was crowded to excess in every part; and ribald jokes, and conduct intolerable in a low theatre, marked the general behaviour of the people. When Smith made his appearance, shouts and cheers resounded through the sacred building. An attempt was made by the Rev. Mr. Small, of Emmanuel College, to read the service; but the noise was so great, and the conduct of the people so infamous —some actually smoking pipes in various parts of the crowded edifice—that portions were purposely omitted. As the time approached for the reading of the remainder by Smith, the excitement increased, until it broke forth in the indiscriminate hurling of bassocks, cushions, and other available missiles, and subsequently one of the very pews themselves, which were broken up by the savage crowd, and thrown at the officiating clergyman and at the rector's pew, in which the reverend gentleman and his defamed wife were then sitting. Smith read his recantation to the Rev. Mr. Small, who, although standing near him, must, in consequence of the noise, have had considerable difficulty in hearing it. The brutal crowd then adjourned to a public-house, and spent the remainder of the day in drinking.

GREAT FIRE IN GLASGOW.—On Sunday last, a fire broke out in the sugar-refining premises of Messrs. Wainwright and Co., Washington-street, Glasgow. The fire, which soon destroyed the premises of Messrs. Wainwright, afterwards communicated with various buildings adjacent, which were all destroyed. The flames then seized the Anderston Chapel-of-Ease in Clyde-street, which was burned to the ground. They afterwards continued their work with the large soap and candle works of Messrs. C. Boyd and Son, then crossed the street, and attacked the boiler manufactory of Mr. Barr, the wood-yard of Mr. Marshall, and the stabling and yard of Mr. Hutchinson. These premises were also completely destroyed. The value of the property destroyed cannot be estimated at much under £50,000, but the whole was insured.

RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF SOUTH NORTHUMBERLAND.—Ill health has induced Mr. Bell, M.P., to intimate his intention to resign his seat in Parliament. The state of the register is said to be favourable to the Liberal party, but no candidate has yet been named. Mr. Bell, who retires, is a Conservative, and voted for agricultural protection. He was elected for Northumberland in 1826, and again in 1830. At the election in 1831 he was beaten, but in the following year was again successful, and has retained his seat ever since.

GREAT SALE OF SHORT-HORNED CATTLE.—The entire herd of short-horns belonging to Sir Charles Tempest, of Broughton Hall, in the rich grazing district of Craven, was recently sold by auction, by Mr. Wetherell, of York, on the premises contiguous to the hall. The great attention which Sir Charles has bestowed on the breeding of cattle, and the fact that he had twice obtained the gold medal at the Smithfield Club, rendered this sale attractive to a large number of gentlemen. There were 86 lots announced for sale, but 78 was the number actually offered and sold, one of the animals being lame and another dead. The sum they realised was 2320 guineas. The bull, considering their breeding, were thought to have been sold very low; but, as the sale advanced towards the close, the biddings became more spirited.

The guardians of the Gainsborough Union have issued a printed notice to discountenance the practice of indiscriminate almsgiving, which, they contend, is not charity. It encourages mendicity to an alarming extent in the country.

MR. MANN, the Secretary of the Leeds Waterworks Company, who had been charged with having embezzled a large sum of money belonging to the company, has been discharged from custody, the magistrates having dismissed the case as not proven.

MR. HUDSON'S BROTHER-IN-LAW DROWNED AT YORK.—The citizens of York were astounded on Wednesday morning by the information that during the previous night the body of Mr. Nicholson had been found in the river Ouse. Deceased was a director and auditor of the York and North Midland Railway; he was also brother-in-law to Mr. Hudson, and took a deep interest in every thing connected with the York railways, and it is said had a very large investment in them. He was in the gardens of the Yorkshire Museum during the evening previous to his death, and about half-past 10 o'clock his body was discovered in the waters of the Ouse, near to the esplanade, and not very far from his own residence at Clifton. When the body was brought to the shore, signs of life were apparent, but he died before medical assistance could be procured. His remains were conveyed to his own house. Mr. Nicholson was formerly the co-partner of Mr. Hudson, as drapers, in York. He was a bachelor, and was an active and liberal patron of the fine arts. His collection of paintings was valuable, and included many of Etty's best productions.—On Wednesday afternoon an inquest was held, when the jury returned a verdict of "Found drowned."

SACRILEGE AT KEW CHURCH.—On Tuesday, two persons were brought down from London to Richmond, on a charge of sacrilegiously breaking into the parish church of Kew, and stealing therefrom an iron chest, containing the parish registers, extending over a period of 150 years or more. The robbery took place on the night of the 22d of February, 1840, or early on the following morning, and was effected by picking the church-door lock. The chest—which was not fixed, and had a ring at each end, and did not weigh more than a hundred weight and a half—was carried away, and nothing more was heard respecting it until very recently, although on one or two occasions letters were received by the late Edward Scard, Esq., the perpetual churchwarden, announcing that, if a handsome reward was offered, and no questions asked, the parish registers and deeds would be restored unmurmured. Amongst the documents of importance that were stolen on this occasion were the certificates of the marriages of the late King William IV. and of the Duke of Kent, the illustrious parent of the reigning Sovereign. Every exertion that could suggest and money could carry out was made to discover the lost registers, but all efforts proved fruitless, and the matter had been long since given up and nearly forgotten, when information was received by Inspector O'Brien, of the A division, and Serjeant Bennett, of the D division, which led to the apprehension of John Standen, a hawker or costermonger, as the thief, and George Tilbey, of No. 11, Great James-street, Lisson-grove, as the receiver; they were accordingly taken, on Tuesday afternoon, before Sir T. N. Reeve and Captain Price, magistrates, and evidence of considerable length was adduced, which it is deemed necessary, in the present stage of the case, to withhold. Tilbey, who was fraudulently related, stated a statement implicating Standen, who declined saying anything, and they were both remanded to Kingston Gaol.

THE STANFIELD-HALL MURDERS.—All the furniture and effects in Stanfield-hall will be sold by public auction during the ensuing month, as the family will not reside there in future. The hall is to let. Mrs. Jermy and Eliza Chestney have left Stanfield-hall; Mrs. Jermy on Tuesday was removed to Norwich. Her general health continues to improve, and we trust the change of scenery may tend to her recovery. Eliza Chestney having expressed a desire to be left in the neighbourhood, where her friends and relations are residing, very comfortable lodgings have been taken for her, by her mistress's family, at Wymondham, where she will also have the care and attention of her usual medical adviser. The subscription on her behalf amounts to upwards of £200. Eliza Chestney is not a native of Norfolk, as has been supposed. She was born in the parish of Braiswell, in Suffolk, where her father is clerk of the parish, and her mother school-mistress. The subscription for Emily Sandford closed on Saturday last.—Norfolk Chronicle.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL.

MR. F. PEEL, whose portrait we give this week, made his début in parliamentary debate on Monday night, in the House of Commons. The ordeal of a "maiden speech" is at all times a severe one to the young political aspirant, and the manner in which he acquits himself on the occasion is usually regarded as an index to the course of his future career: but it is particularly trying when the distinction of hereditary fame attaches to the new member's position, and raises the standard of success to which he is unconsciously subject, to the height that his paternal reputation exacts, by reason of the expectation it inspires. It was so with the youthful member for Leominster on Monday night. He rose from his seat on a secondary bench, but heralded by an ancestral prestige, which it was the more difficult to sustain, as the statesman we created it still sits in the House, and commands its applauding attention for the emanations of his intellect and his political sagacity. Mr. Peel, however, has brought to the ordeal with the most unequivocal success: his manner was modest and unassuming, and at the same time free from any embarrassment; his voice clear and easily heard; the style of his address and his language appropriate and elegant; and the arguments in support of his view of the question under discussion were full of forcible and consecutive reasoning

The topic to which the son of the ex-Premier lent his first parliamentary advocacy was the bill introduced by the Government to make such alterations in the oaths taken by members of Parliaments as may admit of Jews taking their seat in our Legislature, as well as every other disqualification of religion within the realm. Reviewing the history of their exclusion, he showed that, in the oaths formed in the reign of James I., the words "on the true faith of a Christian" were not taken by members of that House. No further legislative measures were adopted till the time of Charles II., when a more stringent law was passed, requiring that members of both Houses of Parliament, previous to sitting or voting on any question, must take, as before, the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, &c., and also subscribe a declaration against transubstantiation. On the accession of William III., these oaths were repealed, and a new oath of supremacy, as well as allegiance, &c., was framed, which did not contain the words "on the true faith of a Christian." Therefore, so far as disabilities on this ground went, the Jews were admissible to Parliament at that period; but, towards the close of the reign of William III., Louis XIV. having recognised the title of the Pretender, an Act was passed imposing upon the members of the Legislature the obligation of qualifying themselves by an additional oath, which declared that King William had the only lawful title to the throne; that no others had any right or title to it, and the words "on the true faith of a Christian" were added. But, though the oath differed from the original one, it was directed against the same classes (Jews); it was formed on the same model as before, the difference being concluded with the words "on the true faith of a Christian." There were three oaths, then—those of supremacy, allegiance, and abjuration (the declaration against transubstantiation being repealed in 1829)—that had been taken since the time of William III., and the concluding words of one of these oaths, that of abjuration, were such as no conscientious Jew could surmount. This oath was not designed to exclude the Jew, but was intended for another class. It was never intended to ask an anomalous profession of Christianity from every member on his admission to that House; but the object was to exclude from Parliament one of the greatest divisions of professing Christians in the country. It was only by a fortuitous and accidental consequence that this oath had come to exclude the Jew from Parliament. If he thought, therefore, that on political grounds the exclusion of the Jew was indefensible, how much more indefensible did it appear when he thought of the indirectness of the mode by which that exclusion had taken place?

Adverting to the religious view of the question, he said that, in advocating the bill, he was contending for a principle that was to be collected from the character of all our existing institutions, and which he thought ought to be as unrestricted in its obligations as it was unqualified in its terms; the principle was that of perfect religious equality before the law—the principle that difference of religious persuasion ought not to constitute a ground for civil disqualification. They had (he said) surrendered the principle that the communion of the Church of England ought to constitute the basis of their political concessions. They did as much when they passed the Sacramental Test Repeal Act in 1828, and when they passed the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act in 1829. In such a case as this, he could only reason on the data of the constitution, as he found it binding his conduct by the conciliatory policy of recent times. He was acting in the spirit of that constitution, and carrying out its distinguishing principle—a principle replete with good-sense, with constitutional law, and with the mild spirit of Christian charity—viz., that all our privileges were to be enjoyed without reference to religious belief. That was the principle which he now advocated, and on which he would support the measure before the House.

In a similar liberal spirit the hon. gentleman ably touched on the various other salient points of argument which have been mooted on the subject of the Jewish disabilities, and he resumed his seat amid the hearty plaudits of the House; and in the course of the evening Lord J. Russell bore the following testimony to the success of the hon. member's first Parliamentary effort. "I have," said the Premier, "been greatly gratified by hearing a speech from an hon. member (Mr. F. Peel) (cheers)—who has not before addressed this House; but from whom the House, knowing his name and lineage, were prepared to expect to hear the arguments which he had to advance urged with ability, force, and eloquence. (Hear, hear.) The hon. gentleman has proved that those expectations were just and well founded. (Cheers.) They have not only been fulfilled, but have been more than realised." (Cheers.)

The young gentleman who has thus produced so favourable an impression on the House is the second son of Sir Robert Peel, and was born in the year 1823. He received his education first at Harrow School, and subsequently at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he received the highest honours in classics. He was called to the bar within the last few months, and is deputy-lieutenant for Warwickshire.

A short time since, on the retirement of Mr. Barkly from the representation of Leominster, upon his being appointed Governor of British Guiana, Mr. F. Peel canvassed the borough, and he was returned at the election which immediately followed.

In personal appearance he doesnot bear any striking resemblance to Sir Robert. His features are rather like those of his mother, regular and delicate.

The accompanying Portrait is from a Daguerréotype, by Beard.

BUST OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

THIS new bust of "the Duke" is modelled by the Count D'Orsay, and manufactured by Mr. Alderman Copeland, in statuary porcelain, and sold by Mr. Cundall, at St. George's Gallery, 21, Old Bond-street. The likeness is very characteristic; and the Bust will, doubtless, become popular, as well from its artistic merit, as from the prestige of the illustrious original.

CURIOSITIES.—II.

SALT-CELLAR OF BISHOP FOX, AT CORPUS CHRISTI COLLEGE, OXFORD.

THIS exquisite specimen of the skill of the mediæval goldsmiths was given to the College of Corpus Christi by the founder, Dr. Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester, in the year 1517. It is of silver gilt, and is covered with ornaments most elaborately and skilfully chased; and amongst the decorations, the pelican, Bishop Fox's emblem, is several times repeated; and on the narrow bands to the cover, and to the bottom of the salt, pelicans alternately with the letter R form an appropriate border, allusive of the name of the Bishop (Richard

BISHOP FOX'S SALT-CELLAR.

Fox). The effect of this elegant Salt is much heightened by the background to the decorated portions being all, with the exception of the knob, coloured dark blue, the knob being green. In Corpus Christi College is also kept the crosier of Bishop Fox—like the Salt, a most elaborate and beautiful work of art, and in fine preservation. Bishop Fox's emblem, the Pelican, occurs, many times repeated, on his superb monument in Winchester Cathedral.

HIS HIGHNESS SAID PACHA'S ENGLISH CURRICLE.

ALTHOUGH not very unlike in form the usual dog-cart of a sportsman, the effect in reality of the extreme lightness of make and most beautiful arrangement of colour, chiefly an intense sky-blue, renders this carriage worthy of our notice, from its own merits, as well as from the hint it gives of the character of its owner, who at no very distant time may become as illustrious from his success in war and his conduct in the government, as he is already distinguished for a highly-cultivated intellect and a daring, dashing character. Being the second surviving son of Mehemet Ali, he has been appointed by his Highness Abbas Pacha to be Admiral of the Egyptian fleet; and, by the interpretation of the guarantee of the hereditary descent of the Pachalic—as the oldest, although not the eldest according to European notions, branch of Mehemet's family—he will succeed to the government. The rare spectacle of cordiality between brothers in their respective situations in the East, proves not only the sagacity and affection of the present ruler of Egypt, but the excellent results of the education bestowed upon them by their wonderful father. It has resulted in the adoption, by Said Pacha, who speaks both French and English, of European habits, from his conviction of their superiority; but still he acts for himself and thinks for himself in modifying them to his own purpose. Thus, in ordering the present open carriage for his usual vehicle, he has composed his own design, to make it subservient to his particular use. The drawing represents his Highness, attended by his cadas, and driven by a coachman with a postilion; but very frequently the coachman's seat will be removed, to allow the Pacha to drive four horses. English servants are also accompanying the carriage, which, with the harness, composes one of the most showy equipages of the season, and does credit to the taste of the distinguished owner.

From a very careful drawing, we see the dusty result of the want of attention to the streets of Cairo, or Kahireh, as it is more properly termed, which are little more than well-worn tracks over rubbish heaps. In front, a soldier is showing the usual authoritativeness to a Bedouin, who may not have performed the salaam so rigidly correctly as the Fellah on the opposite side is executing it, by the side of a well-bred European, who only salutes the Pacha after the Frank manner. A Turkish merchant is waiting at his door to make his obeisance as soon as the Admiral notices him, such being the etiquette. The suite of attendants on foot is omitted in the drawing (not to confuse it), with the exception of a saus in front.

The view represents the "Street between the Two Palaces" (Beyn-el-Kasreyn), one of the principal streets of Cairo, having in it a public fountain, and a sebeel or public reservoir, for the gratuitous supply of water, which the burning climate of Egypt has solicited of the charity and munificence of their founders. There are about 300 in the city, which are annually filled at the time of the inundation. The Emeer Abd-er-Rahmán Kyáhya, a person of great wealth and power, who died in 1776 A.D., erected this and several other sebeels and charitable buildings, and was a considerable benefactor to the elaborated mosque of El-Aghar. It exhibits a fantastic combination of Turkish and Arabian tastes, but is more unassuming than many of the sebeels built within the last seventy years; and the window, through which the thirsty passenger receives his draught, is ornamented with a handsome bronze grating. Upon the upper part of the building is an open kuttab, or school, which generally accompanies the sebeels; and it is situated at the point where two streets branch off, one in the direction of the Gemaleegh, toward B'ab-en-Nasr, and the other to B'ab-el-Futóh.

Beyn el-Kasreyn was, a few years ago, an interesting spot for the antiquarian, from the fact of some remains existing of those buildings. The Palace or Castle of the Fawátim, or Fatimite Khaleefahs, stood where the Mákkemah or Place of Judgment does. The ancient house of the Kádee was taken down by Mohammed Alee about 1829, and a part of it presented a long-unnoticed memorial of the Prince who founded it. Upon the southern gateway of a massive, lofty building, latterly used as the Kádee's kitchen and stable, was an inscription in Kufic, bearing the name of El Mo'ezz Ibn 'Abd es-Saldam el-Ashraf el-Hereem el-Alee, who, about 976, A.D., founded Kahireh. The walls were, in parts, twelve feet thick, and the floors separated by solid vaulting.

The other Palace or Castle stood on the western side of the Beyn-el-Kasreyn, and was, probably, the residence of the Wezeer Góhar and the garrison. The ground which these fortified residences enclosed was, after the fall of the Fawátim and the building of the citadel under the Gebel Mokattam by Salāh-ed-Deen, gradually covered by private habitations and numerous streets.—(From Hay's "Cairo.")

THE "GREENOCK," IRON STEAM-FRIGATE.

SIGNOR CALZOLARI.

ENRICO CALZOLARI, who has just made so successful a début at Her Majesty's Theatre, is a countryman of Gardoni, and was born in the same town, Parma, 23rd February, 1832. In 1835, at twelve years of age, his musical taste, as a child, having long been the wonder and admiration of his neighbours, he became the pupil of the celebrated professor, Giacomo Panizza, to this hour maestro all' cembalo at La Scala. Thanks to the talents he displayed, and to the local influence of his master, although then only twenty-two years of age, he made his début at the Grand Opera of La Scala itself, at the Carnival of 1845, having for vocal colleagues, in the opera in which he appeared, virtuosi of the highest pretensions—La Frezzolini, Debassini, and Marini. It is a singular circumstance, that, although Calzolari was destined to be the warmest and exclusive adherent and the chosen interpreter of Rossini, Bellini, and the purer Italian school, he made his first appearance in "Ernani." Such was his success on his first appearance, that he was engaged to sing at the same theatre the season of autumn, 1846, and the Carnival, 1846-47, in company with Tadolini, Hayes, Angri, Marini, and Debassini.

At those singularly characteristic and mixed musical and commercial solemnities of Italy, the fiere—at the fair of Bergamo, where the great Rubini earned his first laurels—at those of Vincenza, Brescia, Alessandria, &c.—where the highest staple commodities of music are alone admitted, however inferior may be the other merchandize palmed off on the natives, Calzolari from his first appearance enjoyed the highest favour. Wherever there was a grand opera under the government of an Italian impresario, Signor Calzolari had offers of engagement. They, of course, were far more numerous than he could accept. He filled up, however, every interval. He sang at the opera at Trieste during the Carnival of 1845 and 1846. By this time his reputation had travelled far beyond the limits of his native land, and he was engaged during the spring seasons of 1845, 1846, and 1847, at the Imperial Opera of the Porta Carinthia, at Vienna, when he had for colleagues Persiani, Tadolini, Hayes, Angri, Varesi, Colini, Marini, and Debassini. From the Grand Opera of Vienna he was seduced by the immense offers made by the well-known saltimanco banker and impresario of the Teatro del Circo at Madrid, who had not then engaged in the Progressista politics which have since driven him from the country, and was desirous by every means of pleasing his fair and dread liege at the Escurial, and rendering the residence of Madrid brilliant.

For the fourth time Signor Calzolari was engaged to sing during the season 1848-49 at the Porta Carinthia; but when that epoch arrived, Vienna had already ceased to be the gayest rendezvous of pleasure in Europe, and the opera, the first luxury to cease, was finally closed. During this period Brussels, the only quiet capital amidst the general agitation and convulsion of the Continent, became the resort of all the personages of taste and rank whose wealth had escaped devastation in the adjoining monarchies. An Italian opera was established for their entertainment, and there Signor Calzolari has sung up to the moment of his coming to England, before the most critical of audiences, and, consequently, the most difficult to please, but with such success as to attract the attention of the administration of Her Majesty's Theatre, by which he was engaged at the moment when offers were made to him from almost every quarter in which an Italian theatre of any importance still exists.

THE STEAM-FRIGATE "GREENOCK."

THIS fine second-class steam-frigate, built for the service of her Majesty, by Messrs. Scott, Sinclair, and Co., of Greenock, was launched from their establishment on the 30th ult. She is the first steam-frigate that has ever been launched on the Clyde for the British Navy, and her construction will bring additional renown to the ship-builders of Greenock, after which port she is named.

The Greenock is of the following dimensions—

Length of keel and forerake	213 feet
Breadth of beam	37 feet 4 inches
Depth of hold	23 feet
Tonnage by Admiralty measurement	1413 4-94ths
Horses' power by Admiralty measurement	365

She is to be armed—

On the spar deck with 2 8-in. pivot guns,	10 ft. 3 in.,	68 prs., 95 cwt.
" 4 8-in.	8 ft. 9 in.,	65 cwt.
On the main deck with 4 6-in. guns "	9 ft. 6 in.	32 prs. 56 cwt.

She is to be propelled by a screw 14 feet diameter, constructed on the principle of F. P. Smith, Esq., and worked by a pair of powerful engines, of exquisite finish, also provided by Messrs. Scott, Sinclair, and Co. The screw is fitted with a most ingenious contrivance, by which it can be disengaged from the machinery; and, though of seven tons weight, it can be raised from the sea and crater-like physiognomy can be made at once to disappear, and leave the ship devoid of this unsightly feature, and of those cumbrous excrescences, paddle-boxes, giving her all the appearance and symmetry of a perfect sailing ship.

She is constructed in the following manner:—The figure-head is a bust of the late Mr. John Scott, father of the present Messrs. Scott. On the upper and main decks is placed the armament, with one of the large 8-in pivot guns at each end. On the main deck are also the captain's cabins, officers' mess-room, cabins for three Lieutenants, master, purser, and surgeon, large and powerful capstan for working the chains, and immense riding bitts for mooring the ship either by the head or the stern. Under the main deck, the ship is divided into five water-tight compartments, in the foremost of which, on the orlop deck, is the mess-room and sleeping deck for the crew, and two state rooms for the warrant officers, boatswain, and carpenter. Under the orlop deck, in this compartment of the vessel, are three divisions, separated by strong iron bulk-heads, blocks, rope, tallow, &c.; the gunner's stores of pistols, cutlasses, muskets, &c.; and the carpenter's stores of paints, oakum, nails, &c. The second division is occupied by the magazine, in its shot-proof walls of almost endless thicknesses, and the light-room, both of which are flanked by the provision-rooms of beef, pork, and other substantials. The third division contains the water-tanks, capable of holding 70 tuns of water, the chain lockers for stowing the cables and the supplies of shot. The next compartment of the vessel, measuring 73 feet in length, contains the whole of the machinery, consisting of four boilers, fitted with brass tubes, and two powerful steam-engines, lying flat on the bottom, and so arranged that all of the parts are several feet under the surface of the water. The third compartment is devoted entirely to the accommodation of the engineers. The fourth and fifth compartments on the orlop deck contain the midshipmen's mess-room, the gunner's cabin, and the store-rooms of the captain and gun-room officers; and below the orlop deck are the shell-rooms (fitted to contain 480 shells), the slop-rooms, and next the large brass pipe, with its machinery, valve, screw, and lifting gear, for the propeller shaft.

The frame and bulk of the ship is as follows—the keel, stem, and stern posts are of solid malleable iron, measuring 9 inches deep by 3 inches thick. The frames are of angle iron, 6 inches by 3½ inches, and pitched throughout the machinery space at one foot asunder. The floors are 21 inches deep and 1 inch thick. The deck beams are of African oak, secured to the side in a manner peculiar to the Greenock. The decks are of fir, plank, as usual, and secured with composition nails, according to the custom in her Majesty's dockyards. The fore sternpost, through which the propeller shaft passes, is of solid malleable iron, and consists of three pieces, two of which extend from the upper end of the main pieces of three pieces, two of which extend from the upper end of the main pieces to the upper deck in a vertical direction—the after-post, to which aid round the quarter of the vessel in a vertical direction—the after-post, to which is hung the rudder, is likewise secured to and strengthens the stern by two large stones passing also up the quarters as high as the counter. The trunk through which the screw can be unshipped and brought upon deck is also of iron, and fitted to the hull.

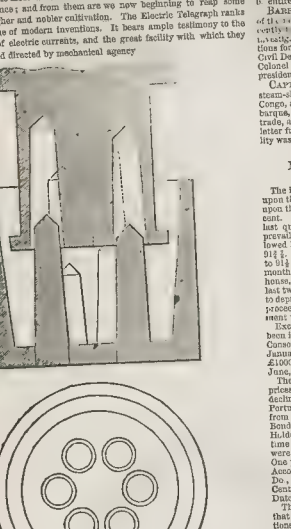
The Greenock is built almost entirely of iron, and is one of four vessels (the other three being the Simoon, Vulcan, and Megæra) ordered by the late Board of Admiralty, and is the only one fitted as a frigate and propelled with sail power. She is armed on the main-deck, and her model so designed as will enable her to fight bow and stern guns in a direct line with the keel—a qualification, though a most important one, in which she stands almost alone in the British navy.

The Greenock has been built, and has her war fittings executed, under the superintendence of Mr. Thornton, a shipwright officer from her Majesty's dockyard at Portsmouth.

HJORTH'S ELECTRO MAGNETIC MOTIVE ENGINE.

Up to within a comparatively recent period, the diversified phenomena of Electricity and Magnetism, as developed in the laboratory of the experimental philosopher, had assumed but little practical importance beyond that of adding some very interesting apparatus to the lecture table, and thereby attracting large assemblies to witness the mysterious operations and influences of these most wonderful agents: but the very nature of these displays was favourable to further development—the most intent listeners and observers were the juvenile portion of the audience; and from them are we now beginning to reap some of the fruits of a higher and nobler cultivation. The Electric Telegraph ranks high in the catalogue of modern inventions. It bears ample testimony to the extent and rapidity of electric currents, and the great facility with which they can be controlled and directed by mechanical agency



SECTION AND PLAN OF THE ELECTRO MAGNETS.

Many have been the attempts to obtain motive power by means of Electro-Magnetism, but motion without a sustaining force was all that had been achieved by the discoveries hitherto made. The most important step—because it appeared to be on the right track—was that of [illegible] a Danish gentleman, of the name of Hjorth, of whose engine we present an Engraving, from a model, of the [illegible] specification of the patent, is, "That the result is obtained by means of the magnetic attraction of the inside parts of which are conical; and, secondly, by placing a number of rods or points of different lengths in the holder magnets, which rods are to pass through corresponding apertures in the moveable magnets. The [illegible] The consequence of this arrangement is, that the respective magnets mutually attract each other by the superficial approximations of their different parts, which during the whole stroke present themselves in a direct path without being hurled to any length of stroke, as this only applies to the number of rods applied in the same way." Besides these essential improvements in the construction of the magnets for obtaining motive power, the inventor has succeeded in preventing the destroying effect of the electric spark by arranging the commutator or current changer in such a way that the electric field is according to its intensity divided into several separate currents, which pass round the respective magnets without communicating with one another; and as it has been proved that the electric spark, when of great intensity, produces a destroying effect on the conducting metals, which serve to break the current, it will easily be seen that this improvement is of great importance with respect to applying galvanic batteries of great power. The electric field is commonly means an up and down motion is produced. It is scarcely necessary to add that the impetus or motion is imparted in a similar manner as in the steam-engine, by transferring the power to a crank. We most heartily wish the ingenious inventor all the success that his labours entitle him to, and believing that he has made a great step in advancing us nearer to renewed exertion. There is no question of the existence of illimitable power; but how that power is to be commanded and controlled to an unlimited extent, is a problem that remains yet to be solved.

IRELAND.

THE POOR-LAW.—The Poor-Law Commissioners recently applied to the Trades Board of Guardians for a portion of the money advanced under the Temporary Relief Act. In reply to the application the board passed the following resolution, the latter part of which is the strongest testimony to the state of affairs to the south-west. Resolved—"In reply to the Commissioners' letter No. 318, dated April 23, we regret to state that there can be no money paid at once there being no funds in hand. The weekly collection is hardly sufficient to meet the weekly demand for provisions, salaries, &c.; and the guardians fear it must be a considerable time before they can hope to be in a position to repay any part of the dem[illegible] as the board is at present about £8000 in debt to contractors, and cannot possibly place heavier rates upon the union. The farmers (with means) are daily leaving the country; many potatoes are coming into the workhouse. Numbers of acres are waste; the greater portion of the cattle of the union are at present in pound for the poor-rates, and purchasers cannot be procured: many instances have occurred of cows and horses having been sold for poor-rates as far as 2s. 6d. each.

THE STATE PRISONERS.—Mr. John Martin, of Loughorne, for several months a prisoner in Richmond Bridewell, under sentence of transportation for treason felony, is at the point of death. His medical attendants are of opinion that any further confinement must tend to hasten the crisis.

THE CONVICT MITCHELL.—By the last West India mail a letter was received by Mitchell's family, written just as he was about to take his departure from Bermuda for the Cape. His health continued extremely precarious, he having been then suffering from a spasmodic attack, which lasted, with scarcely any intermission, for a period of eleven days. His spirits, however, remained unbroken, and, although barely able to write, he looked confidently to the change of climate as the means of restoring him to comparative health and strength.

EMIGRATION.—The Cork Reporter gives a statement of the number of emigrants that have left that port direct from the 1st of January to the 30th of April, promising that the account does not include those who proceeded thence to Liverpool and other emigrating ports.—For the quarter ending the 31st of March, 16 emigrant vessels sailed, carrying 846 men, 572 women, and 357 children, total, 1775. From that day to the 15th of April, 9 vessels, containing 1703 persons; from the 15th of April to the 30th, 11 vessels, containing 1703 persons—making a total since the 1st of January of 3613 men, women, and children.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Admiralty have revised their old circular of 1847, to the effect that officers returning from foreign stations may, with the sanction of their Lordships, take part in any examination for which their rank may qualify them.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.—The North Star, fitting for a voyage to the North Polar regions, is under orders to leave Woolwich on Saturday (this day), to have her compasses adjusted by Captain Johnson, and will leave Greenhithe in the 18th instant, on her enterprising expedition to relieve the officers and crews of the vessels already in the Arctic regions. The Stromboli steam-vessel, Commander Lord Amelius Beauclerk, is expected to remain at Sheerness until the North Star is ready at Greenhithe, and will then tow her to the edge of the ice.

The officers of the 7th Hussars have fixed their anniversary banquet for Saturday, June 16th, at Grillion's Hotel. The Marquis of Anglesey, whose most distinguished days were spent in the corps, will preside.

OPENING OF ST. GEORGE'S BARRACKS.—On Friday week the new barracks called St. George's, situate within the Tower of London, and erected on the site of the [illegible] Armoury, burnt on the 30th of October, 1841, was compleated for the reception of the [illegible] Fusiliers. It is in the Norman [illegible] style of architecture, harmonising with the White Tower, the Bloody Tower, and other ancient buildings of the fortress, to which the Old Mint, the most interesting part of the fortress, is to be entirely removed.

BARRACKS IN THE WEST INDIES.—In consequence, it is understood, of the [illegible] in the Honourable Commons of the great mortality that has recently taken place in the West Indies, a board [illegible] has been appointed to [illegible] report as to the best means of [illegible] the sanitary condition of the barracks in those colonies. The board is composed of Mr. Sidney, C.B., Civil Department of the Ordnance; Dr. Dassauville, of the Royal Artillery; with Colonel Sir Richard Doherty, Superintendent of the Recruiting Department, as president.

CAPTURE OF A SLAVER.—A letter has been received from the Blazer, steam-sloop, Lieut.-Com. G. T. C. Smith, dated at Kabenda, December, off the river Congo, stating that on the 6th of November they had captured a new slave clipper barque, of 450 tons, after a seven hours' chase. She was fully equipped for the trade, and was to have embarked in a day or two no less than 1200 slaves. The letter further adds that all was well on board, and that the squadron in that locality was generally healthy.—Nautical Standard.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The increased complication of foreign and internal politics has had a depressing effect upon the markets generally. Consols, on Monday, opened at a decline of per cent. upon the closing prices of the preceding week, afterwards further yielding ¼ per cent. Towards the close of business, however, some reaction occurred, and the last quotations were 91¼ 99 for money and the May account. Heaviness again prevailed on Tuesday, and the receipt of the Italian and German news was followed by a decline in Consols to 91⅛; but a slight rally left the closing quotations 91⅜ ⅞. The dullness again prevailed on Wednesday; Consols opened at 91⅛, receded to 91⅛ ⅜, buyers, closing at that quotation. Thursday was the settling day at the Stock Exchange account, which was nearly confined to speculators within the monthly Consol account, which was nearly confined to speculators within the house, the public having taken but little interest in the Consol markets for the past two months. The news from Italy was made available by the bear party to depress prices, which at one period declined to 90½. As the account, however, proceeds, prices rallied, and 91¼ became the current quotation. The settlement was light and money plentiful, the continuation being 3-16ths per cent.

Yesterday Bills have not materially fluctuated, nor have the heavy stocks been in a y demand. The last prices are, for Bank Stock, 194 ; Reduced, 89⅜ ; Consols, 91⅛ ; New 3½ per Cent. Annuities, 90⅜ ; India Bonds, £1000, 70 pm. ; Ditto, under January, 1855, 8½ ; India Scrip, 245 ; India Bonds, £1000, 70 pm. ; Ditto, under £1000, 68 pm. ; Consols for Account, June 12, 91½ ; Exchequer Bills, £1000, £1000, 68 pm. ; Consols for Account, June 12, 91½ ; Exchequer Bills, £1000, June, 48 pm ; Ditto, £500, June, 48 pm ; Ditto, Small, June, 48 pm.

The Foreign Market has been influenced by the state of the Consol Market, and prices have consequently been dull; towards the close of the week quoting a decline. Mexican has ranged from 26½ (ex Coupons) to 28¾ (ex Coupons); Portuguese, Four per Cents, from 29 to 28¾ ; Spanish Active Bonds, from 17¾ to 16⅛ ; the Three per Cents, from 23¾ to 23⅝. Among the Peruvian Bonds, sent in for conversion, several have been discovered to be forgeries. Holders of this stock will therefore do well in directing their agents to use the utmost caution in the purchase of Peruvian. At the close of the week prices continue in presenting their bonds for inspection. At the close of the week prices were heavy, at the following quotations:—Equador Bonds, 3½ ; Grenada Bonds, One per Cent, 17 x d ; Mexican, Five per Cent., 1846, with Coupons, 28½ ; Do., Account, 31 ; Do., Ex Coupons, Account, 28¾ ; Spanish Five per Cents, 1840, 16⅛ ; Do., Account, 17⅛ ; Do., Passive, 5⅜ ; Do., Deferred, 9⅜ ; Do., Three per Cents, 23⅛ ; Venezuela Bonds, Two-and-a-Quarter per Cent., 24 ; Do., Deferred, 7⅛ ; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 65⅝ ; Do., Four per Cent., 76⅜.

The depression in the Share Market continues, but it is generally believed that a heavy Bear account in some degree influences the present low prices. The shareholders of the Eastern Counties Company, after a most stormy meeting on Thursday, decided that no dividend should be declared for the past half-year, but the misapprehension with the Norfolk line will remain in force by a ballot, the result of which cannot be known until Monday. Closing prices are—Aberdeen, Preference, 4¼ ; Ambergate, Nottingham, Boston, and Eastern Junction, 13¼ xin ; Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 4¼ paid, ex with a guarantee, 94 ; Caledonian, 27 ; Chester and Holyhead, 16 ; Dublin and Belfast Junction, 7¾ ; East Anglia, £15, E. and H., 12 ; Eastern Counties, 7¼ ; East Junction, 7¾ ; Great Northern, 10½ ; Ditto, Half, A, Allotment, 4¼ ; East Lincolnshire, 2¾ ; Great Northern, 10½ ; Ditto, Half, A, Allotment, 4¼ ; Ditto, Half, B, 3⅜ per Cent., 2¾ ; Ditto, Extension, ½ ; Great Southern and Western (Ireland), 33 ; Great North of England, 229 ; Great Western, 78¼ ; Ditto, Quarter, 19¾ ; Ditto, Quarter, 19¾ ; Ditto, New, £57, 9½ ; Ditto, Half New, 9½ ; Ditto, Quarter, 4¾ ; Lancaster and Carlisle, 18½ ; Lancashire and Yorkshire, Runs, 9 ; Ditto, Stateslife, 1 ; Ditto, Newcastle and Berwick, 4¼ ; London and South-Western, 93½ ; Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, 7 ; London and South-Western, 93½ ; Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, 7 ; London and North-Western, 141 ; Ditto, New, £10 Paid, 10½ ; Midland, 63¾ ; Do., £50 Shares, 19½ ; Do., Consolidated Three per Cent., 122¾ ; Norfolk, Great, 3 per Cent., 17½ ; North Britain, 6 per Cent., 122¾ ; Norfolk, Great, 3 per Cent., 17½ ; North Britain, and Stirling

NEW CHURCH AT PENN-STREET.

THIS new edifice has just been completed at Penn-street, a hamlet of the parish of Penn, situate about midway between Beaconsfield and Amersham, and not far from Wycombe, in the most picturesque portion of the county of Buckingham. The population is much scattered, and the majority residing at a long distance from the parish church of Penn, have been almost destitute of the means of attending a place of public worship. The parish is owned by Earl Howe, whom this spiritual destitution induced, about two years since, to project the erection and endowment of a Church for the district, which has just been accomplished, at a cost approaching £10,000. Such munificence it is extremely gratifying to commemorate in our Journal.

TRINITY CHURCH, PENN-STREET, BUCKS.

The site now occupied by the Church but a few months since was covered with timber, forming part of Penn-common Wood, and covering nearly 1000 acres. The design adopted by the architect (Mr. Benjamin Ferrey) is the decorated style of the 14th century. The Church is cruciform in plan, and is calculated to afford accommodation to more than 400 persons. The whole interior is paved with encaustic tiles. The roof and fittings are of stained deal, and the stained glass altar window was presented by her Majesty the Queen Dowager. The Church, from east to west, is about 150 feet long by thirty wide, and its height to the summit of the steeple is 140 feet. The whole structure has been completed within two years, and it is worthy of record that in its erection none but the tradesmen and tenants of the noble founder have been employed.

The consecration of the building took place last week, the Bishop of Oxford performing the interesting ceremony, in the presence of a vast concourse of spectators, attracted from the surrounding districts.

Amongst the leading personages present were Viscount and Viscountess Curzon, Lord and Lady Radstock and the Hon. Misses Waldegrave, Lord Boston and the Hon. Misses Ipley, Mr. and Mrs. Tyrwhitt Drake, Mr. Bracebridge, Miss Norbury, and most of the influential families in the neighbourhood, and a large assemblage of clergy from the adjoining parishes. The road from the Manor-House to the church was very tastefully decorated with triumphal arches, formed of evergreens, and decorated with complimentary inscriptions, among which were—"In grateful esteem of Earl Howe," "God bless the house of Curzon," &c. The approaches to the Church, and the entrance to the churchyard, were also spanned by evergreen arches, bearing appropriate Scripture texts.

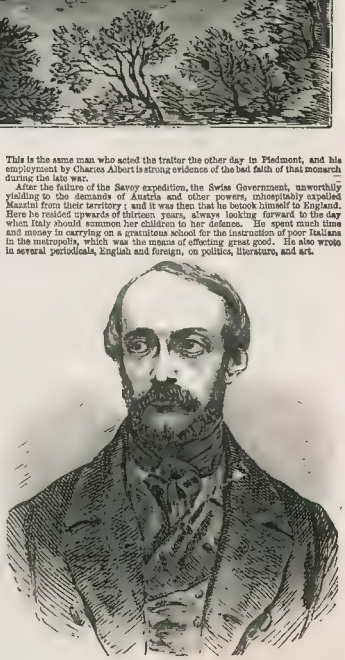
The Lord Bishop was assisted by the Rev. J. Knolls, the Vicar of Penn, and the Rev. E. Hickerstech, the incumbent minister of the Church.

Near to the Church stands a very remarkable and picturesque tree, known as the "Queen's Beech," from the fact of her Majesty the Queen Dowager having, some years since, when on a visit at Penn, honoured with her presence a rustic entertainment given to the poor of the district, under the shadow of its branches, by Earl Howe.

MAZZINI.

GIUSEPPE (JOSEPH) MAZZINI is the son of an able medical professor and practitioner in Genoa. He was born in that town in the year 1809, and is, therefore, now in his 40th year. He was educated for the law, at the university of Genoa. From boyhood, however, his constant and dominant idea has been the distracted condition of his country, and to its regeneration, more than 20 years in exile and in power, he has unswervingly devoted his genius. Before he had finished his studies, he was arrested on suspicion of being connected with Carbonarism; and though the judicial functionary before whom he was brought declared that nothing was proved against him, he was carried off to a fortress at some distance from the town, and was only released in order to be shipped off into exile. He then took up his abode at Marseilles, where he became the founder of La Giovine Italie, and conducted the journal of that name, devoted to the cause of the unity and independence of Italy and a republican form of government. The rule of Louis Philippe did not allow Mazzini to remain long in France; and though he succeeded in evading the vigilance of the police for about one year, during the whole of which time he never went out except on two occasions in disguise, and continued his journal, which was easily distributed from Marseilles into Italy. He at length was obliged to fly, and in 1831 found himself in Switzerland. There he organised the expedition into Savoy, which failed through Ramorino, to whom the military command was given. This is the same man who acted the traitor the other day in Piedmont, and his employment by Charles Albert is strong evidence of the bad faith of that monarch during the late war.

After the failure of the Savoy expedition, the Swiss Government, unworthily yielding to the demands of Austria and other powers, inhospitably expelled Mazzini from their territory; and it was then that he betook himself to England. Here he resided upwards of thirteen years, always looking forward to the day when Italy should summon her children to her defence. He spent much time and money in carrying on a gratuitous school for the instruction of poor Italians in the metropolis, which was the means of effecting great good. He also wrote in several periodicals, English and foreign, on politics, literature, and art.



MAZZINI, THE ROMAN TRIUMVIR.

When the French revolution of February, 1848, broke out, Mazzini conceived that Paris was the proper focus of action, and, accordingly, he went there. He returned to England for a short time, and then Lombardy having risen against the Austrians, he repaired to Milan, where he conducted the paper L'Italia del Popolo. Being persuaded of the faithlessness of Charles Albert, he could not join that King's admirers. He strongly advocated the war; and when Charles Albert turned his back upon Milan, and the people, then convinced of his treachery too late, wished to make Mazzini dictator, and to entrust the defence of the city to him, the Austrians were already at the gates, and nothing remained for the inhabitants but flight. Mazzini took refuge in the canton of Ticino, in Switzerland whence, shortly after the expedition into the Val d'Intelir, he was again expelled.

Rome had now declared itself a republic, and Mazzini was at once elected deputy to the Constituent Assembly for the town of Leghorn, where he landed, and was received with acclamations. After spending some time at Florence, in attempting to effect the fusion of Tuscany and Rome, he at length repaired to Rome. From that moment he has been the leading spirit of the Roman Republic, and is now one of the Triumvirate. Our last accounts present him animating the people to resist the force of General Oudinot.

Mazzini's ideas are conveyed in the motto of the Roman Republic, "Dio et il popolo" ("God and the people"). He is well known to the English public, through the notoriety acquired by Sir James Graham in opening his letters in the English Post-office, and communicating their contents to the Austrian Government, which led to the death of the noble-hearted brothers Bandiera.

Mazzini is of middle height, and extremely thin. There is an unspeakably noble expression in his forehead and eyes. All who were fortunate enough to know him in England, loved him most enthusiastically.

THE CANADIAN RIOTS.

The Ultra-Tory, and formerly ultra-loyal party in Canada, have proceeded at last from rebellious speeches to rebellious acts. They have grossly insulted and assaulted the Queen's representative they have burned down the Houses of Parliament, destroyed a valuable library, and the invaluable records of the colony, extending from its first settlement to the present time, and committed a series of acts which would have disgraced the most ignorant mob of the most lawless city in Europe. The insurgents were not composed of what we in the old world consider the dangerous—because destitute and uninstructed—classes of society, but of men of name, property, and station. It will evidently require much wisdom and firmness to bring them to reason, and to prevent in future a repetition of acts the whole tendency of which is to imperil our dominion in Canada. Our neighbours of the United States have "itching palms" for that territory, and are ready to sympathise with any party in it, who may desire to throw off our yoke, whether the party be led by a Papineau in 1838, or by a M'Nab in 1849. Hence there is the most urgent necessity for more than ordinary care, forbearance, and discretion. To give up Canada of our own free-will, to recognise its independence, and to enter upon a new career of political, commercial, and social alliance with it, is a consummation to which this country may look forward with satisfaction; but to see it violently wrested from us by the proceedings of an exasperated faction, aided by the grasping covetousness of Brother Jonathan, is a result that the people of Great Britain cannot contemplate without alarm. In the fulness of time we must no doubt be prepared for the independence of Canada, as well as of our other colonies; but, in resisting the faction that now troubles that fine country by its increasing violence, we resist no constitutional right, we display no tyranny; we simply support the peaceable many against the turbulent few, and lend our authority to the suppression of scandalous and unprovoked outrage.

In his interrogation addressed to Earl Grey upon the subject, on Tuesday night, Lord Stanley expressed a belief, which he shares in common with a great number of persons in England, that the war between the parties in Canada is, in fact, a war of races; in other words, a war of Saxon against Celt, and of Englishmen against Frenchmen. This, however, is a mistake. The war, if such the conflict may be termed, is a war of principles; of the right of responsible against irresponsible Government; of democracy against aristocracy; and of the many against the few. It is the same conflict which now agitates Europe from one extremity to the other, with this remarkable difference, that it is the aristocrats and ultra-Tories of Canada who appear as insurgents against constituted and legal authority, and who wield, as democracy has but too frequently done in Europe, the torch of the incendiary and the lawless passions of a mob, in support of their political prejudices. If we could imagine anything so preposterous as that the Dukes of Newcastle and Richmond, aided by Lord Stanley and Mr. Disraeli, should countenance a mob of lawyers, merchants, physicians, magistrates, and shopkeepers, in burning the Houses of Parliament and the records of the nation, in forcibly ejecting the Speaker and Lord Chancellor, and in carrying off the mace as a present to Colonel Sibthorp, we should imagine the English counterpart of this Canadian insurrection. The mere supposition is ludicrous; but the realization of a similar scene in Canada has partaken too largely of the terrible to be considered in any light but a serious one. It is altogether a serious business; and will require tact and prudence on all sides to be prevented from becoming much more so.

A slight consideration of all the circumstances will show, as we have stated, that the conflict is between principles, and not between races; and that the only course the British Government can pursue is to maintain the law, and overpower its transgressors, whatever their station or influence may be. The rebellion of 1838 was caused by the dissatisfaction of the French Canadians and of the English colonists of Liberal principles, who were oppressed and insulted, and denied all participation in the government of their own affairs by a dominant party—the "family compact," as it was called. This party monopolised all offices in the colony. The church, the state, and the law were theirs, and theirs only. Wherever there was money or an appointment to be obtained in Canada, one of their people obtained it. They perpetrated job after job; and divided almost the whole of Upper Canada amongst themselves and their connexions. Their oppression at last became intolerable, not only to the French Canadians, but to the British who were not of their "compact," and who longed for the establishment of a system of local government which should at least approximate to the free institutions to which they had been accustomed at home, and of which the United States were in full enjoyment.

In pursuance of this natural desire, the French and some of the British unluckily listened to evil counsel. They took passion instead of reason for their guide, and were betrayed into a rebellion. M. Papineau and his associates as representing the French party, and Mr. Mackenzie and others as representing the British, broke the law, defied legitimate authority, and resorted to insurrection with all its horrors. They were opposed as a matter of right and duty by the "family compact" and loyal party, by all the peaceable and well-disposed, and by the whole strength of the British authority in Canada. The insurrection was put down, the ringleaders fled, the majesty of the law was vindicated, and order was restored in every part of the Upper and Lower provinces. Having performed this part of its duty, the British Government undertook another and equally essential duty—that of redressing proved wrongs. It entered into a calm investigation of the causes of the insurrection. It probed abuses, laid bare corruption, and heard the voice of complaint for the elucidation of the truth. Thereault was the establishment of free institutions for Canada, the recognition to the full extent of the right of the colony to local self-government, under a popularly elected legislature and a responsible ministry. The malcontents, both French and British, were satisfied; the disloyal became loyal; a fruitful cause of animosity was removed, and Great Britain gave a striking example to the world of her sincere desire to do justice, and to govern British America upon principles in accordance with those which had made Great Britain what she herself was, and departure from which had lost her in a previous generation the still more valuable colony of the United States.

But the old party of the "family compact" found out in process of time that they were in a woful minority, and that free institutions in Canada excluded them from power. The last election (which was forced upon Lord Elgin by the "loyal" ministry then in power) returned a large majority of Liberals, and his Lordship found himself compelled to accept a Liberal Ministry. Hinc illæ lachrymæ. Condemned to the cold shade of Opposition, the Canadian loyalists were loyal no more. An opportunity of venting their rage against the triumphant party soon presented itself, and they took advantage of it. The full extent of their factiousness is not very generally known in this country. When in office, they introduced a measure into the Legislature for compensating the parties who had suffered losses in the rebellion of 1838. Among the parties who came in for compensation under their measure was no less a personage than Mr. Speaker Papineau—the very head and front of the insurrection. There was little or no opposition to the measure; but the "loyalists" being ousted from office, as we have already stated, a Liberal Ministry, as a matter of course, was called upon to take their places. That Ministry followed the policy of their predecessors, in so far as the Rebellion Losses Bill was concerned. The flood-gates of "loyal" agitation were immediately opened in the colony. It was difficult, if not impossible, to exclude from compensation all the disaffected of 1838, the more especially as the party at that time had wantonly destroyed the property of their opponents after the rebellion was crushed, and that a demand for compensation from these individuals would not unnaturally be sought for under the new bill. M'Nab (he who were convicted of rebellion were excluded from the bill; but nothing would satisfy the Canadian loyalists except the exclusion of those who were suspected. So upon the pretext that the bill was a premium upon rebellion, the loyalists took up the trade of rebellion themselves; and, proceeded from words to deeds, and committed outrages which nothing can justify. This bill, in common with many others, received, contrary to expectation, the assent of the Governor-General, without being sent to England for the consideration of the Queen; and, apparently, without premeditation of any kind, those outrages took place, which began with an insult to the Governor-General, and ended (if indeed they may yet be said to have ended) in the total destruction of the Houses of Parliament and the records of the colony, and the partial destruction of the houses and property of individuals obnoxious to the mob of Montreal.

An analysis of the division in the Legislature which passed the Rebellion Losses Bill, afterwards sanctioned by the Governor-General, shows that the question is not a purely French one, as the Canadian ultras allege. The total number that voted was 63; of whom 46 voted for the Ministry, and 17 against. Of this majority, 22 were French Canadians, 6 British from Lower Canada, and 18 British from Upper Canada. The minority consisted of 11 British from Upper Canada, 5 British from Lower Canada, and 1 French Canadian, whom the public will be surprised to learn was Mr. Papineau. These facts very clearly that Lord Stanley has miscalled the conflict in designating it a war of races. It is, as we have already stated, a conflict of principles, upon which men range themselves according to their convictions, and not according to the language they speak, or the country from which they came. It it were, indeed, a war of Saxon against Celt, we might expect to find the Celtic chief M'Nab among the Celts, and not as either Celt or Saxon, that he gives countenance to rebellion, and wages war against the French and English Liberals of Upper and Lower Canada. The latest accounts state that order has been restored in Montreal; but it is evident that a most dangerous disaffection exists. The very spontaneity of the outbreak proves a perilous state of exasperation among the once dominant party in Canada. We trust that they will yet see the error which they have committed, and that they will pause before they involve their country in further peril. They may be assured that the people of Great Britain feel but little sympathy with them; and that our Government will be supported by the public sentiment in any attempt they may make to vindicate the law and maintain the peace of the colony.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE

The general elections for the Legislative Assembly, so long and so anxiously looked forward to by all parties in France, commenced on Sunday. There was an unusual display of military force on the occasion in Paris, [illegible] mesures of each arrondissement being occupied with strong bodies of [illegible] cavalry and artillery were also at hand, in readiness to act in case [illegible] the cause of these precautions was the [illegible] apprehension entertained by the Government, from the information communicated to it, of the probability of a Socialist outbreak. The day, however, passed over tranquilly, and during the week order was not disturbed

The official returns have not yet reached us, and in the Paris journals comparatively few returns as to the result of the ballot in the metropolis are as yet fully hazarded, in conformity with the policies of the papers respectively.

The Journal des Débats states that the [illegible] Conservative candidates have a decided majority; whilst the Réforme says that even in the most aristocratic quarters the Socialists have polled 25 per cent, in the commercial quarters 50 per cent., and in the quarters occupied by the operatives [illegible] preponderating majority.

In the provinces, all accounts agree in representing the Conservatives and the Republicans as forming the great majority of the successful candidates. "A prominent feature in the elections, and the effigy of Italy has been [illegible] incident in the National Assembly, which has caused the resignation of M. Faucher, Minister of the Interior. On Monday M. Mallard brought under the consideration of the Assembly the following [illegible] which of that Minister:—

"That the Minister of the Interior [illegible] Italy, in the [illegible]

"After a very animated discussion on the affairs of Italy, the Motion was finally rejected, by a majority of 37 votes, the proposition declaring that the Ministry had lost the confidence of the country. This vote consolidates the public peace. The agitators only waited for a vote of the Assembly hostile to the Ministry to hurry to the barricades and renew the days of June. MM. Molinari, Gerdy, and Delaporte voted against the order of the day; MM. Guy [illegible]

M. Mallard characterised the conduct of the Ministry as unconstitutional and particularly [illegible] in sending ship to public [illegible] as such a fashion the names and votes of members of the Assembly, the object aimed at was to influence the elections in favour of the Government, and he proposed a vote of censure on the Ministry, to the effect that the assembly strongly blamed the attempt of the Minister of the Interior to influence the elections, and passed to the order of the day.

M. Léon Faucher defended the first part of the decree, which was necessary to restore confidence in the province. Being alarmed by the state of things described as existing in the [illegible] tion of the names, he refused all explanation.

On a division, there was a majority for the vote of censure, the numbers for and against no unequivocal [illegible] the President of the Council thought, reluctantly, that the Ministry had [illegible] Wednesday, but several Cabinet Ministers, one of the Generals of Division, and a number of officers of the National Guard, attended the funeral of General Oudinot.

M. Lacaze Lapagene, formerly Minister of Finance, died on Sunday night at his residence, Rue Castiglione, of an attack of gout. He had returned only a few days from the department of the Gers, where, as candidate for the Legislative Assembly, he had a large majority

The French papers continue to grumble at the meagre accounts given them by the Government of the transactions in which the French army is engaged in Rome. They complain that they are indebted to the English newspapers for almost all the detailed intelligence on the subject which reaches them; but no one of them thinks of doing what the English journals do, of sending a trustworthy correspondent to the spot. They upbraid their Government for not supplying them with the means of attacking it, but they have no notion of putting their shoulders to the wheel "themselves to effect that for which they have been called into existence, viz. to obtain an early supply of authentic news.

ITALIAN STATES

The agitation caused by the refusal of some of the rulers of the various states into which "Switzerland" is divided, to recognise the Federal Constitution, is aggravated by the Republican tendency of a portion of the movement. The Grand Duke of Baden is obliged to fly from his capital, his arms, [illegible] hands of the insurgents, who proclaim their intention to establish a Republic. The state of the insurgent town in the little province of Palatinate, [illegible] phalia has not changed. The barricades of Elberfeld, Hagen, [illegible] still standing, and the coal militia appear determined to maintain [illegible] Constitution. Meanwhile the Prussian Government is concentrating a large army on the heath of Camen to suppress this movement.

In Saxony, the troops have completely succeeded in restoring order. The trial of the insurgent prisoners is proceeding before a commission sitting in the Hotel de Luxembourg, in Dresden.

The funeral of the victims of the late conflict took place on the 13th in that city, and passed off without disturbance.

Austria and Prussia have recalled their deputies from the Frankfort Assembly, and the breach between the upholders of that body and the existing Governments is becoming wider every day.

HOLLAND.

The ceremony of the installation of the new King of the Netherlands took place on the 19th, at Amsterdam. His Majesty, being seated on the throne, surrounded by his family, made the following speech:—

"Gentlemen, Members of the States-General,—After the death of my father, whose memory will remain indelible, being called by my birth and the fundamental law to the throne of the Netherlands, I have immediately taken the reins of Government, as I have solemnly made known to my subjects. The moment is now come when, in the presence of the Almighty, who holds in his hands the destinies of kings and people, I am, in imploring his divine name, to unite myself to my noble and faithful people, friendly to order. Raised to the position in which I find myself placed I know heavy are the duties it imposes upon me. Kings are not exempt from the weaknesses of humanity, and therefore have need of being enlightened and assisted by institutions. In order that the throne may remain a focus of light, shedding beneficent rays around. This people, one of the first to elect order, liberty, and the guarantees for maintaining both from the darkness of the brute force and oppression of the middle ages, has, at a vast and consolidated these institutions, in conformity with the wants of the present epoch. The King and the people of Orange and the Netherlands have calmly accomplished this important task, and the inestimable advantages of tranquility and peace have become the portion of the cherished land of the Netherlands. Our tranquil attitude in these times of agitation has not only preserved us from great misfortunes, but has increased the consideration the country enjoyed, for it has acquired for it the admiration of all civilised nations. I am united to a people much greater from its virtues than from the extent of its territory—more powerful from its union and from its means. It is a grand and beautiful mission to be King of such a people."

His Majesty then took the following oath, prescribed by art. 51, chap. 5, of the fundamental law.

"I swear to the people of the Netherlands to maintain and always support the fundamental law of the kingdom. I swear to defend and preserve, with all my power, the independence and territory of the kingdom; to protect the personal and individual liberties of my subjects; to employ all the means which the Constitution puts within my power to maintain and encourage the general and individual welfare. In this may the Almighty be my aid!"

The President of the two united Chambers then advanced in front of the throne, and pronounced the following oath, which was repeated by all the members:—

"We receive and inaugurate you as King, in the name of the people of the Netherlands, and in virtue of the Constitution. We swear to maintain your inviolability and the rights of your Crown. We swear to do all that ought to be done by good and faithful states-general. In this may the Almighty be our aid."

The first King-at-Arms then proclaimed William III. King of the Netherlands.

PRUSSIA

BERLIN, May 12.—The Congress convoked by Prussia for the purpose of debating upon a provisional system and electoral law (in lieu of the Frankfort Constitution), to be submitted to the revision of a future German legislative body, commenced its formal sittings on the 10th inst., under the presidency of the American Plenipotentiary, M. de Radowitz. The principal deputies of Prussia, Hanover, Bavaria, and Saxony were present. The constitution adopted by the Assembly of Frankfort will be taken as the basis of their deliberations. It is proposed to submit such modifications as may be agreed upon to the Frankfort Assembly, and it is expected they will meet the approbation of the majority. It is questioned whether the office of Head of the Provisional Central Power will be conferred on the King of Prussia, in the name of the German Confederation. This is an affair to be settled directly between Austria and Prussia.

Berlin, from which, but a short time since, so many fled, has now become a place of refuge. Families arrive daily from the Rhine, from Cologne, from Breslau, seeking the safety and protection of the capital—a safety which reigns only on a state of siege.

AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY.

There is a lull in the [illegible]ogenes from the seat of war in Hungary. The hostile parties are evidently gathering their strength for the [illegible] which Austrians aided by the Russians, and Magyars by their own unaided and patriotic zeal add to their forces. The nature of the contest on the part of the latter is shown by the fact that the city of Pesth has determined to equip a Honved battalion, while the wealthy nobility of Transylvania have formed a battalion of Honveds.

The following list of the new Hungarian Government has been published:—Kossuth, President and Governor of Hungary; Szemere, Interior; C. Batthyany, Foreign Affairs; Dushek, Finance; Csanyi, Public Works; Bishop Horvath, Ecclesiastical Affairs; Vukovics, Justice. It is intended to raise 50,000 more [illegible]

The other portions of the empire are endeavouring to turn its present difficulties to account. The Croats are [illegible] concessions and ammunition to [illegible] as the price of their active co-operation against the Magyars; and in Jobenow, strong Hungarian party has been formed

The city of Prague, according to accounts of the 12th inst., has been placed in a state of siege, on account of the evident determination of part of its inhabitants to make a diversion in favour of the Hungarians. Some of the leaders have been arrested, and the remaining members of arms and ammunition seized in the course of domiciliary visits. Part of the National Guard is suspended; public meetings are prohibited, and most strangers excluded from the town.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS. MONDAY.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE (in reply to the Marquis of Londonderry) stated that the Government did not think they were authorised in incurring any further ex[illegible]diture with reference to keeping up the communication between Portpatrick and Donaghadee

The Earl of CARNARVON observed that, by abandoning these ports at the present station, a clear saving of £4000 a year would accrue to the revenue, while the communication would be better carried on elsewhere.

ITALY.

Lord BEAUMONT, after adverting to the past and present state of affairs in the Roman States, asked whether her Majesty's Government had received any communication from the French Government of their intentions in occupying a portion of the Roman territories; if it had received any communication from Austrian or Neapolitan Governments as to their intentions in invading the Roman territories and states; and if her Majesty's Government had taken any part in the triumphant invasion?—In the course of the noble Lord's speech, a [illegible] what alteration took place between the noble Lord and Lord [illegible]ham, in consequence of the word "falsehood" having escaped the noble Lord, in reference to some statements made by Lord Stoughton on a former [illegible] in reference to Italian affairs. The noble Lord subsequently withdrew the offensive term.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE did not think the present a fit opportunity for entering into the general question of the state of affairs in Italy, or of the more recent most deplorable events which had taken place at Rome; but, whilst deploring the conflict, he neither admitted the necessity nor compliance and of the inaccuracy of the statements made by his noble friends, but to the questions put to him, which he believed to be perfectly legitimate, he was enabled to give a short and distinct answer. He thought it was on the 21st of April that the French Ambassador communicated the fact that the French Government were about to send troops to Civita Vecchia, accompanied by a declaration that the object was to protect the peace of Italy, and more particularly to promote the re-establishment of a constitutional and regular Government at Rome, no intimation being at any time given upon the latter place, an event which he considered was an afterthought of the French General, and did not form any part of his instructions from his Government. With respect to the course pursued by the Austrian and Neapolitan Governments, no communication whatever has [illegible] from them, and he was not prepared to state the opinion entertained by [illegible] Government on that [illegible] In answer to the last question, it was only to observe that her Majesty's Government had taken no part whatever in these proceedings.

The Earl of ABERDEEN followed on the general question, and, after stating his reasons for not entering at the present occasion, expressed his belief that the Earl of Minto's mission had been [illegible] to the freedom of Italy.

The Earl of MINTO defended himself from the attack made upon him by the previous speaker, stating that no step he was employed on his mission, whatever was [illegible]ended as to the independence of Italy. That danger he did [illegible] to avert, and nothing had ever fallen from him which could be construed into [illegible] supporting the step taken by the Austrians from that country.

Lord BROUGHAM gave it as his opinion that the sending the expedition to Civita Vecchia [illegible] was then examined—The French wanted an expedition [illegible] military expedition, some military glory, it did not sign by how little; but some [illegible] must have. Algiers would not do any longer—it must be Italy. [illegible] ...y the craving, not of the people of France, but of the mobs of Paris; and hence this expedition.

The Marquis of LONDONDERRY believed that the desire of the French Government and of the President was the preservation of peace. An allusion by the noble Marquis to Lord Brougham's having fraternised with the Easter expedition from this country to Paris elicited much ami[illegible]

Lord BROUGHAM begged to assure their Lordships that he had nothing whatever to do with what he believed to be the most absurd expedition that was ever carried on. The rule was, that any common nation which could take place must be, not of individuals, but of the nations, but of the Governments of the two countries. The debate then [illegible]

Earl NELSON presented a bill relative to the appointment of British chaplains in foreign ports, which was read a first time.

The Rivers Bill, after a short discussion, passed in such committee. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

NOTICES OF MOTION

Mr. H. DRUMMOND gave notice that, on the first Tuesday after Whitsuntide, he should move the following resolution: "That whereas a greater amount of taxation is levied upon the people than is required for the good and efficient government of the United Kingdom; and whereas large sums are expended in supporting needless places, extravagant salaries, and unnecessary works and establishments; and whereas the present taxation of the country depresses all classes, and especially the agricultural classes, it is [illegible] that for the employment of productive labour, it is the opinion of the House that adequate means should be adopted to reduce the expenditure of the Government."

HOUSE OF LORDS AND IRELAND (IRELAND).

On the order of the day for bringing into committee on the Land Improvement [illegible] (Ireland) Bill being read,

Mr. ANSTEY took occasion to express his opinion of the policy—If he could [illegible] it by the name, he would call it the policy of starvation—that was pursued [illegible] as sums which had already been voted for Ireland, that now proposed [illegible] various would not be applied bond fide to the maintenance of the Irish people, but to the improvement of the estates of the proprietors. The doses which had been already made had been shamefully misapplied, all classes in Ireland, from the highest to the lowest, assisting for them in the most barefaced manner. The answers of the Irish members had been accepted by Mr. Reynolds, when he said that he wanted to have a "pull at the Exchequer." It was to have [illegible] Exchequer, as he was convinced, they would not be grat[illegible]. This bill proposed another pull at the Exchequer, and as such he opposed it. It was part and parcel of a machine[illegible] policy, which caused the Irish proprietary under the guise of benefiting the Irish people. The Exchequer, at which another pull was proposed, was filled from the hard earned wages of the English people; and he could not avoid taking the first opportunity that offered to raise his voice against the "rapacious desires of an idle, wasteful, and extravagant landed proprietary." The Irish landlords were not the real, but the nominal, proprietary of Ireland. The land of right belonged to the mortgagees, and the mere nominal owners should no longer remain an incubus upon it. Let them cease to be called and to act as Irish landlords, and descend into the simple character of Irishmen, earning an honest livelihood by their hands and heads. The charity of this country had been egregiously misapplied in Ireland. Those who should have been [illegible] Irish appeal, acted themselves in the most rapacious spirit [illegible] as of the country. Unless the Government put a stop to this, the sources of charity in this country would be speedily dried up. The House and country expected to hear said further upon the rapacity and imbecilities of the Irish landlords; and, on his resuming his seat, Mr. John O'Connell, and Sir H. W. Barron sprang to their feet to reply.

Mr. JOHN O'CONNELL, after a scene which had almost ended in a duel, and which he must retract.

Mr. J. O'CONNELL rejected the expression, and, in reply to Mr. Roebuck's [illegible] unmanly. What was it discreditable [illegible] act as the whole [illegible] the [illegible] member had accused as of immorality. [illegible] were to enter upon that charge and I will enter upon it, be[illegible] unmanly [illegible] discreditable [illegible] upon my fellow-countrymen should be received with laughter and good-humour by the House, and without [illegible] remonstrance. [illegible] remonstrance.—I will ask the honourable member to compare the two countries with regard to their morality. Have we the system of poisoning infant children for the sake of getting their burials money, which prevails in the north, east, and west of England? Have we such a system of abortion-houses as prevails here in the metropolis? Have we in Dublin, as you have in London, a body of Guards, from which all [illegible] men are annually rejected as unfit to serve as soldiers? Look for subject to me to go here, then after legislate? Have we any schools in which education was [illegible] taught that the scholars are in ignorance of the name of [illegible] Have we [illegible] of the grossest impurities? Have we [illegible] as the fact are imposed after dark? Have we any [illegible] of public [illegible] or which in newspapers, under the patronage of government, who blasphemously say that the people of Ireland are disposed rational to it, people of Ireland, and England, the remedy, to be starved down to the level of the Capital, and that it would be interfering with the will of God to save [illegible] men starving? No, we have no such practices in Ireland, and I [illegible]

Sir H. Grey defended the Government against the attack, which he treated as altogether wide of the question raised by the bill.

Mr. Escott replied very indignantly to Mr. Roebuck, who had already thrice raised his voice in the House in tones of censure—

Thrice the bruised cat had mewed

Many of the Irish members attacked had been absent, and he trusted that the next time that the honourable and learned gentleman indulged in the "green butter vein, which pervaded every inch of his body," he would have the courtesy and the manliness to do so in presence of those whom he attacked. He was surprised that Lord John Russell had not, on the slightest degree, interposed between the Irish members and the taunts of the honourable and learned gentleman. Instead of doing this, the noble Lord had thrown out a taunt of his own, by alluding to the wearisomeness and frequency of Irish debates. If he wanted a reason for their frequency, it would be found in the renewed and patchwork legislation of the Government. Mr. Roebuck was not, after all, as desperate or dan erous a character as many Irish members were prone to him to be. He had spoken against the bill, but made no motion in conformity with the views which he had expressed. The Sheffield blade was not, after all, so dangerous a weapon. He might speak warmly in reply to the honourable and learned gentleman; but he trusted that the House would distinguish between the "honest indignation of a patriotic senator," and the "odious acerbity of a spiteful self-tormentor."

[illegible] some observations from Colonel Dunne, who would not be t[illegible]

Mr. Moore characterised the speech of the hon. and learned gent[illegible] a compound of the worst passions of the lowest order of the people of both countries.

The episode then terminated, and the House went into committee on the bill. When, after a desultory discussion, the blanks in the bill were filled up with the [illegible] and Clergy Act, 1844, the House resumed, and the bill was [illegible]

JEWISH DISABILITIES.

On the motion for the [illegible] Oaths Bill,

Mr. Estcourt, after referring to the oaths taken by Roman Catholic members and dissenters, asked Lord J. Russell whether he contemplated an alteration of the [illegible] as to his Parliament because he thought the measure would be incomplete, unless the Jews were placed, both with regard to civil offices and to Parliament, on the footing on which all other subjects of her Majesty are placed, whether professing the religion of the established church, or any other

Lord J. Russell replied that the bill rejected by the Lords, last year, embraced both the objects referred to; but, as this bill was of a different nature, applying only to oaths taken to sit in Parliament, he did not think it would be possible to introduce any provision for the admission of Jews to civil office. Supposing the bill to pass in its present shape, the situation of the Jews for [illegible] time would be similar to that which for a long period was the situation of [illegible] Protestant Dissenters, who were not held civil offices except by virtue of the Indemnity Bill. At the same time, he did not wish it to be understood that it was not his intention hereafter to introduce a bill for admitting Jews to civil offices.

After some observations from Mr. Bankes, Mr. P. Howard, Mr. Goulburn, and Mr. J. O'Connell, the House went into committee, when a protracted discussion ensued upon an amendment proposed by Mr. V. Smith, for the omission of the words having reference to the Pope of Rome, &c. The committee during the latter part of the discussion, appeared to have got into a complete state of confusion as to the proper question to be put by the chairman; and Mr. P. Miles moved that, instead of putting the question, he report progress, when the committee divided—ayes, 128; noes, 241; majority against the motion, 113. The committee again divided on the question that the chairman do leave the chair, which proposition was negatived by a majority of 114, the numbers being 111 to 226. Lord J. Russell then consented to the chairman's reporting progress, and the House resumed.

The Incumbered Estates (Ireland) and the Estates Leasing (Ireland) Bills passed through committee; and the St. John's, Newfoundland, Rebuilding Bill was read a third time and passed.

Lord Palmerston brought in a bill for legalising marriages celebrated in consular houses abroad, which was read a first time.—Adjourned at one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

CANADA.

Lord Stanley drew attention to the news which had been received that day from Canada, and which he characterised as being of so alarming and firm a character, that he could not delay a moment in asking the Colonial Secretary if he had received any information other than that which appeared in the newspapers, and if he were prepared to offer any explanation of the state of affairs in Canada, which had been brought about by the measures adopted by the Government. It appeared that the discontent had at last broken out, and that the Parliament House had been consumed by fire; and there was every reason to apprehend that throughout Canada the most formidable and alarming spirit prevailed. Lord Stanley desired to be informed expressly whether any specific instructions had been sent out to the Governor General with respect to the Indemnity Bill, and whether Lord E. Gr. had acted without advice or instruction from the Home Government. The noble Lord emphatically added that whether instructions were sent out or not, it was to Lord Elgin, but her Majesty's Government must be held alone and absolutely responsible for the result of the policy pursued in Canada.

Lord Grey wished the noble Lord abstained from expressing any opinion on that occasion. A despatch had, about an hour before, been received from Lord Elgin, which should be laid on the table on the next day on which their Lordships should meet (Tuesday). That despatch would show that Lord Elgin had acted with the accustomed judgment, moderation, and good sense. The date of the despatch was the 20th of April, and it was written in great haste. It appeared that a riot had taken place at Montreal, and that the Parliament House had been burnt; but there was nothing in the despatch to excite any apprehension that a war of races was about to commence. On the contrary, quiet[illegible] was restored. No step had been taken on the part of the Governor-General that he (Lord Grey) was not prepared to justify, and, with respect to the responsibility of the events that had occurred in Canada, he was of opinion that it rested principally, if not entirely, on the Canadians themselves. There was no doubt that the recount of the proceedings in the Legislative House some time since, and the opinions expressed by the noble Lord, had increased the violent party feeling in Canada. He trusted that in future the noble Lord would remember that there was a responsibility attached to members of the Opposition—a fact that he was too much in the habit of forgetting.

In a question from Lord Brougham, the Marquis of Lansdowne replied [illegible] the Government had received no official communication relative to any military assistance to be given to Austria by Russia.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.

An immense number of petitions, complaining of agricultural distress, having been presented by the Earl of Winchilsea, the Earl of Warwick, Lord Sondes, the Earl of Stamford, the Duke of Rutland, and other peers, [illegible] the question of agricultural distress under the existing circumstances, and demanded from the Government an admission of the existence of this distress, and a declaration whether or not they were prepared to propose to Parliament any measure for the remedy of the said cultural distress. He press having referred to the petitions in general terms, of deep and wide-spread distress amongst the cultivators of the soil, supported the prayer of the petitioners, and urged the necessity of a repeal of the malt tax and hop duties. He assert ed boldly that the system of protection had completely failed, that reaction towards protection to native industry had set in, and that the time would and should shortly come when a duty on the importation of foreign corn for revenue at least, would rise to the protecting point.

The Earl of Winchilsea also supported the prayer of the petitioners, and energetically called on the Government to retrace their steps, and to return to the wise policy of protection to native industry. The repeal of protection was the act of a revolutionary faction, and now that its fatal effects were manifest, no time should be lost in returning to a protective policy.

Earl Grey said that his noble friends and himself were quite sensible that agricultural distress existed, especially in the southern parts of England; but [illegible] upon and to propose a measure to Parliament relative there [illegible] subject of agricultural distress had been repeatedly brought before Parliament during the years when protection existed; and, therefore, the present distress was proof that the free Trade experiment had failed. [illegible] dered that a most unfounded panic prevailed amongst [illegible] present.

The Earl of Malmesbury contended that the distress had been immense [illegible] caused by the Free Trade measures lately adopted; and, worse still, all [illegible] of confusion had been taken away by those measures.

After a few words from Earl Stanhope and the Duke of Richmond, the subject dropped.

The Lordships adjourned to Friday, There being Ascension Day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Mr. B. Osborne [illegible] for the 5th of June of a motion for the committee of enquiry into the temporalities of the Church.

CANADA.

Mr. Herries inquired if the Government had received authentic information of the late events in Canada, and if they would lay information on the table. Likewise if they had yet received the votes and proceedings [illegible] Legislature.

Mr. Roebuck desired also to know if the Indemnity Bill, being a money bill, did not require a message from the Governor-General, or instructions from the Colonial Office, prior to its introduction.

Lord J. Russell replied that a despatch had been received at four o'clock that [illegible] which he would lay on the table [illegible]

Mr. Roebuck pressed for a reply to his question, whether instructions had been sent from the Colonial Office for sanctioning the Indemnity Bill.

Lord J. Russell [illegible]

Mr. Disraeli remarked, that if Mr. Roebuck had been in the House on the 22nd of March last, he would have heard Mr. Hawes give a distinct declaration that no such instructions had been sent to Lord Elgin—that the Colonial Secretary had the utmost confidence in Lord Elgin—and that the Governor-General was left to his unfettered discretion with regard to the Indemnity Bill.

Mr. Hawes having entered the House at this moment

Mr. Roebuck put the question again to the Under-Secretary.

Lord J. Russell [illegible] replied, declaring to cut further into the question, merely saying that answer given by Mr. Hawes on a former occasion was, in point of fact, correct.

Mr. J. Parkington asked if petitions had not been received from different parts [illegible] praying for the recal of Lord Elgin.

Lord J. Russell did not know.

Mr. Bright inquired if the disturbances had been put down.

Lord J. Russell said that Lord Elgin stated in his despatch that Montreal was tranquil. He considered that on the state of the province, but he (Lord John Russell) hoped they were tranquil. There was, however, no doubt that numerous meetings had been held throughout the province

Mr. Hume inquired the meaning of the intention to send our troops or the Guards to protect the Governor-General and the colony.

Lord J. Russell replied that there was sufficient military force in the colony

EMIGRATION

Mr. Monsell called attention to the question of emigration with reference to the necessities of Ireland. He recommended a system of emigration as a supplement to the measures introduced, or to be introduced, for the improvement of Ireland.

Mr. J. O'Connell moved an amendment to the effect that emigration was a partial, tardy, and expensive remedy for the evils of Ireland, that it was immediately necessary at present to check the emigration going on, and that the most pressing object to consider was the progress of starvation, disease, and death.

Mr. Hume opposed the amendment.

Sir G. Grey admitted that a well-considered system of emigration would be likely to prove advantageous to the mother country, the colonies, and the emigrants. He considered some of the suggestions made by Mr. Monsell very valuable, and recommended the hon. member to bring them forward in a practical shape, by moving them as clauses to the amended Poor-law Bill; when, he presumed, they would receive the attentive consideration of the Government. As the motion was apparently made to evoke some expression of opinion, he supposed it would not be pressed to a division.

Mr. S. B. Roche, Mr. F. O'Connor, Sir J. Young, Mr. Scully, and Mr. Bourke addressed the House, and a division took place on Mr. J. O'Connel.'s amendment.

For the amendment	..	..	..	..	..	10
Against it	..	..	..	..	..	45
Majority against the amendment						—35

Mr. Monsell's motion for papers was then agreed to without a division.

PRISON DISCIPLINE

Mr. Pearson moved for a select committee to inquire into and report upon the practicability of establishing a uniform system of discipline, primitive, [illegible] and self-supporting, in all prisons under the Act 9 & 10 Victoria.

Sir G. Grey, while objecting to a specially-restricted inquiry extending over the whole field as that proposed by the hon. member, was willing to admit that the motion might come when Parliament should inquire into the question of prison discipline. He would suggest, therefore, that the hon. member should, in the present session that an inquiry into the system of building prisons and of prison discipline should take place, he would not object to it

After some observations from Mr. Roundell Palmer, the debate was adjourned, on the motion of Mr. Brotherton.

The Grant of Land (New South Wales) Bill was read a third time and passed. The Grand Jury Cess (Ireland) Bill passed through committee.

Adjourned at half-past twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House sat from noon till a quarter to six o'clock.

CANADA.

Mr. Hawes brought up and laid on the table papers relative to Canada.

Mr. Roebuck availed himself of the opportunity it afforded him, of entering at some length into the recent state of affairs in Canada; and, with respect to the Indemnity Bill, read an extract of a letter address d to Mr. J. [illegible] from Montreal, containing the following passage:—"The re s of the House of Assembly, with the view of showing [illegible] was not one of race between French and [illegible] measure, [illegible] citizens the principles which took place in favour of the bill were composed of both classes. The hon. gentleman proceeded to detail the forms gone through, on which the bill was founded, which were in strict conformity with the Act of the Imperial Parliament, viz. that being a money bill, the consent of the representative of her Majesty must have been signified previous to its introduction; therefore to throw any responsibility upon any one but the Government itself was impossible. The Canadian Government according to the opinions and wishes of the majority agreed to the proposal—the money to be appropriated being the money of Canada, and not the money of England.

Mr. Peter Borthwick, in a maiden speech, highly approved of the conduct of the Government to the subject, ought not to proceed further, to the delay of the other business before the House.

The Speaker observed that the question before the House was that the Canadian papers do lie on the table. If the hon. member who had risen to order wished to proceed with other business, it was open to him to move that the debate on the question before the House be adjourned.

Mr. Roebuck said he only arose was to relieve the public mind, and not to interfere with [illegible] members. They would be no doubt that the introduction of the Indemnity Bill had the sanction and approval of the head of the Colonial Office. He was not going to enter into the question as to whether the measure was a right or a wrong one, but entreated the House not to be led away from discussion on the subject until the papers were circulated and considered.

Mr. Gladstone concurred in the opinion expressed by Mr. Hawes, and, while he did not impugn the rectitude of intention of the hon. member for Sheffield, or dispute the wisdom of interfering to calm the public mind in this country, still he warn the House against premature interference with [illegible] Canada or other public matters, yet the hon. gentleman had done more to produce the subject. The right honourable gentleman then proceeded to [illegible] question of the Indemnity Bill, and stated that he had a right to assume that it was, whether it was not one of race, if not within the walls, yet out of the walls of the Canadian Parliament, and nothing which had fallen from the hon. gentleman had tended to elucidate that question. He had not been aware that [illegible] we did not arise way to excitement, but that they would examine with dispassionate care every step in the proceedings, and that they would pass no judgment on the responsible Government until they had made themselves fully acquainted with all the facts

Sir G. Grey corrected that the discussion had arisen, and merely rose, not for the purpose of prolonging it, but to say that he did not understand Mr. Roebuck to have said that he questioned the right of the Crown, or that of Parliament, to interfere and tender its advice on matters of this nature, or he should have risen earlier to protest against such doctrine

Mr. Gladstone explained that he had only inferred the questioning of the prerogative of the Crown from the assertion of Mr. Roebuck that the money in question was the money of the colony.

Mr. Newdegate hoped the House would not be led away by the assertions of the majority given by Mr. Roebuck, believing, as he did, that the correct analysis would show different results.

Mr. T. Duncombe thought Mr. Roebuck entitled to thanks for the information he had expressed, but denied that it was necessary to adjourn the question for the House; nothing having occurred to show an intention of acting [illegible] subject matter

The papers were then ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Adderley moved that the next day, being Ascension Thursday, the committee of the House should not sit before two o'clock

Mr. Bright considered that there was a sort of hallucination over the minds of some hon. members, as to the days on which the house should or should not meet. [illegible] with public business, and while he quite agreed that all should regarded the momentous event of Ascension Day with the same feeling, yet he saw no reason why the House should give up its business on that day. After referring to the inconvenience which would result from detaining witnesses in town about to be examined before committees, the hon. gentleman said he opposed the motion on the ground that no one could tell, if the principle were adopted, where it would end. Next year they would have some other hon. member proposing some other day, and then, perhaps, a contention between Englsh, Irish, and Scotch, in favour of their patron saints. He looked upon motions like the present as symptoms of a growing feebleness on the part of the House, and disinclination to do the business of the country.

Sir G. Grey said, the hon. gentleman's proposition originally, as made to him, was, to adjourn to Friday; but he had since informed him that the Government would oppose him, and suggested the pursuing the same course as was usual on Ash Wednesday

Mr. Simeon [illegible] de up his mind to attend divine service on Ascension Day, but was willing to [illegible] on his committee after that time until six o'clock

After a few words from Mr. Baillie in explanation, and from Mr. S. Crawford, the motion was agreed to.

The House went into committee on the Landlord and Tenant Bill, four amendments being [illegible] on clauses and proposed amendment

THE O'BRIEN.

On the resumption [illegible] house, Lord John Russell moved that the record of the judgment in the case of Mr. W. S. O'Brien be printed, giving notice that he should [illegible] them on Friday; and, further, that Mr. W. S. O'Brien be expelled [illegible] Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY.—MR. HUDSON'S STATEMENT.

Mr. Divett presented a petition from thirty-one shareholders in the Eastern [illegible] praying that the House would appoint a committee to investigate the allegations contained in the petition, and therefore it would be unnecessary to [illegible] statement of the charges in detail. The prayer of the petition [illegible] proved, expel that hon member from the House.

The petition was read by the Clerk at the [illegible]

Mr. Chanters also presented a petition from sixty shareholders in the Eastern Counties Railway Company, complaining generally of the mismanagement of the affairs, and stating that that mismanagement commenced almost as soon as Mr. Hudson and Mr. Wallington, both members of the House, had become vice chairman and deputy-chairman of the company, and had also taken [illegible] Mr. Bagshawe, another member of the House, was upon the five petition concluded, like the former one, by a prayer that an inquiry [illegible] into the conduct of each of those two gentlemen

Mr. Hudson then rose and appeared as deeply affected, that he was [illegible] proceed for a few moments. He said he came down to that House impressed with a copy of the petition from the hon. member, although a considerable difficulty, owing to a severe domestic affliction (Loud cries of "hear"). He thought he was, therefore, entitled to the indulgence [illegible] members of the House while he offered to it some explanation, and observation with reference to those two petitions which had just been presented House. (Repeated cries of "Hear, hear.") If he had been guilty of the practices which had been imputed to him with respect to the capital and the revenue, without fair and sufficient reason, it might be, perhaps, that he had done so through some error, but he could assure the House that it was not an intentional error on his part. (Hear, hear.) His first connexion with the company was in 1845, he believed in the month of October. Upon his accession to the office, he devoted himself as anxiously and as [illegible] duties as he possibly could. (Cheers.) He believed that the first [illegible] was that he had raised the dividend for the first half-year from 3s. to 3s. [illegible] many changes in the circumstances of the affairs of the [illegible] were the facts? The gross income for the half year ending July [illegible] £114,000, and in the next half-year it had risen to £173,000, showing an increase of nearly £60,000. He (he said that the House would consider that was some justification for giving a higher dividend. No two persons seemed to agree as to the accounts. As far as the dividend was concerned, he thought there was no room for recommending the one he had. It was said that the capital had been raised from £8,000,000 to £10,000,000. That was not the truth [illegible] was said that the capital of that company when he joined it was £2,900,000, and £4,000,000 the Northern and Eastern company, but instead of the general [illegible] it was £4,200,000, while the addition of a bonus of £1,000,000 increased [illegible] £5,200,000 or £5,500,000. He had to complain most deeply of the unfair proceedings of the committee of investigation. He had no notice upon whatever with respect to it. He had no knowledge of what was passing in that committee—no information was furnished to him except three or four written questions. He had no notice that such a charge was to be made against him as an individual; and when he called upon them yesterday morning with a friend, to see the real position in which he was placed—to see the documents which purported to be in his handwriting, and some of the figures of which it was said he had altered—he had great difficulty in seeing that document; and when he did see it, he was told that no other person should be permitted to see it but himself. When they did consent to let him see it, two of the committee came into the room, and said they only gave him that permission that he should ask no questions nor receive any information. Now what did the House think of such conduct as that? (Hear.) He was sure but one opinion would prevail among Englishmen with respect to that—name ly, that he should have fair and just information first-hand before [illegible] a specific charge was made against him, in order that he might have a fair opportunity of answering it. (Hear.) But what did the House believe? that on the testimony of the two gentlemen who were present—and allusion was to be made to the forged hundreds of sheets to prove the same—that not one figure in that document was in his handwriting. (Cheers.) He understood that the document had been altered by him at all. (Hear, hear.) As far as he could understand the charge made in the report by the accountants was, that he had altered the sum of £5,000, and turned it into capital. [illegible] that, in his individual capacity, had altered the figures at all. But with respect to the mistake which he had committed, he cautioned the House not to pay too much credence to that committee. It was stated by that committee that [illegible] £15,000 of revenue had been [illegible] capital. He had no hesitation in saying that he did not authorise anything of the kind. But this committee seemed to be a singular one indeed, for he found, from looking at the working expenses of the line, that the published account showed that those working expenses were £1,250 per mile. The committee made those working expenses £1,950 per mile. This was brought forward as [illegible] as a new statement; and it was suggested that he had done so to [illegible] profit, but it totally denied it. Let hon. gentlemen search the same register [illegible] the company, and they would find it was inserted without [illegible] the stock. As soon as his name was top stared when he first joined [illegible] (Hear, hear.) He still held the stock which he first owned when [illegible] company (Hear, hear.) He did not know any other point which called for explanation. The accountant stated distinctly that any alteration that was made by the directors; therefore a petition ought not to have been directed against him (Mr. Hudson) alone, but against the directors as a body. He threw himself upon the House; he was perfectly ready to say to any decision it might come to; he denied that he had sought to [illegible] the shares, or to give an undue value to them. The House would see from a report that had been published this month another company had placed £150,000 to capital, which ought to go to revenue, and that chairman, Mr. Samuda, himself a member of the committee, was not extolled by them. (Hear, hear.) He had no other explanation to give than in his individual capacity, he denied that he had sought to [illegible] the shares, or to give an undue value to them. The House would see from a report that had been published this month another company had placed £150,000 to capital, which ought to go to revenue, and that chairman, Mr. Samuda, himself a member of the committee, was not extolled by them. (Hear, hear.) He had no other explanation to give than in his individual capacity, he denied that he had sought to [illegible] the shares, or to give an undue value to them in any way in the paper.

Mr. Wardsworth said, with respect to what had fallen from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hudson) in reference to the alteration of the document now before him, he (Mr. Wardsworth) was willing to admit that the entries were in his handwriting, he had nothing more to say upon the point.

Mr. Hudson again rose, and said the House would like him to explain a matter which he had forgotten to mention. He was merely going to show the incorrectness of the report of the committee respecting the account of money [illegible] capital and over to revenue and capital. The Commissioners had forgotten that £725,000, arising to the rules laid down for the working of the line, was due from another company to the Eastern Counties, and not £1,450,000, as stated in the report, which account to have been carried to revenue. This showed that they were wrong in this as well as in other matters. Besides, they had put figures down three times over, and therefore the House could not place much confidence in the report.

After a few words from Mr. Bagshawe, the [illegible]

The Land Improvement and Drainage (Ireland) Bill was read a second time and passed.

The Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill was read a second time and adjourned.

On Sunday the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, Under-Sheriffs, and their ladies, attended divine service in full state at the church of All-hallows, barking, in the ward of Tower, where a sermon preached by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of London, in aid of the funds of the charity-schools of the city ward, when the sum of £150 was collected.

Queen Victoria Orphan Asylum.—On Wednesday the governors and friends of this excellent institution dined together at the Albion Tavern, Aldersgate-street, Thomas Alcock, Esq., M.P., in the chair, supported by the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, the Chamberlain, John Edward Johnson, Esq., Treasurer of Bridewell Hospital; Rev. Robert Bickersteth, and other influential gentlemen. After the customary toasts, the Chairman introduced "the British Orphan Asylum" as the name of the company, and stated that there were nearly one hundred children in the institution, some of them from India, from Canada, and from Ireland, as well as from various parts of England, and asked for a liberal and generous public support. The honourable chairman then alluded to the good conduct of a number of the young persons who had been educated in the asylum, and were now engaged in different employments. After the cloth was removed, a number of the children, whose appearance and demeanour excited much interest. They were then addressed with much feeling by Mr. Chamberlain Brown; and, after walking round the room, they retired, to meet again in the morning at the company. Upwards of £700—including £21 from the chairman; £10 10s from the sheriffs, &c.—were contributed during the evening, principally for the building fund.

His Excellency the Turkish Ambassador, whose first reception at Court took place on Monday next, the 21st inst., intends to give [illegible] balls during the present season.

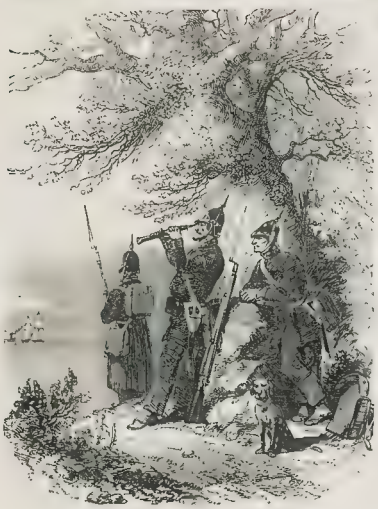
Earl Grey has just disposed of his fine Horton estate, near Wooler, to Mathew Culley, Esq., of Newberry Tower, for a sum little short of £50,000

The Irish Peasantry.—The declaration of Father Mathew's opinion concerning the judgment of the inferior courts against Smith O'Brien and his companions has been communicated to the prisoners; but nothing has yet transpired as to their ultimate destination. Lord Clarendon has [illegible] and rumour says it is in connexion with their fate.

Father Mathew.—An act of remarkable munificence has been performed by one of the merchant princes of Liverpool. Father Mathew's life is insured some years since for several thousand pounds, as security for the expenses of his temperance movement. He received notice from the Insurance Company that in going to America he would have to pay a fine of £300 for the increased risk. But where was the worthy friar to get such a sum. pension, he consumed by the premium of insurance on his life? That veteran philanthropist, practical philanthropist, Mr. Alexander Balfour, of Liverpool, on hearing of Mr Mathew's difficulty, and, unsolicited, sent the good friar £300, saying that the friends of temperance should be responsible for the debts which its apostle had contracted.

O'Connell's Library.—The library of Daniel O'Connell is to be sold by auction on the 22nd instant, being of no use to any members of his family. It is a very extensive and well-selected law library down to 1845, when the reports stop, just at the time he devoted himself to Parliamentary affairs entirely. The miscellaneous library is exactly of the kind which one would expect O'Connell to have had. It contains a good deal of the best of the classics, which would pass its owner as conversant in the subjects of the day. Few of the books are of a profound or recondite character; they are by design descriptive and superficial. Lot 1146 is the gem of the collection. It consists of 7 volumes of the cases, from 1785 to 1806, in which O'Connell was employed counsel, with brief notices (some of them "cases" of the various judges, Lords Ellenborough, Kenyon, Erskine, Curran, O'Grady, and others with them are his cash-books of income and expenditure down to 1806, certainly a curious lot, and will fetch a high [illegible]

Gutta Percha Boat.—On Monday evening, great interest was excited at Newcastle, by a race on the Tyne, between an ordinary wooden skiff, [illegible] and one made of gutta percha, by Mr. Taylor, of the Close. Mr. Taylor [illegible] the services of Mr. Henry Cooper, who, however, had to row against no rivals, the wooden boat being manned by the crew of the Percy. "Gutta Percha," for by that name the new boat is called, is 30 feet long, by 3 broad; she kept ahead throughout the race, and thus beat the "wooden walk."



OUTPOST ON THE BALTIC COAST.

THE SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN WAR.

The Holsteiners are making victorious progress in this struggle. On the morning of the 7th inst., General Bonin, with the Holstein troops, attacked the enemy between the villages of Bert and Gudsoe, and, after a sharp battle of seven hours' duration, drove them out of every one of their positions. The defeated Danes retreated, after setting fire to the village of Gudsoe. The Holsteiners gained possession of the bridge of Snoghol, opposite the island of Fühnen, and leading to the town and fortress of Fredericia, in Jutland, and they bivouacked within gunshot of that place.

The loss of the Schleswig troops was 70 killed and wounded. The number of captured Danes is mentioned to be 16. There are as yet no accounts of any hostile proceedings against the fortress of Fredericia. It [illegible] action at Veile, we learn that the [illegible] under General Reye, were, on the 7th instant, a few miles north of Kolding; that they were attacked by the Prussians, and, with but slight resistance, driven back upon Veile. The loss of the Prussians is stated at 25 men killed and wounded. Among them is a Major of the 7th Rifles

An artistic Correspondent has favoured us with the accompanying pair of characteristic sketches of a Schleswig-Holstein Outpost on the coast of the Baltic. In one of these, the guard are on the look-out; in the other, they are raising an alarm signal. The locality of both scenes is in Sunderwitt, near the Duppler bulwarks, where the troops are yet posted.

IRELAND.

Emigration.—Within the last week several first-class sailing packets moved off from the Custom-house Quay, Dublin, for New York, with the full number of passengers prescribed by the American laws for each ship to carry; and at present there are three or four more taking in luggage and receiving on board detachments of the rural population, all of whom are eager in their flight from the country. Last year and the year before, the class of emigrants that proceeded to America was almost exclusively composed of cottiers, agricultural labourers, and mechanics, whose passage had been provided by their landlords. Few of the farmer or the shopkeeper grades, although alarmed at the spread of destruction with which they were surrounded, had resolved to fly with the remnant of their industry, which they still retained; and, hoping for better times, they braved the calamity for another year; but now, and for the last two months of April and March, a most important change has been introduced in the rapid flight of emigrants from Ireland to the United States. The last packet-ship that left the Dublin port for New York was the Zebra, and a general idea of the rank and circumstances of those who are now escaping from the Irish shores may be formed when it is stated that every berth in her first cabin was occupied; and had there been space for the accommodation of as many more there would have been no difficulty in filling it with occupants of highly respectable classes. The passengers in the first cabin comprised men of medical and legal professions, shopkeepers, graziers, and substantial farmers. The second cabin was occupied by about one hundred persons, many of whom, from their own merits and acquirements, and the society in which they were entitled to move, were in no respect less respectable than the parties in the first cabin; but, forming family groups of four, five, and six, they could not be all accommodated. These carried with them letters of credit and bills of exchange on New York to a very considerable amount. The steerage passengers comprised four descriptions of persons—farmers who held about thirty acres of land and under; shopkeepers on a small scale in provincial towns; mechanics of various handicrafts; and agricultural labourers.

Awful Mortality in Ballinasloe.—Out-door relief had been withheld in Ballinasloe union until the Poor-Law Commissioners very recently constrained the guardians to grant it. The consequence has been a terrible mortality in the greatly over-crowded workhouses. The Ballinasloe Star says:—"Four hundred and ninety paupers (a clergyman to-day assures us the number really was 609) have died, according to the workhouse returns, in the week ending Saturday, the 5th instant."

The Cholera.—The cholera is on the decline in Nenagh, Galway, Ballinasloe, Belfast, Armagh, and Newry. It is very questionable whether the disease at any time was of a more formidable complexion than that of severe dysentery, brought on and aggravated by want.

OUTPOST ON THE BALTIC COAST.

The Portuguese Government, by decree dated the 20th of April last, has declared all vessels trading with the Cape de Verd Islands exempt from the customary tonnage dues.

Employment on Railways.—The total number of persons employed on all the railways in England and Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, on the 1st day of May, 1848, was 188,177, including 102 secretaries, 93 managers, 21 treasurers, 405 engineers, 1837 superintendents, 243 storekeepers, 145 accountants, 88 cashiers, 306 draughtsmen, 887 clerks, 20,087 artificers, 147,325 labourers, 119 inspectors, 76 land surveyors, 6250 miners or gaugemen, 685 firemen, 71 policemen, 256 plate-layers. The length of line in course of construction at the same period was 2365 miles, 4¾ chains. The length of line not in progress of construction, 4429 miles, 67½ chains; and the total length authorised, but not open, 7367 miles, 72 chains.

TUMULT IN BERLIN.

The Prussian capital has of late been the scene of collisions between the troops and the people. On the evening of the 27th ult., the centre of the tumult was the large irregular space called the Domhofs-platz, in front of the Second Chamber, and the Leipziger-strasse, which stretches from it to the Potsdam-gate. The people turned off the gas all along the Leipziger-strasse, and at the corner where the Charlotten-strasse crosses it there was an attempt to erect a barricade. In a surprisingly short time it was raised into a dangerous-looking obstacle; but the interference of some of the citizens sufficed to stop its progress, and it was removed without the interference of the military. The large tubs that stand in the streets filled with water, and which, in Berlin, supply (very imperfectly) the place of mains and pipes in case of fire, were rolled together; the planks that cross the deep drains at all the corners were torn up; and this dismantling process, added to the darkness in the whole street, usually well lit, and exhibiting by night, from its length, a fine perspective, gave everything a wild and desolate look. Another barricade was built at the junction of the Markgrafen and Leipziger streets, and here the pavement was in part torn up. On the approach of a detachment of troops, who gave the signal usual before firing, the people at work on it fled, and it was removed by the soldiers. Another, still more formidable, was raised in the Petri platz, and from here, at half-past ten, three or four shots were fired. The points at which the barricades were raised, or half-raised, were soon in possession of the troops, who also appeared at every other point likely to be attacked; and these movements of detachments continued till a late hour. The crowds gradually dispersed. The evening was in every respect precisely like one of those which preceded the fatal 18th of March.

Next day, the 28th, did not pass off quietly. During the forenoon, crowds assembled again on the Domhofs-plats, and at one o'clock a body of cavalry was ordered to clear it, which it did with as little violence as possible. The people, however, returned, and the manœuvre had to be repeated more than once during the afternoon. The process did not improve the temper either of the soldiers or the people, and towards evening the men used their sabres, and many persons were seriously wounded.

At nine o'clock there were crowds on the Domhofs-platz, and bodies of cavalry patrolled the Leipziger-strasse and the side streets, which they succeeded in keeping clear. The approaches to the Domhofs-platz were completely commanded by patrols of cavalry. A great number of arrests were made, and in the repeated attempts to clear the Platz many persons were wounded. The troops acted under very distinct orders; the officers were forbidden to enter into any parley or conference with the crowd, but, after the legal signal given, to fire at once if it was not obeyed.

The most serious collision took place in front of the Conversations-Halle, a café close to the entrance of the Second Chamber, and on the same side of the square. It is used by the deputies of the Left as their place of meeting for party consultations. The café was, nevertheless, cleared by the police of all persons found in it: at the moment, the body of one man, and another person in a dying state, were brought into the entry, and the police seized all the papers of the deputies.

The accompanying Illustration shows the Domhofs-platz, with the troops and constables clearing the square. The house on the right, with the statues on the roof, is the Hardenberg Palace, in the inner court of which the Hall of the Second Chamber is built. The other house in the centre, with the balcony, is the Conversations-Halle, the café where the Deputies of the Opposition used to meet, and in front of which the tumult began. The low buildings in the foreground are the temporary sheds built for the carpenters employed in fitting up the Chamber, and which have not been removed.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

GENERAL SIR ROBERT THOMAS WILSON, COLONEL OF THE 15TH DRAGOONS.

This highly distinguished officer died suddenly of a disease of the heart, on the morning of the 9th instant. His career had been a most eventful one. Born in 1775, the youngest son of Benjamin Wilson, the painter, he joined, at an early age, as a volunteer, the army of the Duke of York in Flanders, and was appointed Cornet in the 15th Dragoons, in April, 1794. He served all these campaigns, and participated in the principal battles and actions till the return of the cavalry. For his conduct in the affair at Villers en Couche, 24th April, 1794, he received from the Emperor of Austria the gold medal and ribband of Maria Theresa. In the following October he became Lieutenant, and before the close of the year obtained his troop. During the Irish rebellion, he acted on the staff as Aide-de-Camp to General St. John, and in 1799 proceeded to Holland, where he took part in all the principal operations. In 1800, having succeeded to a Majority in Hompesch's Mounted Rifles, he went through Germany and Italy, by Marmora and Cyprus, to Egypt, and was present in all the actions of the Egyptian campaign; he embarked, afterwards, with the expedition for Corfu. The next important service in which the gallant officer was employed, was at the capture of the Cape of Good Hope in 1805. At that period he had attained the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel. He next accompanied Lord Hutchinson to the Continent, and was attached to the Combined Armies, being present at all the operations from Pultusk to Freidland inclusive.

In 1808 Sir Robert went to Portugal, and having raised the Royal Lusitanian Regiment, was engaged in various encounters with the enemy in Castile and Estremadura, during, and for several months subsequent to, the retreat of the British from Spain. Shortly after he was directed to take the command of the advanced guard of Beresford's army, then in pursuit of Marshal Soult; and within a brief period was placed at the head of a Spanish brigade, which formed the advance of Sir Arthur Wellesley's forces in Spain. At Talavera Sir Robert was posted with infantry and guns, but without cavalry, two miles in the rear of the enemy's centre. The misconduct, however, of the Spaniards on that memorable day left Wilson totally without support, and, not knowing that he could effect a junction with the main body of the English, he trusted to his local knowledge for escape, and made for the mountains. Bursting through the purauers that hemmed him in upon all sides, he reached Bejar, in the valley of the Tormez, and was brought in contact with Ney on his march to Valladolid. The consequences was a battle at Banos, where the enemy, composed of 12,000 foot, 1500 horse, and 30 guns, were held in check for nine hours by the heroic English commander, who had with him neither guns nor cavalry, and only 3000 infantry.

From this date to the close of the war Sir Robert acted as British Military Commissioner at the head-quarters of the Allied Armies on the Continent, and participated in the chief occurrences of the eventful years 1812, 1813, and 1814. At Lutzen he rallied, in person, a Prussian detachment, and carried the village of Gros Gorschen. In 1816, Sir Robert aided, in conjunction with Mr. Bruce and Mr. Hutchinson, the escape of Lavalette from Paris, and suffered, in consequence, a short imprisonment and a reprimand from the Commander-in-Chief. In two years after, at the general election, he was returned to Parliament for the borough of Southwark—defeating, after a severe contest, the Ministerial candidate, Mr. Barclay; and in the House of Commons he asserted, with the same manly spirit that had characterised his military career, the boldest principles of liberty and reform.

The proceedings instituted, not long after, against Queen Caroline found in Sir Robert Wilson a determined opponent; and, at her Majesty's funeral, he attended on horseback, as a mark of respect to her memory. This decided step excited the anger of the Court, and a notice appeared in the Gazette of 20th September, 1821, announcing that "the King had been pleased to remove Sir Robert Wilson from the British army." The electors of Southwark, headed by the Marquis of Tavistock, the Hon. Grey Bennet, Sir Francis Burdett, and Mr. Lambton, immediately met, and opened a general public subscription, to indemnify the gallant officer for the loss of his commission. This contribution amounted, in a short time, to £10,000. Sir Robert demanded, but in vain, a court-martial, and was also refused a Parliamentary inquiry

In 1823 he left England to join the patriotic forces in Spain, and was wounded in the thigh while repelling, at the head of the garrison, an attack of the French on Corunna. On the accession of William IV., Sir Robert was restored to his rank in the army, and in 1841 became full General. In the following year he was appointed Governor of Gibraltar, and held that important office until 1848. Sir Robert Wilson was author of "An Historical Account of the British Expedition to Egypt, 1802;" "An Inquiry into the Present State of the British Army, 1804;" "An Account of the Campaign in Poland, and Remarks on the Russian Army;" and "Sketch of the Military and Political Power of Russia." He married Miss Belford, niece of Sir Adam Williamson, and by her (who died 12th August, 1833) has left issue.

On Tuesday, the mortal remains of this gallant officer were interred, at noon, in the family vault in the north aisle of Westminster Abbey. The funeral procession left Lady Parker's residence in Bentinck-street, at half-past eleven o'clock. On reaching the western entrance to the Abbey, the body was received by the Rev. John Jennings and the Rev. Temple Frere, canons, and the principal functionaries connected with the Abbey. The funeral service was impressively delivered by the Rev. Canon Jennings, the mourners on the solemn occasion being Mr. B. H. Wilson (son of the deceased General), Mr. E. L. Wilson, the Rev. H. Randolph, the Rev. J. Saint, Captain Wallis, Mr. Bruce, Mr. Keate, the Rev. C. Stewart, Captain Bruce, Colonel B. Wilson, Colonel Cox, Captain Walker, the Rev. W. Randolph, the Rev. F. Curtis, Mr. Ridgway, the Rev. E. Randolph, Mr. R. E. Wilson, and the Rev. F. Randolph. The coffin, which was covered with fine black cloth with gilt ornaments, the plate bearing a lengthened enumeration of his honours and services, having been lowered into the vault, the burial service was concluded, and the parties retired.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR JASPER NICOLLS, K.C.B.

Sir Jasper died on the 4th inst., at his seat in Berkshire. His military services were of great distinction and long duration. So early as 1793 he entered the army as Ensign in the 40th Foot, and was soon actively employed. During the Mahratta war he served under Lord Lake, and was present at the battle of Agraum and at the storming of Gawalghur. In 1805, being then Major, he joined Lord Cathcart's army in Hanover, and in the next year proceeded with the expedition, under General Craufurd, to South America, where he commanded a column at the assault on Buenos Ayres. In 1808 he embarked for Spain. In 1809 he had under his orders a battalion of the 14th Foot at Corunna, and soon after proceeded to Walcheren. Subsequently, he served many years in the East Indies, and, during the Nepaul war, commanded the force that conquered the province of Kumawn in 1815. At the siege of Bhurtpore, Major-General Nicolls led the second infantry division which carried the left breach, and for this eminent service was made a Knight Commander of the Bath. From 1839 to 1843 the gallant officer held the high appointment of Commander-in-Chief in India. By his death the Colonelcy of the 8th Foot becomes vacant.

Sir Jasper married, 21st September, 1809, Anne, eldest daughter of the late Thomas Stanhope Badcock, Esq., of Little Messenden Hall, Bucks, and had by her one son, Francis Hastings Gustavus Nicolls, and eight daughters.

MARY, LADY DE SAUMAREZ.

Mary, Baroness de Saumarez, died at Cheltenham on the 12th instant. Her Ladyship was second daughter of the late Vice-Admiral William Lechmere, of Steeple Aston, in Oxfordshire. Her marriage to James, present Lord de Saumarez, took place 5th October, 1814, but produced no issue.

SIR ADAM DRUMMOND, KT., K.C.H., ADMIRAL OF THE BLUE.

This distinguished officer, whose death is just announced, entered the Royal Navy 22nd March, 1784, and, having obtained his commission of Lieutenant, bore a part, while commanding the Petrel, in the active operations of Commodore Nelson's squadron on the coast of Italy, in 1796. In 1799 he became Post Captain, and assisted at the bombardment of Alexandria. In 1808 he captured Le Renard, French privateer; in 1830 was promoted to the rank of Rear-Admiral; and in 1846, to that of full Admiral.

The gallant officer was born in 1770, the third son of Colin Drummond, Esq., of Megginch, county Perth, by Katherine his wife, daughter of Oliphant of Rossie. His next younger brother is the distinguished military commander, Sir Gordon Drummond, G.C.B. The Drummonds of Megginch and Lennoch are a branch of the illustrious House of Drummond, being lineally descended from Sir Maurice Drummond, of Concraig, second son of Sir Malcolm Drummond, 10th Thane of Lennox, ancestor of the Earls and Dukes of Perth.

Sir Adam married, in 1801, Lady Charlotte Murray, eldest daughter of John 4th Duke of Athol, and widow of Sir John Menzies, Bart., by whom he has left issue; the eldest son being John Murray Drummond, Esq., now of Megginch Castle.

GENERAL THE HON. SIR EDWARD PAGET, G.C.B., GOVERNOR OF CHELSEA HOSPITAL.

This gallant officer, fourth son of the late Earl of Uxbridge, and brother of the Marquis of Anglesey, died at his residence, Oakfield Lodge, Isle of Cowes Park, Isle of Wight, on the 13th instant, aged 73. His military services extended over an important period of our history. In 1794, having obtained a Lieutenant-Colonelcy in the 28th Foot, he served with that regiment the campaign in Flanders and Holland. He was subsequently on active duty in the Mediterranean, at the capture of Minorca, in Egypt, Sicily, and Sweden. From the last he returned to England in 1808, and was immediately sent to Portugal, where he received from Sir Hugh Dalrymple the command of the advanced corps of his army. In the campaign in Spain he had under his orders the reserve of Sir John Moore's forces, and was present at the battle of Corunna. Shortly after he was appointed to the staff in the Peninsula, with the local rank of Lieutenant-General, and commanded the left wing of the army. General Paget conducted the advance from Coimbra to Oporto, and, at the latter place, lost his right arm, which occasioned his return to England. He afterwards acted as second in command to Lord Wellington, but was unfortunately taken prisoner in the retreat of the army from Burgos, in 1813. His capture by the enemy from the very midst, as it were, of the army was a very remarkable occurrence. It appears that as the British columns were advancing, the badness of the roads and the swelling of the rivulets caused an interval of about half a mile between them, when Sir Edward Paget, riding alone to the rear to learn the cause of this separation, was taken unawares and carried off by a party of French, whom the badness of his sight would not allow him to distinguish.

Sir Edward was, at the period of his decease, a full General in the army, Colonel of the 28th Foot, Governor of Chelsea Hospital, a Commissioner of the Royal Military College, a Knight Grand Cross of the Bath, and of the Tower and Sword. He married, first, 22nd May, 1805, the Hon. Francis Bagot, fourth daughter of William, first Lord Bagot; and, secondly, 22nd February, 1815, Lady Harriet Legge, daughter of George, third Earl of Dartmouth. By the former, who died in childbirth, 30th May, 1806, he had one son, the Rev. Francis Edward Paget, Rector of Elford, in Staffordshire; and by the latter, who still survives, he had three sons, Major Henry William Paget, Captain Patrick Paget, Grenadier Guards, and Edward Heneage Paget, and five daughters, the eldest of the latter being the present Marchioness of Ormonde.

It is arranged that a special steamer shall convey the remains of the deceased veteran from East Cowes to Southampton on Saturday afternoon (this day); thence they will be forwarded by the South-Western Railway, and deposited in Chelsea Hospital, where the funeral will take place, with military honours, on Monday.

THE LATE SIR EDWARD PAGET, GOVERNOR OF CHELSEA HOSPITAL.

THE ANGEL INN, ST. CLEMENT'S.

This curious relic of the hostel of centuries since exists in the parish of St. Clement Dane's, in the Strand. It presents a specimen of the galleried innyard, of which there are few remaining in the metropolis. The gables would also point to a distant age, were there not historical data of nearly three centuries since to attest its antiquity.

FATHER MATHEW LEAVING CORK FOR AMERICA.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

When John Hooper, one of the most venerated martyrs of the Reformation, was, in 1550, appointed Bishop of Gloucester, he objected to the use of the episcopal dress; and, by way of overcoming his reluctance, the was confined to his own house, and finally committed, during some months, to the Fleet Prison. The matter was, however, compromised. In 1552 he received the bishopric of Worcester as commendam. While he was bishop he was "beloved of many;" but when Queen Mary came to the throne, in July, 1553, he was pursuivanted up to London, in the latter end of August, and committed to the Fleet, where remaining some months, he was, at length, examined several times, and required to recant his opinions; but standing constant and resolute to them, he was condemned to be burnt, in January, 1555. It was expected that he would have accompanied Rogers, a prebendary of St. Paul's, to the stake; but Hooper was led back to his cell, and learned that as was to be carried back to Gloucester, to suffer among his own people. The next morning (says the narrative) he was roused at four o'clock, and being conducted to the [illegible] of the Queen's Guard, they took him, before it was light, to the Castle, St. Cenge Us, then standing in the ditch, and there he was taken to [illegible], and burnt on the 9th of February. This last record not only associates the Inn with a very interesting historical event, but does so in the moral condition of the locality.

FATHER MATHEW is about leaving our shores, to advocate the good cause of temperance in the United States of North America; and the [illegible] departure is known in the accompanying Illustration

Father Mathew [illegible] at Charleston, Cork, on the forenoon of Tuesday last, when the farewell was witnessed. On Friday [illegible] throughout the city, the Father's house was surrounded by crowds [illegible] receive his parting benediction; and in the evening he was visited by a great number of friends.

On Saturday morning, at a very early hour, the quay began to fill with troops of disciples from the different Temperance Rooms of Cork. Although the weather was not propitious, the banners and bands of the respective societies were in requisition. At ten o'clock, Father Mathew proceeded to the coach-office, and started for Dublin, and Mallow, where he purposes to remain for a few days previous to his departure for Liverpool. After a short [illegible] with Mr. W. Dalthorne, of that city, he was to start per Acheron liner for America. May Heaven prosper his voyage!

ments for their children, sums of money at death to cover the expenses of burial, the establishment of a home for female servants out of place, a model lodging-house for male servants, and a general registry of servants. All these objects are excellent; and the means by which it is proposed to carry them out seem to us in the highest degree praiseworthy. For the purchase of annuities and endowments the means are already provided by an act passed in the third year of King William IV., the provisions of which are little known to the public, and a proper knowledge of which it was one of the objects of the meeting to extend; while, as regards the establishment of homes, lodging houses, and a registry, the society, thus happily inaugurated, will undertake the task, aided by the contributions of the public. The questions of our treatment of domestic servants, and of their treatment of themselves, are not only highly interesting but deeply important. Servants form, it appears, the most numerous class of the people. Their numbers amounted, in 1841, to 168,701 in London alone; and, in all probability, they are not far short of 200,000 at the present time. In 1841 their numbers in England and Wales, including the metropolis, amounted to 970,000, and must very considerably exceed a million in 1849. As his Royal Highness stated, and as Lord John Russell and other speakers also remarked, in similar language, "all rightly constituted minds feel the deepest interest in the welfare of this class. They minister to us in all the wants of daily life—they attend us during sickness—they receive us on our first appearance in the world—they extend their care to our mortal remains, when Death visits our households—they live under our roofs, and form a part of our family. Yet servants, except they have the good fortune to serve long in families of the highest opulence, are, in the majority of cases, in no position to make a provision for their old age. By the Act of William IV., they and others are enabled to purchase deferred annuities for small annual payments. If they die before the annuities become due, their payments will be restored to their heirs; and if they choose to discontinue their payments, they can have the whole amount of their payments returned to them, without interest. "If," as Lord John Russell remarked, "we can contribute, by means of this society, to bring servants into communication with the means by which their old age may be rendered more comfortable and happy, it will not be a gratuitous benefit, but a return for benefits which we ourselves have received from that class. There has hitherto, we must confess, been more, not exactly of estrangement, but of coolness, between masters and servants in this country than is consistent with pure Christianity. There has been, what the Bishop of Oxford calls "familiarity without confidence, intercourse without affection, and service rendered on the one side as a pecuniary obligation, and received on the other as a simple right."

The general objects of this society—if it be successful, as it deserves, and as we trust it will be—must go far to replace these feelings by better ones on both sides. If we might suggest any thing to its conductors, it is, that in their homes for female servants they will not lose sight of the necessity of instruction in household work of all kinds. Much annoyance and vexation are caused in families of the middle classes by the utter ignorance of young persons, who accept situations without the slightest knowledge of their business; who can neither cook, nor wash, nor scour, nor sew, nor do the most ordinary work without receiving a long course of training from their mistresses. In elevating the moral character of servants, and in giving them instruction in the duties they are to fulfil, the Society would not only increase the money value of their services, and thereby add to the comfort of the class in their youth and in their old age, but would aid to the extent of their ability in the removal of an evil of a most serious and irritating kind. Perhaps, however, this is part of the scheme, though not stated in the published reports of the meeting: if so, the society seems to us to leave nothing to desire; except that it shall be supported to the fullest extent by the class most interested, and by the contributions of the public in those portions of its operations which do not depend upon the annual payments of servants themselves.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Monday, the Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by their respective suites, made a state visit to Windsor Castle, and returned to town the same day.

The Royal children take their usual out-of-door exercise daily.

The Queen, accompanied by the Prince and Princess of Saxe-Coburg, Prince Alfred, Prince Philip of Saxe-Coburg, and Prince Augustus of Saxe-Coburg, took an ordinary drive with four horses in the course of Wednesday, in an open carriage and four. General Wemyss attended on horseback.

Her Majesty and the Prince Consort took their usual morning drive on Thursday with their illustrious relatives, the Prince and Princess Augustus of Saxe-Coburg. The Queen held a dinner party in the evening, which included the Duchess of Kent and the Prince and Princess Augustus of Saxe-Coburg.

THE STATE BALL.

The Queen gave a state ball on the second this season on Monday evening, in Buckingham Palace, to a party of upwards of two hundred, consisting of the members of the Royal Family and foreign Princes and Princesses now in England; all the members of the diplomatic corps and their ladies; the nobility and gentlemen of the Royal household, and a very numerous circle of fashionable acquaintance.

The state saloons were opened for the reception, and were brilliantly illuminated with candelabras, candelabras, and candelabras, the recesses being decorated with choice and beautiful plants in flower, which were also tastefully arranged at the southern end of the Picture Gallery, occupying the whole width and height of the gallery.

The company were invited at half-past nine o'clock, and soon after nine o'clock the visitors began to arrive, alighting both at the entrance in Pimlico and at a temporary entrance in the garden, at which the military guard of honour of the Lord Guards was stationed, with the band of the regiment.

A guard of the Yeomen Guard was on duty in the Grand Hall and Staircase.

The Duchess of Kent arrived at half-past nine o'clock, attended by the Honourable Augusta Bruce, Baroness de Speth, Sir George Couper, and Lord Jane Murray. The Duchess of Cambridge was accompanied by her Royal Highness the Hereditary Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg Strelitz, and was attended by Lady H. Cadogan and Mr. Edmond Madeay. Their Royal Highnesses were conducted to the White Drawing-room, where the Queen and Prince Albert received their illustrious visitors. The Prince and Princess Augustus of Saxe-Coburg joined the august circle. Prince Leopold, Count of Syracuse, was attended by General Prince Castelcicala, the Neapolitan Minister and the Chevalier Colonna. Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar and Prince William of Hesse Philipsthal were also present.

The Duke of Argyll and other Scottish nobles wore the Highland dress.

Shortly before ten o'clock her Majesty and Prince Albert quitted the White Drawing-room, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Kent, the Duchess of Cambridge, the Hereditary Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg Strelitz, the Prince and Princess Augusta of Saxe Coburg, and the Count of Syracuse, and were conducted by the Lord Chamberlain through the saloon into the ball-room. The Queen wore a dress of white and silver tulle illusion, trimmed with bouquets of red and white currants, green leaves, and diamonds. Her Majesty's head dress was formed of a wreath of red and white currants, and diamonds to correspond.

Herr Strauss and his orchestra were stationed in the ball room, and played the National Anthem on the entrance of the Sovereign.

Her Majesty opened the ball with Prince Leopold Count of Syracuse in a quadrille.

The Throne Room was also prepared for dancing. Mr. Weippert's quadrille band attended in the saloon.

The green Drawing-room was appropriated to refreshments during the night. Supper was served in the State Dining-room.

Prince Albert, accompanied by the Hon. C. B. Phipps and Lieut.-Col. the Hon. Alexander Hardinge, presided, on Wednesday, at the Hanover-square Rooms, at the meeting of the Servants' Provident and Benevolent Society.

Lord Cowley, who, for some months past, has been resident at Frankfort, as diplomatic representative of this country, is daily expected to arrive in London.

The French Ambassador has left town for Paris. The first secretary to the Embassy acts as Charge d'Affaires.

The Marchioness of Lansdowne's assembly on Tuesday night, at Lansdowne House, was attended by upwards of 500 of the leading members of the theatrical and literary profession.

Count Palmerston, as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has issued invitations for a grand dinner party to the Ambassadors of the Foreign Ambassadors on Saturday next, in Carlton-terrace.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

ROYAL ORTHOPÆDIC HOSPITAL.—On Tuesday evening the anniversary dinner of this institution took place at the Freemasons' Tavern; the Lord Mayor in the chair. It appeared, from the statement of the committee, that during the twelve months, containing 33 beds, are at the present time full to overflowing, and the number of out-patients in regular attendance is between 600 and 700, there are upwards of 1200 anxiously waiting to be received. Notwithstanding the urgency of these cases, the committee are unable from the want of funds to receive them. Meanwhile, this number is continually on the increase, the fresh applications, including urgent patients, averaging 40 per week. The committee, therefore, earnestly hope that public attention will be drawn to the merits of this very useful and peculiar charity, and the number of its supporters will be much increased. All who may be led to inquire further, and to visit the Hospital and judge for themselves, cannot fail to be convinced, by the surprising nature and amount of the benefits they will there see conferred upon the poor sufferers, of the great value of this Hospital in restoring to the free use of their limbs thousands who were otherwise doomed to a life of helplessness and misery. The total amount of subscriptions announced on this occasion was about £600.

About 60 persons sat down to dinner, and there was a very gratifying assemblage of ladies in the galleries.

ADULT DEAF AND DUMB INSTITUTION.—A meeting was held on Monday, in the board-room of this excellent charity, 26, Red Lion-square, Bloomsbury. From the fifth annual report, it appeared that the superintendents of the several departments had received very encouraging accounts in a manner as to the progress of the pupils in learning the different trades carried on at the institution. There are at present twenty inmates, and it has been found desirable, during the past year, to separate the sexes, and therefore the female pupils; the former are therefore supplied with leather and cloth, which they manufacture at their homes, and bring the articles, after completion, to the institution, whilst the youths work in the establishment, thus avoiding the necessity of bringing the inmates from evil communications from without. A few of the elder workmen cannot wholly support themselves by their labour, and therefore receive temporary relief from the funds of the charity. Upwards of 180 deaf and dumb persons have received temporary relief during the past year, either by supplying them with clothes or money; and all who apply receive casual assistance in the various difficulties into which the deaf and dumb are specially liable to fall. It was stated that, since the printing of the report, some of the inmates had left the institution fully qualified to support themselves by their labour and industry, while others had been received in their place. The applications for admission, however, were far more numerous than the committee could entertain, owing to the want of funds; and a hope was expressed by the meeting that the operation of the benevolent would be adequate in extent to the nature and requirements of the charity.

MOUNT ST. BERNARD HOSPICE, AND LEICESTER-SQUARE SOUP KITCHEN.—We regret to hear that the committee connected with this valuable institution will be under the painful necessity of withholding all further relief to the poor in consequence of the funds being completely exhausted. The number of distressed and truly deserving families will, therefore, be deprived of this timely succour, upon which they have for some period solely depended; and, unless the benevolent extend their immediate aid to the committee, they must discontinue the work of charity—a vast number of our fellow-creatures must inevitably sink from actual want.

ROYAL LITERARY FUND.—The anniversary dinner of this institution took place on Wednesday, at the Freemasons' Tavern, Lord Harding in the chair. Amongst the more distinguished of the guests were Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer, the Hon. W. L. Melville, the Hon. F. Scarlett, M.P., Mr. Monckton Milnes, M.P., Mr. Whiteside, Q.C., Mr. Alison (author of the "History of Europe"), Mr. Jerdan, Mr. Jerrold, Mr. Thackeray (author of "Vanity Fair"), Mr. Cruikshank, &c. The evening was passed in a highly agreeable manner. The total amount of subscriptions announced on the occasion was nearly £300.

SERVANTS' PROVIDENT AND BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.—A meeting in behalf of this society was held on Wednesday at the Hanover-square Rooms. A large assembly, mostly ladies, filled the great room. The objects of the society are—1. To enable servants to secure amidst their fortunes in old age a government security; 2. Endowments for their children at fourteen or twenty-one years of age; 3. A sum of money at death to cover the expense of burial; 4. A home for female servants out of place, and a model lodging for male servants, 5. A registry for servants. From the second annual report it appears that 1,000 new members have been added this year to the list, the increased list attended with complete success. The first consists, then, of 1,000 members of provident members without any entrance fee; and, secondly, in the application of the annual surplus of the benevolent fund to the reduction of the premiums to be paid by the provident members. In May, 1848, there were only seven provident members; there are now no fewer than fifty-eight. Of these, one has contracted for an immediate annuity, and others for deferred annuities, five for endowments, and one for a policy of assurance. The total annual value of the annuities contracted for is £1134; the total annual premium to be paid for the same is £360 15s. 10d.; and the total amount of bonus thus approved by the directors, but not yet complete with the National Debt Commissioners, the annual value of which is £360; and the total annual premium to be paid for the same is £102 9s. 8d. The total sum received by the society from servants for the purchase of annuities during the last year is £1287 18s. 10d.; the total paid by the Society on behalf of servants to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt in the last year is £1,192 12s. 10d.; and the total received from servants.

The society was brought into operation in March, 1845, is £12,5 9s. 7d.; the future of the year exceeded its income by the sum of £243 12s. It is proposed to establish a home for female servants out of place, and a model lodging-house for men servants who do not sleep in their masters' houses, or are out of place. A registry and library will be attached to both the homes and the model lodging-house, and the characters of servants, when duly authenticated, entered in a book and preserved for future reference in the registries. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, who was received with loud applause, took the chair. On the platform were Lord Ebrington, the Bishop of Exeter, the Bishop of Chichester, the Bishop of Salisbury, Lord Ashley, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Archdeacon Manning, the Bishop of London, Sir T. Acland, Lord J. Russell, &c. From the general report it appeared that, in the metropolis alone, there were returned as servants, at the census of 1841, male servants, 39,303; female, 129,401. Total, 168,701; which was nearly one in eleven of its whole population. There were at the same period in England and Wales, including the metropolis, 976,885. The number of the servants who are paupers in our workhouses is lamentably great. The speech of his Royal Highness was highly appropriate, and was enthusiastically received. During the proceedings there was a very liberal subscription made.

RAGGED SCHOOL UNION.—On Tuesday evening the fifth annual meeting of friends and supporters of this society was held in the large room of Exeter Hall, which was crowded in every part. The platform was also very much filled. The attendance of ladies in the body of the hall, and in the galleries was numerous. Amongst those present were the Duke of Argyll, the Marquis of Westminster, Lord Brabazon, Lord Londesborough, &c. The report was read, and the proceedings were opened with prayer. The annual report stated that during the past year the committee had been enabled to extend the usefulness of the industrial branch considerably. The income of the funds was also very remarkable during the year. In the previous year the subscriptions to the Union amounted only to £83, but during that past closed there had been received £433. The donations in the previous year were £30, and in the past year they had extended to the sum of £316. This beneficial increase was after hinted to the committee to the effect produced by a special appeal made on behalf of the Union in Australia—to the establishment of a Ragged School Union Society—and to the appointment of a secretary and collector who devote the whole of their energies to the advancement of the objects of the institution, and to the fact that in consequence of the efforts of their noble chairman, government had adopted the plan of giving outfits and free passages to Australia to the children attending the schools, and had already sent out 150 of the boys and girls attending them. During the past year the society assisted about sixty schools with pecuniary grants; but the amount remained to schools for the next year was upwards of £600, while the income from annual subscriptions was only about £450. There are now 82 ragged schools in operation in London and its suburbs, with an attendance of upwards of 9000 children who are taught by voluntary and paid teachers. Of these schools 28 are open on Sunday evenings, during week evenings and on Sunday. Sewing and industrial classes have been formed in several of the schools, in one of the lowest parts of Westminster (Old Pye-street) the society has had a juvenile refuge and asylum for the past two years; 80 boys and girls are there educated, and to some extent provided with food and clothing. The report concluded with an appeal to the benevolent and the patriotic to contribute towards the funds of the society. From the statement of the receipts and expenditure, it appeared that the receipts from all sources during the year amounted to £4142, which sum, with the exception of a balance in hand of £466, had been expended in the promotion of the immediate objects of the society. A considerable increase in the receipts was anticipated, and new schools were about to be opened. That there are in the metropolis many thousands of poor youths and children, who, from the neglect, the poverty, the desertion, or the loss of parents, are entirely destitute of the means of instruction, appeared from all the evils of ignorance, and to all the allurements of vice; and that free schools for gratuitously erecting and industrial schools, are well deserving the hearty support of all true friends to the poor.—A "that this society, having for its express object the education and support of free evening and industrial schools, is entitled to take a stand among the most valuable and benevolent institutions of our land: that it is the duty of all who are friends of education, to unite in giving for such a great and good work, on the broad protestant basis of the Sacred Bible. Union Chapels and Schools are now instituted on behalf of the institution, and several subscriptions of considerable amount were announced.

IN ROYAL BRAZILIAN MINING ASSOCIATION.—The half-yearly meeting of this association was held on Thursday at the London Tavern; J. Walker, Esq., in the chair. The report stated that the gloomy reports received by the directors from Mr. Henwood, the commissioner of the company abroad, at the commencement of the present year, contrasted with the satisfactory state of the mines at the date of the previous report. This disadvantageous view of the condition of the workings was on the assumption that the mines could not be sunk deeper than the fourteen fathoms, and that the pumps were not equal to the drainage required. In consequence of this state of things, the directors submitted the whole matter to Captain Hitchen, who first advised the purchase of the lease of the Bananal mine, on the assumption that it was practicable to sink the shaft to forty fathoms. Captain Hitchen confirmed the views of the directors, and it had been arranged that this gentleman should go out to Brazil to superintend the mechanical arrangements which were deemed necessary. The auditory statements of receipt and expenditure for the half-year ending the 31st December, 1848, shows a debit balance of £577 4s 10d., instead of £212,172 12s 7d., as it stood at the close of the last half-year. The mines have yielded a surplus for the last six months of £413 18s 2d. In a postscript to the report the directors state that the quantity of gold raised from the 1st of January to the 26th of March amounted to 56lbs. The report was adopted, and the meeting separated, after giving a vote of thanks to the chairman.

NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK OF IRELAND.—A general meeting of this company was held on Thursday, at their offices in Broad-street, Sir J. W. Young, Bart., M.P., in the chair. The report of the directors for the last half-year was read, and alluded to the extraordinary depression of trade and finance of Irish produce during the last year, which had so little favoured banking operations generally. The National Provincial Bank of Ireland were, however, in a position to declare a dividend of 4 per cent. on the last half-year, and the rest or balance of undivided profit amounted to £11,038 16s. 8d. Resolutions, authorising the dividend and re-electing the retiring directors, were passed; and a vote of thanks to the chairman closed the business of the day.

FINANCIAL AND PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

MEETING IN SOUTHWARK.—On Wednesday morning a public meeting of the inhabitants of the borough of Southwark was held in the Town-hall, in pursuance of a requisition addressed to William Prideaux, Esq., the high bailiff, and signed by upwards of 160 electors, for the purpose of considering the best mode of co-operating with, and furthering the views of, the Metropolitan Financial and Parliamentary Reform Association, now fairly established, under the presidency of Sir Joshua Walmsley. The chair was taken by the High Bailiff. Every available space in the Hall was crowded. The following resolutions, and a petition to the Parliament based thereon, were agreed to:—1. "Resolved—That it is the opinion of this meeting that the present system of taxation is based upon erroneous and unjust principles; for while on the one hand it presses unduly upon the labouring and middle classes in the large amount of customs and excise duties levied upon articles of consumption, so on the other hand it exempts parties from taxation who, as owners of real property, are exempted from taxation and legacy duty, although many equitable claims to be so relieved; and they are also of opinion that the expenditure of the public moneys is wasteful and lavish, and ought to be greatly reduced." 2. "That in the opinion of this meeting the present grossly unequitable taxation exist, which are caused by the imperfect representation of the people in the Commons House of Parliament; and, therefore, that the first and most important step is to endeavour to amend the representation, by widening the electoral basis, and causing to be represented persons rather than property, and thus make the House of Commons what the constitution designed it to be, a truer reflex of the minds of the people." 3. "That this meeting cordially approving and earnestly desiring to co-operate with the Metropolitan Financial and Parliamentary Reform Association, established to secure retrenchment in the national expenditure and extension of the franchise, do solemnly call on the electors and inhabitants of this borough to join the district association; and also to adopt the eminently practical suggestion of making as many of the inhabitants of this borough freeholders and voters as possible; it being chiefly by such means that the contest now beginning with the privileged classes will be brought to a triumphant issue."

TEMPNEY AND WHITECHAPEL.—On Wednesday evening a numerously attended meeting of a similar character was held by the inhabitants of the Tower Hamlets, at the King's Arms tavern, Mile-end-road; W. Williams, Esq., late M.P. for Coventry, in the chair. Resolutions in accordance with the object of the meeting were unanimously agreed to amidst much enthusiasm.

At INSBURY, also, a meeting of the same kind was held on Wednesday evening.

ROYAL BOTANIC SOCIETY'S FETE.—On Wednesday, the first fête of the season of the Royal Botanic Society took place at their grounds in the Inner Circle. The weather, in the morning, was very unpromising; but, at two o'clock, when the gates were opened to the general company, the sun shone out, and for the next few hours the gardens were thronged by fashionable company. The form display was very great. The shades were many and the beds were still more abundant, and presented that endless variety of form and tint for which the tribe is celebrated. The pelargoniums were in great force, and offered innumerable choice specimens, many of them quite new. The roses, also, maintained their claim for beauty and sweetness. Those who have an eye for the curious what seeking the beautiful, were gratified by the fantastic features of the orchids, and by the many-coloured tuberous-rooted calceolarias. There were pansies, also, with their English name and association, to show that the Society has not forgotten our native and dazzling strangers; and some graceful ferns—a tribe of plants whose gracefulness is the favour they now receive in modern ornamental grounds. One portion of the gardens was devoted to the display of American plants, where a collection of hydrangeas are now in bloom, and where it appears there is to be a special exhibition of the more remarkable transplanted flowers.

The grand review of the Household Brigade, with the Scots Fusilier Guards from Chelsea, and those two gallant and nightly distinguished regiments, the 42nd or Royal Welch Fusiliers, from Gosport, and the Rifle Brigaders, from Portsmouth, will take place in Hyde Park on her Majesty's birthday, Thursday, the 24th inst. The whole of the troops will be under the command of Lord Frederick Fitzclarence.

The Attorney-General will hold an entertainment to the members of the Bar, in honour of her Majesty's birthday, will take place at the Albion on Saturday (this day).

DEATHS AND DEATHS FOR THE WEEK ENDING MAY 12.—It is satisfactory to observe that the last return indicates a continued tendency in the whole health of the metropolis. The deaths registered in the week appear to be less than the average, the numbers having gradually fallen during four successive weeks from the middle of April, when they were respectively 1069, 1058, 986, and in the last week 953. The result is certainly, notwithstanding recent severe attacks of temperature which in last week was considerably under the average of seven years, though has been much above it during great part of that unmediately preceding. The deaths from zymotic or epidemic diseases, in the aggregate, were 206, and exceeded the average by 8, in the two preceding weeks they were 10 and 16. Of the diseases in this class, which sometimes prevail extensively, whooping cough continues to be fatal to a less number of persons than usual; diarrhœa and dysentery are fatal to 12, or 1 less than the average, showing a decrease for weeks in succession to 3, or only 2 more than the average. Measles, which increases a little, is 33, or 12 in excess of the and scarlatina, which continues to decline, to 40, or 8 in excess. The deaths from bronchitis and pneumonia are only exceeds in a certain to an inconsiderable extent; that from phthisis is in less amount than usual. Death was recorded from influenza. The deaths of two men, one 68 and the other 71 years of age, are described as the result of intemperance, which proceeded in one case typhus fever, and in the other delirium tremens. A man of exceeding great cerebral excitement." The births were 1, METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—The mean height of the barometer during the week was 29.835 in.; the mean daily height was above 30 in. on Saturday, only. The mean daily temperature, was 54.7 deg., on Saturday, continuously fell, to 42.2 deg. on Thursday; on Friday and Saturday it rose to about 47 deg. The mean of the week was 49 deg. 5 min. It was 9.7 deg. below the average of the corresponding week of seven years.

RIOT AT MONTREAL.

BURNING OF THE HOUSES OF ASSEMBLY.

By the mail steam-ship Europa, which arrived in Liverpool on Monday, we have advices of a very serious character to the 21st inst. from Halifax.

The political outbreak, so long threatened, has burst forth at Montreal.

The long delayed sanction of the Governor-General, Lord Elgin, was given on the 25th ult. to the Rebellion Losses Indemnity Bill—a measure which has drawn forth the greatest hostility from the English party in the provinces, and immediately on the populace being made acquainted with the fact their fury knew no bounds.

The occurrences of the afternoon of the 25th were of a truly alarming character. The mob were outside Parliament House in crowds to ascertain the fate of the obnoxious measure. On finding that it had been sanctioned they pelted the Governor, when entering his carriage, with rotten eggs, dirt, &c., amidst a shower of which the vice-regal cortège drove off. An egg struck his excellency in the face. A few hours knew the excitement in the city became uncontrollable, and by o'clock printed notices of a mass meeting, to be immediately held in the Champ de Mars, were issued. Persons were consequently in state of excitement, by driving through the streets in calashes with large bells. The fire bells were brought into requisition. At eight o'clock a crowd of 4000 persons or more assembled, and after strong resolutions had been passed, the cry was raised "To the Parliament buildings!" The enraged multitude immediately rushed through the streets, and by nine o'clock the first stone was thrown through a window into the midst of the Legislative Assembly, at the time in full session. A constant shower was kept up into the windows till everything was smashed. In the meantime the members assembled in the lobby. At the head of the mace of the leaders of the mob rushed into the Chamber, and one, having taken hold of the Speaker's chair, announced. "Gentlemen, the French Parliament is dissolved!" They then rushed out with the mace, to present it to Sir Allan M'Nab, as Commander-in-chief.

The cry of "Fire!" was now raised, and it was soon found that the Parliamentary houses were in flames in a hundred places. The fire spread with great rapidity, and in half an hour the buildings were one sheet of flame. The mob had now augmented to 7000, and the burning building was surveyed with the most fiendish demeanour on the part of the spectators. At first the firemen refused to work their engines, and only attempted to save the buildings of stone; and, in consequence, all the archives and records of the colonies for upwards of a century were destroyed.

The only articles saved from the general destruction are the mace of the Lower House, the very fine portrait of the Queen, to save which every one seemed to contend in earnest rivalry, and a cart-load of books. The mace is a silver gilt, and cost £600 three years ago. It is about seven feet high, surmounted by a crown. The mace belonging to the Upper House is destroyed. Several valuable pictures were destroyed; Portraits of George III., George IV., Sir George Prevost, several ex-Speakers of the colony, and one of Jaques Cartier, the discoverer of Canada, which was a copy of a picture presented by the Mayor of St. Malo to the Historical Society of Quebec. The books are valued as high as £100,000. This must be an exaggeration; but they were numerous, and some very scarce.

Eleven hundred volumes of records of the British House of Commons, of which no other copy was extant, were destroyed. Not eighty dollars' worth of property was saved. The loss is irreparable. The Queen's picture, which was saved from the burning buildings, is said to have been destroyed in the streets. The party in charge of the mace carried it to Donegana's Hotel, and there placed it in the hands of Sir Allan M'Nab. No lives were lost. T. B. Turner, Esq., of the Montreal Courier, Sir Allan M'Nab, and the Hon. W. Badgeley, in attempting to save some books from the library, were nearly lost. They were obliged to drop the works and rush for the Legislative Council chamber-door, which, to their horror, they found locked. Their cries were heard by a party in the library of the council, who had axes, with which they forced the door open, and enabled them to escape by a ladder from the balcony. It was rumoured amongst the mob that the French members were hid in the cellars, and would be destroyed by the fire. The announcement was received with the most brutal cheers. At twelve o'clock, satisfied with the work of the evening, the multitude dispersed. His Excellency the Governor-General, with his family, came into town, and remained all night under the protection of a large guard at Government House.

Early on the 26th, Messrs. Mack, Howard, Montgomerie, and Ferries, proprietor of the Montreal Gazette, were arrested on a charge of arson, and committed for trial. The excitement during the day was intense. A mob of 3000 persons accompanied them to the gaol; but, through the influence of their leaders, the mob were prevented from any outbreak.

On the 27th, at two o'clock, a mass meeting was held by the principal merchants and inhabitants of Montreal, in the Champ de Mars, at which the following resolutions were unanimously passed

1. Resolved,—"That this meeting views with extreme regret and pain the present state of excitement of the public mind, and the recent destruction of public and private property in this city, and pledges itself to maintain public order by all means in its power."

2. Resolved,—"That the assent of the Governor-General to the bill for the payment of rebellion losses, in the opinion of this meeting, caused, although it cannot justify, the recent uncontrollable outbreak of popular feeling."

3. Resolved,—"That, while we have to complain of his Excellency having allowed his advisers, with the weight of his sanction, and the influence of his Government, to introduce the bill in question, we have, in addition, to complain that he has violated a fundamental law of our provincial constitution, by disobeying the Royal instruction to reserve all bills of an unusual character."

4. Resolved,—"That the Governor-General, having been addressed in a constitutional manner by the British inhabitants of the province, to withhold his assent from the said bill, and their prayers so expressed having been treated with indifference by him, it is our duty to petition the Queen to disallow the said bill and recal the Governor."

5. Resolved,—"That the following petition to her most gracious Majesty be adopted by this meeting —

"TO HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

"The humble petition of the undersigned, your Majesty's dutiful and loving subjects, resident in the province of Canada,

"Sheweth: That your Majesty's representative in this province, the Right Hon. the Earl of Elgin and Kincardine, by giving the Royal assent to a bill for compensating rebels for losses inflicted by your Majesty's troops, and by others of your loyal subjects, acting under the orders of your Majesty's officers, hath seriously impaired your Majesty's Royal authority, and endangered the peace and tranquillity of the province.

"That your petitioners feel most acutely the outrage thus offered to your Majesty's Royal authority, and the insult to themselves—an outrage and an insult, they believe, unexampled in the history of nations, and which strikes at the foundations of allegiance and obedience, which are reciprocal with government and protection.

"And they humbly pray that your Majesty will graciously be pleased to recal the said Earl of Elgin and Kincardine from the government of this province, which he can no longer administer with safety to the State or honour to your Majesty; and that your Majesty will also disallow the said bill, which is an insult and a robbery to every man who, in the time of trial, stood forth to defend your Majesty's crown and dignity.

"And your petitioners will ever pray," &c.

There was no subsidence of the excitement after the holding of the meeting on Friday. It was reported, in the evening, that the French party were being sworn in as special constables and armed. It proved correct. The British portion were persuaded by the leaders to wait till armed, and an encounter took place between about twenty English gentlemen and these constables, who fired on them. Only a few of the small party had arms, which they discharged upon the mass, and slowly retreated, bearing off one of the party wounded in the leg by a pistol ball. During the whole night these were drilled, armed with cutlasses and pistols, in the Bonsecours-market. The military were under arms all night, and the artillery were kept drawn up in the square.

It is stated that Sir Benjamin D'Urban, Commander of the Forces, at a meeting of the Executive Council, on the previous evening, made remarks to the following purport to Colonel Tache, one of the Ministry:—He demanded to know by whose authority those men had been armed. He said he was there to protect her Majesty's dominions, and, by the aid of heaven, he would do that. It was unconstitutional to arm one portion of the population against the other. Turning round to General Gore, he said, "Go to his Excellency the Governor-General, and say, I send him a body of British troops to protect him, and that I will not consent to this clandestine arming of the French population. Disarm these men, and find by whose authority they were armed."

It was understood that Colonel Bruce and Colonel Tache did it on an order from the Government.

There cannot be a question of doubt but that a bloody conflict would have taken place in the streets had not the Governor-General resolved to take away the arms from the French.

On Saturday, the 28th, the Legislative Assembly met at Bonsecours-hall, when the following address to the Governor-General was agreed to by a considerable majority after several amendments had been rejected:—

"May it please your Excellency,—We, her Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, have witnessed with feelings of deep sorrow and indignation the proceedings of a mob of riotous and disorderly inhabitants of this city, who, in a time of profound peace and tranquillity, have committed several wanton and disgraceful outrages, as well upon persons as property, the most prominent of which is the destruction of the building occupied by the two Houses of Parliament. At such a moment of excitement we feel it to be due to ourselves and our constituents to assure your Excellency of the devoted loyalty and attachment of the people of Canada to the person and Government of our beloved Sovereign, and of their earnest desire to preserve their connexion with the parent state.

"We further beg leave to express to your Excellency our deep sense of the justice and impartiality which has uniformly characterised the constitutional Government of your Excellency, while assisted by the counsels of your former, as well as your present advisers, without reference to the policy of either.

"While we sincerely hope that the tranquillity of the city is now substantially restored, we feel it our duty to assure your Excellency of our cordial support of any measure which your Excellency may find it necessary to take for the preservation of the public peace, and we pledge ourselves to make good any expense that your Excellency may have found it necessary, or may yet find it necessary, to incur for the accomplishment of that object."

The latest accounts from Montreal are to the 2d inst., and they state that the Royalists from various districts were marching on the town, and that in their progress conflicts were occurring with the French habitans. Mobs of people had been moving in the neighbourhood of the city during the night of the 1st, in expectation of arrivals of French habitans, whom they meant to attack.

A deputation from Quebec came on the 1st to present an address to the Governor-General; and a large mob, numbering from 6000 or 7000, assembled to prevent their landing; but, notwithstanding their efforts to prevent them, they succeeded in effecting a landing at the Cross, about three miles below Montreal.

Large meetings were being held at Toronto and Kingston, and numerous petitions were getting up to her Majesty the Queen for a recal of Lord Elgin.

The whole country was in a state of the greatest excitement, and in many places the Governor-General was burnt in effigy.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Upon our front page we have represented the Burning of the Houses of Assembly, sketched from the eastern extremity, joining the St. Ann's Market, on the night of April 25th, at half-past ten o'clock.

The second Illustration shows the ruins of the Houses of Parliament and here it may be mentioned, that the mob would not allow the engines to be played except upon the adjoining buildings.

In the third Engraving is shown the New Market, at Montreal, in which the Parliament have sat since the destruction of their Houses of Assembly.

The city of Montreal stands upon the southern shore of the island of the same name—the largest of a beautiful group of isles that cluster in the expansive sheet of water formed by the confluence of the two great rivers, the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa.

The approach to the city, either from Quebec or from La Prairie, on the opposite side of the river, is exceedingly imposing. The massive towers of the French Cathedral, together with the several stately spires of the other churches, rising high above the glittering roofs of the handsome habitations of the citizens and the fine public buildings. A noble quay, with convenient wharves, extends along the river, which during summer and the fall is generally crowded with shipping.

The Parliament House, the total destruction of which was consummated during the recent outbreak, was originally St. Ann's Market. It was remodelled interiorly for the accommodation of the legislature, upon the removal of the seat of Government from Kingston to Montreal. Its dimensions were 342 feet in length by 80 in width; the central portion of the northern and southern fronts projecting four feet beyond the wings. It was constructed of cut stone—the beautiful blue limestone quarried in the island, and, though very plain—its only ornaments being a portico at either end—presented an effective appearance. It was, however, situated in a swampy part of the city, not far from the banks of the St. Lawrence.

The ground-floor was occupied in the centre by a spacious public hall, from which extended corridors to the extremity of each wing, leading to the offices of the various clerks to the Council and Assembly. The central compartment of the upper story formed a lobby, with the apartments of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and refreshment-rooms. The chamber of the Legislative Council was situated in the east wing: it was very commodious, and richly fitted up, and had a gilt canopied throne, scarlet draperies, &c.

Immediately behind this chamber were the rooms of the Speaker and the clerks of the Council, beyond which, at the extremity of the building, was the Council's library.

The western wing was almost entirely taken up with the chamber of the Legislative Assembly, a vast apartment, ninety feet in length and forty-five in width, containing galleries, free to the public, capable of seating 900 persons, besides a reservation for ladies and the reporters of the press.

The chamber was illuminated by a bude light, and decorated and furnished in good style. The Speaker's chair was of carved dark wood, and had a splendid gilt clock inserted in the top. On either side were boxes, with draperies, and painted walls, for the reporters. Each member was provided with a desk and a comfortable arm-chair. The valuable library of the Assembly, the loss of which is irreparable, was deposited in the third floor of the central building. It is rather a curious fact that a river runs underneath the structure, along its entire length—the "Little River" having been tunnelled over upon the erection of St. Ann's Market.

GARIBALDI, THE ROMAN GENERAL.

FRENCH INTERVENTION IN THE PAPAL STATES.

MATTERS are little changed in their main features at the Eternal City since our last publication. The accounts of the entrance, by means of a compromise with the Triumvirs, of the French troops within the city, were premature. A rumour to the same effect has reached us this week, but there is nothing authentic to confirm it. The probability of the event at an early period has been taken to justify the assertion of its actual occurrence. An account of an engagement between Garibaldi's corps and the advanced posts of the Neapolitan troops, in which the latter were said to have been worsted, has not been confirmed. The French troops, which have now increased their numbers by various reinforcements to about 15,000 men of all arms, are still encamped at Palo. They have made an exchange of prisoners with the Romans. The latest authentic intelligence, which is dated the 10th inst., is the most important that has yet arrived, that two deputies from the Republic have been despatched to Lord Palmerston to solicit his interference, and that General Oudinot, though he is advancing his camp nearer to Rome, promises not to renew an attack until the result of the mission be known. The delegates are M. Ronconi, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and M. Pescantini, late agent for Rome at Paris. The Neapolitans remain at Velletri.

The following is an official announcement from the Roman papers:—

"Romans,—On the 30th of April last about nine in the morning, the French sent an armed force against Rome to free us from liberty, divided into two parties, each 7000 strong. It commenced a double attack, one by the Porta San Panazzio, by the Via del Cassale di San Pio Quinto, the other towards the Circle of the Vatican. General Garibaldi, on hearing of the enemy's advance, hastened against him with his battalion. Other regiments were called out, and the First Roman Legion, the battalion of the University, and the second regiment of the line hastened to join him. This united force attacked the enemy, repulsed him, and made several prisoners. From the Porta Cavelleigiere to the Porta Angelica the mobilised National Guard, the Carabineers, and Civicos, in great numbers, drove back the enemy at every point where he appeared. It is impossible to narrate every act of valour performed by the troops. The superior officers all distinguished themselves; the several wounds they bear, however slight attest that fact.

"The officers of the staff performed their duty admirably.

"The subaltern officers and men merit the highest praise. They were cool and steady under the enemy's fire, and performed prodigies when they rushed on with the bayonet.

"The people in large numbers seconded the troops; all fought equally well for the country and for liberty.

"The telegraph announces that the French have retired in the direction of Castel Guido, leaving on the field many dead and wounded, and one piece of artillery, which was dismounted by our brave carbineers. To-day the French will all be at Castel Guido; they will soon go to Civita Vecchia, recross the sea, return to their own country, and tell the French nation that the 'few demagogues' and the 'factions of Rome' are millions of men resolved to live or die Republicans. We are a people who have rights, and, from the history of the past, we claim to be a great people. We are the heart of a nation who, having thrown off the chains of monarchy, are worthy of having conquered men educated to war, and always victorious in battle. In fine, we are Romans!"

"Romans! Yesterday was a glorious day for Rome and for all Italy, we can say without a boast. Our troops drove back on every point the attack of the enemy's columns, pursuing and causing them heavy loss, even to a distance of one mile from the city. The conduct of the Roman people was admirable in every respect. It is impossible to describe the joy and enthusiasm. The internal order of the city was not disturbed for a moment. Everywhere we exhibited love, generosity, and public charity. The victory was temperate as the battle was brave. The prisoners were received by the people as brethren led astray. Many of the French wounded, abandoned in the precipitate retreat of the army, are carefully treated by us. They all protest into a fratricidal war under the pretext of being sent to fight against the Austrians.

"Yesterday evening a calm and solemn festival succeeded the busy day. The city was gloriously illuminated. An armed population paraded the streets and squares, and filled the cafés, talking of the great event, and pledging themselves to be ready to renew it.

"The French retired, and do not seem disposed again to renew the offensive. General Oudinot has sent in a herald to ask for an exchange of prisoners—viz: to change our prisoners, verified by the Minister of War to be 500, against the battalion Melara, detained at Civita Vecchia. The exchange will be allowed, provided he also give up 4000 muskets, our property, retained by him in the same place. The Regiment of Borelli, with two battalions of the 1st and 2d of the Line, are marching from Terni towards Rome. From all the provinces the National Guard hasten to succour the capital. If the French army does not again march against us, we will assume the offensive."

Our Artist has sketched the contest at the Porta Cavelleigiere.

We give, also, a Portrait of the Roman General Garibaldi.

OUR MAGAZINE COLUMN FOR MAY.

LADY CLAVERING AT PARIS.

People were all, however, glad enough to go to Lady Clavering's parties when her Ladyship took the Hôtel Bouflé in the Rue Grenelle at Paris and blazed out in the noble world there in the winter of 18[illegible]. She [illegible] took her up Viscount Barwig, our excellent ambassador, [illegible] her married tention. The princes of the family frequented her saloon. The most [illegible] noted of the English residents in the French capital were [illegible] countenanced [illegible] the various Lady Ellesbury, the sovers Lady Rockmans [illegible] received for ass- [illegible] terly, and of quite a dazzling moral purity: so great and beneficent an influence had the possession of ten thousand said (sweet) thousand a year exercised upon Lady Clavering's character and reputation. And her mundaneness and genteel-will were unbounded. Anybody (in society) who had a scheme of charity was sure to find her purse open. The French ladies of piety got money from her to support their schools and convents: she subscribed an enormous sum for a Protestant parsonage in Paris; for Father Barbarossa, who came to Europe to collect funds for his monastery on Mount Athos; for the Baptist Mission to Quashyboo, and the Quashee Bible Society; for Father [illegible] Indian mango of the Cannibal Islands. And it is on record of her that, on the same day on which Madame de Creeri got five Napo eons from her in support of the poor persecuted Jesuits, who were at that time very hot about it in France, Lady Clavering [illegible] her down in her subscription-list for the Rev. J. Ramshorn, who had [illegible] which ordered him to convert the Pope of Rome. And, in re- [illegible] and for the benefit of the wo- [illegible] by her Ladyship gave the best [illegible] grandest balls and suppers which were known in Paris during the [illegible]

INDIAN MEAL.

A Correspondent of Fine Arts Magazine writes:—"Three days ago I received, [illegible] from the barn of an American friend, as it was stowed there last autumn, [illegible] reel of Indian corn in its natural state. Many [illegible] ears, each [illegible] short corn, merely stript of its loose leaves. On each [illegible] of [illegible] shape, about the size of a large thick truncated carrot, there are perhaps about five hundred grains, arranged in close order in four eight columns: the colour, gold yellow, or in some cases with a decker of blood-red. These grains need to be rubbed off, and ground by some rational miller, whose mill-stones are hard enough for the work; that is all, the secret of preparing them. And here comes the important point. This grain, I now for the first time find, is sweet, among the sweetest—with an excellent taste, something like that of maize indeed. It seems to me, perhaps from novelty in part, decidedly sweeter than wheat, or any other grain I have ever tasted. So that, it would appear, all our experiments hitherto on Indian corn have been vitiated by its having a deadly offspring sin, or fundamental falsity to start with as if, in experimenting on Westphalian ham, all the ham presented to us hitherto for trial had been in a rancid state. The difference between ham and rancid ham, Mr. Soyer well knows, is considerable. This is the difference, however, this highly considerable one, we have had to encounter hitherto in all our experiences of Indian meal. Ground by a passable miller, and not by a bad one, and not [illegible] along with it this grain, I can already promise, will make excellent, cleanly, wholesome, and palatable eating, and be fit for the cook's art under all manner of conditions."

A VISIT TO VESUVIUS.

Vesuvius, the first object of curiosity to the stranger in Naples, has lately been attracting crowds to examine a crater which the action of the volcano has lately formed on the side farthest from the city. The new cone rises like an excrescence from the acclivity of the greater one. [illegible] Descending from the great cone during the present eruption, as I did at nightfall, a scene of inconceivable grandeur was suddenly revealed: at our feet lay a region apparently torn up by internal fires which thundered in hyphis their whole salt forming the crust above. The original crater was in powerful action, and [illegible] ing a continual shower of ashes over our heads that caused a feeling of suffocation, not a little augmenting the danger of our situation. But the new [illegible] formed cone was in a fierce activity that drew the attention from all else, shooting forth torrents of fire, roaring, and hissing, and crashing, with sounds I can compare to nothing else, which [illegible] owers of lava-rocks and ashes rose to an [illegible] pendous height with the blood-red foun- [illegible] Towards the lower country, the flank of this cone had been rent into [illegible] ar fissures in almost every hand, that descended down the acclivity and continued flowing in a serpentine course for [illegible] ten

The tenth anniversary festival of King's College Hospital was celebrated on Saturday, at the Freemasons' Tavern, when about 170 gentlemen sat down to dinner. During the evening the secretary announced the subscriptions and donations to be £3000.

The cholera has been moving down its hundreds in Paris during the past week. Among its victims were the friend of Madame de Staël, Madame Recamier, so well known for her beauty, literary taste, and conversational powers; and Madame de Rumigny, the wife of Louis Philippe's friend.

The Earl Dalhousie, we are happy to learn, is nearly recovered from his late severe indisposition.

The widow of the late M. A. Von Rothschild, the founder of the house which bears his name, died at Frankfort on the last week, aged 69 years.

The late Mr. D. Parsons, of Dudley, bequeathed £10,000, to be paid after the death of his sister, for establishing and supporting a school for the education of poor boys and girls (the children of parishioners of the town, or residing within four miles) in writing, arithmetic, sewing, and knitting, and in clothing the same boys and girls, who are to be supplied every Sunday with a penny loaf and a small piece of cheese. The testator's sister having died a fortnight ago, the school will, it is expected, soon be in operation.

It is reported that General Bem, in consideration of his distinguished services, has received from the grateful Hungarian nation the grant of the domain of Akenth. This princely estate, which formerly belonged to the late Archduke Joseph, Palatine of Hungary, when nothing its field officer of the day, had to proceed to the south-west gate of the barrack grounds at Woolwich, and it being very dark, between twelve and one o'clock on the night of Thursday week, his horse came on the ha-ha, the separation between the barrack-field and the common, and in attempting to jump over, fell short and broke his neck. The concussion the major sustained by the fall was severe, but fortunately not to such an extent as might have been expected, and he is now convalescent.

We are authorised, in contradiction of a report very much circulated within the last week, to state that Mr. Charles Russell has no intention whatever of retiring from the office of chairman of the Great Western Railway Company, so long as it may be the wish of the proprietors that he should continue to preside over their affairs, and the board shall possess the confidence of the company. Mr. Russell has relinquished the chair of the South Wales Company to prevent the possibility or imputation of having to perform any duty conflicting with the interests of the Great Western Railway Company.

On or on the 9th of the present month, no less than 135 petitions, bearing [illegible] signatures, were presented against the Navigation Bill, while those in favour of the measure only amounted to four, with 2443 signatures.

In consequence of the present depressed state of the agricultural interest, and the failure of last year's crops, Sir Ralph Lopes has, through his steward, intimated to his tenantry in Devonshire that he shall remit 20 per cent. on their rents which were due at Lady-day last.

On Wednesday week (afternoon), the plantation belonging to the Earl of Fife, on the north side of Holden Hill, was observed to be on fire, and although the neighbours turned out with alacrity, about three acres of plantation was destroyed before the flames were got under.

The solemn inauguration of the present King of the Netherlands, William III., with much pomp and splendour on Saturday, the 12th inst., as a royal command, celebrated on the following day in all the churches of Holland. The Dutch congregation in London numerously attended on Sunday in Austin Friars, and joined with their countrymen in prayers for the prosperous reign of the new King.

Mr Alfred Power is appointed the Poor-Law Commissioner in Ireland to succeed the hon. Mr. Twisleton, who has resigned his appointment under the Colonial Under Secretaries of State. Mr. Power has had considerable experience in the administration of the Poor-Laws, having been first one of the assistant commissioners in England, and afterwards in Ireland, on the introduction of the law there, and having filled the place of the assistant commissioner, resident in Dublin, ever since the re-constitution of the Poor-Law Board.

A scaffolding is now erected round the spire of Salisbury Cathedral, within a few yards of the top, in order to repair the vane, which were undertaken last summer. The extensive view to be had from the lofty summit will, no doubt, induce many of the adventurous, as on former occasions, to ascend the giddy height.

The new humorous work "Martin Toutround" is now known to have been the production of the celebrated author of "Hajji Baba of Ispaan," and "Zohrab." It would appear that the publisher has obtained the sanction of the family of the late Mr. Morier to make this announcement.

Mr. James O'Farrall, brother of the Governor of Malta, has been appointed a commissioner of National Education, in the room of the late Right Hon. A. R. Blake. There is no salary attached to this office.

Last week the officers of her Majesty's Customs in Hull seized no less than eleven casks, said to contain nearly 300 stand of fire-arms, that were brought for shipment on board one of the steamers to Hamburgh; no doubt intended for the Germans or Danes.—Hull Packet.

In the Irish Court of Chancery the total number of solicitors' bills lodged in the office of the taxing master, from the 1st of November, 1845, to the 1st of March, 1849, was 8035, amounting to £598,918, of which there were taxed or certified up to the 1st of March, 1849, 5439, amounting to £509,058. The number remaining untaxed or uncertified on the 1st of March, 1849, was 2596, amounting to £262,885.

The Lancashire Fens are not quite so unhealthy as rumour would have it, at least they are not hostile to longevity. Three widow ladies (sisters) met together at Fleketon, on Wednesday, the 2nd instant, to celebrate the birthday of the second widow, the united ages of the venerable trio amounting to 230 years. There are a brother and two other sisters of the same family, whose ages make 205 years; a total of 443 years for six individuals.

General Gilbert, to whose energy and skill is attributed the recent victory in India, is the same General Gilbert who was examined and personally interrogated in the great horse case tried a no two or three years since in Bristol. The general was a great observer of horse racing men. He rode his own horse at the Taunton and Exeter Races about nine years ago.

The vessel Comaro, of, and belonging to the United States of America, arrived in the handsome Docks, from Savannah and Matanzas, respectively, has brought a large cargo of foreign sugar, comprising 1050 boxes from the former, and 1850 bags from the latter place. This large cargo of sugar was necessarily entered to be warehoused and declared to be for exportation only or under foreign country, it being inadmissible, in the existing state of the navigation laws, for home use.

The engineers employed to survey the routes from Halifax to Windsor, in Nova Scotia, have reported favourably to the construction of a railroad between those two places, at a cost of from £300,000, to £330,000.

Late advices from California state that the large arrivals of goods at San Francisco had already reduced prices. Gold was still said to be found in abundance, and new deposits had been discovered equal if not superior in richness to those on the Sacramento.

Accounts from America, just received, inform us that the cotton crops throughout the States have suffered so much from the severe weather that prevailed during the month of April, that all hopes of saving any portion of them have entirely vanished. In some places the devastation is so great that scarcely any green ripling remains. The tobacco plants have been nearly killed; and the wheat and fruit crops have equally felt the influence of the cold.

The German papers state that the King of Prussia and the Diet of Frankfort have sent in a request to the King of Belgium to abolish gambling at Spa; but the Belgian government replied that this would not be done so long as the German and Prussian lotteries attracted such immense sums from abroad.

At St. Petersburgh the number of cases of cholera between the 21st and 26th of April was 360, 180 of which proved fatal. It has broke out again in several Russian cities. The average number of deaths is one in four.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

Alboni in opera buffa is struggling for mastery with Persoli in "Norma" [illegible] with a parody respectable [illegible] Bellini's opera. Alboni has this week had the stage to herself. Her fame and talent are by this time indissolubly associated with the "Cenerentola;" but although it is new two years and more since she has been indentified with the part, like a judicious and conscientious artist, she has striven to rise above the [illegible] and to impart [illegible] Her improvement in an actress equals her superiority as a singer. In "Cenerentola" she performed on Saturday and on Tuesday with a success the most striking—the lists of the notables published by our daily contemporaries bear witness to the crowded Alboni could bring together, even the very next night after Lind had absorbed its money and the feelings of the audience. Her Majesty ordered the "Barbiere" and the last scene of "Ernani" to be performed on Thursday last. Here Alboni's resources were tasked to the utmost, and she rose proportionably to the demand made on her genius. There is no species of vocal excellence that she did not essay whether the tones that awaken sympathy by their softness and beauty of intonation, or those chromatic passages which astonish by their execution, impetuosities, boldness, and what shall their perfect appropriateness to the subject. Not a passage did she sing in the Weels course of the opera but was accompanied by a murmur of admiration, and not a song but was encored more loudly—particularly the air from "Ismy," with variations. She was admirably seconded by Labloche, who, as Dariolo, was in admirable fettle, making even royalty laugh audibly, and by Gardoni, and Beletti. On Thursday, in the same night, they were entrusted the parts even of Persoli and the buffa spirit of Alboni; whilst between the operas Rosati declaimed Shakspeare, in the genius of water, and Carlotta, in "Electra," maintained triumphantly her position as a star. The consequence was, that the audience was kept in the highest spirits from the beginning to end of the performances; the enthusiasm at the conclusion of each performance, and particularly at the last, presenting the most cheering spectacle.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The completeness of the first representation, at the above establishment, of Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable," on Saturday night, in the presence of her Majesty and Prince Albert, and a great assemblage of rank and fashion, as well as of literary and artistical celebrities, may be cited hereafter as one of the most remarkable performances in our musical epoch. To have produced a work of the [illegible] kind, on a scale even surpassing the best days of the Académie Royale de Musique, in Paris, where "Robert le Diable" was first so dazzled, on the 21st of November, 1831, reflects the highest credit on all the artistes, mas cal, coreographic, and scenic, engaged in the mounting of the opera. And that, at the [illegible] unexpected difficulties arose, which menaced the success of the [illegible] Miss Hayes was labouring under such a severe sore throat on Saturday, that her medical adviser gave no hope of her singing for some days; and, in order not to postpone the anxiously-expected production, Madame Dorus Gras was induced upon to undertake the part of Alice.

The great drawback on the first night was the late hour before the performance was over. The cast was then: Alice, Mdme. Dorus Gras; the Princess Isabella, Mdlle. Corbari; Dame Ermony, Mdme. Bedini; and Helena (the Abbess), Mdlle. Wuthier; Roberto, Signor Salvi; Alberto, Signor Romagni; Rambaldo, Signor Lavia; the Prior, Signor Tagliafico; the Herald, M. Massol; Major Domo, Signor Soldi; Cavaliers—appointed to the Duke, Polonoi, and Raoke; and Bertramo, the fiend father, Signor Marini. The leading off of the trombones, in the andante maestoso of the short overture was very fine, and its inner parts beautifully developed. The view of Palermo, while shipping, landing of arms and stores, the tents of the knights in the foreground, formed an animated tableau. The "Drinking Chorus" was sung with infinite spirit. Lavia gave the ballad "Regnava un tempo" nicely in the first verse, but its intonation was at fault in the second. Madame Dorus Gras sang the romance "Vanne, disse," admirably, but her voice exhibited signs of fatigue.

The [illegible] scene, forming the finale of the first act, was superbly executed, the acting and singing of Salvi and Marini, and the by-play of the gambling knights, admirable. Marini's making up of the fiend father (copied from that of Levasseur, the original Bertram) was most effective. Mdlle. Corbari has not flexibility enough to give due effect to the florid cavatina "En vain, j'espère" ("In vain I hope"). The choir, chorus, music, numerous armorial bearings, and arms of the knights, the gorgeous banners, groups of ladies, pages, &c., in the finale of the second act, were on the grandest scale. Massol coming on the stage to sing only the few passages of the part of the Herald to Robert, on behalf of the Prince of Grenada, was an instance of artistic devotion and self-denial which ensured him a great reception. The semi-chorus of tenors and basses, and the working up of the stretta, are beyond all praise.

The first two acts, which are within the realms of the real, filled with chevalric [illegible], are perfect contrary to the gloomy plunge into the ideal, which Scribe and Delavigne, the authors of the libretto, have revealed in, to supply the [illegible] with situations in which his genius reigns supreme. The infernal agency, to which Bertram resorts to usurp the soul of Roberto, is depicted in sublime musical imagery by Meyerbeer. The scene painters, Grieve and Telbin, have wonderfully seconded the composer in his conceptions. The opening chorus was excellently sung and well marked; the dramatic energy of the latter was finely conceived, and the voice of the tenor in the simple strains of melody was most sympathetic. The scene of Marini, with the "Vasa Diabolica" and the infernal demons, whose terrific yells below ground to mortals from the very bowels of the earth, was one of the grandest displays of powerful vocalisation we have ever heard. It created an overwhelming sensation, several of whom he succeeded to the Prior and were [illegible] He was recalled again and again, and compelled to repeat the last movement Mdme. Dorus Gras, for whom, by the way, Meyerbeer composed Alice, [illegible] displayed her musical-like feeling in the well and tastefully [illegible] but it requires a fresher voice to make it tell. She acted the duo with Marini very effectively. The unaccompanied trio between her, Salvi, and Marini was delicious sung. The ardour of Salvi in the duo with Marini, "Les chevaliers de ma patrie," was unabated; his voice seemed to gain strength as the opera proceeded. The second scene in the third act—that of the resuscitated nuns—was a triumph of pictorial art. Casati, who invented the classic groups, was called on at the end of the act, but Grieve and Telbin ought to have shared in the honour. Mdlle Wuthier danced the pas with buoyancy, exhibiting some wonderful feats on the pointes

In the fourth act, in the apartment of the Princess, in the cavatina, "Robert, toi que j'aime," Corbari's beautiful voiced told powerfully, but her acting lacked spontaneity and finish.

The choir is of base voices, headed by Tagliafico, opening the fifth act, was splendidly sung. The duo in which is the air for the bass between Marini and Marini, and the glorious inspiration the trio in which Alice and Bertramo, impersonating the conflicting spirits of good and evil, contend for the soul of Roberto, went beautifully. The audience seemed quite taken by surprise at the gorgeousness of the last scene—the interior of the cathedral with the domed roof and crossed columns, the painted stained glass, and the galleries crowded with spectators at the union of Roberto and Isabella.

The ovation to Costa was never more richly earned.

On Tuesday night "Robert le Diable" was repeated, having been curtailed of a few comic recitatives and repeats; but the performance, with the delays in the third act for the scene effects, still exceeded four hours. With the omission of the divertissement in the second act, and of the grand pas de deux in the second and fourth acts, the opera might easily be reduced still more without impairing the general effects.

GERMAN OPERA.

On Monday night, Weber's masterpiece, the ever-popular "Der Freyschütz," was produced, her Majesty and Prince Albert honouring the performance with their presence. The choral singing was excellent, and the enchanted hunting chorus was rapturously encored; but the execution of the overture scarcely called it to similar distinction. The artistes who filled the three principal parts of Agatha, Max, and Caspar were very indifferent; but the Aunchen of Mdme. Marlow was pleasing. The house was crowded.

SADLER'S WELLS.

AN original five-act tragedy was produced at this theatre, on Thursday week, with signal and merited success. The piece is named from the chief character, and the plot is simply as follows:—

Calaynos (Mr. Phelps), a nobleman of Spain, living in retirement with his beautiful wife, Donna Alda (Miss Cooper), contemplates a journey to Seville. An ancient superstition exists among the peasantry of the neighbourhood, that a visit to that city is attended with evil consequences to all the race of Calaynos. His secretary, Oliver (Mr. Dickenson), has also a presentiment of danger, and endeavours to dissuade his master from his purpose, upon which Calaynos informs him that the paramount object of his journey is to assist a friend, Don Luis (Mr. Henry Marston), whose lands will become forfeited unless a considerable sum of money is forthcoming on a particular day. Arrived at Seville, Oliver, in an accidental meeting with Soto, (Mr. Hoskins), the servant of Don Luis, learns the villany of the latter; but Calaynos indignantly refuses to entertain so unjust an opinion of his friend. The secretary is authorised to discharge all the obligations of the Don, who continues to ingratiate himself with the "great Calaynos," who induces him to accept of his hospitality. No sooner, however, has Don Luis accepted this, than he conceives a passion for the wife of his benefactor, but is repulsed. Thro' the instrumentality of Donna Alda's maid, Martina (Mrs. Henry Marston), the libertine discovers that Calaynos has a taint of Moorish blood in his veins, and in a midnight interview informs the object of his unholy passion of her disgrace. Struggling between love and pride, she calls upon her husband for protection, and faints in the arms of Don Luis, who carries her off the stage. Calaynos enters, and is soon informed that his wife has fled, and the curtain falls upon the raving of the injured husband.

"PARADISE AND PERI."—PAINTED BY DESANGES.—FREE ART EXHIBITION.

The applause at the end of this act was deafening, and loud calls were made for Mr. Phelps, who appeared, and was greeted with enthusiastic cheers. When the fifth act commences, a month has intervened, and Oliver, who has been sent in pursuit of the fugitives, returns, and finds Calaynos prematurely old from grief. The secretary informs his master that Donna Alda had fled from the residence of her seducer. A storm arises, and a wretched woman is discovered sheltering herself beneath the walls of the castle. Calaynos desires the retainers to bring her in, when he recognises her as his wife, but stricken with death. Calaynos passionately expresses his conviction of her innocence: she expires, leaving a written document, unfolding the perfidy of Don Luis. Attended by a body of Moorish retainers, Calaynos hastens to Seville, and discovers the destroyer of his peace in the midst of revelry and libertinism; he is instantly disarmed, and refusing to crave forgiveness, is slain by Calaynos, who is also mortally wounded, and expires. The play abounds with passages of great power and beauty. The author, we learn, is an American, resident at Philadelphia, and is, consequently, unacquainted with his success. Mr. Phelps portrayed with great pathos the loving, broken-hearted husband. The expression of the frenzied ecstacy of sudden kindness, contending with the strong emotion of long-cherished love and grief, on the unexpected interview with Donna Alda, was striking in its execution.

Mr. Marston played Don Luis with great discrimination. Miss Cooper, as the heroine, was very successful, and Mrs. Marston's Martina was poquant and agreeable.

The piece has been mounted with the picturesqueness which invariably distinguishes the management of this ably conducted theatre.

With the exception of Mr. W. Farren's appearance in the "Hypocrite" this week, at the STRAND Theatre, there has been nothing of novelty in the dramatic world. There is a general complaint, from the first to the smallest of the houses, of very bad business; and yet no particular efforts appear to be made by any of the managements to attract attention, notwithstanding that town is very full, and that the height of the season is approaching. There is no decline in the taste of the public for evening amusements or exhibitions, theatrical or otherwise; but nothing will do at the present day, unless it is absolutely perfect, whether appealing to the ear or the eye; or possessing some novel feature of interest or attraction over the ordinary conventional (and, indeed, traditionary) run of entertainments. The public is disposed to patronise everything that is really good, native as well as foreign, and they will really give the preference to the former, provided it be only equally excellent. However hard the times may be said to be, there is evidently a great deal of money to spare for entertainments. We find, each night, crowds of stay-at-home travellers voyaging up and down the Mississippi, the mighty auditories of the two Italian Operas are both filled—a large sum of money, more than 10*l*. individual persons were taken at Hyde Park on Monday, thousands pay at the Surrey Zoological Gardens nightly; one can scarcely find a corner at the concerts in Exeter Hall; Mr John Parry is obliged to advertise days before that no more tickets can be sold for his entertainments; Madame Tussaud's living visitors treble her wax creations; yet all the theatres are complaining, and offering as a reason for their want of patronage, that people have no money to spend in amusements. We trust the managements of the various houses will provide a little more occupation for us next week, by bringing forward something sufficiently strong to lure the public, in some degree, from the above-mentioned, and similar entertainments. At present, the ADELPHI is the only house that looks really, and comfortably, and honestly well filled.

THE NEW PLAY OF "CALAYNOS," AT SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.

THE FREE EXHIBITION AT HYDE-PARK CORNER.

SINCE the opening of the Royal Academy Exhibition, we have renewed our acquaintance with the Free Exhibition at Hyde-park Corner, and have found fresh reason to think well of what the Association has brought together. Several pictures more than maintain the good opinion we expressed about them when the collection was first opened; while others, perhaps too hurriedly passed by at the time, have forced themselves into notice by their real and unobtrusive beauties. The "Paradise and Peri" of Mr. Desanges, and the "Lear and Cordelia" of Mr. F. M. Brown, are efforts in art of no every-day character.

The "Paradise and Peri" illustrates a passage in Mr. Moore's charming poem of "Lalla Rookh:"—

Yet mark'd the Peri where he lay,
And when the rush of war was past,
Swiftly descending on a ray
Of morning light, she caught the last,
Last precious drop his heart had shed
Before its free-born spirit fled.

The figure of the Peri is nicely drawn; the action, too, is easy and graceful, while the effect of morning light that pervades the picture has been very happily caught. This is certainly the best of Mr. Desanges' nine contributions to the collection.

"The Infant's Repast" (No. 70), and the portrait of the infant son of Mr. R. Madox Bromley (No. 116), will hardly lead the spectator to imagine that Mr. F. M. Brown was likely to contribute a picture embracing the higher excellences of art which will be found to belong to his "Lear and Cordelia." The colouring of the picture is hard and somewhat spotty; the gradations are far from being nicely balanced, and there is little in the picture at first sight to arrest attention, but it grows into favour upon acquaintance (a sure sign of excellence), and will be found to be both original in design and treatment. The passage in the play which Mr. Brown has sought to illustrate has many pictorial points to recommend it:—

Physician. Louder the music, there!
Cordelia. O my dear father! Restoration hang
Thy medicine on my lips!
Kent. Kind and dear Princess! * *
Cordelia. Had you not been their father, these white flakes
Had challenged pity of them. Was this a face
To be exposed against the warring winds?
To stand against the deep dread-bolted thunder?
In the most terrible and nimble stroke
Of quick cross-lightning? to watch (poor perdu!)
With this thin helm? Mine enemy's dog,
Though he had bit me, should have stood that night
Against my fire; and wast thou fain, poor father,
To hovel thee with swine, and rogues forlorn,
In short and musty straw? Alack, alack!
'Tis wonder that thy life and wits at once
Had not concluded all. * * *

The face and figure of Cordelia are full of earnest expression, and the details throughout are well considered and appropriate. The distant view of the white cliffs at Dover is nicely and suggestively introduced.

OAK STRUCK BY LIGHTNING.

ON Saturday, the 5th instant, a storm, which had been for some hours gathering, commenced near Honiton, at about 3 P.M., and in the parish of Clyst-hydon. After repeated vivid flashes of lightning, one was seen, apparently of considerable breadth, near the earth, and which, it is supposed, struck an oak, the property of Mr. Pratt, of Aunk, in a hedge, near Maypowder. This oak was finely grown, and stood in height about 60 feet, 20 being in the trunk, very clean, with a wide-spreading and luxuriant head. The trunk measures about 9 feet in circumference, and the branches extended, perhaps, 25 feet around it. But now, from the electric blow, it appears as follows:—The lightning evidently first struck, most probably, the highest and centre limb, and running down to the place from whence all the other branches had developed themselves, met there with very considerable resistance, and, apparently, blew up and threw down all the branches around the stock, not one being wholly separated, but all still connected by the external parts, which now remaining undermost, keep the branches from falling, leaving two upright pieces. Each limb, therefore, is to be seen forming an arch from the stock to the ground, turned directly off from the parts from which they diverged, whilst the trunk is perfectly deprived of its bark, this being shot off in very many pieces of different sizes, and to distances varying from the tree to 50 feet. The trunk itself is split into seven divisions, from top to bottom, one or two of these different portions being forced out many inches: it is literally shivered into threads, and resembles in appearance the muscles, tendons, and nerves of the human body under dissection.

MDLLE. ALBONI.

We this day present to our readers a Portrait of Mdlle. Alboni, who has already triumphantly filled the void left by the retirement of Mdlle. Jenny Lind from the stage.

We have already hinted at the change in Mdlle. Alboni's style of singing, which is very remarkable in this respect—that formerly she relied on her lower notes for the greatest effect: these notes, so loud and so bell-toned, never failed to excite applause; and their too frequent use, overstretching the vocal chords, was injurious to the voice generally, and to the middle notes in particular. The change now presented is, that all this great artist's notes are now continuous and equal; and she adheres to the more ancient and more elevated style of Italian singing—that which prevailed when Pacchelli and Cimarosa wrote what Tramezzani and Catalani, Rubini and Camporese, subsequently sang in kindred spirit. Her greatest charm to the' ordinary observer is the volubility, and still the perfect distinctness, with which Mdlle. Alboni, in passages and florid embellishments, pours out a flood of intricate notes, so sparkling and so varied—the majority of them soft beyond expression, but relieved by others highly penetrating, and still as melodious. But we question whether, with the more serious lovers of music, her far greatest merit will not be found to consist in the execution of pnornate, pathetic pieces of music. Her "Non più mesta" displays the singer, but her singing of "Nacqui all' affano" reveals the real artist; and the exquisite shades of modulation fall on the ear with irresistible charm. In all she sings there is repose as well as enjoyment for the hearer. There is gentleness and sweetness of tone as well as volume—in fact, it is only the greatness of her resources which banishes effort. In her you behold none of those distortions of the muscles of expression in the fa', or of that tension of the vessels of the throat, which betray the exertion with which the greatest singers, her contemporaries, execute even their forte.

MDLLE. ALBONI, OF HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

MUSIC.

CONCERTS.

The scheme of the fifth Philharmonic Concert, which took place last Monday night, was by no means a happy selection. Spohr's "Historical Symphony"—a work of dull pedantic pretensions, affecting to imitate the musical period of 1720, 1760, 1810, and 1840, by copying the symphonic schools of Bach and Handel, Haydn and Mozart, Beethoven and the French style of 1840—which was a failure some years since when first introduced, was received with the greatest frigidity. It was a silly design of Spohr; and has not even the negative merit of well imitating his professed models, for the composition exhibits his own peculiar mannerism in the highest degree. What a contrast, for instance, between the Spohr-Beethoven scherzo and the real Beethoven scherzo in the glorious seventh symphony of the latter, executed in the second part, the lovely allegretto in which was so rapturously encored! The overtures were the "Zauberflöte" of Mozart, wonderfully played and fervently encored; and Onslow's "Colporteur," a work of no marked interest. The solo instrumentalists were Mr. J. B. Chatterton, who performed the late Parish Alvars's Concerto in E flat, Op. 38, and Molique, the celebrated composer and violinist, who played his own Concerto in A minor, No. 5. The English harpist is a very clever executant; but we think the place of honour in the first part ought to have been assigned to the distinguished German violinist, whose pure and limpid tones and polished style were greatly applauded. The two vocalists, a Signor Domenico Colotti (not the Colotti the great artiste of Her Majesty's Theatre), and Mdlle. Babnigg, from Hamburg, were most unfortunate engagements; the vocal gleanings in the programme being thus rendered worse than a nonentity. This was, on the whole, a very inferior concert. The sixth will take place on the 28th inst.

The fifth of the Musical Union scheme, on Tuesday, exhibited the talents of a new violoncello performer, Herr Cossman, in a very favourable light, in Mozart's quartet in A, No. 5; and Beethoven's in B flat, No. 13, op 74; having for colleagues Sainton, with his amazing breadth of tone and sure intonation, as first violin, Deloffre as second, and Hill as tenor. With the classical and accomplished pianist, Sterndale Bennett, Herr Cossman executed the sonata of Mendelssohn in B flat, op. 45, to the great delight of the cultivated amateurs present at this fine performance. The twelve Hungarian vocalists, after the instrumental selection was over, again enchanted the auditory by their exquisite light and shade in part singing, with fine-toned voices, of their own national melody, "L'Adieu," besides a piece by Mendelssohn.

At the sixth concert of the Amateur Musical Society, given on Wednesday night, at the Hanover-square Rooms, the MS. Symphony in F of Mr. Henry Leslie, the Honorary Secretary, was performed for the second time. The first movement is too crowded with ideas, and the subjects are overwrought, but the conception of the whole is large. The andante religioso is rather a heavy movement; but the sparkling gaiety of the subsequent scherzo, which is of the Mendelssohnian school, so enlivened the auditory, that it was encored. The orchestration in this third movement places Mr. Leslie's reputation, as a musician conversant with instrumental resources, in the best light. The fire of the concluding allegro was indicative of his inventive faculties. The symphony is altogether a clever work, and renders us curious to hear more of this young and promising composer. A MS. march, by Mr. G. A. Osborne, was included in the scheme: it is Auberish in form and idea, and is scored in a picturesque style. This piece was also demanded twice. Mr. Osborne could compose beautiful ballet music we are convinced—a branch of art not to be despised, seeing that Beethoven has written ballet music, and Auber also in the present day. The prettiest music of this class ever composed is that of Costa, in "Alma," and there is now an opening for Mr. Osborne. Beethoven's No. 1 symphony in C, Hérold's "Pré aux Clercs" overture, and a well arranged selection of the popular themes from Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," the solo bits admirably played by Baumann, Boosey, Handley, the amateurs who play the oboe and flute, &c., were comprised in the programme. The improvement in the amateur playing is marked. The violoncellos, headed by Lord Gerald Fitzgerald, who has a powerful tone, are all amateurs. Caudiani heads the double basses: with his exception, and that of another professor, the remainder are also amateurs. In the fifty first and second violins and violas there are not above half a dozen professors. Mr. L. Negri conducts these concerts with tact and energy, and we have been present at many professional ones which afforded infinitely less gratification.

The first of the new series of the London Wednesday Concerts, which will now be continued fortnightly, at Exeter Hall, was well attended, as usual. The lion instrumentalists were Thalberg and Belleasini, the latter a contra-bassist of wonderful skill. He has not Dragonetti's breadth of tone, but his executive feats are without a parallel. Pischek was warmly welcomed, and sang with great spirit. The Misses Williams, Lucombe, Poole, E. Lyon, and Reeves were the other vocalists. The next concert will be on the 30th inst.

MUSICAL EVENTS.—On Monday, Mr. Sterndale Bennett will give his annual concert, the proceeds of which are to be allotted to the Governesses' Institution. On the same evening there will be a performance under the direction of Mr. Hullah, at Exeter Hall; and Mr. Parry will repeat his entertainment at Willis's Rooms.——On Friday, Mrs. Anderson, the pianiste, will give her annual morning concert.——Owing to the indisposition of M. Roger, the performance of the "Prophète" was postponed for two nights, but it was played again last Monday.——Amongst the arrivals this week are Dreyschock the great pianist, Brancialli the eminent flautist, Wartel the French singer, and Madame Agnes Buhring a German pianiste of note.——On Thursday night will be revived, at the Royal Italian Opera, Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," in which Madame Grisi will sing for the first time the part of Valentine, and Signora Angri that of the Page. Madame Dorus Gras, who was the original Marguerite de Valois, in the French version, will sing that part for the first time in London. Massol will also appear here for the first time as the chivalric Nevers, and Tagliafico as St Bris. Mario and Marini resume Raoul and Marcel, and Lavia, Mei Rachu, Polonini, Soldi, and Madame Bellini are included in the cast.——Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was again repeated at Exeter Hall by the Sacred Harmonic Society, conducted by Costa, with the Misses A. and M. Williams, Miss Dolby, and Reeves, and Machin as the principal vocalists.——The Hungarian vocalists gave their first morning performance at Willis's Rooms, on Thursday; they are engaged also to sing at the Royal Italian Opera, at the next morning concert, on the 30th inst.——Herr Strauss, with his excellent band, assisted by Mdlle. Jetty Treffz, Herr Sigrili, Mr G Barker, the Misses A. and M. Williams, the Hungarian vocalists, &c., gave, on Monday and Thursday, two concerts at Exeter Hall.——Mdlle. Speyer, an accomplished pianiste, has given a matinée musicale, assisted by Ernst and Piatti, and the Misses Williams, with Benedict as conductor.——Ernst and Charles Hallé have played at a concert in the Free-Trade Hall, Manchester, with immense success.——The annual concert in aid of the funds of the excellent institution the Choral Fund has been given at the Hanover-square Rooms.

The Leeds papers mention that the excavations on the site of the abbot's house at Fountains Abbey are proceeding very satisfactorily. A great space has been uncovered since the first notice of the discovery in the papers; and the rubbish that has accumulated all around, in consequence of the excavations, is now being rapidly removed. The arches on which the house has been built cover the river for nearly 300 feet: but how far the building has extended north and south, it is, at present, impossible to say, for it appears that the hill to the south has been cut away to a considerable extent, and there are, very likely, many curious remains now deeply buried in its shelving bank. The most interesting apartment brought to light within the last week or two is the private oratory of the abbot, near the eastern portion of the remains. It has been an elegant little chapel, of a style of architecture different from any hitherto noticed at Fountains, viz. the enriched dog-toothed early English; and has been, no doubt, the work of an immediate successor of the three Johns, sometime between 1245 and 1290. The stone altar is nearly perfect; and there remains the lower part of a small mysterious stone staircase in the north-east angle—the approach, very probably, of the officiating priest. The encaustic tiles that are continually turned up are both numerous and curious.

THE MISS HARRIS OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.—This old lady has just been discovered in that prominent part of the new House of Lords, the reporters' gallery. During the discussion on Thursday evening last on the subject of parliamentary reporting, the Earl of Lucan was seen wending his way towards the reporters' gallery, and on reaching it he requested a gentleman who was there in the performance of his duties to introduce him to the stenographic representative of Hansard. Great was his Lordship's amazement on being informed that no reporter for Hansard had ever attended the gallery, the debates in that ——sed high authority being in fact a compilation from the daily papers; and ——with much difficulty that the gentleman addressed persuaded his lordship that there "wasn't no sich a person."

M. Duchon, the editor of M. Proudhon's journal, Le Peuple, was tried on Saturday at Paris, before the Court of Assize of the Seine, for having published a series of seditious libels on the 9th, 6th, 11th, 16th, and 19th of March last. He was found guilty, and sentenced to imprisonment for five years and to pay a fine of 15,000f.

"LEAR AND CORDELIA."—PAINTED BY F. M. BROWN.—EXHIBITION OF FREE ART.

THE ORIGIN OF COMMUNISM.

To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

SIR, The elements of Communism, it has been observed, are latent in the [illegible], and continually manifest themselves whenever circumstances are favourable. Religious bodies have appealed to them for support, and Monkery and Mormonism have professed a community of goods. Schemes to equalise property, by taxing the rich and allowing the poor to go scot free, proceed on a similar principle, and have found advocates in every age. Robespierre proposed one; and one has been advocated by Mr. J. Stuart Mill, in the latest work on political economy that has issued from our press. Co-operative societies contemplate a similar object; and Socialism, which is Communism in disguise, is now spread in every land. To place before your readers the circumstances which favour the growth of such systems, is of more importance than to refer to their modern authors and their local origin. Saint Simon, Cabet, and Proudhon in France, and Owen in England, are remarkable individuals; but the peculiar frame of mind, and the peculiar circumstances of society which suggest their doctrines, and procure for them a ready belief, are of more interest to the philosophical investigator than the existence of the men. I shall say less, therefore, of them than of the principles and circumstances which give birth to Communism in them, and in every place.

The Ministerial plan for relieving the Irish has been described as [illegible]-mism, and that, as well as all the late proceedings in Parliament to attain that object, has been provoked by their destitution and misery. "The object," says the advertisement to the translation of Thiers' work on the right of property, "of Fourier, George Sand (Madame Dudevant), Louis Blanc, Cabet, Proudhon, and Considerant, is to suppress the miseries of the people." Causation as simple and uniform in the moral as in the physical world: at all times like effects are produced by like causes; and, as in Ireland and France, so, in all times and places, the doctrine of Communism and the political practices approaching to it spring from the misery of the multitude.

Amongst those whose destitution suggests the doctrine, it finds the readiest [illegible], and though now and then one of the opulent classes may advocate it for a political purpose, or from a mistaken view of philanthropy, in general these classes are opposed to it in every form. In Germany, where the bulk of the people are comparatively well off, Communism and Socialism have little influence. They are scarcely heard of in the United States, except amongst a few religious enthusiasts, and create no alarm. If they find favour in England, that is explained by our army of paupers, by the low wages and the comparative [illegible] of large portion of the people. In France, where the bulk of the people are [illegible] miserably destitute, in comparison to the Germans and the English, and in comparison to the persons who compose the Government, Communism is most at home. That is cognated there and finds much favour there, is the consequence of the general poverty, which I pointed out in my first communication; and its existence confirms the statement, that the condition of the bulk of the French is very little better than that of the bulk of the Irish.

Mere destitution, however, the natural and original condition of man, generates intense selfishness, and of itself were it to act, would not give rise to the doctrines of Saint Simon or Proudhon. It is further necessary that men be associated, to attain a common object. Government itself is a species of Communism. It professes to provide equally for the good of all. Philosophers and lawyers, too, a Dumont, a Bentham, and a Brougham, have taught that the right of property is created and [illegible] On that principle Government has [illegible] to extort, partizans [illegible] and have disposed of the property of a people. Government has thus made itself responsible for the existence of poverty and misery, and, on the supposition that it creates the right of property, it is required to amend the distribution of wealth, to divide it equally, or to establish a community of goods, as well as an equality of property. But for the strange and erroneous assumption that Government can and does establish and regulate the property of men, of misery, and of the assumption which imposes on the Government the great duty of providing for the welfare of the masses; while their destitution, particularly in France, shews that Government has not fulfilled this assumed duty, [illegible] meddled more with the property of the people, and more [illegible] in this error, than the Government of France. The first [illegible] action swept away all rights and warranties of property, and the revolutionary Government substituted for them a right accordign to a theory of its own. It assumed the power of disposing of property; the law of forcible partition was decreed, as the true arrangement in all Communistic systems; it proclaimed that the State may regulate property, with a view to prevent the evils of accumulation, and a the clubs bore to every thing that was in any way connected with property. At the same time, the revolutionary Government, and every succeeding Government, assuming all the powers possessed by the old guilds, and more than all the powers of the Municipality of Paris, and of the Crown, granted protection, and monopolies to regulate all the industry of the people. Moreover, all these successive Governments appropriated their property to serve their own purposes of ambition, war, or pleasure, regarded money as more than they disposed of their lives. Bonaparte taxed them enormously for his wars, and, by his anti-commercial system, destroyed their trade. The [illegible] Bourbons appropriated without ceremony about 40,000,000 to the maintenance of their courts. Louis Philippe's whole career was one continued appropriation of the property of the people on false pretexts for personal objects. During the Empire, the average amount of taxation was 40,000,000 francs. In 1815, when peace was at war with all Europe, the sum levied on its people for the Government was 1,115,000,000 francs. Under the Bourbons and Louis Philippe it varied almost [illegible], and was not prosperous, the average annual taxation rose to 800,000,000 francs; and under Louis Philippe, when the country laboured under much opprobrium, it rose to 1,200,000,000 francs. Thus, while the distribution of property [illegible] poorer, and relatively to the other nations of Europe much poorer, the Government which has undertaken to regulate their industry has appropriated an increasing quantity of their property, and has realised the language of the author of "France: Her Governmental Administration and Social Organisation," "all the growing resources of the country." In France, therefore, the Government has made itself responsible for the existence of poverty and misery, in the eyes of the few. It has caused the evils of which the people complain, and has, both by its theories and practices, deeply impressed the habit on the national mind that the Government is responsible, and has the distribution and property, and prevent the over grown opulence of the few and the destitution of the many. In France, accordingly, Communism has lately started into vigorous [illegible]

[illegible] Communism will be sure to prevail. St. Simonism, M. Considérant, M. Proudhon, are all men, who, like our Lord Ashley, have been deeply impressed with the general destitution and general sufferings of the common man. They are, moreover, pupils of Henry M. Franklin (not our Premier's son), of a logical cast of mind, who [illegible] drawing correct conclusions from admitted principles, than in detecting errors in it. Their systems and their recommendations, pointing, [illegible] clusions from the principle of Government adopted in France, feel acutely the condition of the people. They recognise the duty of the Government to provide for the welfare of all. They [illegible] here that its past conduct has been the cause of that condition, particularly in its conduct in relation to property; and they draw the conclusion that a different line of conduct on the Government—the establishing a hierarchy, as was proposed by St. Simon, to reward individuals according to their merits—or framing society on a new principle, as was proposed by Fourier—or establishing Communism, as is supposed by Cabet—or organising labour, as is suggested by Louis Blanc, is the means of lessening the general destitution, and establishing [illegible] happiness. These gentlemen mean well, though their [illegible] manifest. That is the inevitable consequence of error; and when they confine themselves to merely teaching and [illegible] no more blameable than the proponents of a false theory in chemistry or geology: but, when, following the example of the Government, will habitually uses force to uphold its own equally or more erroneous system of taking away the property of the people by taxation, they provoke revolution, by failure to make their own good and do good, they commit a great wrong. Then error begins by supposing that the sufferings of the people are caused by the existence of property, and that the only remedy is the abolishment, which only violates the right of property, creates and [illegible] [illegible] accordingly by proposing to establish, like some [illegible] different. So deserving may seem the destitution of the masses which is at the bottom of the whole, nor the fact that the Government, by its interference with property and industry, is responsible for that; but I for one deny that the right of property ceases has suffering of the people, and that the only true remedy for the [illegible] of the people is a sound Communistic world reform. It can be shewn, I think, that it would only aggravate them; but I must reserve the full proof of their error, and to certain consequences were it acted on, till another opportunity.

I remain, yours obedently,

Jenny Lind obtained passports for Paris on Tuesday from the Swedish Minister.

It has been extensively announced that the Marquis of Londonderry has found his annual tenantry harmony to the echoes of his regiment—the 3d Life Guards—for the 12th proximo. His Lordship has a grand banquet on that day, but in military dinner will not be given until the regiment changes its quarters from Windsor to London.

THE NEW EXCHANGE, MANCHESTER.

EXTERIOR OF THE NEW EXCHANGE, MANCHESTER.

he sides by circular corners, which are relieved by two columns corresponding with those of the portico, and which corners are to be covered domically in masonry.

The sides are divided into ten compartments by pilasters, the spaces being filled in with large triple-light windows, occupying the entire width, less the mullions between the pilasters. These windows are rather elaborately, though not expensively decorated. The mullions, which are of stone at the upper portion, are relieved by fruit and flowers, which fall from the mouths of lions' heads sculptured in high relief on the frieze above the windows.

The entablature of the new portico is entire, running in continuous lines over the portico and down the two sides. The entablature is relieved with triglyphs and mutuals throughout.

Above the entablature there is an attic, which, on the principal side, to Exchange-street, is relieved with panels and festoons of flowers, fruit, &c.

The work, as a whole, is highly satisfactory, and will add another to the already numerous and handsome buildings which are so rapidly multiplying themselves in Manchester.

The exterior of the new addition is entirely of stone, and has been executed at a cost of something under £23,000., which is less than the architect's estimate.

The architect is Mr. Alexander Mills; and the contractors for the bulk of the work are Messrs Bowden and Edwards.

A ball for the benefit of a public institution was given in this new Exchange on Friday night.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 372–3.—Vol. XIV.] SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1849. THE TREBLE NUMBER } One Shilling.

THE STATE OF EUROPE.

The Emperor of Russia has issued his ukase, explaining to his people, and through them to Europe, the motives and the objects of his intervention in Hungary. In this document he states the "mission" of Russia to be "the extinction of rebellion, and the destruction of audacious and evil-intentioned men" He explains the commotions of Western Europe to be caused by "guilty delusion enticing the thoughtless crowd with dreams of that prosperity which can never be the fruit of wilfulness and obstinacy;" an explanation which, as far as we can understand it, seems to point to French Socialism. His armies have marched into Transylvania: the Hungarians are armed to the teeth to resist his forces, either separately or combined with those of Austria. Germany, from one end to the other, is labouring in the throes of a new revolution, which only requires a few mistakes on the part of the Brandenburg Ministry, or a defeat of the Hungarians, to eventuate in a Teutonic Red Republic. The Frankfort Parliament is boarding the King of Prussia, and all the other Potentates who resist its powers. The King of Prussia is making a desperate effort to destroy the revolution in his own hereditary dominions, as well as throughout Germany; while in Italy the Romans are showing a determined front, in the name of their own independence and in that of the whole Peninsula, against the extraordinary alliance of the Roman Catholic Powers to force upon them the old superannuated Theocracy which they have cast off. But amid all these great events, the eyes of Europe are principally directed upon France. The culmination of the social and political crisis of our time is seen to be there. It is felt that the triumph of Conservatism in France will strengthen the cause in every part of Europe; and that the victory of the Ultra-Revolutionists, whether they call themselves Red Republicans, Socialists, Communists, or Mountaineers, will light a flame throughout France, Germany, and Italy, of which the extinction will not be achieved until Europe shall have paid the penalty of a war of principles—a war in comparison with which all the wars recorded in modern history will read hereafter like child's play among the nations.

Nor is this paramount interest which all politicians take in the fortunes of France in the slightest degree unwarranted. France is the mistress of the movement. She took the lead in revolutions, and will maintain it, either as a reactionary or as a revolutionary power. It was hoped by all the friends of order, by all the enemies of extreme opinions, and by all that numerous class who love, above all other forms of Government, a powerful status quo, whatever its principles may happen to be, that the elections for the new Legislative Assembly would have shown a preponderance of the Conservative element. This has not been the case, to anything like the extent anticipated. France has shown in a very significant, if not decisive manner, that she has no sympathy with moderate Republicanism; she has shown, in fact, that the "sentimental" Republic is at a discount, both in Paris and in the departments.

EPSOM RACES.—THE STRUGGLE BETWEEN "THE FLYING DUTCHMAN" AND "HOTSPUR."—(SEE PAGE 338)

[COUNTRY EDITION.]

While in the old Assembly there was a large body of men who were neither Legitimists nor Reactionists on the one hand, nor Red Republicans or Socialists on the other, the class which they represented has been, to a great extent, also bed by one or other of these extreme parties. It would seem that Republicanism, in the Lamartine sense, had become impossible amongst our excited neighbours; and that, in the anticipation of a final struggle between the two principles of military despotism and Socialism, each principle had beaten up for recruits among the hitherto moderate men, and drawn them off either to one side or the other, leaving no longer that array of neutrality and indecision of which the existence was always sure to prevent the quarrel of the Ultras from premature and violent explosion.

The elections, so far as the results are yet known, show a clear gain to both of these parties, at the expense of the juste milieu. Legitimists and Bonapartists muster strong. All that conglomeration of politicians who disagree in most things, but unite in support of the sword as the only emblem of Government, and in hostility to Socialism and Red Republicanism, have gained by the new elections. The Red Republicans, Socialists, and Mountaineers have gained even to a greater extent: they have returned M. Ledru-Rollin and nine Communists for the capital, including a sergeant-major and a sergeant; while, in the provinces, they have shown a strength which has surprised even themselves, and carried dismay into the ranks of those who love peace and a fair trade better than all the theories in the world, and who prefer slavery with quiet to liberty with commotion. General Cavaignac has had but few supporters; M. Thiers and M. Molé, and that class of politicians, have been repudiated altogether; while M. Lamartine—a sincere and moderate Republican, who at one time did more for the cause of order in France than any man living—has not been deemed worthy of a seat in the new Assembly. M. Armand Marrast, the venerable Dupont (de l'Eure), and a host of others Marrast, the venerable Dupont (de l'Eure), and a host of others whose Republican badge is not red, but tricolour, are in the same predicament. The extreme Republicans and Socialists have, therefore, plucked up courage. The blow struck at them by the suppression of the insurrection of June, 1848, seems, in their opinion, to be half avenged by this triumph. They are already talking loud, and preparing for the further prosecution of their projects for the regeneration of society à la Cabet or à la Proudhon. The expiring Assembly, with a shameful recklessness not to have been expected from it, has done its part to increase the alarm which the successes of the Socialists have excited. It has sought popularity among the multitude by repealing the duties on wines and spirits, amounting to 100,000,000*f.*, or £4,000,000 per annum, without even amounting to 100,000,000*f.*, or £4,000,000 per annum, without even so much as hinting at a substitute; and by hostile votes against General Changarnier, and, on the now famous circular of M. Leon Faucher to the departments, has led to the resignation of the Barrot Ministry. The consternation created by these events caused the French funds to fall 12 per cent. within the week; and such has been the state of public feeling, that the final attempt, which most people suppose M. Louis Napoleon and the Generals of Algiers will at some period or another be compelled to make, to put an end to the Republic by the proclamation of a military dictatorship, has been prayed for by some, as the salvation of the country, and supposed by many to be, either for good or for evil, on the point of decision.

The Barrot ministry is greatly to blame for this uneasy and perilous position of affairs; for, though the funds have gone up again seven per cent., as suddenly as they came down, the alarm has not by any means subsided. M. Odillon Barrot's intervention in Italy was a display of political false pretence and international treachery, which wounded the self-love, and affronted the sense of right of the French people. The circular of M. Leon Faucher, Minister of the Interior, which was avowedly written and despatched to influence the elections, was a piece of sharp practice unworthy of the ministry or any member of it. The arrest of Sergeant-Major Boichot, for daring to become a candidate for the Assembly, was a mistake, which has had the worst effect upon the loyalty of the army; while the general alarm expressed at, and persecution launched against the Socialists, have but increased the daring, the influence, and the ambition of that party and its heterogeneous supporters. M. Odillon Barrot is the unluckiest of public men. In the days of Louis Philippe he created a Revolution, which he did not know how to turn to account; and in those of M. Louis Napoleon he has created the Minister in a manner which has belied his own liberalism, and brought France into a difficulty almost, if not quite, as great as that to which he brought her in February, 1848. We expect, however, that France has seen the last of him; and that, whatever may be the ups and downs of politics, his name will never again be considered of use to any body. In the meantime, the President has refused to accept the resignation of the ministry until the meeting of the new Assembly shall afford him something like a clue to the state of parties. Public opinion points to a military ministry, as the only possible combination likely to stand for a month; and we should not be surprised to learn that Marshal Bugeaud had been entrusted with the task of forming a Cabinet; and that he had given the various portfolios to men of the calibre of Changarnier, Bedeau, and the other Generals of Algerine education men accustomed to razzias and to the exercise of a despotism. No one, however, can imagine that France could be permanently governed under such a system. Nevertheless, there seems a very general idea, to use the current French expression, that "il faut passer par là."

The one great danger which now menaces Europe through the instrumentality of France is that the clamours of the Socialist party, the disposition of the army, and the general predilection of the people for military renown, will force the President, as a means of escape from the internal difficulty of his position, into foreign warfare. War with Austria for the liberation of Italy is the cry of the Ultras. Such a war would be the war of principles to which we have already alluded—the war predicted by the Emperor Napoleon as the inevitable consequence of the existence in Europe of two such powers as France and Russia, each representing a principle of Government and ranging other nations under its banner. We are not inclined to set the pert of alarmists, but we must confess that the state of Hungary, Poland, Italy, Germany, and France on the one hand, and of Russia and Austria on the other, is so full of difficulties that may refuse themselves to any solution save that of the sword, and of complications that may be cut but that can scarcely be untied, that, without much more wisdom, patience, and forbearance than seem to actuate the conduct of the great leaders of nations at the present time, we can but consider that, sooner or later, a European war is inevitable. It will be happy for Great Britain if she be not compelled to meddle in it.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS OF MANUFACTURED GOODS.—The declared value of all the manufactured goods of a portable character imported into the United Kingdom, and exported for home consumption, in 1848, amounted to £14 398; in 1841, £13,813; in 1842, £16,867; 1843, £20,761; 1844, £23,920; 1845, £31,020; 1845, £35,5.9; 1847, £35,160; 1848, £32,020. The declared value of British manufactured goods exported was as follows:—1840, £3,014 344; 1841, £3, 78,175; 1842, £2,920 128; 1843 £3 448,451; 1844, £4,123,670; 1845, £4,3 407; 1847, £3,84..735; £1849, £3,958 634.

RAPID DELIVERY OF LETTERS.—GENERAL POST-OFFICE, MAY, 1849. The Postmaster-General is desirous of calling attention to the greater facility of delivery which would be obtained by consequent on the general adoption of street-door letter-boxes, or slits, in private dwelling-houses, and indeed wherever the postman is at present kept waiting. He hopes that householders will not object to the means by which, at a very moderate expense, they may secure so desirable an advantage to themselves, to their neighbours, and to the public service.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The general elections have falsified the expectations of those who thought that the Socialists would be in a contemptible minority. So far from that being the case, in Paris, out of the 28 representatives, 10 are Socialists; while, on the whole election in the departments and in the capital, the official return gives the result, 917 Socialists, 511 Moderates, and 22 not classified.

The men of order had need to look to their tactics in time. Disturbances had occurred both at Montpellier and at Castelnaudary the elections; that they were soon put down. Several arrests were made in the former town, chiefly of the M ntagnard party. At Lodève the Procureur-Général was killed by a pistol-shot.

On Monday there was a grand review in the Champ de Mars, in the presence of the President of the Republic. The object of the review was to ascertain the real feeling of the troops with respect to the Government, it having been currently reported that the Socialists had succeeded in undermining many of them from their allegiance. The number of troops on the ground was upwards of 40,000. Their appearance was magnificent. Among the troops the cries were generally of a loyal character, but the crowds of lookers-on were very equivocal in their reception of the President. On leaving the Palace of the Elysée, and again on his return, Louis Napoleon was warmly received. Immediately after the review, the Prince addressed a letter to General Changarnier, requesting him to tell the soldiers how grateful he was with their appearance, &c. "With such soldiers" adds the Prince, "our young Republic will soon resemble an elder sister of Austerlitz and Marengo, if foreigners should force us to show the resemblance. And at home, if the anarchists should raise the flag, they would quickly be rendered powerless by this army, so faithful to duty and honour. In praising the troops your chief himself is praised. So be good, Mon General, as to remit the punishment." Louis NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

The continued hostility of the National Assembly; the results of the elections; a certain want of unanimity amongst Ministers themselves, and various other causes, have combined to bring the Cabinet to the belief that they ought to resign, and accordingly it was understood in the course of the week that they had tendered their resignation to the President, but that he had hesitated to accept it. Nothing certain, however, was known on the matter—all was but rumour —the general impression being that the President's intention was to form "a strong Government," whose chief reliance should be upon the army, Marshal Bugeaud being Minister of War and President of the Council.

In the National Assembly, on Tuesday, M. Sarrans brought forward his promised interpellations respecting the affairs of Rome and Hungary. He said, that the latest accounts from the former city satisfied him that General Oudinot was about to make a second attack upon it; and as to the latter, the Russian had ordered its submission. He thought that, under such circumstances, France should not remain a passive spectator. He, therefore, suggested that a league should be formed with their traditional allies, for he had no doubt that Russia, having 150,000 men in action, would be concentrated in Germany. It was the intention of that power to invade France.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs replied that our envoy had been sent to the French Head-quarters at Rome to enforce the views and resolutions of the Assembly. Respecting the interference of Russia in Hungary, the gravity of events had attracted the serious attention of the Government, who had determined upon forwarding remonstrances to the Courts of London, Vienna, Berlin, and St. Petersburg. He regretted to say that he could add nothing further upon these subjects.

M. Joly expressed himself dissatisfied with the explanations given. For his part, he preferred war to the degradation of his country and the destruction of its liberties. He should, therefore, censure the Government.

"The National Assembly, considering that the manifesto of the Emperor of Russia, and the treaties concluded between Russia, Austria, and Prussia, are an attempt against the principles of the public law proclaimed by the French Constitution, and rat fied by the vote of the National Assembly, protests, in the name of the French people, against that new coalition which menaces the liberties of Europe, and enjoins the Government to adopt immediately the most energetic measures to enforce the respect for the principle of the independence and nationality of the Roman Republic."

General Lamoricière stated that he had objected to the French expedition, because he deemed Rome to be attacked. France might respect the Roman Republic, without supporting it. He suggested that the motion should be modified thus:—

"The National Assembly calls the serious attention of the Government to the events and the movements of troops which are taking place in Europe; and, forewarned by the danger of this state of things, as well for the welfare of liberty as for the interior and exterior interests of the Republic, it recommends to the Government to take the measures necessary to protect them energetically, and passes to the order of the day."

M. Joly approved of this resolution, as being too feeble to answer the desired end. He should, therefore, persist in his former motion.

M. Odillon Barrot opposed both resolutions, especially the first, as amounting to a declaration of war—a policy which the Ministry could not accept. It could not engage in a policy of words; it must take the responsibility of its actions. Therefore he should support the simple order of the day, which, on a division, was received by a majority of 469 to 83. The Assembly then broke up in a state of great excitement, the proceedings having been characterized by unusual acrimonious violence. The consideration of the two resolutions was resumed on Wednesday, and the Assembly, after a great deal of noise and confusion, proceeded to divide on the motion of Gen. Cavaignac, modified by a proposal opposed by MM. Joly and Bastide to the following effect:—"To take measures necessary to preserve the independence and the liberty of nations." Gen. Cavaignac objected to this addition, on the ground that it went beyond what he wished or proposed. A short but stormy discussion followed on the mode in which the vote should be entered by the Tellers. It was decided that General Cavaignac should be put to the vote separately; that a vote should be afterwards taken upon the phrase proposed by MM. Joly and Bastide; and that another vote should be taken on the whole question of the order of the day. The motion of General Cavaignac was then put and carried par assis et levé. The addition phrase was rejected by a majority of 346 votes to 269; and, finally, the Assembly, by a majority of 453 to 184, carried, as Gen. Cavaignac, as adopted, on a scrutin de division, by a majority of 436 to 184. The alarm which the division of Tue day had created in Paris subsided considerably on the receipt of Tuesday's discussion becoming known the fear of war being for the none moment.

The Emperor of Russia has recognised the French Republic, and has accredited Baron Kisseleff to Paris as Minister Plenipotentiary.

Three representatives elected to the new Legislative Assembly have died since the commencement of the elections.—M. Lacave Laplagne (elected for the Gers), M. Lobet (for the Nord), and M. Roger (du Loiret).

SPAIN.

There is no political intelligence of interest from Madrid.

On the 17th inst. the long expected and extraordinary spectacle of a fight between a bull and a Bengal tiger took place in presence of the Queen and a vast number of spectators. The bull appeared to be in the full force of health, whilst the spirit of the tiger was subdued by long imprisonment. The bull approached his antagonist with his head lowered. He stopped a moment to look at the tiger, and then rushed at him. The tiger made a spring forward, but the latter laid the tiger dead with one thrust of his horns. The bull went off gallop triumphantly through the arena, was led away. It was calculated that 90,000 persons were present, and that the bets amounted to full £.00,000.

ITALIAN STATES

TUSCANY. The Austrians, upon having forced an entrance into Leghorn, proceeded to place the city in a state of siege, and shot all the insurgents who had fallen into their hands.

ROME.—Accounts from Turin announce that Bologna was entered on the 16th by the Austrians, after a sanguinary contest.

From the "Roman City" we learn that M. Lesseps had arrived there on a mission from the French Government, and that on the 15th, accompanied by Signor Accursi, he repaired to General Oudinot's camp, at Palo. On the night of the 13 h, also, a deputation from the city came to the General's quarters. The nocturnal object of these visits was to treat for the opening an armistice; but as an armistice already existed in fact it was supposed that the establishment of preliminaries for a final pacific arrangement was the real object in view.

FRANCFORT.—The National Assembly, in the sitting of the 19th, after rejecting by different majorities several propositions relative to the Vicar of the Empire, and a modification of the Constitution, resolved, by 198 to 94 votes, that a Lieutenant-General should be elected in the room of the Archduke John [illegible] constitution before the National Assembly. It had also to hand the government [illegible] After his accession, he should cause all to swear to the constitution. 4. He shall proceed to the elections for the Diet, and to the convocation of it. Diet. 5. Until the opening of the Diet, the National Assembly shall exercise all the power hel nging to it. As to the number of members necessary for deliberate, the resolution of the 30th April shall continue to govern the fact of law (that is, that the members must be present to render a vote valid). 6. If insurmountable obstacles shall prevent the nomination of a Chief of the Empire, as provided for by the resolutions of the 28th inst., the Lieutenant-General of the Empire shall continue to exercise his functions until the Diet shall have decided on the Government of the Empire. 7. When the Lieutenant-General shall be decided on, the Central Provisional Government shall cease to exercise power, and the authority of the Chief of the Empire shall fall on the new Lieutenant-General of the Empire. The Assembly further declared that it would oppose any attack on the governments which have recognised the constitution, and would invite them to lend their co-operation to realise the constitution, and to maintain order, and also adopted a resolution to the effect that if the press in Vicar of the Empire should, as the Ministry had threatened, resign his powers into other hands than those of the National Assembly, [illegible] act should be considered null and of no effect. Baron Gagern and all the Conservative Moderates resigned their seats on the 21st inst.

BAVARIA.—The insurrection in the Palatinate of Bavaria has not been checked, but the accounts last received state that the chiefs display much energy against anarchists as they have done in throwing off their allegiance to the Government.

In the other minor states matters continue in a very effervescent state

AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY.

The Emperor has published a new proclamation to the Hungarians, in which his Majesty sums up his old complaints, and declares that the interests of the nationality and of the liberty of the Hungarians is but a pretext made use of by the anarchists. That party, he says, seeks its support from the league of foreign countries; it has taken into its pay men without fortune, and the enemies of tranquility and of order. Such is the reason why the Emperor of Russia has united himself to the Emperor to combat against the common enemy.

The last accounts from Pesth state that the Hungarians were still engaged in bombarding Buda, and were de ermined to take it, even if the Austrian should destroy Pesth. It was reported at Vienna that they had succeeded in their aim.

General Bem is said to have obtained a victory over the Russians; but nothing certain is known on the subject.

SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

The fortress of Frederic ia has been more closely invested by the troops of Schleswig Holstein. On the 15th, 16th, and 17th inst., several bombs were thrown into it, more to alarm the Danes than with any expectation of bringing them to surrender.

In the neighbourhood of Duppel there has been some severe fighting.

General Sponneck, the aide-de-camp of the King of Prussia, has gone to Copenhagen, charged with a mission relative to the negotiations for peace with Denmark.

CANADA.

Accounts which have been received this week, and the United States, represent the state of matters as re tored to comparative tranquility. An address which had been agreed to at Montreal, expressive of the determination of peace, and a resort only to legal and constitutional means for a redress of what may be considered grievances, was signed by influential men of all parties, and had produced a tranquillising effect.

At Kingston, the resolutions in favour of a recal of Lord Elgin were moderate in tone, but decidedly adverse to the Rebellion Losses Bill. These resolutions also regret the outbreak at Montreal, and pledge the citizens to a preservation of order.

Although great excitement continued to prevail, and the worst spirit was manifested against Lord Elgin upon every occasion when he appeared in public in Montreal, yet no further disturbances had taken place; while in various parts of the country meetings and addresses sustaining the course of the Government were numerous

Upon the occasion of his Excellency attending at Government House, Montreal, to receive an address from the Legislative Assembly, on the 30th ult., he was again grossly insulted. He arrived under the escort of the Light Dragoons, the mob yelling and groaning, and throwing eggs at his carriage. The streets were greatly crowded, and numerous persons assembled in front of Government House, but no disturbance took place. Regret and indignation at the burning of the Parliament House, and the fine library, are the prevailing feelings throughout the country.

UNITED STATES.

In the intelligence from the States which has been received this week there is no feature of domestic interest.

WEST INDIES.

By the mail steam ship Conway, we have advices this week from the islands. The news from Jamaica is to the 21st of April. It is of the same cheerless routine nature that has characterised our advices from this quarter of the globe for a considerable period. The sugar crop will be much shorter than was originally supposed. It is calculated by the highest authority, that the gross aggregate cannot exceed 35,000 hogsheads

The idea of an alteration in the constitution of the council of the island still occupied the thoughts of the colonists. A very large and influential meeting was held in the town of Falmouth, on the 14th of April, at which some able speeches were made, and a series of resolutions passed in support of that object.

Rain on many parts has set for all branches of agriculture in Jamaica.

Our accounts from Demerara extend to the 21st ult. In conformity with the terms of our advices by the last packet, the Combined Court met on the 11th ult., and the estimates were entered upon during several days' sittings, after which the Court adjourned, but not before carrying the principle of retrenchment to a length which had taken even its own supporters by surprise.

INDIA.

Advices in anticipation of the Overland Mail have been received, dated Bombay, April 17, and Calcutta, April 7.

The intelligence is of special importance It announces the close of the Sikh war, and the annexation of their country, the Punjaub, to the British territory.

Our last summary closes with the arrival at the head of General Sir W. R. Gilbert and his army, in pursuit of the flying Dost Mahomed, Ameer of Cabool, who, vanquished on the field of Goojerut, was making his way towards the Khyber Pass, en route to the cis-Indus. He entered the Khyber Pass without any obstruction from the natives, just as General Gilbert crossed the Indus, and had made his way to Jellalabad before the last or rear-guard Peshawur. When the British General arrived at the latter place, he found that the Affghans had destroyed the villages and suburbs around, and set fire to the cantonments, and to the former residence of Major-General Lawrence. The gates of the city had been ordered against the Sirdars, and the "Lion of the Punjaub" (the Dost's own suggestion; otherwise, the place would, no doubt, have been given over to sack and pillage.

Lord Dalhousie, having determined to await the intelligence of the expulsion of Dost Mahomed from Peshawur, before taking the important step of proclaiming the annexation of the Punjaub, the gratifying news was officially conveyed to his Lordship in a despatch from Major-General Gilbert, dated from Head-quarters Camp, the 22th March, 1849, and enclosing a letter from General Gilbert, announcing his success in Peshawur.

Immediately on the receipt of these documents, the Governor-General issued a proclamation on the 30th of March, declaring the Sikh dynasty at an end, and the Punjaub annexed to the British territories. The chief secretary, Mr Edet, proceeded straight to Lahore on the 26th, accompanied by a strong escort of troops. He arrived on the 28th, and next morning read before the assembled darbar the determination of the Governor-General. The Rajas, no longer strong enough to reserve an allowance of £40,000, and to reside within the British dominions His mother will be permitted to join him. Poonah, it is said, will be the place of their future abode. The few chiefs not convicted of treason are to retain their estates—the property of those who have appealed in arms against us is all confiscated. The Sikh soldiers are not to be entertained in the service. The Government is to be managed by a council of three—Mr. J. Lawrence, Mr. Mansell, and Colonel Sir H. Lawrence, of which the last is president, with a salary of £5000 a year—the others have each £4800. Four commissioners, with a large array of deputy commissioners, are under these. Our new dominions comprise 100,000 square miles of ground, yielding a revenue of about a million, and containing a population of above three millions. For some time to come it will in all likelihood prove a heavy drain on our finances, its revenues falling short of its military expenditure—the charges of Government devolving on India. Thirty-three thousand troops have been ordered to remain for the present within the country; thirty-eight thousand more are maintained close at hand. Lord Gough left Lahore for Simla on the 30 ult., whither he had been preceded by Lord Dalhousie from Ferozepore on the same day.

Sir Willoughby Cotton has resigned the office of Commander-in-Chief at Bombay. It is said that he is not pleased with Sir Charles Napier (an officer his junior) being placed over his head.

AUSTRALIA.

ALLEGED DISCOVERY OF A LARGE FIELD OF GOLD.—Papers from Melbourne, Port Philip, to the 1st of February have been received, which announce the alleged discovery of a large field of gold in the interior by a shepherd's boy, and as specimens of the ore weighing from 22 to 24 oz. each had been purchased and exhibited, the excitement of the colonists was said to have become intense. Great numbers of persons had, although unacquainted with the exact spot, had set out in search of the mine

MOURNING PORCELAINE BROOCH.—This beautiful brooch has just been introduced by Mrs. Broughan, of Burlington. It consists of the white porcelaine design, as flowers, &c., placed upon a jet-black ground, the effect of which is novel, tasteful, and pleasing.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.—This place of olden celebrity will be opened on Whit Monday, under an entirely new proprietorship. Among the novel attractions will be the Ball of the Opera Comique, of Paris; housemanship by Hernandez and the Antrials; and a concert by English, Irish, and French vocalists. The gardens have been revived: the Italian Walk has been continued all round the grounds, and will be illuminated by the electric light; there will be a beautiful picture-model of the Lake of Como; and, a superb theatre, a representation of the far-famed Fountains of Versailles, with real water. In the refreshment department there will be considerable reduction of charges, with, it is promised, scrupulous attention to the quality of the refreshments

OFFICE OF HER MAJESTY'S EXCHEQUER-BILLS.—J. WHITEHALL, 24 MAY, 1849. The Exchequer Bills, dated in the month of June, 1848 (per act 11 Vic. c. 15. £17,946,500, and 1848), with the interest due thereon, will be paid off on the 14th of June, 1849, when the interest will cease. Such bills will be received for exchange at this office daily, from half-past ten till three o'clock, until the 7th day of June, 1849, inclusive. Printed forms, containing instructions for the preparation of the bills (or claims), and the arrangement of the bills, may be obtained on application at the office. The bearers must endorse each bill with their usual signatures, and they must insert their names and addresses in each bill or claim where the number of bills is inserted in the bills, the inducement of such holders must also be obtained previously to their claims being left for examination. New bills, bearing interest at the rate of one penny halfpenny per day, will be issued every one hundred pounds paid and left on the 14th day of June, 1849, may be obtained in payment of the principal of the [illegible] part, of the £4 acquer bills issued under the act above mentioned, on [illegible]ying, in their course of [illegible] months of new bills re[illegible] them The new bills, together with the interest due thereon, will be left for [illegible] will be issued on the 15th day of June, 1849; the bearers must attend at the office to sign receipts for the payment of principal and interest. IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

Their Lordships met at five o'clock.

FIRING AT THE QUEEN.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE immediately rose, and referring to the crime committed on Saturday against the person of her Majesty, stated that the result of the inquiry directed against the culprit did not lead to the disclosure of any circumstances that would justify his committal on a charge of high treason. Had such been the case, there could be no doubt that the unanimous desire of their Lordships would be to go up at once to the throne and express their abhorrence of the crime, and their congratulation on the preservation of her Majesty's invaluable life. This was an of those crimes so odious and dastardly a character—of so paltry and contemptible a nature, that it was impossible to speak of it with that seriousness which a malignant attempt would deserve. The contemptible offender was committed on the charge of a simple misdemeanour, under the act of 1842 and left to be treated as the law directed.

Lord STANLEY rejoiced that it was not the intention of the Government to give to the most contemptible and disgraceful crime committed on Saturday that importance which an address to the Crown would imply. If any serious attempt had been made on her Majesty, every individual, of every class in the empire, would at once desire to express his execration of such an act, and his congratulation at her Majesty's escape

Lord CLINTON suggested the propriety of ordering a prayer of thanksgiving on this occasion

After some observations from Lord BROUGHAM, the subject dropped.

On the motion of the Marquis of LANSDOWNE, the Land Improvement and Drainage (Ireland) Bill was read a second time; and the standing orders having been suspended for the occasion, the committee was negatived, and the bill was read a third time and passed, without discussion.

THE NAVIGATION LAWS.

On the motion of the Marquis of LANSDOWNE, the House then went into committee on the Navigation Bill —Lord Beaumont, in the absence of Lord Shaftesbury, who was indisposed, in the chair.

The first clause having been read,

Lord STANLEY explained the general scope and object of the amendments he felt it his duty to propose, and of which he had given notice. The principle of these amendments was to maintain the existing Navigation Laws, giving power to her Majesty in Council, upon receiving satisfactory assurances of reciprocity from foreign powers, in certain cases to relax or modify the restrictions now in force The bill submitted by the Government professed to be a bill to "amend" the Navigation Laws; but instead of amending, it went at once to abrogate and utterly annul them. The proposal he (Lord Stanley) and those who were with him on this question had to make to their Lordships was really and fairly to amend the laws, entering honestly into the consideration of the most fictions and restrictive one that it would be advisable to make, having in view the setting of commerce as free as possible, consistent with those higher interests which it was the paramount duty of Parliament to promote and secure. There was a great distinction between the bill brought forward by the Government and all pre-existing acts Mr. Huskisson recommended treaties with various countries, on receiving equivalent advantages, and all his measures applied to the direct trade between country and country. But now the Government proposed to enter into competition with all the world —with each and every quarter of the globe; and this measure was forced forward contrary to the sense of the country and against the express prayers of British shipowners, or shipbuilders, and of merchants. The objects of the amendment he (Lord Stanley) submitted to their Lordships were to maintain our trade with our colonies; to maintain the advantages of the long voyage trade and of commerce with those countries which had no shipping of their own, and to maintain, as a matter of paramount importance, the restricting the right of British registry to British-built ships. But in submitting his first amendment, by which he wished to test the principle whether the Navigation Laws should be repealed or amended, he did not ask noble Lords to pledge themselves to the adoption of all his amendments, but simply to the modus operandi of the bill—whether they should begin by abrogating or maintaining the existing Navigation Laws. Lord Stanley moved his first amendment.—"After the word 'that' in page 1, to the end of the clause it shall be made to appear to her Majesty that any foreign country is willing to concede the ships of this country the like privileges and advantages as are enjoyed by or intended to be conferred on the ships of such foreign country, or advantages equivalent thereto, then, and in such case, it shall be lawful for her Majesty, from time to time, by any order or orders in council, to be published and revoked as hereinafter mentioned, by authority and declare as follows."

Earl GREY opposed the amendment, because it would practically rescind the principle of the bill affirmed at the second reading. He could not assent to the proposition of beginning by scrutinising one clause after another by which the existing restrictions would be repealed. The noble Earl, at considerable length, contended that the Navigation Laws were injurious to commerce, and that no man could tell how they impeded trade until other expressions should have shown their importance

Lord BROUGHAM dissected the petitions presented for and against the measure, to show that all the great maritime towns were, with very trifling exception, opposed to a repeal of the Navigation Laws. With regard to the amendment proposed by Lord Stanley, he could not see with what consistency Lord Stanley and Sir Charles could refuse to vote for that amendment, and yet adhere to the amendment he had himself placed on the paper. In fact, the amendments proposed by Lord Stanley and Lord Wharncliffe were similar in principle, although the former had the great advantage of being the better. That it would be better practically, Lord Brougham proceeded to point out. Under the bill as framed by the Government, America, Belgium, and Spain would get into our coasting trade without the possibility of our obtaining anything like reciprocity; whereas, by framing the bill according to Lord Stanley's recommendation, reciprocity would be secured before our colonial trade would be given up. The noble and learned Lord concluded his speech by observing upon the extraordinary and unusual efforts evidently made in the Government on that occasion, as if the fate of the empire depended on the vote. He saw there present some who had been summoned from afar and from near (Lord Clarendon and Lord Normanby were in the House), who had not been in the House for those who had not heard a word of the debate. He saw those who had hastened from the Continent, which, at all events, might be adduced as a proof that this measure excited a strong sensation in Europe. He hoped their Lordships would not (as Lord Brougham implored their Lordships to uphold the principle of the Navigation Laws, under which the country had attained its present eminence, warning them that there was something more important than trade and commerce—the defence of the empire.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE summed up the arguments in favour of the bill. The broad line of policy laid down in the Government measure, and which they were prepared to carry out, was the removal of every restriction that they possibly could; whereas the policy laid down in Lord Stanley's amendment was the maintenance of all the restrictions that could be held, and the removal of only such few restrictions as could not be maintained. Those amendments would, if carried, overturn the principle of the bill, and therefore he called on their Lordships to support the original clause.

The committee then divided:

For Lord Stanley's amendment—

Majority against the amendment ..

On the motion of Lord Lansdowne, the further consideration of the bill was postponed.

Their Lordships adjourned at a quarter to one o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

On the motion of Mr. TEPPEL, a new writ was issued for Sutherlandshire, in the room of Sir D. Dundas, who has accepted the office of Judge-Advocate.

FIRING AT THE QUEEN.

Lord J. RUSSELL: "Sir, before I move the postponement of two orders of the day that stand on the paper for to-night, I think it right, in order to allay public apprehension, to say that, as the information which was made in some of the newspapers of Saturday evening that a treasonable attempt had been made against the life of her Majesty, I can state, that, although it is unfortunately true that a pistol was discharged at the Queen when her Majesty was passing on her return home to Buckingham Palace, it has been found that there is no reason to assume the person who discharged the pistol of a treasonable attempt, and that it is a crime more remarkable for its baseness than its atrocity. (Hear, hear.) I have only further to state that I am sure it had been an attempt of another kind, I should have had the cordial assent of this House to a great character to address to her Majesty, congratulating her on the preservation of a life so valuable. (Loud cheers.) I may add, that her Majesty, on this occasion, which might have been one of a most serious nature, acted with her usual intrepidity and self possession." (Loud cheering.) The noble Lord then moved that the committee on the Poor Relief Bill (Ireland) Bill be postponed till the 4th of June, and, as we understood, also the Ecclesiastical Commission Bill.

The noble Lord's announcement was received by the House with the utmost possible demonstration of loyalty; and Lord J. Russell, in making it, laboured under deep emotion

Mr. J. O'CONNELL hoped it would not be considered an intrusion if he said that, being as warm a subject of Ireland, it would be improper to regarded as an aggravation of those misfortunes that the dastardly miscreant who had committed this outrage was an Irishman He would say, however, that he believed, amidst the greatest excitement that prevailed in Ireland, there would not have been found one among the fiercest, the wildest, the most unruly that took part in those unhappy events, who would have harboured a feeling of personal insult towards her Majesty. (Cheers.) And even now, although the misfortunes of Ireland were absorbing the attention of every one in that country, he might say that they would all be in a moment forgotten in one general burst of congratulation and fervent joy that our beloved Sovereign had escaped unhurt from the dangers that surrounded her person. (Cheers.)

The Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill and the Irish Poor Law Amendment Bill were postponed to the 4th of June.

The House went into committee on the Encumbered Estates (Ireland) Bill, and agreed to its clauses

The Parliamentary Oaths Bill, as amended, was considered, and the third reading fixed for the 11th of June.

The Charitable Trusts Bill was read a second time.

The Passengers Bill was committed.—Adjourned at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

In consequence of the illness of the Lord Chancellor and of Lord Shaftesbury, Lord CAMPBELL presided on the Woolsack, and Lord BEAUMONT filled the Chair of Committees

On the motion of Lord ENDESLEIGH, the Apprehension of Deserters (Portugal) Bill passed through committee

On the motion of the Earl of EGLINTON, the Small Debts Act Amendment (Scotland) Bill was read a third time and passed.

To questions from the Earl of HARDWICK,

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE stated that the negotiations now in progress relative to the affairs of La Plata promised to arrive at a speedy and satisfactory conclusion, though they were not in such a state as to admit of discussion in that House.

The Earl of ABERDEEN hoped that the basis of the arrangement would be that taken out by Mr Hood some years ago. The independence of Monte Video was the important point for this country to secure

Lord BROUGHAM presented petitions from members of the United Church of England and Ireland resident in Scotland, praying their Lordships to provide for the endowment of all clergymen of the Church of England and Ireland on being appointed to Episcopal chapels in Scotland

A discussion followed, in which the Bishop of Salisbury, the Earl of Suffolk, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Worcester, the Duke of Argyll, the Bishop of Exeter, the Bishop of Oashel, the Earl of Minto, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Bishop of Oxford, the Earl of Harrowby, the Bishop of Powis, and the Earl of Galloway took part

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.—Adjourned to Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

A new writ was ordered for South Warwickshire, in the room of Mr. E. J. Shirley, who has accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

The Marquis of GRANBY moved that the House, at its rising, should adjourn to Thursday, over Wednesday, the "Derby day."—Sir G. GREY would give no opinion upon the motion, but leave it to the House to decide On a division, there were:—For the motion, 138; against, 119: majority for the motion, 19.

SHORT PARLIAMENTS.

Mr T. D'EYNCOURT moved for leave to bring in a bill for shortening the duration of Parliament. He would not insist absolutely on limiting the duration of Parliament to three years, but he would be content with five years, provided the Government would assent to that term.

Lord J. STUART seconded the motion.

Lord J. RUSSELL said the question was one of experience and practicability, and 20 years after the passing of the Triennial Act many of its supporters found that it led to fraud and subsidies throughout the country, and ultimately its inconveniences and injuries were so great as to lead to the Septennial Act. Practically, the duration of Parliaments was now six years, and he did not see that any advantage would be gained by reducing the term to five years. As to three years, two would be thrown away, the first in the formation of new members, and the third in looking forward to the next election. He should, therefore, oppose the motion.

Mr. S. CRAWFORD supported the motion, and the House went to a division, when there were—For the motion, 46; Against it, 41: Majority for the motion, 5.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

The result of this division was received with loud cheers by the members present.

Mr. SLANEY moved for the appointment of a standing committee, or unpaid commission, to consider and report from time to time on practical measures (unconnected with political changes) likely to improve the condition of the working classes, to encourage their industry and increase their contentment. The honourable member was proceeding to develop the measure he contemplated, when the House was counted out.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their Lordships met shortly after four o'clock.

ROYAL ASSENT.

The Royal Assent was given to-day to the following thirteen private and public Bills:—St. John's (Newfoundland) Rebuilding Bill. Grants of Land (New South Wales) Bill. Land Improvement and Drainage (Ireland) Bill. Poor-laws (Ireland) Rate in Aid Bill. Grands (Corporations) Revenue Arrangement Bill. Whitehaven Waterworks Bill Marshland, Smeeth, and Fen (Equalisation of Drainage Rates and Repair of Road) Bill. Kidderminster Union Small Tenement Rating Bill. Argyle Canal (Abandonment of Undertaking) Bill New Ross Port and Harbour Amendment Bill. Edinburgh and Northern Railway (Additional Capital and Amendment of Acts) Bill. North-Western Railway (Extension of Lancaster Branch, Abandonment of Williams Lane Branch, New Road to Settle Station, Extension of Time for purchase of Land and Construction of Works) Bill. Sandgate Waterworks Bill.

The Lords Commissioners were the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Marquis of Clanricarde, and Lord Campbell.

The House was adjourned during pleasure.

Their Lordships resumed at five o'clock

The Earl of HARROWBY presented several petitions, praying for an alteration in the Sale of Beer Act.

BANKRUPTCY CONSOLIDATION LAWS BILL.

On the motion of Lord BROUGHAM this bill was committed pro forma.

REPORTERS' GALLERY.

Lord BEAUMONT presented the report of the committee, recommending the erection of a temporary gallery

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE gave notice that, on the understanding that the temporary gallery would be erected, he should move to-morrow (it is the House do adjourn to the Monday se'nnight following.

BANKRUPTCY LAWS CONSOLIDATION BILL.

Lord BROUGHAM proposed that on Tuesday se'nnight he should move the further consideration of this bill.

CANADA.

Lord WHARNCLIFFE asked if the noble Earl had received the promised despatch from the Governor of Canada; and if so, whether he would lay it on the table to-morrow?

Earl GREY said he had received the despatch, and he would lay it on the table on an early day, but he could not promise to do so to-morrow.

Lord BROUGHAM postponed his motion on the subject to Canada to this day fortnight, when he should draw the attention of the House to recent events in Canada, and to the bill introduced by the Government and assented to by the Governor-General.

NAVIGATION LAWS

On the motion of the Marquis of LANSDOWNE, their Lordships resolved themselves into committee on the Navigation-laws Repeal Bill, Lord Beaumont in the chair.

The various clauses of the bill were agreed to without amendment. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

NEW SPANISH TARIFF.

In reply to a question put by Mr. Hankey,

Mr. LABOUCHERE said he had no objection to lay on the table of the House the new Spanish tariff, in the same way as that of 1841.

THE DUTY ON ADVERTISEMENTS.

Mr. EWART gave notice that, on an early day, he should move for the repeal of the advertisement duty.

THE BALLOT.

Mr. HENRY BERKELEY moved for leave to bring in a bill to enable parliamentary electors to give their votes by ballot.

After a short discussion, the motion was on division, negatived by a majority of 136 to 8.

THE COLONIES.

Mr. ROEBUCK moved for leave to bring in a bill for the better government of the North American, Australian, South African, and New Zealand colonies. His plan embraced an improved system of self-government that settlements should be formed, with fixed boundaries, so that when they attained a certain amount of population they should be declared provinces, possessing federal legislative assemblies, as in the case of the United States.

Mr. HAWES combatted the plan as expensive and impracticable.

On a division, the motion was lost by a majority of 116 to 73.

Adjourned at a quarter to one o'clock.

VACANCY IN THE REPRESENTATION OF SOUTH WARWICKSHIRE.—

Mr. Shirley having retired, Lord Guernsey, eldest son of the Earl of Aylesford, is a candidate for the representation. He avows himself a friend to protection to agriculture and British industry.

SALE OF THE EFFECTS OF THE PRESIDENT OF FRANCE.—On Tuesday the sale by auction of the effects of Prince Louis Napoleon was concluded by Messrs. Christie and Manson, on the premises, No 3 King-street, St. James's square. This property consisted of a quantity of valuable Gobelin tapestry, of choice pictures, engravings, furniture, &c. &c. Many of the lots fetched high prices the numerous light and graceful trifles which the universally patronised dance, the Polka, has given birth also, fastened on by means of iron wire snares —they have undergone no process of annealing:—introduced into the wall of the hoof, through holes bored into it, taking nearly the same direction and course as the nails do The staples are turned downwards, so that their ends emerge within the canal of the faltering, where by means of pliers they are brought into contact and twisted together, and the twist afterwards turned and beaten down snugly within the canal The deeper the faltering, therefore, the better. The staples are introduced on either side, the number, as in the use of nails, being left to the judgment of the practitioner.

THE SHANNON POLKA, BY MARGARET J. MACCULLOCH.—Among

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

MEETINGS.

SOUTH YORKSHIRE, DONCASTER, AND GOOLE.—At the special general meeting of the proprietors, on the 1st instant, Lord Wharncliffe in the chair, about 3097 shares were forfeited on which £3 per shr had been paid and whose holders had refused the payment of the £5 call, and the capital of the company was reduced to that extent.

MONMOUTHSHIRE.—At the half-yearly meeting of the proprietors, at Newport, on the 16th, Mr. R. Blakemore, M.P., in the chair, the report affirmed that the improvements in the Western Valley lines would be completed by August next, so that the company will well perform the carrying service of the district. A satisfactory increase in the merchandise revenue had occurred during the last six months. The total revenue had been £21,500, and the expenditure for the half-year, to 31st March last, was £8565. There was due on calls £5000 only. After the adoption of the report, a dividend of £2 10s per share was declared for the half-year, and resolutions were passed empowering the directors to raise £12,000 by the creation of new shares.

BIRKENHEAD, LANCASHIRE, AND CHESHIRE JUNCTION.—At the special meeting, on the 19th, at Birkenhead, Alderman J. Bancroft in the chair, powers were taken to the bills read to the meeting to abandon the proposed line to Stockport; to alter the levels of a portion of the Chester branch; for reducing the capital from £2,250,000 to £1,902,000; and for making a line from Denton to Wolsley. The reduction of capital was proposed to be adjusted as follows:—On calls £5000 only. After the adoption of the report, a dividend of £2 10s per share was declared for the half-year, and resolutions were passed empowering the directors to raise £12,000 by the creation of new shares.

BIRKENHEAD, LANCASHIRE, AND CHESHIRE JUNCTION.—At the special meeting, on the 19th, at Birkenhead, Alderman J. Bancroft in the chair, powers were taken to the bills read to the meeting to abandon the proposed line to Stockport; to alter the levels of a portion of the Chester branch; for reducing the capital from £2,250,000 to £1,902,000; and for making a line from Denton to Wolsley. The reduction of capital was proposed to be adjusted as follows:—On the 5000 only. After the adoption of the report, a dividend of £2 10s. shares to £72, and the 10s. paid, the meeting was adjourned, after a slight opposition, to the 2nd June. The works are being rapidly progressed with.

STOCKTON AND DARLINGTON.—At the special meeting, on the 14th, at Darlington, Mr. Stobart in the chair, authority was accorded to the directors for the carrying out of certain improvements, &c. in the enjoyment of the company, viz. by an increase of capital; the purchase of the Middlesbrough Dock; the abandoning of portions of the line in Eaglescliffe and Stockton-on-Tees; and the making of a new line in lieu, and the leasing of the whole undertaking to the York, Newcastle, and Berwick.

DUNDALK, DUNDRUM, AND RATHFARNHAM.—At the special meeting on the 16th, in Dublin, Alderman Roper in the chair, the shareholders determined to pay up the £5 call to enable them to vote at the approaching meeting, when certain reforms in the present board are to be discussed.

YORK AND NORTH-MIDLAND.—A special meeting of this company was held in the De Grey Rooms, York, on Thursday, to consider the propriety of appointing a committee of inquiry into the affairs of the company, and also to call up any arrears due to the directors; Sir John Simpson in the chair The chairman announced that there were four vacancies occasioned by the resignations of Mr. Hudson, Mr. Richardson, and Mr. Plews, and the death of Mr. Nicholson. The directors only wished to promote the interests of the company, and had no objection to the appointment of a committee of inquiry. After some discussion, in which it was denied that the traffic returns had been "cooked," as had been intimated, Messrs. Kinnear, of Glasgow; Swann, of York; Brook, of Halifax; Lloyd, of London; and Bull, of London were appointed a committee of investigation. A resolution, giving full power to the committee, having been passed, Messrs. Crawshay, of London; Nesh, Lord Mayor of York; Thompson, of Mount Hall; and Rowntree, of York, were elected directors. A vote of thanks having been given to the chairman, the meeting adjourned to the 12th of July.

The directors of the Great North of Scotland intend forthwith to complete the portion of their line connecting the more populous districts. The completion of the Aberdeen will render this step necessary for the accommodation of the local traffic

The new offices opened on the 26th at the Euston Station of the London and North-Western will cost about £125,000 to £130,000. (We shall Engrave this new Station next week.)

Captain HUTCHINSON, the chief engineer of the London and North-Western declare that by reserving an annual sum of £200,000, or 4 per cent, with compound interest, the permanent way of the whole line, 436 miles long, may be renewed seven times over.

The opening of the Hailsham and Lastbourne branches of the London and Brighton railway, which were recently inspected by the directors, took place on Saturday, at an expense of about £6,000 for the two.

In Aspinwall's empire—a Mr. Aspinwall—a Mr. Aspinwall—a French paper—and—Panama, and are making the proposed line as the best mus. the line, if this information is correct, might be opened for public use by 1852.

The directors of the Blackburn, Haslingden, Burnley, and North-Western have thought fit to issue a printed list of all their shareholders in arrear of calls, in accordance with a resolution of the last general meeting. In it appear the names of 144 persons, who hold 4406 shares, total amount in arrear £4,344.

Certain resident Caledonian shareholders in London, headed by Capt. Plunkett, have resolved on a council of investigation. They believe the misdirected measures of the present board, and seek to adjourn the special meeting one day, fixed to be held in Edinburgh on the 29th, till the company's present condition has been thoroughly examined and declared.

The Railway Chronicle fairly enough remarks, that the traffic of the Eastern Counties is worthy of note at this time, and we gladly record that upwards of one-half of the whole weekly supply of the London markets is brought by the line—of 14,099 sacks of flour brought last week, 6796 came by it, and of 7039 quarters of malt, 4307 quarters. Full one-half of the cattle and beasts supplied to Smithfield came from the eastern counties, and most probably are brought by the railway. Besides the foregoing, large quantities of wheat, barley, oats, and other agricultural produce have been carried.

Respecting the long-talked-of aid to Irish railways by the Home Government, we hear that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has declared that he will give £500,000 to the Midland Great Western, of which £200,000 is to be applied to the line between Mullingar and Athlone, at five per cent. per annum; and £300,000 for its section from Athlone to Galway, at three per cent. per annum. The directors have asked time to discuss these terms.

The line of Waterford, Wexford, and Dublin proprietors have petitioned the Houses of Lords and Commons against such aid.

The Newry, Warrenpoint, and Rosstrevor is to be forthwith opened. Mr. Dargan has excellently well, we hear, performed his contract, and is to have the working of the line.

LORD MONTRAGLE'S RAILWAY RETURNS.—On the motion of Lord Montragle, the following returns have been ordered to be laid before the House of Lords:—Accounts of the total amount of capital authorised to be raised or borrowed by the directors of the Caledonian Railway Company, distinguishing the special acts under which such authority has been granted, and the amounts authorised by each of such acts. Accounts showing the total amount of capital already raised or borrowed under each of such acts. Statement of the specific parliamentary appropriation of the capital so raised or borrowed. Accounts showing the share parcels as made by or on behalf of the Caledonian Company in the Glasgow, Kilmarnock, and Ardrossan Company; Glasgow, Barrhead, and Nelson Company; Caledonian and Dumbartonshire Junction Company; Ayr and Galloway Company; Glasgow, Strathaven, and Lesmahagow Company; Wilsontown and Morningside Company; Scotch Central Railway Company, Dundee and Arbroath Company, Scotch Midland Railway Company; together with a statement showing the dates of such purchases, the funds out of which they have been paid, and the parliamentary authority for such payments. Copy of the accounts submitted to the annual meeting of the shareholders of the Caledonian Railway Company in 1847. Copy of the accounts submitted to the shareholders of the Caledonian Railway at their last annual meeting. Statement of guarantees entered into by the Caledonian Railway with any other railways, stating the amount of stock and the percentage of such such guarantee.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.

SIR JOSHUA WALMSLEY.

SIR JOSHUA WALMSLEY is truly a "man of the people." Sprung from their ranks, and gifted with the energy characteristic of "the industrial classes," he has devoted his talents and his influence to promote their interests, moral, social, and political.

Liverpool, his native town, has been chiefly the sphere of his exertions, which have been by a great degree concentrated in that municipality. He first came before the public during the agitation in favour of the Reform Bill; his strenuous and vivacity of popular rights and liberties during that period of excitement soon won him the favour of the leaders of Liverpool and on the accession of the Reformed Parliament's Reform Association of that town he was unanimously selected as the president of that body; an office he continued to hold for several successive years, until he was elected to fill the civic chair of the Great Shipping Emporium in 1839 40. On the passing of the Municipal Reform Bill, Sir Joshua was elected to the Town Council for the influential ward of Castle-street, and from that period to the present day he held the following offices, ably exercising the functions attaching thereto, viz. Chairman in Council of the Watch Committee, Chairman of the Educational Committee, Chairman of Court of Requests Committee, Vice-President of the Mechanics' Institution, President of the Northern Mechanics' Institution, President of the Literary and Scientific Institution, Chairman of the Committee of Exhibition in Mechanics' Institution, President of the Tradesmen's Reform Association, President of the Shipwrecked Association, President of the Orphan Asylum, President of the Northern Hospital, and Magistrate for the borough of Liverpool and county of Lancashire. The entrance entertained of his business powers by his townsmen may be inferred from the official catalogue here quoted; and some idea of the correctness of that estimate may be formed from the fact, that on no occasion did any institution with which his name was officially connected give expression to the least dissatisfaction with the manner in which his duties were discharged. As Chairman of the Education Committee he is more honourably identified with the successful efforts of the council to extend education to the children of the poor of all denominations. But his great work of usefulness was the reorganisation of the Borough police force—which under his administration, was transformed from a state of corrupt inefficiency into a most highly disciplined and efficient corps.

There is a social feature connected with Sir Joshua Walmsley which should not be overlooked. Previous to his time, the hospitalities of the town-hall were confined to the "merchant princes" of the modern Tyre. Sir Joshua, liberal in all matters, would not see his townsmen of minor commercial rank excluded from the municipal festive board over which he presided; and his invitation brought the shopkeepers of Liverpool, for the first time, as guests to the table of their chief magistrate on all occasions of public festivity: a worthy example which has been since duly followed.

It was during his mayoralty, on the occasion of the Queen's marriage, that he received the honour of Knighthood.

At the general election of 1841 he unsuccessfully contested Liverpool. In 1847 he was returned for the borough of Leicester, but was unseated, on petition, towards the close of the session of 1848. At the commencement of the present year, when the borough of Bolton became vacant, by Dr. Bowring's accepting the office of Consul at Canton, Sir Joshua presented himself as a candidate for the suffrages of the electors, who at once recognised his claims on a Liberal constituency, and returned him as their representative.

SIR JOSHUA WALMSLEY, M.P. FOR BOLTON.

In the House he is not a frequent speaker. We cannot call to mind any set speech of his since he has transferred the scene of his labours to the Legislature. His talents, however, are rather of an administrative character, and, in that respect, are of a high order. But he is by no means wanting in ability as a speaker, as he evinced on Tuesday last, at the great meeting of the Metropolitan Financial and Parliamentary Reform Association, at which he occupied the chair in his capacity of President of the Association.

Sir Joshua Walmsley is the son of Mr. John Walmsley, of Liverpool, and was born in that town, in the year 1794. He was educated at Holt Hill, in Lancashire, and subsequently entered business in his native place as a corn-merchant, which occupation he has relinquished for several years past. In 1815 he married Adeline, the daughter of Mr. Hugh Mulleneux, of Liverpool. The living of St. Luke's there is in his gift.

PESHAWUR.

THE intelligence just received from India announces the occupation of Peshawur by the British troops, the precipitate retreat of the Ameer Dost Mahomed Khan and his followers beyond the Khyber Pass, and the consequent dissolution of the Afghan confederacy. Major-General Sir R. W. Gilbert, in detailing these brilliant results, announces himself in possession of the city of Peshawur and its Bala Hissar. General Gilbert's despatch then states—

"The Afghan army, under the command of Ameer Dost Mahomed Khan, retreated from Peshawur on the 19th instant, and is to-day (March 21st) reported to have reached Dakka, on the western side of the Khyber Pass. The city I found untouched by the Afghans, the Ameer having directed the gates to be closed against his troops; but most of the garden houses in its neighbourhood have been burnt, or otherwise rendered uninhabitable; and the Sikh cantonment at Alli Murdan Khan's Bagh has been burnt to the ground. The fort of Jumrood is also reported to be destroyed.

"By the expulsion from the province of Peshawur of the Ameer and his army, I have carried to a successful conclusion the whole of the instructions of the right honourable the Governor-General of India, conveyed to me through his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, with your letter of the 3d March inst.

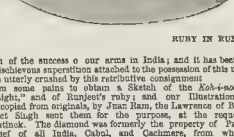
"The Sikhs have been humbled, and their power crushed; the British prisoners released from an irksome captivity; and the rich province of Peshawur freed from its Mahomedan invaders. To my troops I am indebted, under Providence, for these glorious results. Since the 1st of the month they have marched from the Jhelum to the Indus and Peshawur, crossing both rivers under many disadvantages, and overcoming all the obstacles of the road, which are naturally great, and were much enhanced by our large train of stores and baggage—the necessary incumbrances of a force like this. To both officers and men I am deeply indebted for their cheerful endurance of the fatigues and privation to which all have been exposed."

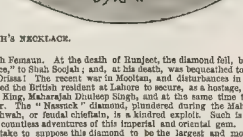
We are enabled to present our readers with the accompanying fine view of the city and fortress, from a drawing by Mr. Vigne.

Peshawur, or Peshawer, is the capital of the province of the same name, usually considered part of Affghanistan, a very fertile and valuable territory, lying between the Indus above and below Attock and the Khyber mountains, through which is the great Khyber Pass, twelve miles east of the eastern extremity of which is situate the city. Thornton tells us that, "In the early part of the present century, when visited by Elphinstone, it was a flourishing town, about five miles in circuit, and reported to contain 100,000 inhabitants. Twenty years later, Runjeet Singh, after defeating the Affghans in the decisive battle of Noushera, took Peshawur, demolished the Bala Hissar, at once the capital and state residence—destroyed the fine houses of the chief Affghans, desecrated the mosques, and, cutting down the groves and orchards about the city, laid waste the surrounding country. The subsequent exactions and oppressions have effectually prevented its revival. The houses, built of mud, or unburnt brick, have flat roofs, on which the inhabitants spend much of their time. The whole city has rather a melancholy appearance, presenting numerous ruins of great dimensions, the result, not so much of gradual decay, as of sudden and recent violence. The numerous mosques—many built in a splendid style of Oriental architecture—have been intentionally polluted by the Sikhs, and are going to ruin. A vast and magnificent caravanserai has been converted into the headquarters of the Sikh governor. It is called Gorkhuttr; it has quadrangular outlines, each side measuring two hundred and fifty yards, and contains extensive accommodation for all departments of government, as well as a spacious house for the Governor. The fortress, recently erected by the Sikhs on the site of the Bala Hissar, is a square of about two hundred and twenty yards, and is strengthened by round towers at each angle, every curtain having in front of it a semi-circular ravelin. There is a fausse braye all round of substantial towers and curtains, with a wet ditch. The height of the inner walls is sixty feet—of the fausse braye, thirty—all constructed of mud. Within are capacious and well-constructed magazines and storehouses. The only gateway is on the northern face, and it is protected by towers. Court, about fifteen years ago, estimated the population at 80,000—a mixed race of Affghans, Kashmirians, and Hindoos. It is believed to be now about 50,000. Peshawur was built by the Mogul Emperor, Akbar, who affixed the name, signifying 'advanced post,' in reference to its being the frontier town of Hindostan towards Affghanistan."

THE KOH-I-NOOR DIAMOND.

THIS famous Diamond, forfeited by the treachery of the Sovereign of Lahore, and now under the security of British bayonets, in the fortress of Govindghur, (engraved in No. 355 of our Journal), will, in all probability, be brought to England in attestation of the success of our arms in India; and it has been suggested that the mischievous superstition attached to the possession of this unique diamond might be utterly crushed by this retributive consignment.





RUBY IN RUNJEET SINGH'S NECKLACE.

We have taken some pains to obtain a Sketch of the Koh-i-noor, or "Mountain of Light," and of Runjeet's ruby; and our Illustrations are from a drawing copied from originals, by Jhan Ram, the Lawrence of Bengal, to whom Runjeet Singh sent them for the purpose, at the request of Lord William Bentinck. The diamond was formerly the property of Pandoor Rajah, then chief of all India, Cabul, and Cachmere, from whom it was taken by Timur, and subsequently from Mohammed Shah by Nadir Shah. Runjeet Singh was accustomed to wear this diamond on his right arm, set, as we have engraved it, in gold, surrounded with small rubies. It has been valued at 25 crore of rupees, or 20 million pounds sterling. Tavernier, who saw it in the possession of the Great Mogul, states its weight to be 279 9-10th carats; before cutting, it weighed 900 carats; it was found in the mine of Coulour, to the east of Golconda, about the year 1550. It is said to have formed one of the eyes of the jewelled peacock of the famous Musnud or throne of Aurungzebe, the Takh-e-ouss, or peacock throne. Its twin jewel is numbered among the crown jewels of Russia. Runjeet Singh, Rajah of the Punjaub, plundered the "Koh-i-noor" from the ex-princes Shah Shujah-ool-Moolk and Shah Esmaun. At the death of Runjeet, the diamond fell, by "lot of inheritance," to Shah Soojah; and, at his death, was bequeathed to the hideous idol of Orissa! The recent war in Mooltan, and disturbances in the Punjaub, induced the British resident at Lahore to secure, as a hostage, the person of the boy King, Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, and at the same time to seize the Koh-i-noor. The "Nasuck" diamond, plundered during the Mahratta war from a Peshwah, or feudal chieftain, is a kindred exploit. Such is but an outline of the countless adventures of this imperial and oriental gem. It is, however, a mistake to suppose this diamond to be the largest and most precious in the world, for it is surpassed by several.

The Ruby, in the accompanying Illustration, has been sketched under similar circumstances. In the Illustration both sides are shown; the gem is worn in Runjeet's necklace. It belonged to Pandoor Rajah, was taken from him by Timour, and subsequently from Timour's descendants by Ahmed Shah. The names of the six Kings of Delhi are engraved on this Ruby:—Alumasser II., Shah Karam II., Jehangire, Ackbar, Feroze Shah, and Ahmed Shah. Runjeet valued it at 12½ crore of rupees, or twelve millions five hundred thousand pounds sterling.

We are indebted to the courtesy of a Correspondent for the loan of the sketches of those Jewels, taken in Runjeet Singh's lifetime.

RUNJEET SINGH'S DIAMOND—"THE MOUNTAIN OF LIGHT."

GRAND BALL AT THE TURKISH EMBASSY.

His Excellency Mahmed Pacha, the newly accredited Ambassador from the Ottoman Porte, has gained golden opinions by the magnificent hospitality he dispensed on Monday last, at the residence of the Embassy in Bryanston-square. The novelty of a ball under a Mussulman's roof naturally excited very considerable interest among the fairer members of the aristocratic world; and, for some days previous to the event, off, the projected festivities formed a fruitful subject of fashionable gossip.

The arrangements for the occasion were upon the most profuse scale of magnificence. The whole interior of the mansion was festooned with red and white drapery (these being the Turkish national colours), additional rooms were erected, and every device that ingenuity could suggest to add splendour to the scene was adopted with unsparing hand by his Excellency's command. The two principal saloons on the first floor were thrown open into one and formed a very excellent ball-room, the walls being beautifully decked out with the "star and crescent" in gold on a pale blue ground. The reception saloon was magnificently furnished, the prevailing style of decoration being pale blue and gold. There was another small apartment on this floor of the mansion fitted up as a tent, and supplied with mirrors and ottomans, into which the company occasionally retired from the ball-room. The entrance-hall and staircase, as well as all the corridors of the mansion, were festooned as above described, and over the door of the reception-room was suspended the Turkish national flag. Another great feature in the internal arrangements of the mansion was the "Divan," a somewhat small but very beautiful apartment, communicating with the dining-room. Partaking, in its general character, the form of a tent, this apartment presented a scene of truly Eastern magnificence. The walls were covered with splendid mirrors, and hung with "hookahs" of the most superb description, having mouth-pieces studded with diamonds and rich precious stones. On one side a portrait of the present Sultan, Abdul-Medjid (Anglice, "The Slave of God") was suspended; and, on the opposite side, the monogram of the Sultan, beautifully emblazoned, was displayed, in a handsome frame, festooned with the national colours. Around the apartment ottomans of the richest description were arranged; and in the centre a very beautiful fountain, designed in exquisite taste, poured forth its liquid stream into a marble basin, well stocked with gold and silver fish. The effect of the decorations throughout the mansion was greatly heightened by a profusion of choice flowering shrubs and beautiful exotics, which met the eye in every direction, the entrance-hall being, in fact, a perfect pyramidical greenhouse.

THE DIVAN.

The festivities commenced with a grand banquet, the guests at which were originally intended to have included all the Cabinet Ministers, but, unfortunately, the members of the Upper House were prevented from attending, in consequence of the debate on the Navigation Laws. His Excellency was, however, honoured with the presence of the First Lord of the Treasury and several other Ministers, the circle including Lord John Russell, Viscount Palmerston, the Marquis of Breadalbane, the Right Hon. Sir Francis Thornhill Baring, the Right Hon. Sir John Cam Hobhouse, the Right Hon. Henry Labouchere, the Right Hon. T. Milner Gibson, and Mr. Addington, Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Caboull Effendi, First Secretary to the Embassy; Sadik Bey, Second Secretary; M. Zohrab, First Attaché; Taber Effendi, Second Attaché; and Capt. John Ford (of the Ottoman navy), had the honour of joining the party.

The dinner was most magnificently served, and at its conclusion the guests retired with their host to the Divan, where tea and coffee were served, and pipes "offered" to the company, though, we believe, the latter luxury was only enjoyed by one gentleman present. Half an hour having been passed very agreeably in this beautiful apartment, his excellency conducted his guests to the drawing-room, where they had scarcely arrived when the company invited to the ball began to set down.

His Excellency did the honours of the reception himself, and most worthily. His remarkably handsome features were illumined by a smile of hearty welcome to all, and the only subject of regret to us was, that his fine face and figure should have suffered, as it did, by the adoption of our somewhat conventional evening dress, and consequent rejection of his own picturesque national costume. The only distinguishing mark his Excellency adopted was the Turkish "fez" (cap), and this he wore in common with all the other natives of the Ottoman Empire present.

Their Serene Highnesses Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, and the Princes Ernest and William of Hesse-Philippsthal, honoured his Excellency with their presence.

The diplomatic circle included all the foreign Ministers at present in town, accompanied by their ladies, and the secretaries and attachés of the various legations.

The general company embraced upwards of 500 of the most distinguished members of the aristocracy. The Duchess of Bedford, the Duchess of Leeds, the Marchioness of Londonderry, the Countess of Jersey, the Countess of Kinnoull, Viscountess Palmerston, and Viscountess Combermere were among the visitors.

The ball was opened at eleven o'clock with a quadrille, in which Baron Wiedenbruck (of the Austrian Legation) led off with the Lady Clementina Villiers, Caboully Effendi, First Secretary of the Turkish Legation, danced in the same set with Miss Mayer; M. de Berg (of the Russian Legation) taking the hand of the Lady Adelaide Vane, and M. Zohrab, first attaché to the Turkish Legation, dancing with the Hon. Miss Cotton.

The opening quadrille was followed by a waltz, and dancing was kept up with great spirit until one o'clock, when supper was served in the dining-room. The festivities were subsequently renewed, and morning had dawned before the party broke up.

During the evening "the Divan" formed an object of great curiosity to the ladies, and we believe that even the most inveterate haters of the "weed" made a pilgrimage thither before leaving the ball.

Everything connected with the fête was admirably arranged, and we never saw a ball pass off more satisfactorily. Although the limits of the mansion were rather confined, there was no inconvenient crowding, even when the guests were most numerous, and the most perfect enjoyment prevailed. His Excellency was evidently much pleased at the readiness with which his hospitality had been responded to, and it is not too much to say that this feeling was fully reciprocated by every guest present.

Coote and Tinney's band was in attendance.

The magnificent internal decorations of the mansion, including the divan and its appointments, were executed by Messrs. Druce, of Baker-street, on whom they reflected the highest credit.

We have authority to announce that his Excellency will give a second ball on Wednesday next.

THE BALL.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

The Queen and Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household attended Divine service on Sunday morning, in the private chapel at Buckingham Palace. The Bishop of Oxford preached the sermon. During Sunday the nobility and gentry thronged Buckingham Palace to make their dutiful inquiries after the state of her Majesty. The answer given was "The Queen is well."

The Queen held a Court on Monday, at which his Royal Highness Prince William Henry of the Netherlands had an audience of her Majesty, to deliver the insignia of the Order of the Bath presented to his father, the late King of the Netherlands, by the Prince Regent, in 1814, in consequence of his Count de Nenilly and the Princes and Princesses of the ex-Royal Family of France paid a visit to the Queen on Monday, and remained to luncheon with her Majesty. The Queen and Prince Albert took an airing in their carriage and four, and, in the evening, honoured the performance of the German Opera, at Drury Lane Theatre, with their presence. The nobility and gentry again called at the palace in great numbers to make their dutiful inquiries.

On Tuesday morning the Queen and Prince Albert, with the Royal children, left town for Osborne House.

HER MAJESTY'S DRAWING-ROOM.

The Queen held a Drawing-room in St. James's Palace, on Saturday, in celebration of her Majesty's birthday. Her Majesty and the Prince Consort arrived from Buckingham Palace shortly before two o'clock, attended by the Royal suite, and escorted by a detachment of the Life Guards. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and Prince George, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, their Royal Majesty's bravery at Quatre Bras. The

The Prince ... was habited in a ... from of a Field-Marshal, with the collars and ... of the Garter and the Bath, and also the stars of St. Patrick and the Thistle. His Royal Highness also wore the insignia of the Golden Fleece.

The Drawingroom was far more numerously attended than on any previous occasion this season, about 1700 of the nobility and gentry being present.

The Duke of Wellington wore a Field-Marshal's uniform, with the ensigns of the Garter and the Golden Fleece. The Duke of Devonshire wore the ... of the Garter and ... a Prussian order of Knighthood. Viscount Combermere wore ... and ... the Orders of the Bath, the Guelphic, and the Tower and Sword.

The ladies' dresses were especially remarkable for their splendour. Among the most beautiful costumes may be instanced those of—

The Duchess of Norfolk, who wore a train of white Gothic moire, lined with glace, and trimmed with Irish point lace; and a petticoat of white glace, flounced with point lace. The head-dress was composed of feathers and lace lappets, ornamented with ... and pearls.

The Duchess of Argyll, who wore a train of blue velvet, lined with satin, and trimmed with bouquets of ... and brown oak-leaves, and a petticoat of blue satin ... owered with guipure lace. The head-dress was composed of a tiara of diamonds and oak-leaves, with feathers and lace lappets.

The Marchioness of Donro, who wore a train of white Gothic moire, lined with glacé and trimmed with blonde, and a petticoat of tulle, over glacé, trimmed with blonde and bouquets of green iris. The head-dress consisted of feathers and blonde lappets, with diamond ornaments.

The Countess of Jersey wore a splendid Court costume composed of a white satin dress, over two Oriental tuniques, embroidered and fringed with gold, and a train of drap d'or, trimmed with satin and gold ribbon. A tiara and stomacher of diamonds completed the costume.

The Countess Brownlow, who wore a magnificent Court costume in the style of Queen Anne, composed of a white satin dress, embroid red in blue, with a train of blue velours d'Afrique, trimmed with revers of white satin, and looped up with diamonds.

Viscountess Combermere, who wore a train of rich blue satin, embroidered with gold, and trimmed with bouillons of white tulle, and a dress of white brocaded satin, trimmed with ... and gold bands.

Lady Agnes Duff, who wore a train of Pompadour, beautifully painted by hand, and trimmed with ruches and ... and a dress of Pompadour green glacé; the front en tablier magnificent guipure and pearls.

Lady Peel, who wore a Brussels lace dress over a white satin skirt, trimmed with bouquets of fleurs des champs, and a train and body of a rich lilac moire antique, trimmed with Brussels lace and bows of ribbon; the body and sleeves ornamented with diamonds.

THE QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.

Saturday having been appointed for the celebration of her Majesty's birthday, the household troops assembled, at a quarter past nine o'clock, on the Horse Guards parade "God save the Queen" was played by the united bands at a quarter to ten; soon after which his Royal Highness Prince Albert, Prince George, Prince Augustus of Saxe-Coburg, and the Duke of Wellington, Commander-in-Chief, accompanied by a numerous staff, arrived on the ground, and, after the Royal salute, reviewed the line, the band playing Mendel-sohn's grand march from "Athalie." The Prince of Wales, attended by General Bowles and Mr. Birch, witnessed the inspection on the parade, from Lord John Russell's residence.

At one o'clock the Park and Tower guns fired a Royal salute.

The Premier and the other members of the Ministry gave full-dress entertainments in honour of the occasion; and, in the evening, the streets were ... by persons of ... classes to witness the illuminations, many of which were exceedingly beautiful.

THE COURT AT OSBORNE.

The Royal family arrived at Osborne at two o'clock on Tuesday afternoon.

The Court dined privately on Tuesday evening; and on Wednesday morning her Majesty and the Prince Consort, accompanied by the Royal children, took walking exercise.

On Wednesday afternoon the Duchess of Kent arrived at Osborne, on a visit to her Majesty and Prince Albert.

Her Majesty will give a grand concert at Buckingham Palace on Friday next.

His Royal Highness Prince Henry of the Netherlands, brother of the King of Holland, arrived in town on Saturday last, from the Hague.

His Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge has arrived at his apartments in St. James's Palace, from Cobln.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess Augustus of Saxe-Coburg (Princess Clementine d'Orleans), who have been visiting her Majesty and Prince Albert at Buckingham Palace, have rejoined the ex-Royal Family of France at St. Leonard's-on-Sea.

The Duke of Devonshire on Tuesday last entertained a select party, including several distinguished foreigners, at a déjeûner, at his Grace's villa at Chiswick.

The Marquis of Normanby arrived in town from Paris, on Monday night, and attended the debate in the House of Lords. His Lordship returned to Paris on Wednesday.

We are sorry to learn that the Lord Chancellor has been again seriously ... and ... ...

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1849.

THE Overland Mail brings intelligence of the annexation of the Punjaub. The announcement will cause no surprise. Even those who are of opinion that our empire in India is already too large, will confess that, as regards the Punjaub, the restlessness, treachery, and daring of the Sikhs left us no alternative but the absorption of the Punjaub, or a state of continual warfare and ultimate loss of influence, authority, and dominion in every part of India. We could not but choose the former. Writing upon the affair of Chillianwallah, we expressed our opinion so early as the 10th of March, not only that the Sikhs would be signally defeated, but that the Punjaub would be annexed, and that the warlike and ambitious sect of the Sikhs would allow us no peace in India until they had been made to feel once for all that they had no chance against us. The proclamation of the Governor-General, announcing the annexation, is dated on the 29th of March, and sets forth in few, but clear and emphatic words, the history of the several aggressions which the Sikhs have made since the death of Runjeet Singh. and the reasons which have induced the British Government, that desired no such conquest, "to resolve upon the entire subjugation of a people whom their own Government has long been unable to control—whom no punishment can deter from violence, and no acts of friendship conciliate to peace." The Sikhs are to be disarmed, and every fortified place not occupied by the British troops is to be destroyed. The property of the few chiefs who have not been engaged in hostilities against the British is to be secured to them; but the property and rank of all who have served against us are to be forfeited. The young Maharajah is to receive a liberal pension, and to be treated with respect and consideration. The territory thus acquired amounts to one hundred thousand square miles. It has a population of three millions and a half, and yields a net revenue of about a million. The Indian journals are of opinion that, as far as pecuniary considerations are concerned, we "gain a loss" by the acquisition of the Punjaub: but although present appearances would seem to confirm such an opinion, we must remember that the resources of the Punjaub have been grossly mismanaged; that it has had to pay large military expenses, which have thrown it into arrears; and that Sir Charles Napier, who has all along foreseen the necessity, and advocated the policy of the annexation, is of opinion that the Punjaub, under a judicious system of fiscal management, may be made not only to pay its expenses, but to leave a surplus. We trust that it will prove so, and that Sir Charles, in devoting his administrative talents to this subject, will entitle himself to the gratitude of India and Great Britain, in a manner quite as splendid as if he had won the final battle which procured us the Indus for our boundary.

The people of Umritsir and of the Punjaub generally, with the sole exception of the inhabitants of Lahore, are represented as hailing the annexation with enthusiasm, as a relief from a long-endured and grinding oppression. Upon this subject the people of England will be better enabled to form an opinion hereafter.

Dost Mahomed Khan, pursued by the brave General Gilbert, has managed to escape destruction. The Khyberries, who might have closed their passes against him and so driven his whole force to annihilation, were induced, by a con-sideration, to let him through without molestation. Nothing is known as to the intimate fate of Chutrur Singh and Shere Singh, but it is supposed that perpetual imprisonment, at the least, will be decreed against them. Moolraj, whose defence of Mooltan has excited the admiration of military men, is likely to undergo a more ignominious fate. It is asserted that the murder of Lieutenant Anderson and Mr. Vans Agnew was his act alone, and that the Durbar of Lahore had no part in it. If this be proved, the probability is that he will be executed.

We suppose it may now be taken for granted that the Ministerial bill for the repeal of the Navigation Laws will meet with no further impediment. Lord Stanley, on Monday night, brought forward an amendment in committee, which we may consider the last great effort of the Protectionist party against the measure. Its object was not the amendment, but the destruction of the bill; in fact, to retain the Navigation Laws, giving the Queen power to relax them by degrees with such nations as should offer us reciprocal advantages. The Ministerial bill, as Lord Lansdowne remarked, proposed to remove all restrictions except those imposed by necessity; whilst Lord Stanley, by his amendment, proposed to keep up all restrictions except those which we were forced to abandon by circumstances we could not resist. In introducing his amendment, his Lordship confessed that he had not sufficient confidence that the opinions of the mercantile world had been ascertained; and stated that he could "not speak with confidence upon the details." This confession seems somewhat surprising, if we reflect that the bill has been for two sessions before Parliament, and that no subject in our time, not even the repeal of the Corn-laws, has been more thoroughly discussed in all its bearings, than that of the Navigation Laws. The amendment dealt with generalities, and attempted in reality, though not, perhaps, in form, to make the House reject in Committee a measure to the principle of which it had given its assent on the second reading. This was a course of proceeding rather unusual, as was pointed out by several of their Lordships in the course of the debate. The chief supporter of the amendment was Lord Brougham; between whom and Lord Stanley there was, however, some difference of opinion as to the effect of the bill, and the policy of such a country as Great Britain in commercial matters. Lord Stanley defended the reciprocity system from the charge of peddling and meanness which had been brought against it by the Free Traders; and maintained, that, as a nation, we should lose wealth by the measure, and that we had no business to be generous or magnanimous. "If we carried on a commercial business," said his Lordship, "we ought to carry it on upon the commercial principle of giving nothing for nothing." Lord Brougham, on the contrary, was willing to admit that upon the commercial principle we might gain a fraction of a farthing in the price of tea, sugar, or cotton by the bill: nevertheless, as he maintained that "commerce was not everything," he preferred the national defences to the increase of our wealth. But these were only a few of the discrepancies in the arguments of those who opposed the bill, to most of which Lords Lansdowne, Wharncliffe, Canning, and others did ample justice. The amendment was rejected by a majority of 116 against 103. As proxies do not count in committee, these numbers show an increased majority over that obtained on the second reading, which was ten only. On the third reading, when proxies will again count, the majority will probably amount to double or treble that number; and thus a question which has excited much difference of opinion, as well as alarm and ill-feeling, will, we trust, be satisfactorily and permanently disposed of.

THE outrage upon her Majesty on Saturday last has excited but one feeling of disgust and indignation against the cowardly miscreant who committed it. The British public, however, rejoices that the assault was excited by no political feeling, and that it sprang entirely from the lunacy of a vulgar ruffian, unprompted by any sentiment more serious than the lust of notoriety. It does not even appear that the pistol was loaded with ball. The unanimity with which the public has decided upon the insanity of the wretched man is a great proof of the love and loyalty of the people, and cannot be otherwise than gratifying to her Majesty and the Royal circle. No one can imagine any thing so atrocious as that a sane man should attempt the life of a Sovereign so exemplary in every public and private capacity as Queen Victoria. It is, nevertheless, very hard upon her Majesty, that she should be subjected to such alarm and annoyance. While the sympathy expressed for the Queen is deep and universal, there is a feeling no less general that for such insanity the only proper preventive, as well as puni-ment, is corporal chastisement of the severest and most degrading kind.

Some years ago, when an imitative mania was excited by the similar attempts of Oxford and Bean, it was suggested in the Journal, and afterwards by our daily contemporaries, that whipping was the best mode of bringing such vain and miserable creatures to reason, and of preventing their example from becoming contagious. The public came to the same conclusion; and in the bill shortly afterwards introduced into Parliament, transportation or a flogging was made the punishment for such offences. It is, perhaps, to be regretted that the framers of the bill did not provide that transportation and a flogging should be the punishment. We have certainly no desire to revive the barbarous punishments of past ages, but we think that a weekly, semi-weekly, or even daily infliction of the cat-o'-nine-tails for three months at the least, preparatory to transportation, would greatly tend to prevent such lunacy as that of the last offender from breaking out into action. In fact, we should like to see the two alternatives of punishment left to the Judge or Magistrate by the present bill blended into one. Insane as such offenders may be, they have sanity enough to understand the logic of the cat-o'-nine-tails; and we would allow no squeamishness or false delicacy to stand between them and the fullest dose of it that their constitutions can bear.

PARLIAMENTARY AND FINANCIAL REFORM.

THE first public meeting called by the Council of the Financial Reform Association was held on Tuesday at the London Tavern. The meeting was convened for one o'clock; but long before that hour the large room of the tavern was densely crowded, as also was the gallery. On the platform were Arthur Anderson, Esq., M.P.; R. B. Osborne, Esq., M.P.; J. Williams, Esq., M.P.; J. Wyld, Esq., M.P.; B. M. Wilson, Esq., M.P.; Colonel Thompson, M.P.; L. Hayworth, Esq., M.P.; George Thompson, Esq., M.P., and others.

The chair was taken by Sir Joshua Walmsley, M.P., who explained the objects of the meeting. It was intended to publish the principles and objects of the association, and to promote an effectual reform of our representative system; that reform to consist of—1. Such an extension of the suffrage as will confer the right to be registered as an elector upon every man of full age, not subject to any legal disability, who for twelve months shall have occupied any tenement or portion of a tenement for which he shall be rated, or shall have claimed to be rated, to the relief of the poor. 2. The adoption of the system of voting by ballot. 3. The limitation of the duration of Parliaments to three years. And 4. Such a change in the arrangement of the electoral districts as shall secure a more equal apportionment of representation to constituents. The last gentleman having urged the propriety of observing silence and order during the proceedings, called on the hon. sec., Mr. T. H. Allen, to read the address and the rules, and stated that "The council, upon mature consideration, have decided upon advocating such an extension of the franchise as will give to every male occupier of a tenement, or any portion of a tenement, the right to be registered as a voter, as the only condition coupled with that right being, not the payment of rates, but the fact of being rated, or having claimed to be rated, for the relief of the poor in respect of the qualifying premises. The effect of such a measure is to give the right of voting with the shelter of the ballot, and, in order to keep actively a use that sense of responsibility, which, in the public business of the nation, as in the private affairs of life, secures the faithful exercise of a power held in trust, they advocate the return to the old constitutional system of triennial Parliaments, which, whether and not less important change sought for in our representative system will be that which will give us more equal apportionment of members to constituents. District and periodical aggregate public meetings will be held, tracts will be distributed, and will be imparted to the more metropolitan of agricultural institutions now in existence for watching over the interests of rural votes, and important facts will be collected for the acquisition of freehold qualifications in the surrounding counties."

The Chairman again rose, and having expressed his gratification at the crowded numbers of the meeting, thus adverted to the objects of the Association:—

[illegible] almost seem a work of supererogation to say a word in its defence, were it not that men, led away by the zeal rather than by their judgment, have given occasion to the enemies of reform, and the upholders of things as they are, to confound a desire for the removal of abuses with sedition, and a zeal for progressive reform with revolutionary tendencies. (Hear, hear.) We know, and none know better, that, without order, the best intentions and the purest principles are not available for good; and it is this knowledge which, I am sure, will induce the utmost caution and the most circumspection in the consideration of any proposition for organic change. (Hear, hear.) But, in avoiding the Scylla on the one side, we must be careful not to rush into Charybdis on the other. We must be careful that we do not, in the fear of innovation, perpetuate abuse (Cheers.) We must not shut our eyes to the danger which must inevitably flow a continuance of those evils which are fast destroying all confidence between the governor and the governed. (Cheers.) There are few amongst us who do not feel the extreme pressure of taxation; there are equally few amongst us who are not alive to those abuses which are constantly before our eyes; there are few amongst us who do not look with alarm on the wide-spread and deep seated disaffection which pervades the great body of the unenfranchised masses. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, whichever way we look at it, the political and financial state of the country is most unsatisfactory. We see a rapid and continuous increase in our expenditure, we see the grossest abuse of patronage—we see the grossest waste in our navy and army of forces totally disproportioned to our wants—we see a system of colonial government which has as many hues as the chameleon, and which has neither reference to the requirements of the colonies nor to the interests of the mother country—and we see at the same time a dogged determination on the part of the powers that be to withstand every demand on the part of the people to dry the pestilential atmosphere within the precincts of the constitution. (Hear, hear.) Under such circumstances, continued the hon gentleman, I believe it to be the duty of every good citizen to take measures for obtaining that control over the public purse and the public affairs of the country which reason and common sense show to be the basis of good government—to enforce economy and retrenchment in every department—to see that property be made to bear its just share of the burdens of the State. (Cheers.) That object can be placed within the reach of all—that the House of Commons be made the true reflex of the public mind—and that public safeguard, economy and public economy take the place of disorder and extravagance. We seek these changes by means other than the most loyal and peaceful means, and, strong in the justice of our cause, we call for the support of the rational of every class, creed, and party. (Cheers.) I have only one other point to refer to. We have called this meeting with somewhat of trepidation; but our anxiety is set at rest. (Cheers.) It is our intention to locate reports from time to time of our proceedings, and give effect to public opinion through the medium of an organised body, uniting reformers of all grades; and that the establishment of the Metropolitan Financial and Parliamentary Reform Association is, therefore, a matter not only of expediency, but likewise of paramount necessity." Mr. W. J. Hall seconded the motion.

Mr. Elliott, who stated that he was a working man, then came forward on the platform to move an amendment namely, that the association be called the Metropolitan Parliamentary and Financial Reform Association. He strongly advocated the adoption of universal suffrage.

Mr. Osborne, M.P., said he could have no hesitation in seconding such an amendment as that which had been proposed, and in doing so he could not but exclaim—

[illegible] (laughter). Resuming, he said the present aspect of the "Reformed House" of Commons, the hon. gentleman grieved to say that there was a lamentable want of feeling on the subject of reform in that House of which he was a member. It would hardly be believed that in the nineteenth century there was no such thing as a popular party existing in the House of Commons. There were certainly [illegible] and good men in that House, but he grieved to say that among them existed and schisms had been long. The great partisans of reform, Mr. Hume (cheers), he was sorry to say, was grievously ill; the two members for Finsbury, those honest and independent men, were not able to take their seats, and the hon. Baronet for Marylebone, he understood, was also ill. There was great apathy and distrust among Reformers [illegible] expressed again, that, at the present time, there was no popular party in the House of Commons [illegible] hear, hear," and cheers.) The want of a popular party in this country was mainly owing to the conduct of her Majesty's present Ministry, for that Government, which had climbed to power on the shoulders of Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, were the first to throw cold water on those men, and to make the Cabinet the prerogative of the oligarchy which ruled this country. (Cheers.) He had great respect for men in high stations when they exhibited ability and principle, but no could not see why the middle classes could see no wisdom except in a Lord (Cheers), and no probity except in a retired gentleman. He thought the tendency was to make the House of Commons a great barrow for titled rabbits. (Cheers and laughter.) The House of Commons was, in consequence, nothing better than a leading machine, by which a Minister was enabled to raise a greater amount of taxes than was ever imposed by the most despotic monarch of ancient [illegible] period. The hon. gentleman, having reviewed the statutes of taxation, to show that it was constantly increasing, concluded by urging the necessity of the middle and working classes possessing themselves of forty shilling county franchises by the means proposed by the council.

Mr. Joseph Sturge regretted that physical-force principles had too often been associated with the name of Chartism. No doubt many who had profes ed Chartism had been guilty of violence, but as well might they charge Christianity with the evils of the Established Church, or the horrors of the Inquisition, as to condemn Chartism because some of its supporters were mad enough to resort to physical force. (Hear, hear.) Chartism was founded on Christian principles, and all that was wanted to secure its success was a revival of the motto of "Measures not men." So soon as good and honest men were found to carry those measures, Chartism would assuredly triumph. (Cheers, hear, hear.)

Mr. Phillmore remarked that the object of the association was to obtain the suffrage for no less than 3,712,676 of the people, and surely such a boon was worth striving for, without objecting that it did not go far enough.

The Chairman then intimated that the amendment proposed to the resolution was of so trivial a nature, that it had been determined to embody it in the resolution itself.

The resolution having been accordingly amended, it was put from the chair and carried unanimously.

Mr. William Williams, the late member for Coventry, was then introduced to the meeting as the mover of the next resolution, which was as follows:—

"That, in the opinion of this meeting, the present system of taxation is characterised by an extravagance the most reprehensible; that to sustain this reckless waste an enormous amount of taxation is required, which, as now levied, presses most unequally upon the industrious classes and the community; that so long a preponderance of the taxes is imposed upon the necessaries of life, that no economy nor self-denial on the part of the poor man can enable him to escape from those burthens; that the effects of such a system are not only cruel and arbitrary, and pernicious towards the industrious classes, but are calculated to produce that wide-spread demoralisation and those flagrant crimes which are the off-spring of poverty and distress; and that, therefore, the whole framework of taxation should be so altered as to adjust its burdens to the respective means of those who are to bear them."

The hon. gentleman also drew on the increase of taxation since the period of the Reform Bill. That increase amounted to £4,000,000, while the expenditure of the country had been augmented by £7,000,000 —The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. D. Wire proposed the third and last resolution, as follows:—

"That in the opinion of this meeting, the Commons House of Parliament, as at present constituted, represents neither the popu ation, the property, nor the industry of the country; that the election of its members has in numerous instances been the result of bribery and corruption, coercion and intimidation; that the electoral distributions present the monstrous anomaly of a few hundred voters in some districts returning as many members as several thousand constituents in other districts; that the Reform Act has totally failed to realise the expectations of the country, or to harmonise with the spirit of the age; and that, therefore, a large extension of the franchise, a complete independence in its exercise by means of the ballot, a more equal apportionment of representatives to population, and the limitation of Parliament to three years, become not only measures of common justice, but also of prudence and safety."

Mr. Reynolds spoke to the resolution in a somewhat intemperate manner.

Another person in the body of the meeting attempted to speak also, but—

The Chairman stated that the arrangements they had entered into with the proprietors of the room compelled them to close the meeting at five o'clock, which hour had now arrived. He regretted that the gentleman who had last addressed them should have used the word "infamous" in reference to the aristocracy (Hear, hear.) For himself, he would be no party in applying the term "infamous" either to the peerage or the middle classes. (Hear)—The motion was then put and carried unanimously.

Mr. Prout moved a vote of thanks to the President, Sir J. Walmsley, for his impartiality conduct in the chair.

The vote was carried amidst much cheering, and was acknowledged in suitable terms by Sir J. Walmsley, who called on all persons present to unite in the movement, and to aid on part the Freehold Land Association as the means of placing the counties in the hands of the popular party.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CAMBRIDGE.

The Morrisian Professor of Divinity has given notice that his lectures in Michaelmas Term, 1849, will commence on Thursday, October 18.

OXFORD.

Mr. C. E. Adams, of Worcester College, and Mr. G. P. Cordeaux, Lately Scholar of Magdalen Hall, have been elected Scholars of Worcester on the Gardner's Foundation.

Mr. T. Richardson, B.A., Scholar of Jesus College, has been elected a Fellow of that Society on the South Wales Foundation.

DURHAM CATHEDRAL.—We have heard that it is intended speedily to appoint a new minor canon in this cathedral, and it will greatly every lover of our cathedral services to learn that no candidate who does not possess creditable power of voice and a thorough knowledge of music is likely to be a successful applicant.

DEAN AND CHAPTER OF BRISTOL.—The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol having been called in as visitor to determine a question respecting the mode of performing the choral service in Bristol Cathedral, directed that the cases which he had made on the subject should be entered in the Book of Statutes belonging to the Chapter. The case has been opposed on the part of the Dean, Sub-Dean, and other members of the Chapter, who declare that a compliance with the direction of the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol would be the conceding a power which that prelate cannot legally exercise, and they pray his Lordship to revise his decree.

QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY.—The Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty will hold an extraordinary general court at the Governors' house, Dean's-yard, Westminster, on Tuesday, the 5th of June next, at twelve o'clock at noon.

THE CLERGY AND THEIR PARISHIONERS.—The 148th anniversary of this society was celebrated at St. Paul's Cathedral on Monday last. In the evening, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishops of London, Oxford, Llandaff, Lincoln, Carlisle, Hereford, Salisbury, Ripon, and Gloucester, &c., dined with the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House.

BETHNAL-GREEN CHURCH FESTIVAL.—On Wednesday last, the foundation-stone of the last of ten new churches for Bethnal-green was laid, and the occasion was commemorated as a festival. In the earlier part of the day sermons appropriate to the occasion were delivered in each of the new churches by the Bishops of London, Winchester, St. Asaph, Ripon, Llandaff, and Coventry. Bishop Co-eridge, of St. Augustine's Missionary College, the Rev. Thomas Boudier, and the Rev. W. H. Mackenzie. The stone was laid by the Earl of Harrowby

THE ROAD.

A TRIP TO THE DERBY.

[Translated literally from the French of M. Bonenfant, Captain in the Third Legion of the National Guard, by a member of the ancient and widely-extended Smith family. With fac-simile Illustrations, from the Captain's Sketches, and variorum notes by the Translator.]

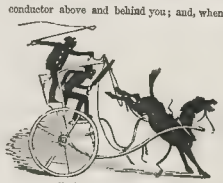
S I came over, mon cher —— (a), by the excursion train (train du plaisir) to see the far-famed race of horses at Epsom, I thought you would well desire to have an account of that great national solemnity. You know that I cannot speak very well English; in effect, I know nothing of it beyond the words muttonchop, stole (b), and How doyoudo. But I can use my eyes; and have, accordingly, done that.

My friend, you can form not the least idea of this sport du turf from the races of horses on the Champ de Mars. All the world goes—from Sir Wellington to the dangerous classes; and if a man is seen in London on that day, he at once loses his position.

I took a place on a fast coach (drogne de grande vitesse) (c), but was very squeezed; as I think the postilion who drove (d) took more than he ought to have done. On the road near the Hôtel du Château d'Elephant I bought a card of the sport, but was afterwards told it was that of the yesterday; but it was equal to me, as I could not understand it.

You see accidents the gravest on the road. I witnessed a carriage called a Broom (balai) completely rent by the pole of an omnibus behind it, which caused the voyager within to be thrust from his seat, in fear the most profound. Then, after a loud altercation, the aggressor and the victim turned out on the grand road to arrange their dispute by blows of the fist, where we left them enjoying the pleasure to box. A cab called Handsome (dits Beau) was in equal perplexity. It is a carriage the most curious that you have never seen, having the conductor above and behind you; and, when the horse kicks, one cannot get out. The voyager was in this predicament, and much gaiety was caused by a horseman went by exclaiming "One for his heels." (Deux pour ses talons.) But I could not enter into all the merit of the allusion (e).

"WHERE ARE YOU DRIVING?"



"IT'S ONLY HIS WAY, SIR."

The crowd of voitures of every description it is impossible to count. And as all the voyagers stop to drink, and the horses to water, at every inn upon the road, the consumption of Bass (bière pâle ou amère) is beyond belief. The water is, indeed, more costly than all beverages, and the horses have sometimes a difficulty to get even that, as you may here perceive. The smallest animals draw more people than ever you have seen go to the fête of St. Cloud in a coeu on a fine Sunday; and they do not very well balance their weight, as you may perceive; so that, indeed to use a poetical expression, "the horse's feet scarce touch the ground;" but this does not indicate speed—all to the contrary.

THE MORE THE MERRIER.

"DON'T YOU WISH YOU MAY GET IT?"

"WHY DON'T YOU FILL YOUR CART?"

Another great sight of the day, which overcomes all the others, is the dust. Sometimes you see nothing for it, which I have here drawn. You remember what it was to be in the intérieure of the last of two diligences, racing along the road to Paris in dry weather. Very well—then you well know what the road to Epsom is on a Derby Day. It is so bad that the high nobility, such as Sir Beaufort and other milors, all wear veils—a droll of a sight.

Epsom is a town, considerable enough, celebrated for its salt mines and this Derby Day. When the day is over, all the inhabitants retire to the mines and remain there until next year, in inaction the most perfect.

As with us the Passage de l'Opera is connected with the funds, so here Her Majesty's Theatre is connected with the betting by Mr. Lumley.

THE RACE.

On arriving at the Downs (les dunes) the road was infested with brigands, who seized on the horses of the voyagers, and, after sanguinary fights amongst themselves, bore them away. This I must confess astonished me, but not so much as the savage manner in which I was seized by another party of marauders on alighting from the drague, and brushed within an inch of my life. You, mon brave, who know how careful we are of our clothes in Paris, and the fragile texture of our cloth, can understand the horror and fear of this assault.

The sports began with a dog race, who is hurried along the course by the cries of the society. As he does not run with another, I suppose the accomplishment of the distance in a certain time is the object. The friends of the animal cheer him on with éclats of encouragement; and the enemies throw their batons at him, which he is lucky to escape. Then the jockeys appear on their horses, and then the race begins.

"THE DUTCHMAN 'S FIRST!"

It was curious to see the people lean over the ropes until they almost fell, to catch a glimpse of the horses; and it was more curious to observe the number of those who, coming down from London, on purpose to see the race, never saw it all. I was one of these unhappys; having my view quite obscured by the parasols of the ladies, whereby

"I WISH I COULD SEE.

I only heard what was going on, which, from my knowledge of English, was not altogether understood. But I caught some phrases, such as "Here they come!" (Les voici!) and "There they go!" (Les voilà!) And then the betters (les meilleurs)—so called because they are of the aristocracy—looked far off to the end of the course, and all their heads turned on a pivot at once, following the horses as daisies follow the sun, until they looked the other way.

"HERE THEY COME!"

"THERE THEY GO!"

You are not able to imagine the noise extraordinary as the horses go past, and everybody for the moment is mad; the tumult at a barricade in the Faubourg St. Antoine is nothing to it. They cry the names of the horses at the top of their voices, and each has his favourite; and they climb anywhere to see it. The horse that even on this occasion is called L'Hollandais Volant, and has proved that Dutch metal is not so bad. He gains 296,250 francs in the stakes, besides wagers, and belongs to Sir Eglinton (g).

"IT'S—NO IT ISN'T—YES IT IS!"

No sooner is the race over than every one begins to eat and drink—the gainers from joy, and the losers to keep up their spirits. Some lose so that they are obliged to sell their wives the next day, as you saw in "Les Mystères des Londres," at the Ambigu, where the Lord Mayor of London sold his wife at Blackwall to the great Sir S. Iceridan (h). Others, who win, have an envy to take wine with strangers in their good-fellowship, until they can no more drink.

When they have finished, they all go home; and then you would not imagine the whirlwind of carriages—the windmill of people that crush away. Again there are grave accidents: horses are killed, wheels are broken, windows are smashed; and, in one case, I saw the hinder part of a carriage knocked away, so that the friends were obliged to hold it up all the way home, to the cheers of the spectators. All the drivers were filled with wine, which they call champagne; but it is of a vintage the most remarkable, grown on purpose for the Derby, and its consumption leads to curious events; but these are only for laughing at, as it is a great national fête. And, indeed, whilst our National Assembly is in a terrible state, the House of Commons only debate whether they shall have a holiday to go to the Derby.

GIVING THEM A LIFT.

COMING OFF.

When you write, tell me whether we are to have in France an Empire, a Republic, or nothing at all (i). Milles amitiés, BONENFANT.

I have to day a headache, and but a little of money; but they say all of the world is the same on le lendemain du Derby.

door to M. Bonenfant, who has never been out of Paris in his life, further than Versailles.

(5) Query wrong?

(6) M. Bonenfant here makes a mistake by confounding our term "drag" with the French "drague," a grapnel for under water.

(7) The driver of a diligence is still the "postillon."

(8) The similar rule of counting "le Roi" as carré might have made this observe M. Bonenfant. The "heals" of French knaves are, however, lighter than those of English ones, and the comparison becomes lost.

(9) Another error, or rather two. Epsom salts do not come from mines; and the esteemed director of the Opera does not keep the betting-rooms.

(10) M. Bonenfant keeps up the French notions of our Nobility, who are only divided into Messrs and Sirs. These they apply vaguely—such as Sir Anstey and Major Hudson.

(11) The French believe the present Anti-Smithfield movement is in consequence of a wish to obtain the sale of wives always going on there.

(12) M. Bonenfant does not say much about returning just at present. We think he has reason.

Parties for the Hinthrship	Forty-two, Cross-street, Long-acre,
(When policemen are not near);	Look alive, you unlaked muffin!"
Betting-men, M.P., and Peer.	"What's the matter, Joey?" "Snuffin;
Putting forth their top most paces,	Only broken both the traces."
All agog for Epsom Races.	"Never mind—it's Epsom Races!"

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The sporting sympathies of all classes have for the last week been so completely absorbed by the great event consummated on Wednesday last, that, in whatever company or quarter we have moved, the only words that have caught our ear have been "Dutchman," "the Black-an," "Tadmor" (alias the "Dumpling"), and "Clatterer." Even the Sabbath was not "Derby proof;" for, at the Corner, the gathering was quite as numerous, and the excitement quite as intense, as if it had been a regular and a "proper" day of business. The betting gentry, however, are notoriously careless in their devotions, and look upon the whole seven as week days.

The races commenced on Tuesday, and, as far as quantity went, left nothing to complain of: the list of sport, albeit its fund was not particularly interesting.

On Wednesday the great race was decided: and, to the delight of every lover of fair and honourable racing, was won by that popular nobleman, the Earl of Eglinton, viz.: "The Flying Dutchman," a half-bred horse running a very good second, and little Fadmor third; these notables, "Nannyjerk" and "Chatterer," "nowhere." The betting men are "hit" very hard, and it is feared the settling will be a bad one.

The meeting was resumed on Thursday, with an average list; the racing offered not the slightest novelty.

The turf arrangements for next week embrace the settling, on Tuesday, at Manchester races, on Wednesday and two following days; and Hungerford, on Friday. The first Thames Yacht sailing match will come off on Wednesday.

TATTERSALL'S

MONDAY.—Although this was the last public day at the corner previous to the races, the betting was dull, beyond all precedent. It was important, however, from the feeling shown against The Flying Dutchman and Fadmor, and the eagerness to back Nannyjerk and Chatterer: no others were, on the ground. The Oaks betting was equally flat. Imperatrix alone made any advance.

MUSIC.

CONCERTS

The annual morning concert of Mr. W. Sternlale Bennett, the composer and pianist, took place on Monday, at the Hanover-square Rooms. The proceeds of this entertainment will be given in aid of the funds of the Governesses' Benevolent Institution. Mr. Bennett performed his own pianoforte concerto in F minor, No. 4, in masterly style, proving himself to be able to conquer the greatest difficulties, as well as the possessor of a refined touch and classical style. He was greatly applauded by the fashionable assemblage present and by the band. His MS. overture, "Maria di Rudi," which is not equal to his "Naiades and Wood-Nymphs," was also executed, as well as Weber's jubilee overture, in which the Naiades and Athenæ interwoven, and Mendelssohn's "Isles of Fingal." Mr. J. B. Cramer played Field's Adagio and Rondo pianoforte concerto in E flat, also, and Signori Ricciolai and Platt's flute and violoncello fantasias with unrivalled mechanism and taste. Mr. Lucas and Mr. Bennett are the conductors, with Dando and Baggrove as alternate leaders of the band. The Hanoverian vocalists sang three pieces with the greatest effect. Miss Andrews, a pupil of Sir G. Smart, made a promising début as a vocalist in the "My Dew," one of Mr. Bennett's Lyrical melodies. M. Wartel, the celebrated singer of Schubert's songs, made his first appearance in this country, and was warmly welcomed, in a scene by Weber, and the "Adieu" of Schubert. In this class of songs Wartel is unrivalled; he has a baritone organ of good quality, and its phrasing is perfection. He was formerly on the stage, and was the original Huguenot soldier in Meyerbeer's opera, singing the "Ra ta-plan" song with fine effect. The other vocalists were Mdlle. Jetty Treffz, who has acquired great popularity already; Miss Dolby, the Misses Williams, Mdlle. Graumann, another clever German singer; Herr Pischek, Mr. Machin, and signor Marras.

The performance of Handel's "Acis and Galatea," and the overture and music to the second act of Weber's "Oberon," on Monday night, at Exeter Hall, under the direction of Mr. Hullah, was very creditable to the performers in the choral portion of the entertainment. Mr. Willy was leader of a good orchestra, and Mr. Lucombe, the Acis of the occasion. Mr. Lockey, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Pischek were the principal singers. Reeves was encored in "Love in her eyes," and Pischek in "Raddler than the cherry." Two choral songs, composed by Miss Macirone, a very accomplished English professor, were performed, and well received. Mr. Jarrett's born obligato in the mermaids' song, so sweetly sung by Miss A. Williams, was beautiful. The hall was quite full, and the selection afforded every gratification.

MUSICAL EVENTS.—Mr. John Parry repeated his entertainment, last Monday, at Wills's Rooms, and it will be again given on Monday next. We regret to learn that the respected father of Mr. John Parry is very severely indisposed.——On Wednesday, Ernst the violinist, and Hallé, again performed at the Free Trade Hall in Manchester.——The third classical matinée of Mrs. and Mr. John Day took place on Thursday; the most interesting evening Sir H. Bishop gave his lecture on the music of Italy, at the Wellington Club.——On Friday morning was the concert of Mrs. Anderson and on the evening the performances of Haydn's "Creation," at Exeter Hall, conducted for the first time by Costa, notices of which will appear in our next week's impression.——The sixth Philharmonic Concert will be given on Monday.——On Tuesday morning will be the fifth meeting of the Musical Union, and in the evening, Herr Schulhoff's concert.——On Wednesday will be the seventh concert of the Amateur Musical Society; and the sixth of the Exeter Hall Concerts.——On Wednesday morning will be the second concert at the Royal Italian Opera, with the entire vocal and instrumental resources of the establishment, besides the Hungarian Singers, and the début of Dreyschock, the pianist, the double-bass playing of Bottesini, &c.; the whole under Costa's direction.—Mdlle Conlon has a morning concert, on Wednesday, at the [illegible] rooms.——Mr. [illegible] will give a morning concert [illegible] Rooms.——Mr. [illegible] Musical Institution, and in the evening Mr. Julien's [illegible] Concerts Monstres at Drury [illegible] French and German Opera, Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, at the St. James's and Drury-Lane theatres, English Opera nightly, at the Princess's and Italian Opera, Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, at Her Majesty's Theatre, and the Royal Italian Opera, Covent-Garden.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S

On Saturday, the performances were "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," followed by the new ballet of "Electra." As soon as the previous attempt on her Majesty was known, the performance was stopped, and Mr. Lee, the official speaker of the theatre, made the following address:—

Ladies and Gentlemen,—Under the assurance that a portion of the audience may be labouring under anxiety, and as loyalty is here paramount to all other thoughts, I am commissioned by Mr. Lumley to inform you that the attempt against her Majesty and the Royal children were shot at whilst returning to the Palace, they were (thank Heaven) escaped unhurt.

When it was announced that her Majesty was unhurt, the cheers from a crowded audience were most deafening. "God save the Queen" was sung three times, amidst the loudest applause and a general waving of handkerchiefs.

The house was one of the most brilliant of the season; and the magnificence of the scene was most imposing, the official personages appearing in uniform.

On Tuesday, the splendid opera of "Semiramide" was performed, with a very powerful cast, comprising Parodi, Alboni, Labiache, and Coletti. The character of the Assyrian Queen was finely conceived by Mdlle. Parodi: "Qual mesto gemito" was given with remarkable effect, by the judicious use of the sotto voce; and the duet with Arsace, "Se la vita," was encored with great energy and spirit. The Arsace of Mademoiselle Alboni was, as heretofore, a brilliant success: "Ah quel giorno," "Bello immagine," "Giorno d'orrore," and "In si barbara sciagura," being so many stage-feast days throughout the two latter were encored. Coletti was very efficient as Assur, and Oroe impressively given by Lablache. The success of the performance was unquestionable. The overture was unanimously encored. Mademoiselle Parodi and Coletti were each twice called before at the termination of their duet, in addition to the usual calls at the end of the acts.

On Thursday "La Gazza Ladra" was given; Mdlle. Alboni taking the part of Ninetta for the first time in England.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The excitement on the news of the firing at her Majesty reaching the theatre during the performance of the prologue in "Lucrezia Borgia," was very great, and the call for the National Anthem was spontaneous, and was immediately obeyed by the entire company. Grisi singing the three verses with fervent feeling. Every allusion was taken up with enthusiasm. The appearance of the house, crowded with rank and fashion—many of the ladies appearing in their Court dresses, and the gentlemen in their uniforms, wearing their orders, was most brilliant. At the end of the opera the Anthem was again called for, and sung.

On Tuesday night the house was crowded to excess, for the only appearance of Madame Persiani in her grand part of Amina, and for the début of our great Ensemble tenor, Sims Reeves, as Elvino. Madame Persiani, with the exception of a little uncertainty in the second act, when overcome by excessive nervousness, was more astonishing brilliancy. Reeves' reception was most enthusiastic; and, although we have heard him in better voice, his success on the Italian boards was unquestionable. The great duet with the grand movement of the "Tutto è sciolto" ("All is lost now"), which he was compelled to sing twice. Mdlle. Corbari was the Lisa; Polonini, Alessio; and Tamburini, the Count; and the cast was, therefore, first-rate.

On Thursday night was revived that lyric tragedy of deep and powerful emotions, the "Hugenots," of Meyerbeer. The cast not last season has undergone several changes. Valentine, sustained by Viardot, is now filled by Grisi Mdme. Dorus Gras, who "created," as the French term it, Marguerite de Valois, in Paris, succeeds Mdme Castelli. Mdme Persiani is to be the Queen of Navarre. Mario, the chivalrous Nevers has passed from Tagliafico to Massol, who was in the original Parisian cast, the former artist assuming Tamburini's character of the stern and cruel father of Chenonceaux. Ronconi plays the part of Marcel. Mario and Marini retain their parts of Raoul and Marcello; and Mdme Reaini, Mei, Lavia, Schill, Rache, Talamo, and Poscolini also enact their original characters. But a most important change has been made, in which the truly artistical feeling displayed by Sims Reeves, who, to add to the powerful ensemble, sings the couplet of Bois Rose, the Huguenot soldier, in the second act, "Ra-ta-plan." There are likewise some valuable additions in the cast act, suggested by Royal amateurs.

GERMAN OPERA.

Beethoven's "Fidelio," the only opera the immortal composer, unfortunately for art, has given to the world, was produced at Drury Lane Theatre on Saturday night, but the execution was by no means satisfactory, the band playing two of the four overtures written for this work—the Fidelio and the Leonora in C in a very scrambling style. The principal singers were Mdlle Wallner, her first appearance in the devoted wife, for whom supposition was pleaded, but who acted with feeling and energy; Mdlle. Babnigg, who sings distressingly out of tune as Marcellina; Herr Erl, as Florestan; Herr Breuer, as Rocco, the gaoler; and Herr Stepan, as Don Pizarro. The choral singing was not so good as that in "Der Freyschütz," but the earnestness of the chorists secured an encore for the celebrated chorus of prisoners, one of the most pathetic and poetic creations of the composer. On Monday night, Fotow's opera of "Stradella," with two acts of Weber's "Der Freyschütz" were performed, her Majesty and Prince Albert honouring the performance with their presence. The reception given to the Royal amateurs was most enthusiastic; the National Anthem was sung amidst prolonged bursts of cheering. Her Majesty looked remarkably well, and was evidently in excellent spirits. Flotow's work—of which an English version was done during Mr. Bunn's management—was respectably executed on the occasion. Mdlle Morton being the Leonora, Erl Stradella, Stepan: Malvolio, Köchler Barberino, and Breuer Bassi. The drinking song for two basses and chorus was encored.

FRENCH OPERA

Boisselot's comic opera, in three acts, "Ne touchez pas à la Reine," was very successfully produced on Monday night, at the St. James's Theatre, in presence of the Duchess of Kent and a great array of fashionable visitors. It was manipulated for Mr. Mitchell's forces then any French opera has before mounted. It is an unnamed production of the Auberian school, and Scribe's libretto is dramatic and effective. The hero is Charles the Second, who, to save Queen Catherine to death, forms the basis of the story; a young Cavalier (Coudere), who has saved the life of the Queen (Mdlle Charton), having imprinted a kiss on her Spanish Majesty's forehead as she was swooning, and the Queen's honour to defend. However, by the Queen bestowing on him her hand, heart, and crown. An excellent acquisition to the company has been made in Zelger, from Brussels: he asserted the Baron: he has a fine baritone voice, and is an admirable actor. Mdlle Charton's Queen was nicely sustained, and was encored in the bolero with enthusiasm. Mdlle Cinthie's Kathrine was clever. Coudere and Zelger, and Mdlle Guichard, are soon to the utmost advantage in the operetta of "Le Coin devroux Bourgeois." Between the acts of Boisselot's opera, the National Anthem was sung, Miss Messent and M. Octave, the new tenor, taking the solo verses.

Two bustling little farces have been produced, and with entire success—one at the Haymarket, and the other at the Strand, entitled "Taken in and done for." They are both so slight as one essay by, but sufficiently lively to keep the audience in constant laughter—the act ing of Mr. Farren in the latter piece has never been excelled.

The embarrassed affairs of one of our most popular theatres forms the subject of conversation in the dramatic circles. It is not improbable that, before long, the management will be changed.

Mr. Lovel announced, at the Theatrical Fund Dinner, on Monday, that he had a new five-act play, nearly completed, for Mr. and Mrs. Kean to appear in at the Haymarket.

Mrs. Nesbitt and Miss Mordaunt commence their engagement at the Surrey on Monday.

The Princess' Theatre has only been opened three nights this week.

St. James's Theatre.—Monsieur Coudere's benefit is announced for Wednesday, when will be produced Auber's "La Part du Diable" (Carlo Broschi, by Mdlle. Charton); Belfast, M. Coudere. This will be followed by the first act of "La Dame Blanche."

A new five-act play is in active preparation at the Marylebone, and a grand spectacle is about to be produced at Astley's.

The proprietor of the Royal Western Yacht Club in order to give increased accommodation to the increasing wants of the members, has commenced the erection of an additional wing to the club-house, which is to be completed before the 1st of August.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

LAMB AND FLAG RAGGED SCHOOLS, CLERKENWELL.—The fourth annual meeting of these schools took place on Wednesday evening, at the Parochial School-rooms, Aylesbury-street. There was a very crowded attendance, including a great number of ladies. The Earl of Harrowby occupied the chair, and there were also on the platform the Bishop of Norwich, the Hon. and Rev. T. Vesey, Mr. C. Thompson, M.P., &c. From the report it appeared that since the last meeting, the Queen and Prince Albert had become munificent subscribers to the cause, having presented 100 Testaments to the Ragged School Union. The number of children on the books of the day-school was 374, and the average attendance was upwards of 206. Of these, 167 could read well; 283 could read by single words and letters; 20 could write very well; 182 could write on slates; 30 understood arithmetic; and 46 of the girls could sew well. In the evening school for adults there were 104, and the average attendance was 60, of from 15 to 60 years of age, most of whom could read a little. The success of the adult schools was much crippled for want of teachers. On the books of the Sunday school there were 250, the average attendance being 150. In all, the number on the books in the past year had been 938, and the average attendance 410. The progress of all was most satisfactory. The annual subscriptions had amounted to £90, but the expense of carrying on the four schools would not be less than £200 per annum.

GENERAL THEATRICAL FUND.—The annual dinner of this excellent institution came off on Monday, at the London Tavern, Mr. Charles Kean presiding. The attendance was most numerous, every seat in the large room being occupied, and the subscriptions far exceeded those of former years. Admirable speeches were made by the chairman, as well as by Mr. Charles Dickens, General Burgoyne, Mr. Lovel, Mr. Bayly, Mr. Webster, and other gentlemen; and the musical services of Mr. Balfe, Mr. Hobbs, Madame Dulcken, Miss Dolby, and Miss Ransford acknowledged with the loudest enthusiasm. The crowded attendance formed a striking contrast to the anniversary dinner of the friends during the names of the two large theatres, which it would be advantageous, if practicable, to amalgamate with the more admirable institution.

IONIAN BANK.—The annual meeting of the company was held at the office, 3 and 4, Great Winchester-street, on Thursday, Mr. C. Hancock in the chair. The report stated that, owing to the accidental circumstance of a run having taken place on the Bank at Cephalonia, the operations did not present quite such a satisfactory result as for the two previous years. The way in which that run had been met, though it occasioned a loss upon the exchanges to obtain specie, had established the bank on a firmer basis than ever. Notwithstanding the circumstance just alluded to, the directors were gratified in being able to state that the year's business enabled them not only to meet the extraordinary charge entailed on them by the loss on the exchanges, but to write off the bad debts, pay the dividend of 6 per cent., and carry a sum of about £2,000 to the credit of profit and loss, which would increase the reserve fund to £12,472 19s. The report was unanimously adopted; and, the usual resolutions having been carried, the meeting separated.

ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY OF ENGLAND.—On Tuesday the annual general meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society of England took place at the rooms of the society, Hanover-square, for the purpose of receiving the report of the council for the last twelve-month, and the election of a president, trustees, vice-presidents, and other officers for the year ensuing. The Earl of Chichester, the president of the society, occupied the chair, and was supported by the Marquis of Downshire, Earl Dacie, the Earl of Yarborough, &c. The Marquis of Downshire was elected president, and the following noblemen and gentlemen were elected as trustees and vice-presidents for the ensuing year, viz.: Trustees: Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, Bart., M.P.; Lord Braybrooke; the Hon. Robert H. Clive, M.P.; Sir James Graham, Bart., M.P.; Sir Francis Lawley, Bart.; Joseph Neeld, Esq., M.P.; Lord Portman; Philip Pusey, M.P.; the Duke of Richmond; the Duke of Rutland; Earl Spencer; the Duke of Northumberland; Lord Frederick Cavendish; Mr. Thomas Raymont Barker; the Earl of Chichester; Earl Dacie; Earl of Egmont; Marquis of Exeter; Earl Fortescue; Sir T. S. Gooch, Bart.; Earl of Hardwicke; Viscount Hill; the Duke of Wellington; and the Earl of Yarborough. After enumerating various experiments which the chemical committee had successfully carried out, it appeared that a salary of £300 a year be paid to Professor Way for this purpose, and that £300 per annum be permitted to be expended in chemical inquiries. The council had decided that the annual meeting of the society should be held at the city of Norwich, commencing on Monday, the 18th of July; and the number of entries for implements at present far exceed the number exhibited at York last year. The principles throughout the kingdom had granted the same liberal concessions in favour of the society's exhibitions as were made by them last year; namely, the free conveyance of live stock, and a reduction of one half the usual charges for implements. The authorities of Norwich had granted the free use of St. Andrew's Hall, fitted up at their own expense, for the great dinner of the society and the council dinner, and that the country meeting of the society for the western district shall be held, next year, at the city of Exeter; and that the district for the year 1850 shall consist of the counties of Leicester, Lincoln, Nottingham, and Rutland, and be designated the East Midland district. The report as to the state of the funds of the society for the half-year up to the 31st of December last showed a balance in favour of £583. 13s. 3d., and the accountant-general of the society had stated

He has been unable to attend to his duties in Parliament during the last week—a circumstance which from his usual regularity in the house, we fear indicates that the disease is rather serious

At Bolsover great preparations are making to observe the birthday of the venerable Duke of Portland, on the 24th of June. Upwards of £50 is already been subscribed for a dinner to the Glee Club, and a ball.

The obituary of the Banffshire Journal contains the following terrible instance of mortality in a single family:—"Died, at Middlemuir, Monquhitter, of malignant scarlet fever, on 19th February, Mary, aged 6; on 20th February, Helen, aged 14; on 27th February, Isabel, aged 12; on 1st March, James, aged 4, on 7th March, Jane, aged 2; on 10th March, Ann, aged 10; on 29th March, George, aged 8, children of William Duncan, farmer there."

There are in Liverpool 5900 unoccupied houses, at a rental of £30 and upwards. The total number of unoccupied houses is 9500.

The Rev. L. Carpenter, of Bridgewater, late minister of the Unitarian congregation there, has ceased to hold that office, because he could not conscientiously, as an advocate of temperance, receive as a portion of his salary the rents of certain beer-shops.

It is said that the Lowther Rooms, which for several seasons past have been used for music and dancing, are about to be converted into a Roman Catholic chapel.

At Easter the sittings of St. John's church, Moulsham, Chelmsford, were all made free by an endowment of £2000, raised principally by voluntary contributions.

The Opera-house at Dresden was destroyed by fire, in the late revolutionary contest there; nothing but the walls remain. The loss of the wardrobe alone is estimated at 400,000 francs. This event took place at the time when the condition of the establishment was at its zenith.

M. Laurent Franconi, the oldest and most celebrated equestrian performer in Europe, died last week in Paris. He was interred on Saturday last, when his funeral was attended by a great number of his friends and the whole of the troupe of the Hippodrome.

Mr. Baillie Hart, one of the magistrates of Forfar, has committed suicide by drowning himself. He was walking out with his sister, when he leaped into the water, and could not be rescued before life was extinct.

The magnificent estate of Chedden, near Maidenhead, late the residence and property of Sir George Warrender, Bart, with all the costly effects, has been purchased by Messrs. Farebro ther and Co. for the Duke of Sutherland.

The Mixed British and Portuguese Commission Office will finally close on the 31st instant. All parties holding claims, either for pay or pensions, are requested to present the same for payment without delay.

The only link wanting to complete the chain of evidence against Rush is supplied by the discovery on Saturday morning of a bell-muzzled double-barrelled blunderbuss, which was found in a dungheap in an outhouse where the latter has taken shelter from the weather, and which the ramrod fitted at Chelmsford did to exactly.

IRELAND.

THE OUTRAGE ON THE QUEEN.—On Monday, at a meeting of the Dublin Corporation, the Lord Mayor said he thought it his duty to inform the Council that he had just learned that an attempt had been made aged on the life of her most gracious Majesty. (Hear, hear.) Such being the fact, he thought they (the Council) ought to seize the earliest opportunity of expressing their horror with which they viewed such an execrable act by convening a special meeting of the Corporation, and giving instant utterance to their indignation. It was arranged that a special meeting of the body should be held on Friday, for the purpose mentioned by his Lordship.

EMIGRATION.—The extent to which emigration continues, even at the advanced period of the spring, is marvellous, and Ulster is now affording its full quota. Three vessels fully freighted, sailed from Belfast last week, one for Quebec, and two for the United States. The Canadian emigrants were of the most substantial class that have left Ulster for very many years. One of the passengers carried with him £700 in gold, and generally those emigrants took out sums of money beyond their immediate necessities. Although the Poor-law guardians are limited in their power to promote emigration, a considerable number of paupers are about to be sent out to Canada by the Athy, Ballinrobe, and other unions, in which a certain saving is to be made on the rates for outfit, and some landlords are liberally contributing. Passages have been provided in Dublin for upwards of one thousand paupers, and many more are to be sent out before the close of the season. Many of the Roman Catholic clergy are preparing to engage with a portion of the remnant of their flocks. The Limerick and Clare Examiner mentions several new cases, and one in particular, of a gentleman priest in the diocese of Limerick, whose parish has been depopulated to so great an extent, that the clergyman has been altogether bereft of income. The Rev. Dr. Moriarty, Vicar-General of the Augustinians, is about to proceed to the United States, accompanied by some wealthy laymen, in order to find a colony. It is thus that the failure of the potato is working a revolution in the whole social system of Ireland.

DEATH OF MISS EDGEWORTH.—Maria Edgeworth, the celebrated Irish novelist, died at Edgworthstown, county of Longford, on the morning of Monday last, after a few hours' illness. She had reached an advanced age, and the last years of her life were passed in her native village in tranquility and peace.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of this society will be held on Wednesday next, at Essex-street Chapel, Strand. The sermon on behalf of the Association will be preached by the Rev. John Scott Porter, of Belfast; and in the evening there will be a soirée at the Freemasons' Tavern. James Heywood, Esq., M.P., in the chair.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.—On Monday evening the annual meeting of the friends and supporters of the above society was held at the Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle-street; G. W. Alexander, Esq. (the treasurer of the society), in the chair. From the statement of the accounts appended to the report, it appeared that the total receipts from all sources were £2,000, which had been expended in promoting the objects of the society, with the exception of a balance in hand of £54 8s. 3d. The society, however, had incurred liabilities to the extent of £166. Resolutions in accordance with the object of the society were passed, accompanied with appropriate speeches.

POST-OFFICE NOTICE.—Many newspapers addressed to New South Wales and New Zealand having recently been posted unpaid, it has become necessary to repeat the announcement, that the packets conveying the mails between this country and Sydney, New South Wales, have been discontinued, and that all newspapers for the colonies above-mentioned being now transmitted by private ships, are liable to a postage of one penny each, when postage must be paid in advance or the newspapers cannot be forwarded

REGIMENTAL SCHOOLS.—A circular from the War-office was issued on Friday last, directing, with reference to the general order that all recruits are to attend the regimental schools daily for instruction, that, from the 1st ult., recruits so attending the school are to be subjected to the charge of 4d. a month.

THE ENGINEERS IN IRELAND.—Colonel Oakfield, K.H., of the Royal Engineers, has proceeded to Dublin to take the command of the Royal Engineers in Ireland.

GOVERNORS OF MILITARY PRISONS.—Copy of a circular from the Secretary-at-War to general officers commanding districts:—"War office, May, 1849.—My attention having been drawn to the position of officers who, under the provisions of the Secretary-at-War's Act, 7th and 8th Victoria, have been appointed governors of military prisons, and, although entrusted with duties of a military nature, are really in charge of civil establishments, and as I consider it desirable, with reference to the importance and responsible nature of those duties, in the performance of which the governors are necessarily in constant and immediate communication with the military, that their position in the garrison, or the station where military prisons are established, should be defined, I have the honour to acquaint you that they should be considered as heads of the civil departments over which they preside, and to request that they may be treated accordingly, but it is to be clearly understood that this is not to give them any claim to allowances of any kind to which they are not at present entitled."

PENSIONLESS MEDALS.—On the 1st inst. above 20,000 officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, survivors from the Peninsular War, had established their claims, and the medals are in course of distribution. Last week the brigade of Guards received theirs, but several months will elapse before the above number are all received by the claimants.

PORTSMOUTH DOCKYARD.—The new dock in this yard, opening into the steam-basin at the entrance to the steam-factory, the work of Mr. Rolt, has been completed this week, and will be ready for use on the station being filled. The dimensions of the dock are as follows:—Length on the coping, 300 feet; width, sixty, 80 feet; length on the bottom of the dock, 260 feet; width, 60 feet, 35 feet. The structure is faced with the finest stone; it is the largest dock yet constructed, and will consequently be able to take in the largest ship of modern build either. The building—comprising a workroom, &c. for her Majesty's accommodation at the railway terminus in Clarence-yard—is ordered to be taken down, and a more suitable and capacious one to be erected in lieu of it. The commanding building was designed by the Royal Engineers' department, who so narrowly constructed the approach to the waiting-room that the queen cannot turn it.

THE ORDNANCE ESTIMATES.—The Master-General and Board of Ordnance have appointed a committee consisting of the following military and civil officers:—Colonels Gordon, R.A., inspector of the carriage department, Colonel Dundas, C.B., R.A., inspector of artillery; and Lieut.-Colonel Hardinge, K.H., R.A., director of the labo atory department of the Royal Arsenal; Mr. Robert Vallier Wade Hope, chief clerk in the Surveyor-General's office; and Mr Robert Perrett, principal clerk in the principal storekeeper's office at the Tower, London; Mr Sparkes, storekeeper; and Mr. Pellett, assistant-storekeeper at the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich, to meet at the Royal Arsenal during the present week to draw up a report of the best means that can be adopted for economizing the various departments in the Royal Arsenal, without impairing their efficiency.

THE CHELSEA PENSIONERS.—The Chelsea pensioners of the Woolwich division of the London district have coincided their spring drills, and received notice that they will shortly have to proceed to London to be reviewed in Hyde-park. They are expected to embark from their respective ports. As soon as each inspected these intended for them to ascertain that they are all correct, but they have been delivered back again, as it is intended to present the medals to the gallant veterans when they parade in Hyde-park, to be reviewed by his Royal highness Prince Albert, the Duke of Wellington, and a distinguished staff of officers.

THE "NORTH STAR."

AT length, the North Star, the vessel fitted out by Government for the Arctic Regions, in search of Sir J. Franklin's Expedition, has left our shores, with the most anxious hopes for her success. The North Star left Deptford at two o'clock P.M. on Wednesday week, towed by the Stromboli steam-sloop, Commander Lord Amelius Beauclerk, who is to tow the North Star to the edge of the ice. This vessel completed taking in her stores, at Woolwich, by the 11th instant; and, on the morning of the 10th, bags were forwarded to her from the Admiralty, containing letters for the Arabus and Terror, discovery vessels, under Captain Sir John Franklin; the Enterprise and Investigator, under Captain Sir James Ross; and the Plover, Commander Thomas Moore.

On the 12th instant, the Right Hon. Sir Francis T. Baring, First Lord of the Admiralty, Rear-Admiral J. W. Deans Dundas, C.B., Captain Fitzmaurice Berkeley, and the Hon. W. Cowper, Lords of the Admiralty, visited Woolwich, and proceeded on board the North Star, accompanied by Commodore Henry Eden and Mr. Lang, master ship wright, to witness the manner in which the vessel had been fitted for her expedition to the North Polar regions. Their Lordships remained nearly three-quarters of an hour on board, and were satisfied with the whole of the arrangements which have been made for the voyage. In the afternoon, the vessel was towed by the Monkey to Greenhithe.

The North Star is a vessel of 500 tons burden, and has been recently fitted out at Sheerness, according to the most approved principles, to render it capable of encountering the dangers incidental to the navigation of the Polar Seas. The hull has been cased over with timber until it has attained a thickness of three feet of solid wood; and, in addition to this, the bow—which is, of course, the most exposed part of the vessel—has an extra casing, projecting about a couple of feet beyond the ship's sides, to prevent its being stove in by the masses of floating ice which the vessel may expect to encounter during her voyage. The crew of the North Star numbers about forty, and the majority of the hands are young, active men. There are twelve officers, several of whom, in common with the commander (Capt. John Saunders), have previously experienced the hardships of Polar navigation.

BOW OF THE "NORTH STAR."

The warm clothing provided for the crew consists of fur caps, which wrap round the head, and cover all but the bare features; gloves of the same material; and pilot coats of thick rough cloth, lined several times through with flannel, with trowsers of a similar character. In addition to these there are boots of thick felt made to come above the knee, and having cork soles four or five inches in thickness. Snow shoes, the outer frames made of wood, with lining of deer-skin, have also been provided for the use of expeditionary parties among the crew.

The apparatus for warming the ship has been fixed in the gun-room, an apartment appropriated for the officers' mess. From the furnace, copper tubes extend through all the sleeping and other cabins; and the heat circulated by this means is so intense, that, during our visit on board, in about a quarter of an hour after the stove had been lighted, every part of the vessel was thoroughly warmed, and the heat in the gun-room itself was extreme. With a view of keeping the temperature of the ship as warm as possible, the port-holes are provided with felt linings, so that when required they can be rendered perfectly air-tight.

The stores with which the hold of the ship is crowded consist of preserved meats, stowed away in barrels of saw-dust, preserved potatoes, in air-tight iron boxes, with the usual supply of biscuits and salt junk. Large quantities of coal and wood, and barrels of oil and tar, have likewise been shipped on board, with copper sufficient to cover the bottom of the vessel in the event of this being found necessary.

SIGNAL LOCKER, AND DRESS OF CREW.

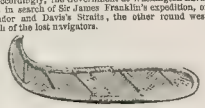
The North Star is furnished with the usual complement of ice-anchors, saws, axes, and chisels. The anchors are an improvement on those previously used. The saws are twenty feet in length, with stout projecting teeth. The use to which these are applied is to release the vessel, in the event of its becoming frozen in with the ice. These ice saws are sometimes worked from the ship itself, but more frequently after the manner shown in our Illustration, that is, a strong triangular scaffolding is erected with steps at one side; to the upper part of this scaffolding one end of the saw is slung, by means of a pulley, and at the other end of the saw a couple of hundredweight is suspended. A number of small ropes are attached to the main rope, which runs over the pulley, and these are grasped by the men, who ascend and descend the steps of the scaffolding, and raise or drop the saw according to their movements.

ICE-SAW AT WORK.

Several ships' boats have been presented to the captain and crew of the North Star; one of these is of immense strength of build, and is sufficiently large to hold the entire crew, with several weeks' supply of provisions.

We hear that a vessel is being fitted out by order of the Government to start in a few days, and to be stationed at a certain point in the North Seas, so that the North Star may be enabled to transmit despatches to it, to be forwarded to England.

An interesting correspondence is published in the American papers between Lady Franklin and Mr. J. M. Clayton, Secretary of State, respecting the Arctic expedition. The American Government promise with alacrity "that every effort will be made to lay the subject before our whalers, and induce them to undertake the work for which the British Government have offered so high a reward." And, accordingly, the Government at Washington have determined to send two ships in search of Sir James Franklin's expedition, one to go round east, by Labrador and Davis's Straits, the other round west, by Behring's Straits, in search of the lost navigators.



SNOW-SHOE.

THE OUTLAW.

OUTRAGE ON THE QUEEN.

On Saturday, as the rejoicings in honour of her Majesty's birthday were proceeding, a base attempt was made by which it was at first thought that the lives of her Majesty and her Royal children had been placed in peril.

The outrage was committed between half-past five and six o'clock in the evening, as her Majesty, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Helena, was returning from a drive in Hyde-park. They had reached the lower end of Constitution-hill, on their way to the Palace, when suddenly a pistol-shot was fired at them by a man dressed as a labourer, who stood with his back to a tree, within the railings of the Park. He was immediately arrested by the by-standers, and conducted to the station-house in Gardner's-lane, King-street, Westminster. The Royal carriage proceeded to the Palace, her Majesty retaining throughout the most perfect composure of manner, and addressing herself to the Royal children as if to calm their fears. On their arrival, they were received by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, who had been out on horseback, and was slightly in advance when the occurrence took place. His Royal Highness, with great emotion, congratulated her Majesty on the escape she had had.

From the evidence taken at the station-house before Colonel Rowan and Mr. Mayne, the Chief Commissioners of Police, it was ascertained that the name of the prisoner is John Hamilton. He is a native of Ireland, and follows the occupation of a bricklayer's labourer. He has been resident in this country for five years, but states that he was born at Adare, in the county of Limerick. For some time past he has resided principally at No. 3, Eccleston-place, Pimlico, in the house of a bricklayer, for whom he at one time worked. Of late, however, it appears that the employment given to him by his landlord had ceased, and that he had been almost, if not entirely, out of work. There was no pretence, however, for saying that he was in want. His landlord lodged him gratuitously, and the other necessaries of life were provided by the kindness of the labourers who were inmates of the same house. On Saturday morning his landlady, in arranging some things in the room where Hamilton was sitting, turned out a small pocket-pistol, with an old flint-lock, which her husband had had in his possession for more than seven years, and which was used by her children as a plaything. He asked her to lend it him, as it wanted cleaning. Seeing no objection to this, the woman consented, and thereupon the prisoner sent out a little child of hers to buy a halfpennyworth of powder. Having got this, he went into the yard behind the house and satisfied himself that the pistol would go off. He then put it into his pocket, and, disappearing, was next seen within the railings of the park at the lower end of Constitution-hill, shortly before six o'clock. There he went up to a woman, and asked what she was waiting for? Just as she was about to explain, he said, "Oh, for the Queen. Has she passed yet?" She replied "No, she has not come yet; but if you wait a little you will see her," or words to that effect. She had hardly finished the sentence when the outriders of the Royal cortège appeared in sight, and she exclaimed, "Here she comes!" The prisoner answered, "All right," and immediately pulled from his breast a small pistol, which he had loaded and fired at the carriage in which her Majesty and the Royal children were seated. His aim is supposed to have been taken in a slanting direction, the carriage being rather past him when the fatal charge took place. Every effort has been made by the police to discover whether the piece was loaded with a bullet or any kind of shot, but their search has been fruitless, and there is no mark on the carriage or elsewhere to indicate its course.

THE ARREST.

THE EXAMINATION OF THE PRISONER, AT THE HOME OFFICE.

Upon close search, and the examination of the pistol barrel, have established satisfactorily that there was no ball in it. The prisoner offered no resistance, nor did he even attempt to escape; and so thoughtlessly did he manage, that in returning the pistol to the pocket in his flannel jacket, the handle of it stuck fast. The park-keeper and constable who took him in charge had some difficulty in rescuing him from the vengeance of the excited crowd which soon formed around him. On his way to the station-house, whither he was conveyed in a cab, he is said to have stated that he was driven to the commission of the act by poverty, and that he had no accomplices. The charge against him was entered by General Wemyss, who was in attendance. He remained on Saturday night locked up in the station-house.

Instead of it being, as has been known at the West-end, the Ministers, who were giving entertainments at their respective mansions in honour of the Royal birthday and several of the nobility, hurried to the palace to inquire after her Majesty. The news caused a great sensation out of doors; indeed, on many, private rejoicings at her Majesty's escape, being everywhere expressed by the crowds who thronged the streets to witness the illuminations.

On Sunday, at two o'clock, Mr. Gregory, the Attorney-General, Mr. Hall, the home office magistrate, and the Commissioners of Police, assembled at the Home Office, to have the preliminary examination before trial taken. The witnesses who had been examined on the previous day were in attendance, but only a few of them were examined. The Attorney-General conducted the examination in the presence of the prisoner, who betrayed the same sulky, sullen temper, as on the previous day, and preserved throughout the proceedings an obstinate silence. The depositions taken on Saturday having been read, the following witnesses were examined:—

Daniel O'Keefe was the first witness called.

The Attorney-General: Where do you reside?—Witness: At No. 4, Eccleston-place, Belgrave-road, Pimlico.

The Attorney-General: Do you know the prisoner, Hamilton?—Witness: I do.

The Attorney-General: How long have you known him?—Witness: From four to five years.

The Attorney-General: What was he?—Witness: He came over from Ireland, as a bricklayer's labourer.

The Attorney-General: And followed the same business?—Witness: Yes, when he could get any work

Mr. Hall: State all you know about him.

Witness: He was in Ireland some time back, having neither father nor mother; was brought up in the charity-school there, and when he left to come to London, he was recommended by a friend over there to come and lodge with me.

The Attorney-General: Has he lodged with you during the whole period you mention, and—from four to five years?—Witness: No. He left me to go to France.

The Attorney-General: When was that?—Witness: Two seasons ago last year, last summer

The Attorney-General: When did he come back?—Witness: In the month of November in the same year as he left.

Mr. Hall: Where did he lodge when he returned?—Witness: With me, but he was out of work, and owed a debt, and I, in consequence, sent him to a friend of mine, named Chambers, residing at Bow, in order that he might get employment, and pay me something of what he owed me.

Did he pay anything?—Witness: I wrote a letter to him and told him that I had burned my leg, and was in great want of money, when he came on the Saturday night and brought me a sovereign. He came again after that, and brought me some more, but I could not get anything else from him through that season

The Court: What else transpired?—Witness: I summoned him and put him to all the expense I could, except lasting an execution. He came at that time from Bow, and called upon an acquaintance in the neighbourhood for the purpose, as I ascertained, of being taken, so that he might get a billet for the winter season in prison

The Court: What else do you know?—Witness: When opportunity came I got him about two months' work at a wheelwright's.

The Attorney-General: How did you first come to know him?—Witness: I knew him from his coming from the same place as I did.

The Attorney-General: Is that your property? (The pistol which the prisoner fired at her Majesty was here produced; it was a very old, small brass-barrel instrument, with a flint lock.)—Witness: Yes, it is.

The Attorney-General: Have you anything else to say?—Witness: No; I cannot recollect anything more.

The witness was then ordered out of the court.

Bridget O'Keefe, wife of the last witness, was next called and sworn.

The Attorney-General (showing the pistol): Do you know that?—Witness: I do.

The Court: What do you know respecting it?—Witness: On Saturday last I was going out into the garden, when I saw Mr. Hamilton at the bench, when he said he was making a pistol, and was going to fire it at one o'clock. He then showed me a kind of spout, which he had fastened to a piece of wood. I spoke to him about it, when he said, "Why, Dan has got an old pistol, lend me it."

The Court: Did you do so?—Witness: Yes, I went to my bedroom, and gave it to him at the window.

The Attorney-General: What did he then say?—Witness: He looked at it, and said, "It is very rusty."

The Court: Did you make any remark?—Witness: I said, "Yes, it is. It is of no account."

The Attorney-General: Did you see him do anything with the pistol after that.—Witness: I did not, but I afterwards heard him fire the pistol about three times in the garden.

The Attorney-General: Do you know whether he was in or out of work?—Witness: I have not known him to have more than seven weeks' work since Christmas last.

The Court: Then, how did he live?—Witness: A young woman who lives with me, who is in the milk line, serves a great many persons and collects a deal of broken victuals, and between the two of us we managed to keep him.

The Court: What else do you know?—Witness: Nothing more.

Edward O'Keefe was next called and sworn.

The Attorney-General: You are the son of the last witness, I believe; how old are you?—Witness: Eleven years next birthday.

The Attorney-General: Tell us what the prisoner, Hamilton, asked you to do for him.—Witness: On Saturday last he asked me to fetch him a ha'porth of powder

The Court: Did you do so?—Witness: Yes; I went to a shop in Elizabeth-street and bought a ha'porth of gunpowder of a woman, which she said was not the best sort of powder.

The Attorney-General: What time was that?—Witness: About a quarter to 3.

The Court: Did he say any thing particular to you after that?—Witness: He asked me if I had ever had squibs or crackers, when I said yes, and added that they could be got at the next shop.

The Court: Did he say anything else?—Witness: He said he wanted a ha'porth, as he wanted to have a bit of fun, and could make them fire through the trees in the air.

The witness produced a piece of wood, roughly cut in the form of a pistol stock, on which was tied, to all appearance, the spout of some old iron or tin kettle. He said that he purchased it of Hamilton on Saturday last, for one penny, and, turning round to the prisoner, and offering him a penny, said, "Here, Mr. Hamilton, I can pay you the penny now, for I did not have one on Saturday."

The Court: When did he go out?—Witness: Shortly afterwards; and I wanted to go with him, but he would not. He, you must stop at home.

The prisoner was asked as he had been at the conclusion of the examination of the previous witness, whether he had any questions to ask, and replied, "No, nothing."

Mr. Renwick deposed that he was in the service of her Majesty, and about twenty minutes past six o'clock, as the Royal carriage, which was an open landau, was returning to Buckingham Palace, and when it had reached better than mid-way down Constitution-hill, he heard the report of a pistol, and at the same instant her Majesty stood up and said "Renwick, what is that." Witness replied, "Your Majesty has been fired at." Her Majesty then said no more, but resumed her seat. Her Majesty did not appear to be in any way alarmed.

From the evidence of Inspector Conway, it appeared that the prisoner had been out of employment since November last. He had formerly worked on the Edinburgh and Nantes Railway, and went over to France at the time the President of the French Republic was coming over from Ham. The prisoner had told him that the pistol was only loaded with powder, and that he had not the slightest intention to injure the Queen, that he did it for the purpose of getting into prison, as he was tired of being out of work.

The Attorney-General said that he had heard the whole of the evidence in reference to the charge made against the prisoner, and on which he asked for his committal.

Mr. HALL asked the prisoner if he wished to say anything in reply to the charge which had been made against him. He was at the same time, he was bound to inform him that whatever he might say would be taken down as evidence.

The prisoner replied that he had nothing to say.

Mr Hall: You will then stand committed to Newgate to take his trial for misdemeanor, under the 5th and 6th Victoria, c. 51, for firing and discharging a loaded pistol at her Majesty, with intent to alarm and injure her.

The several witnesses were then bound over to prosecute upon the commitment being made out, the prisoner was remanded, and was in a cab.

With respect to the pistol, [illegible] the prisoner being found guilty, an erroneous impression exists that he can be both publicly flogged and transported. The clause of the act, which is as follows, will show the contrary:—"And be it enacted, that from and after the passing of this act, if any person shall wilfully discharge, or attempt to discharge, or point, aim, or present at or near to the person of the Queen, any gun, pistol, or fire-arm, or any other destructive material, or shall discharge or cause to be discharged, or attempt to discharge or cause to be discharged, any explosive substance or material near the person of the Queen; or if any person shall wilfully strike or attempt to strike at the person of the Queen with any offensive weapon or in any other manner whatsoever; or if any person shall wilfully throw or attempt to throw any substance, matter, or thing whatsoever at or upon the person of the Queen, or in the presence of her Majesty, in any of the cases aforesaid to injure the person of the Queen, or with the intent in any of the cases aforesaid to break the public peace, or whereby the public peace may be endangered, or with intent in any of the cases aforesaid, &c., every person so offending shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, being convicted thereof in due course of law, shall be liable, at the discretion of the court before which he or she shall be so convicted, to be transported beyond the seas for the term of seven years, or to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any period not exceeding three years, and during the period of such imprisonment to be publicly or privately whipped, as often and in such manner and form as the said court shall order and direct, not exceeding three times."

It will thus be seen that the sentence of transportation has passed, the flogging cannot be carried into execution: to inflict such a necessary punishment the court must pass the maximum sentence.

ENTERTAINMENT TO THE BISHOPS AT THE MANSION HOUSE

MONDAY being the 143th anniversary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, the members and friends of the institution, with the bishops, the clergy, the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs, attended divine service in the afternoon in St. Paul's Cathedral. In the evening the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress gave a dinner at the Mansion-house, which was honoured with the company of the Archbishop of Canterbury and Miss Sumner, the Bishop of London and Miss Blomfield, the Bishop of Llandaff, the Bishop of Worcester and Mrs. Pepys, the Bishop of Hereford and Miss Wilberforce, the Bishop of Lichfield and Mrs. Lonsdale, the Bishop of Carlisle, and the Hon. Mrs. Percy, &c.

The Archbishop of York, the Bishops of Winchester, Durham, Gloucester, Peterborough, Exeter, and Lincoln, who had accepted invitations, were unavoidably prevented from honouring the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress with their company.

The Lord Mayor, in proposing the first toast, said, I esteem it a high honour and privilege to be permitted to entertain in this hall the Bishops and other dignitaries of the church, upon this interesting occasion; and I am sure that it is not usual to offer many observations in proposing the toast, "The Church and Queen," and I shall adhere to that rule; but it is impossible on such an occasion to refrain from manifesting the confidence of present occurrences, which, although greatly to be deplored, tends in no small degree to produce the most unequivocal evidences of loyalty and love to the Sovereign. (Cheers.) It is quite impossible to express in language stronger than the mingled feelings of anxiety and indignation which burst forth in the metropolis upon the intelligence that an attempt was made upon the life of her Majesty. (Loud cheers.) It is time to say, that, in this country, such attempts are political suicide, and under this country [illegible] to immunity from any of those dreadful conflicts to which the rest of Europe is subjected. It would indeed, be matter of regret if the lustre of the character of a people distinguished for their attachment to the laws, were dimmed by an act against the person of the Sovereign (Cheers.) in which [illegible] alone. Although calculated to exasperate on the one side, is said on the other to call forth those manifestations of devoted affection and loyalty. It is with the highest degree of pleasure I propose "The Church and Queen." (Loud cheers.)

The company immediately rose and drank the toast with the utmost enthusiasm.

The Lord Mayor: I now rise to propose the health of "Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, and the rest of the Royal Family." It is unnecessary for me to say a word in favour of Prince Albert every day brings forward additional proofs of his desire to promote the good of her Majesty's subjects, and of his benevolent exertions for the advantage of the humbler classes. (Cheers.) It has been my happiness personally to witness his Royal Highness's labours, and the high estimation in which he is held, not only in the metropolis, but in the surrounding counties; and it gives me the most lively gratification to propose the toast. (Cheers.)

The Lord Mayor then proposed "The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," and took occasion to speak of the respectful entertainment which his brother magistrates and his fellow-citizens had received from the prelates who discharged the difficult duties of his high office in so exemplary a manner. (Cheers.)

The Archbishop of Canterbury, in returning thanks, commented upon the magnificent hospitality of the Lord Mayor, and then proposed the health of his Lordship, many of whose constituents were, he understood, present, and no doubt delighted to witness the strong feeling of respect and regard which had been expressed in the course of the splendid entertainment.

The Lord Mayor proposed "The Bishop of London and the Bench of Bishops." He spoke of the several services which the Bishop of London had to perform in his extensive district, and of that Prelate's never-failing exertions for the diffusion of learning.

The Bishop of London returned thanks in an admirable speech, which he delivered with great spirit. He had, he said, recently concluded visits in the city of London, not fewer than nine years, in eight of which he had received as parochial clergyman, and in nearly twenty one as Bishop, and he rejoiced in the co-operation which the Bishop's executive in the great charity there they were [illegible] ing had met from the magistrates of London. Ships, colonies, and [illegible] were the great instruments by which the propagation of the Gospel must be accomplished; and he trusted that the Lord Mayor with the spirit of the charity was indispensable to its success. (Cheers.)

Several other toasts followed. Most of the company retired at an early hour from the festive board.

The foundation-stone of the Printers' Almshouses will be laid at Woodgreen, Tottenham, on Monday, June 11, by Viscount Mahon, M.P. This institution was most honourably organized by subscriptions among the journeymen themselves, and has since received the sanction and support of most of the metropolitan printers.

On Tuesday the launch of the steam-frigate Megæra took place at the ship-yard of Messrs. Pitcher and Son, at Millwall. Her dimensions of the Megæra, one of the largest screw-steamers in the service, are 507 feet, breadth of beam, 37 ft. 3; depth in hold, 24 feet; tonnage, 1391. Her keel and stern are of wrought iron; screw upwards of 13 feet in diameter; mounted with 14 guns.

Lieutenant J. N. K. Wasse, R.N., who distinguished himself in the late affair with the pirates of the island of his vessel, the Polyphemus steam sloop, and was wounded, is appointed to her Majesty's steam yacht Victoria and Albert for promotion.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From the City Correspondent.)

The extraordinary depression in the French funds, with the comparatively trifling reaction, has been the predominating influence in causing the slight variations which have affected Consols during the week, the extreme range being about ¾ per cent. Consols on Monday opened at 90¾ to ¾ closing, after a most insignificant market, at 91 for Money, and 91 for Time. The fall in French funds (five per Cents having receded from 90 to 86 within a week) influenced the market unfavourably on Tuesday, the Consols opening at 90⅞, but afterwards improving to 91 to ¾. The French funds quoting an advance of 5 per cent., produced a favourable reaction on Wednesday, Consols quoting 91⅛, closing at that price after a temporary decline. The same price was the opening quotation for the week; but, after receding ¼ per cent., was firmly maintained upon the satisfactory nature of the intelligence known; but, on the arrival of the French mail, a reaction immediately occurred, and 90⅞ to 91 became the last quotation. Exchequer Bills are a few shillings lower this week, and the June bills are advertised to be issued at par. Bank Stock has been steady, and the quotations and the heavy stocks realise the full market value. Prices at the close of the week were:—For Bank Stock, 2¾; Three per Cent. Reduced Annuities, 89¾; Three per Cent. Consols, 91; New Three per Cent. Annuities, 90¾; Long Annuities, expire Jan., 1860, 8 9-16; Ditto, 30 years, Oct. 10, 1859, 9 5-8; India Bonds, £1000, 71 pm.; Ditto, Under £1000, 68 pm.; Consols for Account, 91; Exchequer Bills, £1000, June, 64 pm.; £500, June, 64 pm.; Small, June, 64 pm.; Ditto, Advertised, 46 pm.

The following amount of bullion in the Bank of England has scarcely influenced quotations, Mexican Stock [illegible] owing my decided change. On Monday the price (ex Coupons) was 29¾, [illegible] forwards to 29¾, closing 29. On Tuesday it receded to 29¼, and [illegible] per cent. Dutch Stock has fluctuated about one per cent. during the week. In the other securities the change has been trifling, as the following statement of prices will show:—Brazilian Bonds, 78; Danish Bonds, Five per Cent., Sept., 1849, 6 pm.; Equador Bonds, 2¾; Grenada Bonds, One per Cent., 15; Mexican, Ex Coupons, Account, 29¾; Portuguese, Four per Cent., 27; Spanish Five per Cent., 1840, 16¾; Ditto, Account, 16¾; Ditto, Passive, 8¾; Ditto, Three per Cent., 24¾; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent., 48¾; Ditto, Four per Cent., 74¾.

Shares have not materially altered during the week, although but little expectation of any improvement at present appears reliable. All the lines seem thoroughly investigated before confidence will be restored. The [illegible] ningham and Oxford [illegible] calls daily [illegible] £16, 1¾ dex. Caledonian, £16, 1¾ dex. Chester and Holyhead, 15; Dublin and Belfast Junction, 8¼; Dutch Rhenish, 6¼; Eastern Counties, 8¼; Ditto, New, Guaranteed 5 per cent., 10¼; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 12¼; Great Northern, 7¾; Great Western, 78¾; Hull and Selby, 85¾; Ditto, Leased to Great Northern, 78¾; Lancaster and Carlisle, 58¾; Ditto, 5; Ditto, Sixteenths, 4¼; Ditto, Thirds, 8¼; Ditto, New, Guaranteed Six per Cent., 113¼; Leeds and Bradford, 97; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 56¾; London and Blackwall, 3¾; London and Greenwich, 9¾; London and North Western, 108¾; Ditto, New, 5, 9¾; Ditto, Fifths, 7¾; London and South Western, 34¾; Ditto, New Six per Cent., 104¾; Manchester and Leeds, Five per Cent. on Calls, 5; Manchester, Buxton, and Matlock, 1; Midland, 67¾; Ditto, Consolidated Three per Cent., 84¾; Ditto, Bristol and Birmingham, 5 per Cent., 104¾; Ditto, Birmingham and Derby, 25¾; Ditto, Newcastle and Berwick, 24¾; Ditto, Newcastle Extension, 13¾; Ditto, G N R Preference, 4¾; York and North Midland, 33¾; Ditto, Preference, 4¾; Ditto, East and West Riding Extension, 14¾; Bourgogne and Amiens, 2¾ x.c.; Central of France (Or-Vernon), 12; Great Indian Peninsular, 5; Northern of France, 8¾; Paris and Rouen, 18; Paris and Strasbourg, 4; Rouen and Havre, 9¾; Tours and Nantes, 2¾; Australian Mines, 6.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Very moderate supplies of English wheat have been received up to our market this week, and they have proved quite equal to the wants of the millers. Selected lots have to some fearlessness sold at about stationary prices; but the value of all other kinds has given way quite a per quarter. Further wheats in imports of which have been in a comparatively small [illegible] have moved off slowly and the quotations have had a downward tendency. The sale for barley—both English and foreign—has continued inactive at barely late rates. In malt scarcely any business has been transacted. Oats have moved off slowly, but both beans and peas as well as Indian corn, have been held for more money. In the [illegible] we have to quote

OLD LONDON-BRIDGE: an Historical Romance. By GEORGE HERBERT ROWELL, Esq. Illustrated with Twenty-four Steel Engravings by Ashley, and an elaborate Frontispiece of the Bridge, built by the prize architect, Peter of Colechurch, the first which ever crossed the river Thames, and which withstood the raging of nearly a Million of floods, during the lapse of six entire centuries. The work is handsomely bound in the antique style. "The graceful manner, congenial to the best biographer of 'The Umbrella,' has adventured upon a novel theme, even for a novelist: he has invested the interesting subject of an old bridge with the interest and fascination of romance. But that bridge is one of the rival celebrity—the first stone bridge ever built on the Thames—the masterpiece of art and science, and the wonder of the world. Peter's bridge is thirty years, ranging from 1176 to 1206, in building. Now that the narrative is complete, and each stone has been placed in its wary work by the Walter Castons, the 'Old St. Paul's,' and the 'Tower of London,' by Harrison Ainsworth, Esq., while we await that magnificent story of Mr. Rodwell, we may say, that, in several of the engravings before us, the illustrator, Mr. Ashley, may fairly be considered even with such eminent and practice, designers as Finden and Cruikshank."—Sun. J. C. BRADBURY, Bibliopegist-Street, SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, and Co., Stationers'-hall-court

ROYAL ACADEMY, 1849

SUPPLEMENT TO THE

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

VOL. XIV.] SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1849. [THE DOUBLE NUMBER] ONE SHILLING

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF ARTS, 1849.

A BRIEF account of the Royal Academy, from its foundation to the present time, will not be out of place in a paper containing critical notices of the principal works of art in the Academy's present Exhibition. It will, moreover, be found of use, for there is no separate history of the Academy, or, indeed, any book, that we can call to mind, affording even an ordinary account of its origin and history.

The Royal Academy of Arts was constituted Dec. 10th, 1768; opened its first exhibition in Somerset House, May, 1780; and removed from Somerset House and opened its first exhibition in Trafalgar-square, May, 1838. Its principal objects were, and are still, the establishment of a well-regulated "School, or Academy of Design," for the use of Students in the Arts; with an "Exhibition," open to all artists of distinguished merit, where they might offer their performances to public inspection, and acquire that degree of reputation and encouragement which they should be deemed to deserve. It is called by its members "a private society." "In fact," says Mr. Howard, the late secretary, in his evidence before the House of Commons, "it is a private society, but that it supports a school that is open to the public." The members are under the superintendence and control of the Queen only, who confirms and signs all appointments; and the Society itself consists of forty Royal Academicians (including a President), twenty Associates, and six Associate Engravers. The Royal Academy derives the whole of its funds from the produce of its annual Exhibition, to which the price of admission is one shilling, and the catalogue, one shilling. From 1769 to 1780 the Exhibition produced, on an average, about £1500 annually; from 1780 to 1796, about £2500. The average annual receipts amounted, in 1836, to about £5000.

Since the removal to Trafalgar-square, the receipts have increased, and are now, we are assured, nearer £8000. On the first day of opening, in 1847, £106 was taken; on the second, £114; and on the third, £130. The annual Exhibition opens the first Monday in May; and works intended for exhibition must be sent in at least three weeks or a month before—but of this due notice is given in all the public papers. No works which have been already exhibited; no copies of any kind, (excepting paintings on enamel); no mere transcripts of the objects of natural history; no vignette portraits; nor any drawings without backgrounds (excepting architectural designs), can be received. No artist is allowed to exhibit more than eight different works. Honorary exhibitors (or unprofessional artists) are limited to one. All works sent for exhibition are submitted to the approval or rejection of the Council, whose decision is final, and may be ascertained by application at the Academy in the week after they have been left there.

The rules direct that any person desiring to become a Student of the Royal Academy, shall present a drawing or model of his own performance to the keeper, which, if considered by him a proof of sufficient ability, shall be laid before the Council, together with a testimonial of his moral character, from an Academician, or other known person of respectability. If these are approved by the Council, the candidate is permitted to make a drawing or model from one of the antique works in the Academy, and the space of three months from the time of receiving such permission is allowed for that purpose; the time of his attendance to be from ten o'clock in the morning until three in the afternoon. This drawing or model, when finished, is laid before the Council, accompanied with outline drawings of an anatomical figure and skeleton, not less than two feet high, with lists and references on each drawing, of the several muscles, tendons, and bones contained therein, together with the drawing or model originally presented for his admission as a probationer; if approved, the candidate is accepted as a Student of the Royal Academy, and receives in form the ticket of his admission from the hand of the keeper in the Antique School. If the specimen presented is rejected by the Council, he is not allowed to continue drawing in the Academy. The rule for Architectural Students is of a like character.

The Academy possesses a very fine library of books on Art, with a noble collection of casts from the Antique. The library is open to the Students.

The foundation members of the Academy were:—

Sir Joshua Reynolds (President).
Sir William Chambers, the Architect of Somerset House.
Thomas Gainsborough, Richard Wilson } The eminent landscape painters.
Benjamin West (the Second President).
Joseph Wilton the sculptor.

F. Bartolozzi, the engraver; Charles Catton, Master of the Painter Stainers' Company; George Barrett, an indifferent landscape painter; Dominick Serres, the marine painter; Francesco Zuccarelli, an Italian landscape painter, patronised by George III.; Francis Cotes, a portrait painter, of whom Hogarth, when angry, used to say that he was a better portrait painter than Sir Joshua; Francis Hayman and Samuel Wale, who drew for booksellers; Carlini, the sculptor of the heads on the key-stones at Somerset House; Cipriani, who had some skill in design; Nathaniel Dance, better known as Nathaniel Holland, a man who drew unmistakeable likenesses, but bad portraits; John Gwynn, an architect but better known as one of Dr. Johnson's friends; Thomas and Paul Sandby, small landscape painters, but good drawing-masters; John Richards, who drew portraits in crayon; Peter Toms, the son of old Toms, the engraver—Alderman Boydall's master (he was Port Collis at Heralds' College, and was employed by Sir Joshua on his draperies); John Baker, a flower and coach painter; Mason Chamberlain, a portrait painter, residing at Spitalfields; Nathaniel Hone, remembered only by his satire on Sir Joshua; Jeremiah Meyers, a miniature painter of little merit; George Michael Moser, a chaser for the brass decorations of cabinets; F. M. Newton, a portrait painter, and the first Secretary to the Institution; Edward Penny, a painter of small portraits in oil; William Tyley and Richard Yeo, of whom little or nothing is known; and two women, Angelica Kauffman and Mary Moser, afterwards Mary Lloyd.

To these foundation members the following were added as [illegible] occurred. George Dance, an indifferent architect; William Hoare, the father of Prince Hoare, the painter of the best portrait of the great Lord Chatham; Johan Zoffany, the admirable painter of theatrical portraits and subjects; Edward Burch, a gem engraver; Richard Cosway, celebrated for his small portraits; Joseph Nollekens, the sculptor, whose best bust is his head of Dr. Johnson; James Barry, the painter of the "Grecian Harvest Home," in the great room of the Society [illegible] the Adelphi; John Bacon, the sculptor of the statues of Dr. Johnson and John Howard, in St. Paul's Cathedral; Rev. William Peters, who painted some of the second-rate pictures in Boydell's Shakspeare; John Singleton Copley, the father of Lord Lyndhurst, and the painter of the "Death of Chatham," in the National Gallery; George Stubbs, the horse and dog painter—an early Edwin Landseer, but not one twentieth part so good; P. J. De Loutherbourgh, occasionally a fine landscape painter; Edmund Garvey, an indifferent imitator of R. P. Bonington; John Francis Rigaud, who painted for the Boydell Gallery, Ancona Banks, one of the greatest and most poetic of English sculptors; John Farrington, who worked with Richard Wilson, but caught very little of his master's skill; James Wyatt, the architect of the Pantheon, and the person who inflicted so many injuries on some of our finest cathedrals—Salisbury, Hereford, &c.; William Hodges, who accompanied Captain Cook on his second voyage, and mapped scenery with skill, but with little art; James Northcote, the pupil of Sir Joshua; John Opie, the Cornish wonder, whose reputation is not so great as it was; John Russell, a painter of crayon portraits, in the manner of his master, Cotes; William Hamilton, who was painted for Boydell; Henry Fuseli, whose once great reputation is still on the decline; John Webber, Francis Wheatley, and John Young, indifferent artists, of whom very little is known; Sir Francis Bourgeois, whose noble bequest of the Dulwich Gallery is his best monument; Ozias Humphrey, a painter of crayon portraits of average merit, Robert Smirke, the father of two architects, and the designer of some of our best book illustrations; Sir Thomas Lawrence, after Sir Joshua, the best known, if not the best of our school of portrait painters; Thomas Stothard, the English Watteau; Richard Wilson, whose later works did not justify the proper estimation in which his earlier efforts; John Hoppner and Sir William Beechey, portrait painters of merit (Hoppner more particularly), whose reputation was injured by the success of Lawrence; Sawrey Gilpin, a [illegible] animal painter; Henry Tresham, a poor painter of history pieces; [illegible] sional poet; and Thomas Daniel, whose Indian view [illegible] pectacle his name.

Of such men was the Royal Academy composed [illegible] 1800. With the new century, we are introduced to members some of whom are still alive. We shall continue to catalogue them [illegible] order of their election. In the year 1803, John Flaxman, our great English sculptor, and Sir Martin Archer Shee, [illegible] Portraits, the father of the Royal Academy, were made Royal [illegible] Joseph M. W. Turner, (who is still among [illegible] Soane, the architect of the Bank of England, and Charles Rossi, the sculptor, whose best work is his monument in St Paul's to [illegible] wallis, were made in 1802. Then came (1804) Henry Thomson, [illegible] a wit than an artist; William Owen (1806), a portrait painter of great merit, disowned by Lawrence; Samuel Woodforde (1807), so little known that he is not included in the elaborate record of painters compiled by Bryan, and enlarged by Stanley; Henry Howard, who had [illegible] feeling for the poetry of his art, but little skill; Thomas Phillips, the painter of the best portrait of Lord Byron, Nature [illegible] forgotten in the same way as Woolnoth); [illegible] excellent painter of English skies and English [illegible] Sir David Wilkie, the English Teniers, Henry Bone, the [illegible] enamel painter, Sir Robert Smirke, the architect of the [illegible] and [illegible] Museum; Sir Richard Westmacott, the sculptor who [illegible] is his monument to Mrs. Warren, in Westminster Abbey; James Ward, the horse painter; Philip Reinagle, [illegible] and [illegible] W. R. Bigg, all three nice forgotten; [illegible] Dubois, [illegible] of the best portrait of the Princess Charlotte; [illegible] Thurburn, the greatest painter, after Wilkie, that Scotland has produced; Edward Burt, for some few years the rival of Wilkie; Alfred Edward Chalon, a painter of portraits in crayon, slightly coloured; William Mulready, a genius in his own way almost as much as Teniers or Wilkie; John Jackson, whose fine portraits of Flaxman and Canova will be long remembered; Sir Francis Chantrey, the greatest head-sculptor of ancient or modern times; William Hilton, who laboured with much and still to advance the English school of historical painting; William Collins, whose sea-shore scenes are so essentially English in feeling; Abraham Cooper, the horse and battle painter, [illegible] work is his "Richard and Saladin;" E. H. Baily, the sculptor of [illegible] at the Fountain;" Richard Cook, who has caused exhibit very many years; Wm Daniell, a careful and spirited painter of Eastern scenery; R. R. Reinagle, removed from the Society in his lifetime, like poor James Barry; Sir Jeffry Wyatville, the restorer of Windsor Castle; George Jones, who painted one or two military pieces of merit, but who has since [illegible] scriptural imbecilities. C. R. Leslie, one of the best and most original of our school of painters; H. W. Pickersgill, the portrait painter, the rival of Phillips; W. Wilkins, the architect of University College, St George's Hospital, and the National Gallery; William Etty, the prince of English colourists, when he is not sinning; John Constable, a landscape painter of rare and original merit; C. L. Eastlake, a refined and careful of English draughtsmen; [illegible] Lawrence, then a match, when painting the busts of [illegible] Rubens; H. P. Briggs, an historical painter, who died [illegible] achieving a name; G. S. Newton, best known [illegible] the Vicar of Wakefield; [illegible] William Allan, celebrated for some [illegible] history; Clarkson Stanfield, our English [illegible], C. R. Cockerell, the architect of the Taylo [illegible], whose long residence in Rome has strongly [illegible] for the classic excellencies of art; J. P. Deering, [illegible] Exeter Hall; W. Wyon, celebrated [illegible] heads as Thomas Simon in the time of Cromwell and Charles II; Thomas Uwins, whose Neapolitan scenes "breathe of it sweet sun;" Ravenhach, Earlom, and Bewick, whose works possess a future reputation, while the very names of Yeun and Y[illegible]

[illegible] Thomas Campbell, Author of "The Pleasures of Hope"

From this analysis, we shall now proceed to our promised criticisms.

THE GREAT, OR EAST ROOM

Contains 230 works in all. Landscapes and subject pictures are principally on the line of sight; immediately above, are the largest portraits. The Royal Academicians contribute fifty-two works, and the Associates seventeen.

1. "The Real Scenery of the 'Bride of Lammermuir.'" In the distance is the promontory of East Castle (Wolf's Craig of the novel), which forms the termination of Lammermuir, in the German Ocean." Large and characteristic. It is the work of James Hall, the son of Sir James Hall, of Dunglass, and the brother of the late Captain Basil Hall.

7. "M. Guisot." V. Mottez. A three-quarter portrait, and very like, though somewhat hard in the expression of the lower features. The action is easy and simple, and yet dignified.

8. "Henrietta Maria in distress, relieved by Cardinal de Retz." A. L. Egg, A.

Cardinal de Retz, the principal leader of the Fronde, paid a visit of enquiry on the 6th of January, to learn what had become of the de-throned Queen of England, after a series of furious affrays and slaughters which had convulsed Paris during the days immediately preceding the 6th of January. It was well he had not forgotten her; for her last loaf was eaten, her last faggot had been consumed, and she was destitute of the means of purchasing more.—Miss Strickland's Queens of England.

Mr. Egg is the last male Associate of the Academy; and this picture more than justifies his election. The story is well told, and the painting conscientiously executed throughout. The face of Henrietta is beautiful y thoughtful, and there is some good drawing in the hands and hands.

12. "Tilbury Fort, on the Thames—Wind against Tide." C. Stanfield, R.A. One of Mr. Stanfield's noblest works. The river is as fresh as nature—you can almost hear the wind blow and the water beat. The shipping is free and masterly, and the sky thoroughly English.

15. "The Desert." E. Landseer, R.A. A dead lion, carefully painted, with a desert background, in which some people affect to see a great deal of poetry. The lion itself is admirable, but the desert is not very poetical.

17 "Portrait of Dr. F. R. Ure, F.R.S., &c., &c." D. Macnee. A careful likeness of the great chemist.

20. "The Marquis of Breadalbane's Deer Forest, and Loch Tulgar, Black Mount, Argyllshire." G. F. Buchanan. A good subject, not very well treated.

21. "Portrait of Major-General C. R. Fox." W. C. T. Dobson. Like; but the painter has hardly caught the easy frankness of look which the General wears.

22. "His Excellency the Prince Metternich." H. W. Phillips. Mr. Phillips is the son of the late Royal Academician. This of Prince Metternich, and a portrait in another room of Lamartine, evinces a zeal which would have pleased his father, had he lived to have seen it.

23. "Religious Controversy in the time of Louis XIV." A. E. Elmore, A.—(Engraved at page 356.)

31 "Portrait of R. J. Wyatt, Esq., sculptor, Rome." S. Pearce. A good likeness of one of the best of our sculptors, whose unwillingness to leave Rome is the only reason that he was not elected into the Academy many years ago.

32. "Portrait of the Right Hon. the Countess of Eglintoun and Winton." J. Watson Gordon, A. A full-length in white. Mr. Gordon has avoided, not unskilfully, the old recipe of a column for a background.

37. "Clearing-off at Sunset." T. S. Cooper, A. Sunny, and Cuyp-ish, and Cooper-like; which is real excellence.

38. "The Smuggler's Refuge." W. W. Collins. By the son of the late Royal Academician, whose sea-shore scenes will long preserve his name. There is something of the father in the treatment and execution of this subject. The very title is somewhat similar.

39. "Interior of an Anglo Cottage." G. Hardy. A carefully-painted interior, worthy of a Dutch painter for its Dutch like fidelity. There is real promise in this picture. One could wish for the same observation of human nature, and the same skill in representing it, which we see here—the bricks and common utensils of a country kitchen.

54. "Portrait of Nicholas Vandiest." W. Boxall, R.A. A woman leaning on a skull. Not very well conceived or very well painted, but suggestive, in its title, of the pleasant reply made by Lord Burgoley, which will occur to many of our readers.

47. "George Cruikshank." H. S. Parkman. A small portrait, and like the grave caricaturist.

48. A Portrait." W. Boxall. There is a boyish frankness about this face, worthy of Gainsborough. The colouring, too, is rich and full; indeed, the whole treatment is most excellent.

54. "Portrait of Mrs. Fraser." E. Dubufe. A three-quarter portrait in pine. The action of the hands, perhaps, somewhat objectionable; but the lady-like air and grace of the whole figure and face, cannot be matched by any other picture in the present collection. Artists call it [illegible] the objection is barely just.

53. "Scene from Henry VIII." C. R. Leslie, R.A. A small picture. Henry is taking off his mask; Anne Boleyn is by his side. The painting is hard, but the grouping is good.

Wolsey. Here I'll make my royal choice,
King. You have found him, Cardinal. (Act v., scene iv.)

56 "Sympathy." J. Ward, R.A. A horse contemplating a dead ass.

60. "Amoret chained." W. Etty, R.A. A female figures down to the waist, with some gorgeous colouring, in the shape of flesh, but sadly deficient in refinement.

61. "Portrait of Thomas MakDougall Brisbane, Bart., G.C.B., G.C.H., President of the Royal Society of Edinburgh." J. Watson Gordon, A. A three-quarter portrait, and most excellent.

62. "Portrait." Sir W. Allan, R.A. A three-quarter portrait of a lady; we believe, Miss Allan, Sir William's niece.

7. "River Scene, North Wales." F. R. Lee, R.A. Fresh and truthful; evidently painted on the spot. Mr. Lee maintains his position, but [illegible] talent.—(Engraved at page 365.)

71. "Portrait of John Bright, Esq., M.P." J. P. Knight, R.A. A kit-kat, and clever.

73. "Lear disinheriting Cordelia."—In progress in fresco in the new Houses of Parliament. J. R. Herbert, R.A.

Lear. But mark my rival's hate.
Cordelia. Ay, my good Lord
Lear So young, and so untender?
Cordelia So young, my Lord, and true.
Lear. Let it be so: They truth, then, be thy dower:
For, by the sacred radiance of the sun;
The mysteries of Hecate and the night;
By all the operation of the orbs,
From whom we do exist, and cease to be;
Here I disclaim all my paternal care,
Propinquity, and property of blood,
And as a stranger to my heart and me
Hold thee, from this, for ever.
* * * *
Hence, and avoid my sight!
So be my grave my peace, as here I give
Her [illegible] heart
From [illegible] bosom
When [illegible] dowers dispose the third:
Detested [illegible] my power,
Pre-eminence, and all the large effects
That troop with majesty. Lear, act 1 scene 1.

Full of thought and fine drawing. The Cordelia is exquisite for tranquil feeling of art and nature. Lear himself is very fine. The architecture is Byzantine; the drawing somewhat hard.

"Portrait of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, intended for presentation to the University of Cambridge." F. R. Say. A full-length; and like as if painted by the master of the great wardrobe.

75. "Queen Elizabeth at Kenilworth," F. Cowie, rather suggests than realizes a memorable scene.

The Knight expectant advanced up the hall, the whole length of which he had unfortunately to traverse, turning out his toes with so much zeal, that he presented his legs at every step with its broadside for most, so that it resembled an old-fashioned table-knife with a curved blade when seen sideways. The rear of his gait was in correspondence with this unhappy amble, and the implied mixture of bashful fear and self-satisfaction was so unutterably ridiculous, that Leicester's friends did not suppress a titter. Sussex himself laid all patience aside, and could not forbear whispering into the ear of his friend. "Curse thee! canst thou not walk like a man and a soldier?" an injection that only made honest Blount start and stop, until a glance at his yellow dress and crimson stockings restored his self-confidence, when he went at the same pace as before.—Kenilworth.

77. "Mrs. Entwisle." F. Grant, A. A three-quarter portrait in black; a sort of companion to a picture by Mr. Hollins, A.R.A., on the other side of the room.

78. "Sir Roderick Impey Murchison, F.R.S., F.G.S., &c." H. W. Pickersgill, R.A. A kit-kat, representing the great geologist holding his book on the Silurian system. There is a flushed, after-dinner look about the face which is most objectionable.

81. "The Wreck Buoy." J. M. W. Turner, R.A. Evidently a picture painted twenty years ago, but lumbering about, and then cleaned up, or intended to be so, by the insertion of two or three new bright rainbows. There is as much folly in this picture as in Mr. Martin's blue expanse, to be noticed shortly.

83. "Trusty Tomkins appearing before Sir Henry Lee." C. Landseer, R.A. A pleasing illustration of Scott; nicely told, but without fervour, or fancy, or any unusual dexterity that raises it above the common level of such productions.

As he spoke, the military preacher abandoned his leafy screen, and, stalking forward, stood unexpectedly before the old Cavalier, who stared at him as if he thought his expression had actually raised the devil. * * * The soldier, with little courtesy, held out a scroll, &c. &c. Woodstock, chap. i. p. 30.

84. "The Crotchet Worker." W. Etty, R.A. A female head and shoulders, on which all the colours of a loaded palette have been emptied with a confused but masterly hand.

85. "Charles Barry, Esq., R.A." H. W. Pickersgill, R.A. A three-quarter portrait of the great architect of the New Houses of Parliament. It is like; but perhaps too Hibernian for the original.

90. "Mrs John Walton." Mrs. W. Carpenter. A three-quarter portrait in crimson velvet, and very elegant.

91. "A See-Saw." T. Webster, R.A.—(Engraved at page 356.)

92. "Tourists in the Tyrol." J. J. Chalon, R.A. Mr. Chalon's single contribution to the present Exhibition, and not very remarkable.

93. "A Sister of Charity, of Ravenna." S. A. Hart, R.A. A small picture, full of devotional feeling, and beautifully coloured. Mr. Hart has a fine eye for colour.

96. "Portrait of P. M'Dowell, Esq., R.A." J. Haverty. A clever portrait of the sculptor of the beautiful statue, "A Girl Reading."

100. "Fireside Musings," C. W. Cope, R.A., is somewhat disappointing.

101. "The Wounded Greek." A. Cooper, R.A., is Engraved for our present paper, and hangs as a companion to No. 118, "The Ottais." The horse is capitally painted.—(Engraved at page 348.)

108. "The Forester's Family." J. Landseer, R.A. A small, pleasing picture—Mr. Landseer's best work in the present Exhibition. The scene is laid in a Scottish glen; the time, morning; and the living creatures introduced, two girls, attended by young deer. The girls' faces are beautiful; the deer, perfection. The whole tone, too, is good. The feet of the eldest girl are very unfinished.

115. "Il Tempo del Carnovale." C. Landseer, R.A. A girl looking out of a window. A small picture, with a nice expression of face, and some good farm painting.

117. "Coloured Study for Fresco in House of Lords—Griselda's First Trial." C. W. Cope, R.A. The Cartoon is No. 903 of the present Exhibition.

118. "The Odalisque." A. Cooper, R.A. A companion picture to No. 101.

120. "Portrait of the Infant Son of T. K. Hervey, Esq." Frank Stone. A small portrait, almost in profile, and most carefully painted. The boy's cheek is as round, and plump, and fresh as nature.

126. "William Cubitt, Esq., F.R.S., &c." W. Boxall. A three-quarter portrait, the size of life—a very unusual style for this clever artist. The likeness is excellent.

127. "The Sisters." W. E. Frost, A. One of the most poetic pictures in the Exhibition, and already Engraved in our paper of the 12th instant—"And the songs of sirens sweet."—Comus.

130. "A Dutch calm." E. W. Cooke. A small long picture, evincing a high appreciation of Vandervelde and Cuyp, and a skill of hand for which Mr. Cooke has long been distinguished.

131. "A Glade in the Park." J. Linnick, A. Some felled timber in the foreground. The painting is very careful throughout, and the general arrangement harmonious.

132. "A Mother praying to the Madonna for the recovery of her Sick Child." P. Williams. A pleasing picture in Mr. Penry Williams's old and well-known style; but it is no advance on former efforts.

134. "Showery Weather, near Midsummer." J. Ward, R.A. With all Mr. Ward's peculiarities, and some few traces of his former merits.

135. "Women Bathing." W. Mulready, R.A. An Academy study, made into a picture. The principal figure is seen to the knees, with her back to you. The drawing and general execution are both good. We must confess we should have preferred seeing some other picture than this from Mr. Mulready's pencil. When we think of this "Wolf and the Lamb," his "Lending a Bite," and his "Butts," his "Women Bathing" fails to interest us.

136. "Portrait of Richard Webb Jupp, Esq." Painted by order of the Carpenters' Company, as a testimonial for faithful service extending over a period of half a century. J. P. Knight, R.A. Is, it is said, like.

140. "The Right Hon. Sir Frederick Pollock, Lord Chief Baron." Painted for the County Hall of Huntingdon. F. Grant, A. A full-length, in his robes as Lord Chief Baron, and very like. This is the first official portrait which we remember to have seen by Mr. Grant. The treatment is good; the colouring warm and rich.

141. "Scene from 'Don Quixote,'" Second Part, chapters XXXI. and XXII. The Duke's chaplain, after attacking Don Quixote for his devotion to knight-errantry, and therefore for his belief in his master, reprimands the Duke for encouraging their fancies, and leaves the company in a passion. C. R. Leslie, R.A. The story is told with a quaint humour for which Mr. Leslie has long been distinguished. The grouping is good; the faces capital in point of expression, and all its details throughout managed with consummate art. Mr. Leslie was, perhaps, never greater than he is here. He is usually a cold colourist; but here he is unexpectedly warm. The face of the Duchess is very beautiful. Mr. Gibbons, we understand, is the owner of this fine picture.

The clergyman rose up wonderful angry, saying, "By my holy order, I am about to say You Excellency is as mad as one of these stones; and see if they must not needs be mad, when wise men canonize their madness. Your Excellency may do well to stay with them, for whilst they be here I'll get me hence, and save a labour of correcting what I cannot amend." And, without more ado, leaving the rest of his dinner, he went away, the Duke and Duchess not being able to pacify him, though the Duke said not much to him, being hindered with laughter at his unseasonable choler.—Shelton's Translation.

143. "Aliwal, an Arab Charger, the property of Sir Harry G. W. Smith, Bart., G.C.B., and ridden by him at the battles of Aliwal, &c." A. Cooper, R.A. Carefully painted. Many, like ourselves, will look upon it with interest.

144. "Helena." See "All's Well that ends Well," act i., scene 1. C. L. Eastlake, R.A. A thoughtful head, full of beauty, and painted with all the grace and feeling of Guido. This is Mr. Eastlake's single contribution to the collection.

145. "Admiral Sir Edward Owen, G.C.B." H. W. Pickersgill, R.A. One of Mr. Pickersgill's second-rate portraits.

146. "Miss Julianna Somerset." T. M. Joy. Elegant, but hard.

150. "William Ballantine, Esq." J. Hollins, A. An excellent likeness of the late worthy police magistrate.

151. "Lugano." C. Stanfield, R.A. Full of beauty and even poetry, and truthfulness itself.

152. "The Italian Mother." P. Williams. Another of Mr. Penry Williams's careful transcripts of Italian life.

153 Thou hast the sunset's glow,
Rome, for thy dower,
Flushing the cypress tree,
Temple, and tower.

E. W. Cooke. A long narrow view of Rome at sunset; wonderful for truth and beauty.

158. "Portrait of Mrs. Thomas Todd." C. Baxter. Mr. Baxter is well and honourably known at the Suffolk-street Exhibition; nor will this portrait of Mrs. Todd diminish his reputation.

159. Circe, with the syrens three,
Amidst the flowery kirtled Graces,
Who, as they sang, would take the prison'd soul,
And lap it in Elysium.

F. R. Pickersgill, A. Elegant but hard, as even the uneducated eye may detect by a cursory comparison with Mr. Frost's "Syrens," on the same wall.

166. "Mrs. Claypole, Cromwell's favourite daughter, on her death-bed, at Hampton Court, admonishing him to repent of his sins and guiltiness." A.D. 1659.—(Vide Clarendon, Hume, &c.) C. Lucy. A large picture, figures of the size of life, by a young artist who distinguished himself in the last Westminster Hall cartoon contest. Mrs. Claypole is sensible, devout, penitent and annoyed.

167. "Portrait of Mrs. Leamington." J. Hollins, A. Mr. Hollins's best portrait in the present Exhibition.

168. "Swandia, accused of crime, is exposed to be killed by wild horses: she is innocent, and is caressed, instead of injured, by the animals."—("Hist. Danica. Sax. Gramm." B L.) G. Jones, R.A. One of Mr. Jones's dotages.

169. "Sun and Shadow." R. Redgrave, A. A kind of companion to No. 174, "The Stream at rest," by the same artist. It is too hard.

171. "A Slide." T. Webster, R.A. A masterly picture, in Mr. Webster's best manner, containing about fifty figures and almost as many incidents. To describe it is impossible—so full is it of mirth, accident, and humour. The scene is laid on a pool or pond of water by a village church. We have heard it objected to, as too hot in colour for a cold winter's day; but this objection is, we think, unsound. The picture was painted for Mr. Gibbons, of the Regent's-park.

172. "The Pilgrim." S. A. Hart, R.A.

174. "The Stream at rest." R. Redgrave, A.

Why should the waters love
To take so far a journey to the hills,
When the sweet valleys offer their soil,
Inviting gushlet to nearer bed?—Thomson's Autumn.

A better picture than its companion, No. 169.

178. W. Etty, R.A. Is an attempt to paint what Spenser has sung so beautifully. —

Gather, therefore, the rose whilst yet in prime;
For soon comes age, that will her pride deflower:
Gather the rose of love while yet 'tis time,
Whilst loving, thou may'st loved be with equal crime.

Herrick has a song on the subject:

Gather ye rose-buds, while ye may,
Old Time is still a-flying;
And this same flower that smiles to-day,
To-morrow will be dying.

This is Mr. Etty's best picture in the present Exhibition. The colouring is less smudgy, and all the richest hues of his palette seem to have been blended on his canvass.

179. "Portrait of J. Shaw Lefevre, Esq." J. Watson Gordon, A. A three-quarter portrait, and most excellent. Mr. Watson Gordon and Mr. Frank Grant carry everything before them in the way of portrait painting in the present Exhibition.

183. "Mrs. Fraser Grove, with a favourite dog," T. M. Joy, is clever.

187. "Mrs. Pritchard, of Broseley, Shropshire." H. W. Pickersgill, R.A. The only female portrait by Mr. Pickersgill in the present Exhibition. It may be like, but, as a work of art, it is of inferior merit.

188. "Sir Guyon (fighting with the virtue of temperance), under the conduct of his spiritual guide, destroys the enchantments that have tempted his companions from their duty." T. Uwins, R.A.

The constant payre heard all,
Yet swarved not, but kept their forward way,
Through many covert groves, and thickets close;
In which they creeping, did at last display
That wanton lady with her lover lose,
His warlike armes * * * * *
* * were hong upon a tree:
And in a brave pavilion, full of old monuments,
Was fowly ra'st, that none the signes might see.
No for them, no for honour cared he,
No ought that did to his advancement tend;
But in lewd loves and wastfull luxuries,
His days, his goods, his bodie he did spend:
O horrible enchantment, that him so did blend!

The Faërie Queene. Legend of Sir Guyon, or Temperance, book ii., canto 12

A carefully-painted scene from the Rubens, as he has been called, of English poets. It is pleasing to see a painter of Mr. Uwins's age and reputation maintaining all his early love for a poet whose works he contributed to illustrate when a young man.

193. "The Ogwen Lake, North Wales." F. R. Lee, R.A. Cold, careful, but English in its feeling.

196. "The Free Church." E. Landseer, R.A. Consists of three dogs, an Highlass, a Scotch mull, an old man, an old woman, a girl of twenty-two, and a boy. The execution is beyond praise, but the Free Church seems a sad misnomer.

197. "Portrait of Ralph Price, Esq., Treasurer of the Royal Hospitals of Bridewell and Bethlem." Painted by order of the Governors. J. P. Knight, R.A. A full-length, correctly conceived and coloured.

205. "The Summons to the Conclave." S. A. Hart, R.A. A sort of "Strafford and Secretary," being a Cardinal with his secretary and attendant. We do not remember to have seen Mr. Hart in greater force than we find him in this well-arranged and forcibly-painted picture.

206. "Venus and Adonis." J. M. W. Turner, R.A. Is said to have been painted forty years ago, and wears the look, certainly, as if it belonged to the National Gallery. The point of colour (its principal beauty), it is something between Titian and Velasquez; but the dogs are too indifferently drawn for either the great Venetian or the great Spaniard.

207. "The First-Born." C. W. Cope, R.A. A young father and mother (head and shoulders only seen) bending over a plump-looking boy, who is kicking about with all the healthy energy of youth. The drawing is careful, the colouring rather cold.

211. "Salvator Rosa's Studio." C. Stanfield, R.A. A cave, with banditti, and the great Salvator busily sketching. Though beautiful in itself, this picture has little of the "savage Rosa" about it.

212. "Thomas Cubitt, Esq." (To be presented to him by upwards of seventy of the builders of London, in testimony of their high esteem of his character and abilities.) H. W. Pickersgill, R.A. A full-length of a most excellent man, and a proper tribute to his worth. The likeness is perfect, and the picture, as a portrait, the best Mr. Pickersgill has painted for very many years.

219. "Mrs. Richard Talbot." J. Hollins, A. Another pleasing portrait by Mr. Hollins. It is somewhat hard in colour, but the action is elegant, and the expression all that could be wished.

220. "The Breakfast." W. F. Witherington, R.A. Hard, and almost undeserving of its position in the room.

224. "The Interior of a Highland Inn." A. Cooper, R.A. Careful, and that is all.

225. "Portrait of Mr. Serjeant Thompson, late Recorder of Beverley." J. F. Knight, R.A. A three-quarter portrait, in his robes of office. The face is boldly painted, and the general arrangement of the figure and its accessories extremely good. Mr. Knight wants more refinement in his portraits—he would do well to study Mr. Frank Grant in this way, who seldom fails to catch that refined feeling which marks the gentleman and the complete artist.

235. "Interior of a Highland Cottage," from sketches made on the spot. Eliza Goodall. By, we believe, a sister of Mr. F. Goodall—and very good.

242. "The Cup found in Benjamin's sack." Sir W. Allan, R.A. Sir William Allan never fails to tell a story well—but he has a poor eye for colour, and here we see his merits and defects in a most striking manner. The scenery, dresses, &c., all possess an Eastern character.

"As soon as the morning was light, the men were sent away, they and their asses. And when they were gone out of the city, and not yet far off, Joseph said unto his steward: Up, follow after the men; and when thou dost overtake them, say unto them: Wherefore have ye rewarded evil for good? Is not this it in which my Lord drinketh, and whereby indeed he divineth? ye have done evil in so doing. And he overtook them, and he spake unto them these same words. And they said unto him: Wherefore saith my Lord these words? God forbid that thy servants should do according to this thing: * * * * Then they speedily took down every man his sack to the ground, and opened every man his sack. And he searched, and began at the eldest, and left at the youngest; and the cup was found in Benjamin's sack."—Genesis xliv. 3–7, 11, 12.

243. "The Countess of Zetland." F. Grant, A. A full-length portrait. The Countess is dressed in black velvet, and has her knitting-needles in her hand. The air and action are both good; the colouring is warm and careful. In the background we have the old costumes introduced—one of the old recipes in portrait painting which is now somewhat hackneyed, and which Mr. Grant's ingenuity should be taxed to do without.

247. "On the Coast of Norfolk." J. Salmon.

249. "A Gleaner." J. Hollins, A.

MIDDLE ROOM.

257. "Evenings at Home." R. Rothwell. Hardly maintains Mr Rothwell's former reputation. He was once to have succeeded Sir Thomas Lawrence

258. "Grasmere." W. F. Witherington, R.A. Map-like, and therefore truthful. But true to the scene and true to art-nature are different matters.

O Vale of Grasmere! [illegible]
From all the strife of [illegible] jarring world.
* * * * * * *
And thy pure lake,
Spreading its waveless breast [illegible]
The soul
Doth hoard it as a gem, and fan-like [illegible]
Expires its [illegible] and curving [illegible].

263. "Hunt the Slipper." F. Goodall. An out-door scene, very unlike Mr. Goodall's well-known manner, but much in the style (admirably so in parts) of Mr. Mulready. The incidents are numerous and well-selected, but the picture is hardly a step forward for so clever an artist.

How often have I blessed the coming day,
When toil remitting lent its turn to play,
And all the village train, from labour free,
Led up their sports be-neath the spreading tree;
While many a pastime circled in the shade,
The young contending as the old survey'd.

264. "Portrait of Sir Robert Buckley Comyn, late Chief Justice of her Majesty's Supreme Court, Madras." H. W. Pickersgill, R.A. An excellent likeness of the able historian of the Western Empire.

269. "Lear and Cordelia." H. Le Jeune, deserves a word of praise from the feeling it evinces for the higher excellences of art. It is something to grapple even ordinarily well with a subject from a great tragedy.

Have [illegible] their father, these white flakes
Had chall[illegible]-ged my [illegible]. Was it a love
To be opposed against the jarring winds?
To stand against the deep dread-bolted thunder,
In the most terrible and [illegible] night
Of quick, cross-lightning? to watch (poor perdu!)
With this thin helm? Mine enemy's dog,
Though he had bit me, should have stood that night
Against my fire. And wast thou fain, poor father,
To [illegible] thee with [illegible] and [illegible]
In [illegible] straw
[illegible]
Had [illegible]

270. "Three Versions of One Subject." W. Etty, R.A. Three female heads (the same person in three views), in the manner of Vandyck's portrait of Charles I., for Bernini to make his bust from.

273. "Italian Image boys at a Roadside Alehouse." J. Collmann. One of the best pictures in its way in the whole Exhibition. The three Italian boys grouped on the floor are capitally conceived and drawn, and the expression in the boy's face who is admiring a plaster figure of a Mandarin is all that is wanted. We recollect, with pleasure, Mr. Collmann's former effort in art, his "Country boy's début," so full of observation; but this is a better picture, and is forerunner of future promise.

277. "Cattle returning from the Meadows." F. R. Lee, R.A., and T. S. Cooper, A.—(Engraved at page 360.)

281. "Drawing for the Militia." J. Phillip, should not be passed by, though seen to little advantage where it is hung.

284. "The Temple of Female Fortune, with the Acqua Felice." W. Linton. One of Mr. Linton's classical landscapes, in his easily recognised style.

285. "The Poet's Invitation to Music." F. Stone. A most successful endeavour to represent boys and girls of a blushing eighteen, in a nineteenth century drawingroom, at a nineteenth century piano, and in nineteenth century dresses. Two families are introduced—a light-haired family and a dark-haired family. The dark-haired brother is in love with the fair-haired sister of his friend, and the fair haired brother with the dark-haired sister of his friend. This kind of dusting with eyes is very carefully and prettily carried out. The female faces are especially beautiful. The picture belongs to Jacob Bell, Esq.

290. "The Destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, under the Command of Titus, A.D. 71." D. Roberts, R.A.

Walk about Zion, and go round about her: tell the towers thereof. Mark ye well her bulwarks, consider her palaces. Psalm xlviii. 12, 13.

Jerusalem is immortalized by recollections more various and destructive than have occurred in any other city of the world. Seventeen times has it been sacked and partially destroyed. It has been the seat of the most brilliant explosions of the Jewish, Roman, and Saracenic armies, and has been moistened by the blood of our ancestors, and of the [illegible] Crusade.

During the reign of Nero, [illegible] revolted, but city was invested by Titus; and, having desperately sustained the most remarkable siege in history, from the 14th of April to the 2nd of September, in the year A.D. 71, it was taken, and, together with the Temple, plundered and burnt. The Jews, after having courageously defended the third and second walls, fall back upon the fortress Antonia, which commanded the Temple. Torn into factions amongst themselves, they fought madly against each other, while the Romans armed and laid waste the outer and lower cities of Bezetha and Acra; but Titus, after every labour, having brought the war-engines to bear upon this fortress, the Jews were, ultimately, driven back upon the Temple itself. The principal tower having fallen, the northern portico of the Temple was left defenceless. Titus, commanding in person, was anxious to save it, but, on the seventh day after the breach had taken possession of it, the outer portico having caught fire, the Temple itself, together with the magnificent porticos by which it was surrounded, were totally destroyed. Being the Feast of the Passover, the city was crowded with people, and Josephus, who was present, relates that 600,000 perished of famine, 1,000,000 by the sword, and 97,000 were sold as slaves. The young, and the women, were sold for slaves, and all to might be bought for a piece of silver.—Vide Josephus's War of the Jews.

A very large and elaborate picture, and easily mistaken, as many have mistaken it, for the work of Mr. John Martin. Think a picture which deserves to be studied by the artist, for its great breadth over space; and by the scriptural and historical student, for the map-like fidelity of every part. It is a panorama in small.

293. "Scene from 'The Lady of the Lake.'" A Johnstone. We must confess to some disappointment on seeing this picture, recollecting the deserved reputation of Mr. Johnstone. He is more at home with Allan Ramsay than with Sir Walter Scott.

But Douglas rose,
And thrust between the struggling foes
His giant strength. "Outlaw, forego!
I hold the first who strikes my foe.—
Madman, forbear your frantic jest!
What! is the Douglas fallen so far,
His daughter's hand is doomed the spoil
Of maids unknown-ble broil!"
Sullen and slowly they unclasp,
And struck with shame, their desperate grasp;
And each upon his rival glared,
With foot advanced and blade half bared.—The Lady of the Lake.

303. "Benjamin West's First Effort in Art." E. M. Ward, A.

Little Benjamin was placed with a fly flap in his hand to watch the sleeping infant of his eldest sister, while his mother gathered flowers in the garden. As he sat by the cradle, the child smiled in sleep; he was struck with its beauty, and seeking some paper, drew its portrait in red and black ink.—See ALLAN CUNNINGHAM'S Lives of the British Painters.

This we have already described, and, better still, have Engraved.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

306. "A Dance of Nymphs and Satyrs." S. A. Hart, R.A.

> Meanwhile the rural ditties were not mute,
> Temper'd to the oaten flute.
> Rough satyrs danced, and fauns with cloven heal
> From the glad sound would not be absent long;
> And old Damœtas loved to hear our song.
> MILTON'S Lycidas.

A kind of Nicholas Poussin subject, treated in the warm rich manner of the Venetian artists. We are more in love with subjects of this nature when they resemble ancient bas-reliefs, than when they attempt (however successfully) the rich full hues of the Venetian school. Still, we admit the propriety of treating a subject as it is here treated; and there is much to admire in Mr. Hart's picture.

307. "Portrait of the Right Hon. Lord Rollo." J. Watson Gordon, A. A full-length, of the size of life. the action easy and noblemanlike, and the general effect good.

310. "Portrait of Samuel Cousins, Esq., A.E." T. Mogford. A very good likeness of the greatest mezzotinto engraver we have yet had.

311. "Isabella." J. F. Millais.

> Fair Isabel, poor simple Isabel!
> Lorenzo, a young palmer in Love's eye!
> They could not long in the self-same mansion dwell
> Without some stir of heart, some malady.
> They could not sit at meals but feel how well
> It soothed each to be the other by.
> * * * * *
> These brethren having found by many signs
> What love Lorenzo for their sister had,
> And how she loved him too, each unconfines
> His bitter thoughts to other, well-nigh mad
> That he, the servant of their trade designs,
> Should in their sister's love be blithe and glad,
> When 'twas their plan to coax her by degrees
> To some high noble and his olive trees.—KEATS.

A wonderful picture viewed as a work of art, but still more wonderful when viewed as the production of a very young man. The scene represented is a dinner table, with four figures on one side, and eight on the other. Lorenzo is looking admiration and love at Isabella, and the brothers are showing their scorn of Lorenzo—one by kicking his dog, another by biting his nail at him. Some of the heads, though wanting in relief, are full of character. The leg of the brother who is kicking the dog is somewhat of the long-shanks character.

312. "Autumn." T. S. Cooper, A., is one of those pictures to which it is unnecessary (when standing before it) to give the name of either subject or artist

318. "Daniel Defoe and the Manuscript of 'Robinson Crusoe.'" E. M. Ward, A.

> The manuscript of "Robinson Crusoe" passed through the whole circle of the trade before it could find a purchaser; when at length accepted, the sale was so immediate and rapid, that no less than four editions were published in as many months.—See FORSTER'S Life of Defoe.

A very clever picture, representing the interior of a bookseller's shop of the time of Queen Anne, and in its details strictly true to the time. In the foreground is seen Defoe, thoughtful and resigned, receiving the MS. of "Robinson Crusoe" from a young coxcomb of a bookseller, who has just snuffed out a candle at the same moment that he has, as he evidently thinks, snuffed out an author. Behind Defoe is his wife. The background represents part of an open court, seen through the window. Behind the young coxcomb publisher is a sort of ante-room, where the head of the house has just undertaken to publish a volume of "Poems on several Occasions," for a lady of quality—an eminent hand, as Mr. Lintot would have called her. This is a capital contrast—the accepted and the rejected. All the accessories are in good character: dry bodies of divinity, tied up ready to be sent to the butterman; the book for subscriptions; the list of books published this term. We have seldom seen this thoughtful artist abound in more suggestive incidents and little circumstances than in this very clever picture.

223. "Portrait of the Reverend Edward Rice, D.D., Head Master of Christ's Hospital." Painted for the Board-room of the Royal Free Hospital, Gray's Inn-lane. T. H. Illidge. An excellent likeness of as good a teacher as ever taught in any school.

"THE WOUNDED GREEK."—PAINTED BY A. COOPER, R.A.

324. "Rienzi vowing to obtain justice for the death of his young brother, slain in a skirmish between the Colonna and Orsini factions." W. H. Hunt. This, like the "Lorenzo and Isabella," is the production of a very young man. The subject is well imagined, and the whole circumstance brought before the eye. There is a thoughtful early-art character about the whole design, with some crude colouring:—

> But for that event, the future liberator of Rome might have been but a dreamer, a scholar, a poet—the peaceful rival of Petrarch—a man of thoughts, not deeds. But from that time, all his faculties, energies, fancies, genius, became concentrated to a single point; and patriotism, before a vision, leaped into the life and vigour of a passion.—BULWER LYTTON'S Rienzi.

325. "Lago Maggiore." C. Stanfield, R.A. Full of rich transparent beauty, with an effect of light in Stanfield's best manner.

327. "The death of Gelert." R. Ansdell. This is less like Edwin Landseer than is common with this clever artist, who has sufficient originality of his own to render it unnecessary for him to traffic with other people's ideas.

> "Hell-hound! by thee my child devoured!"
> The frantic father cried;
> And to the hilt his vengeful sword
> He plunged in Gelert's side.
> Conceal'd beneath a mangled heap
> His hurried search had miss'd,
> All glowing from his rosy sleep,
> His cherub boy he kiss'd.
> Ah, what was then Llewellyn's pain
> For now the truth was clear;
> The gallant hound the wolf had slain
> To save Llewellyn's heir.
> Vain, vain was all Llewellyn's woe:
> "Best of thy kind, adieu!
> The frantic deed which laid thee low,
> This heart shall ever rue."

329. "Viscount Emlyn." F. R. Say. By the painter of the full-length of Prince Albert—and a better picture than the portrait of the Prince.

331. "Near Misori, Gulf of Salerno." C. Stanfield R.A. A fit companion to 325.

336. "Viscount Hardinge on the field of Ferozshur, accompanied by the Hon. Charles Hardinge (private secretary), Colonel Wood (military secretary), and the Hon. Arthur Hardinge, A.D.C." The horse on which he is mounted was in the battles of Moodkee and Maharajpore, and was afterwards ridden by him in the three battles on the Sutlej. The view represents the field and village of Ferozshuhur, taken from a sketch made on the spot by the Hon Charles Hardinge. F. Grant, A. The horse on which Lord Hardinge rides is unusually wooden for so spirited an artist as Mr. F. Grant. The attendants are better It is like Lord Hardinge.

337. Thomas Grissell, Esq., F.S.A. H. W. Pickersgill, R.A. Like.

343. "A Stream in the Hills" T. Creswick, A. Very beautiful. We should be sorry to hear that Mr. Creswick had gone, like other artists, across the Alps—we would rather subscribe to keep him at home. Our landscape painters, who have visited Italy, have always lost the feeling for an English sky, or, at least, the skill to represent it as of old.

344. "An incident in the Life of Benjamin West, afterwards President of the Royal Academy." C. Compton.

> Little Benjamin was placed to watch the sleeping infant of his eldest sister. As he sat by the cradle, the child smiled in sleep; he was struck by its beauty and seeking some paper, drew its portrait in red and black ink, although at this period he had never seen an engraving or picture, and was only in the seventh year of his age.—Vide ALLAN CUNNINGHAM'S Lives of British Painters.

The same subject as Mr. Ward has painted, but Mr Compton is not equal to Mr. Ward

348. "Garden Scene." J. D. Wingfield. With Mr. Wingfield's usual success in details, and all his usual dryness in representing them.

349. "Coming of Age." W. P. Frith, A. A picture restoring the manners and customs of the age of Queen Elizabeth in a very remarkable manner. The scene represents a quadrangle, not unlike Hever Castle, if we mistake not, in which the artist has introduced nearly one hundred figures. We have the son on the steps leading to the great door, dressed like a second Lord Leicester. Behind him are his father and mother (the mother with red or auburn hair in compliment to Queen Elizabeth); and by his side is a fine venerable dame (his grandmother), most capitally painted. The clerk of the parish reads a congratulatory address, while a youth kneels and presents a helmet on a cushion, the work of some cunning armourer, who is willing to compliment the family on its prowess, and show his own skill at the same time. The courtyard is all bustle and merriment suitable to the importance of the occasion. We have Boniface drawing his Anno Domini (the best he has; and it is good, we can attest to that); while the clerk of the kitchen is showing his skill in carving the ox that was roasted whole. The picture is full of incident, and full of groups most charmingly conceived and painted. That of the child in the foreground is especially well designed and completed. This is Mr. Frith's single contribution to the Exhibition, and it is, in every respect, a great and successful effort.

"RIVER SCENE, NORTH WALES."—PAINTED BY F. R. LEE, R.A

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

"THE SHADE OF THE BEECH TREES."—PAINTED BY T. CRESWICK, A.

356. "Colly Dogs." E. Landseer, R.A. Perfect in its way. The dogs smack of the heather they are on.

357. "The Awakened Conscience." R. Redgrave, A.—(Engraved at page 357.)

363. "Mill on the Ogwen River, North Wales." F. R. Lee, R.A. Cold, careful, and literal.

364. "Rhodopis, the Greek Cinderella." C. Landseer, R.A.

> Once when she was bathing, Fortune, which is fond of affecting strange and wonderful things, gave her what her beauty rather than her mind deserved: while she was bathing, and her attendants were taking care of her raiment, an eagle swooped down, seized one of her sandals, went off with it, and bore it to Memphis, and, as King Psammeticus was administering justice, dropped it into his bosom. Psammeticus was struck with the form of the sandal, the elegance of its workmanship, and the zeal of the bird, so he issued an order to search through all Egypt for the person to whom the sandal belonged, and when he had found her he made her his wife."
> —Elian, xiii. 33.

This is very unlike the usual run of Charles Landseer's pictures. It is better than anything he has done for some time past. The drawing and design are both good, the incident well made out, and the colouring less uncertain than customary with this painter. The Egyptian character is well sustained.

366. "Esquisse sur la Mort de l'Archevêque de Paris, Juin, 1848." E. Delfosse.

"L'Archevêque, blessé, est soutenu par un insurgé: il est accompagné de deux Grands Vicaires. Des insurgés sont groupés autour de lui: un jeune homme est à genoux à ses pieds. Sur la gauche est le valet de chambre de l'Archevêque, aussi grièvement blessé. Sur la droite on voit des Membres de l'Assemblée Nationale retenus et conduits dans l'intérieure de la barricade par les insurgés. Dans le fond on aperçoit la Colonne de Juillet."

372. "Destruction of Idolatry in England." G. Patten, A.—(Engraved at page 357.)

374. "Passing Showers." T. Creswick, A. Partly in the late Mr. Constable's manner, and partly in Mr. Creswick's own. The artist has represented a fine open country, with that effect of sky and atmosphere which indicates showery weather. The foreground is capitally managed—rough, wild, and true to nature. The horseman hurrying along adds to the passing character of the changes pourtrayed. This, to our thinking, is Mr. Creswick's best work—better he has never been.

377. "Returning from Deer-Stalking—Urquhart Castle in the distance." A. Cooper, R.A. The horses, as is usual with this artist, unmistakeably good; the landscape indifferent.

378. "Subject from Tristram Shandy." A. Elmore, A.

> Leave we then the breeches in the tailor's hands, with my father standing by him with his cane, reading Bim, as he sat at work, a lecture upon the lotus clavus, and pointing to the precise part of the waistband where he was determined to have it sewed on.

Suggests a comparison with Leslie, but is wanting in humour, and even in character. The painting is quite as good as in the "Religious Controversy," by the same artist (No. 2.)

383. Compartment to the left: "Ferdinand declaring his love to Miranda." P. F. Poole, A.

384. Centre compartment: "The Conspiracy of Sebastian and Antonio." P. F. Poole, A.

385. Compartment to the right: "Ferdinand and Miranda discovered by Alonso, at the entrance to the cave, playing at chess." P. F. Poole, A. Three pictures in one frame—a triptych, as our antiquarian friends would call it. There is some good drawing throughout, and a good deal of Mulready's manner in which a severe style of art is attempted, and in some respects successfully.

389. "Auld Robin Gray." A. McInnes.

> They gied him my hand, but my heart was in the sea;
> And so Auld Robin Gray he was guidman to me.
> I had na been his wife a week but only four,
> When mourufu' as I sat on the stane at my door,
> I saw my Jamie's ghaist: I cou'd na think it he,
> Till he said, "I'm come hame, my love, to marry thee!"
> LADY ANNE LINDSAY.

A favourite subject, but Mr. McInnes has caught very little of the sentiment or inspiration of the song.

392. "The Solitary Pool." R Redgrave, A

> The half-uprooted ash,
> Dripping and bright, * * *
> Tinged yellow with the rich departing light,
> And haply basin'd in some unsunn'd cleft,
> A beauteous spring, the rock's collected tears,
> Sleeps shelter'd there, scarce wrinkled by the gale. COLERIDGE

This is a sweet passage in Coleridge. Mr. Redgrave has covered his pool with water lilies, and has led us, not unwillingly, into a very sweet spot.

397. "Innocence and Guilt." A Rankley.

> To woman's heart, when fair and free,
> Her sins seem great and manifold,
> When sunk in guilt and misery,
> No crime can then her soul behold.
> HOOD.

Another wonderful picture, by, we understand, a young man.—The scene is the interior of a country church. Innocence is pourtrayed in the meek devotion of the poorer people. Guilt, in the conversations of forgetfulness of the place, exhibited by a fashionable lady and gentleman. Some of the charity children in this picture are beautiful representations of real innocence and unaffected devotion.

404. "Sand-pits." J. Linnell. The best picture by this admirable landscape painter that we have seen for some time. Mr. Linnell has had Gainsborough in his eye—not to copy, but to emulate, as he has done in some portions of this picture most successfully.

405. J. Gilbert.

> Master and man alighted from the beasts, and, seating themselves at the foot of the trees, Sancho, who had his afternoon's collation that day, entered abruptly the gates of sleep. But Don Quixote, whose imagination, much more than hunger, kept him waking, could not close his eyes. On the contrary, he was hurried in thought to and from a thousand places.—Don Quixote, 2nd part.

This little incident in Don Quixote's history is well made out. The subdued yet warm tones of the picture is well imagined and sustained. We have engraved Mr. Gilbert's picture for our present paper, at page 349.

WEST ROOM.

407 "Wise and Foolish Builders," G. Harvey, is hung too high to be seen to advantage. Mr. Harvey is not a common artist, and deserves to be well treated.

414. "Autumn." G. Lance. A fruit piece—a companion to No. 418. We have seen Mr. Lance better than he is here.

> Whate'er the wintry frost
> Nitrous prepared, the various blossom'd spring
> Puts white promise forth, and summer sun
> Concocted —THOMSON

417. "The Shade of the Beech Trees." T. Creswick, A. This we have had engraved. The foliage of the beech is caught with the eye of a botanist, and rendered with the feeling of a painter. The composition is good.—Engraved at page 345.)

419. "Happy Hours—Italy as it was," W. D. Kennedy, is clever, very clever indeed in parts, and is neither like Watteau or Stothard, yet has much in common with what they felt and drew so admirably. The landscape portion of the picture is beautifully designed, but in parts is somewhat weak and insipid. We recollect the time when Mr. Kennedy could and did colour with as rich and juicy a pencil as Mr. Etty.

434. "Evangeline in the Church." C. Lucy. The expression on the face of the boy in the foreground, who is looking intently at Evangeline, deserves to be studied.

> Many a youth, as he knelt in the church and opened his missal, fixed his eyes on her, as the saint of his deepest devotion Vide LONGFELLOW'S Evangeline.

436. "A Fern Cave—a Scene in Mount's Bay, Cornwall." E. W. Cooke. Another of Mr. Cooke's delightful pictures. No painter understands ferns better than Mr. Cooke, or paints them half as well.

441. "Dover, from the Canterbury-road." J. Danby. This is by the son of Mr. Danby, the Associate. Mr. Danby, as we have noticed in several recent British Institute Exhibitions, has an eye sensibly alive to the solemn grandeur of landscape scenery.

442. "Monsieur de Lamartine—painted at Paris, May 1848." H. W. Phillips. A well-imagined portrait, and like; with a dignity of character proper to the man.

443. "The Return of Ulysses." J. Linnell.

> And first brought forth Ulysses' bed, and all
> That richly furnish'd it; he still in thrall
> Of all-subduing sleeps. Upon the sand
> They set him softly down; and then the strand
> They strew'd with all the goods he had, bestow'd
> By the renown'd Phæacians.
> 13th Book of Homer's Odyssey (Chapman's Translation.)

Not so good as the "Sand Pits" of the same artist, already noticed.

445. "Romance." E. V. Rippingille.

> There is a region, boundless as the sky;
> A thought-created world, exhaustless, rife
> With beings that know no decay, nor die,
> But ever fresh and young centuries life,
> Sustained by Fancy's bountiful supply,
> And all secure from earthlike change or strife.
> That world is thine ; commence! the bright ideal,
> Beautiful reflection of the real. Pictorial Scraps, by the Painter.

We recollect the time when great things were expected of Mr. Rippingille, and the Bristol people were angry with other people who could not see the many excellences of their favourite artist. This, we fear, will hardly justify the expectations that were raised aunut him.

447. E. Armitage.

Gilbert Becket, when a youngman, was made prisoner in Palestine while fighting for the Cross. After two years' captivity he was enabled (aided by the love and self-devotion of his captor's daughter) to make his escape, and return to London, where he soon became a man of great importance. The young Princess to whom he was indebted for his liberty, finding life insupportable without him, resolved to follow him; and, after a perilous journey through Europe, at last reached London. Her search for him was, however, fruitless, the only word she knew being Gilbert, the name of her beloved. She was followed about by crowds of women and children, their curiosity excited by her singular dress and appearance. At last, worn out with fatigue, she sat down on a stone which happened to be at the door of her beloved Gilbert. A crowd of children collected round her, some playing, others laughing at her. Here she was found by Gilbert, who, having easily converted her to Christianity, married her. She became the mother of the celebrated Thomas à Becket.—Thierry's History of the Norman Conquest.

It was Mr. Armitage who carried away the first prize at the first Westminster Hall Exhibition. This, however, is in a different style of art, and is good and full of thoughtfulness.

448. "A Girl with a Tambourine." S. A. Hart, R.A. An oval picture, seen lengthways. The colouring is rich, but hardly harmonious: time, however, may mellow it down into one subdued and perfect whole.

449. "St Peter and St. John healing the Sick." E. U. Eddis.

> Grant unto thy servants, that with all boldness they may speak thy word, by stretching forth thine hand to heal; and that signs and wonders may be done by the name of thy holy child Jesus —Acts, iv. 29, 30.

A large picture—the figures the size of life seen only to the knee. This is better than any scriptural subject we can call to mind by Benjamin West, and we know what West was thought of in his day.

455. "Mountain Scenery—North Wales. P. R. Lee, R.A., and T. S. Cooper, A. With the usual excellences of both artists.

461. "Surprice, the Winner of the Derby and St. Leger, 1848." A. Cooper, R.A. Painted with the care of one who understands the points and qualities of the horse. We have seldom seen a better horse-portrait than this. We are not, however, very ardent admirers of this class of Melton Mowbray art.

463. "The maids of Alcyna, the enchantress, endeavouring to tempt Rogero." F. R. Pickersgill, A.

> The second brings him wine on the other side,
> Heap'd him far more than he can drink in the night;
> But these enticements could not cause him bide.
> ARIOSTO'S Orlando Furioso (by Harrington).

Has merit, while it makes us sigh for Mr. Frost.

464. "A Torrent and Cascade in a mountainous country—Morning." R. R. Reinagle. By the late Royal Academician.

465. "The old Hall at Stiff key, near Wells, Norfolk, once the seat of, and built by, Sir Nicholas Bacon, Knight, Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal to Queen Elizabeth." H. Bright. Is not up to the mark of the expectations raised by some of Mr. Bright's recent landscapes.

471. "Lady Macbeth." A. Elmore, A.

> Hark! Peace! It was the owl that shriek'd,
> The fatal bellman which gives the stern'st good night.
> He is about it: the doors are open.—Act II., scene 2.

Will not advance Mr. Elmore's reputation. How few can

> Trade and traffic with Macbeth
> In riddles and affairs of death.

472. "On Hampstead Heath." G. Stanfield. By the son of Clarkson Stanfield, and with a portion of his father's spirit.

473. "Launce's Substitute for Proteus's Dog." A. L. Egg, A.

> Proteus. And what says she to my little jewel?
> Launce. Marry, she says, your dog was a cur: and tells you, currish thanks is good enough for such a present.
> Proteus. But she received my dog?
> Launce. No, indeed, she did not: here have I brought him back again.
> Proteus. What, didst thou offer her this from me?
> Launce. Ay, sir; the other squirrel was stolen from me by the sumpman's boys in the market-place; and then I offered her mine own; which is a dog as big as ten of yours, and therefore the gift the greater.

One of the best Shakspeare illustrations in the present Exhibition: full of character, and most admirably and honestly painted. Launce and his dog have noses very much alike.

474. "Malvolio in the Sun, practising behaviour to his own shadow; Maria, Fabian, Sir Toby Belch, and Sir Andrew Aguecheek in the background." J. C. Horsley.

> Maria. Get you all three into the box-tree: Malvolio is the walk through there [throws down a letter], for here comes the trout that must be caught with tickling.

We wish we could speak in praise of Mr. Horsley's Shakspeare illustration. The picture reminds us somewhat too closely of Mr. Maclise's treatment of the same subject.

479. "Landing a Salmon." F. R. Lee, R.A. The trees piled up on the left of the picture, above the banks of the river, are rich in effect and foliage.

481. "An Otter Lake, in North Wales." T. Danby. Full of solemn stateliness, but hung shamefully high.

483. "Mozart's Last Moments." H. N. O'Neil. This is so unlike Mr. O'Neil's former pictures, that we were willing to think, for some time, that the catalogue was in error. Mr. O'Neil has wrestled with his subject, and, in some respects, successfully, but it is not a picture that will add to his reputation.

> At two o'clock on the same day which was that of his death, he had been visited by some performers of Schickaneder's theatre, his intimate friends. The ruling passion was now strongly exemplified. He desired the score of the "Requiem" to be brought, and it was sung by his visitors round his bed, himself taking the alto part. They had proceeded as far as the first bars of the "Lacrymosa," when Mozart was seized with a violent fit of weeping.—Life of Mozart, by Holmes.

489. "The Outcast of the People." J. R. Herbert, R.A. This, by Mr. Herbert, has many admirers; but the sentiment, we fear, is more frequently supplied by the spectator, than found on the canvass supplied at hand by the artist.

> The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head.—St. Luke, ix. 58.

497. "Academy for Instruction in the Discipline of the Fan, 1711." A. Solomon.

> Mr. Spectator,—Women are armed with fans, as men with swords, and sometimes do more execution with them. To the end, therefore, that ladies may be entire mistresses of the weapon they bear, I have erected an academy for the training up of young women in the exercise of the fan, according to the most fashionable airs and motions that are now practised at Court. Vide Spectator, No. 102.

A picture in Mr. E. M. Ward's manner. It tells its own story, and is engraved among our Academy Illustrations.—(See front page.) It is hung too high to be seen well, but will be found to repay a stretch on tiptoe to see it.

496. "Moonlight off the Reculvers." C. Stanfield, R.A. Mr. Stanfield is here with a new effect. This admirable artist has never been seen to more varied advantage than in the Exhibition of the present year.

503. "A Dewy Morning"—Sir Robert Howard's duel of the stags, and battle, written in the year 1738. J. Ward, R.A. Sir Robert Howard was dead many years before 1738. Mr. Ward may have forgotten this—but that he has not lost much of his skill at the great age of eighty, is evident by this picture. We observe that in one corner he has put his name, and appended to it, "aged 80, 1849." Much of it has been painted with a magnifying glass.

> The mighty enemies now meet at length,
> With equal fury, though not equal strength;
> For now too late the conqueror did find
> That all was wasted in him but his mind.
> His courage in his weakness yet prevails,
> As a bold pilot steers with shatter'd sails
> Before his once scorned enemy he reels.
> His wounds increasing with the shame he feels
> The other's strength more from his weakness grows,
> And with one furious push his rival throws.

512. "Evening Scene in the Highlands." E. Landseer, R.A. A repetition of the "Challenge," with the slight difference of an evening effect. Our readers will remember the popular print by Mr. Landseer, under the name of the "Challenge." This is less to our liking.

513. J. Hollins, A.

> If music and sweet poetry agree,
> As they must needs, the sister and the brother,
> Then must the love be great 'twixt thee and me,
> Because thou lov'st the one, and I the other.
> Dowland to thee is dear, whose heavenly touch
> Upon the lute doth ravish human sense;
> Spenser to me, whose deep conceit is such,
> As, passing all conceit, needs no defence.
> Thou love'st to hear the sweet melodious sound
> That Phœbus' lute, the queen of music, makes;
> And I in deep delight am chiefly drown'd,
> When am himself to sing the lute makes.
> One God is god of both, as poet's feign;
> One knight loves both, and both in thee remain." —SHAKSPEARE.

The sentiment conveyed by the male and female figures in this picture is very happy. The landscape is poor.

514. "The Blackberry Gatherers," P. F. Poole, A., is a sort of distant imitation of Mulready's manner. The picture consist of three figures—an unsuccessarily tall female (the principal person in the picture) and a boy, who is giving a basket to a younger brother, in order that he may reach some of the blackberries, too high to be got at without such assistance.

517. "Bianca Capella." J. C. Hook.

> The young Bianca found her father's door,
> That door so often, with a trembling hand,
> So often then so lately left ajar,
> Shut; and, all terror, all perplexity
> Now by her lover urged, now by her love—
> Fled o'er the waters, to return no more.—ROGERS'S Italy.

518. "Serne near Veletri." W. Linton.

523. "Portrait of the Very Rev. John Lee, D.D., Principal of the University of Edinburgh, and Dean of the Chapel Royal." J. Watson Gordon, A. A three-quarter portrait, and a very thoughtful and manly one. The action, too, is, as far as we remember, unborrowed.

524. "The Rising Mist." T. S. Cooper, A.

530. "The Earl of Wilton." F. Grant, A. A kit-kat; dark and Titianesque.

531. "Morning, on the Banks of Zurich Lake, with Pilgrims Embarking on their way to Einsettlin." F. Danby, A. The most poetic picture in the whole Exhibition—a perfect triumph in landscape art: the effect of the morning light on the lake is a piece of complete pictorial deception. The rich light behind the trees and church tower is equally wonderful.

537. "Portrait of T. Richardson, Esq," J. P. Knight, R.A., stands in curious contrast to its companion picture, the "Portrait of the Earl of Wilton," already noticed.

543. "The Marquis of Granby." F. Grant, A. A three-quarter portrait. Excellent for its unconstrained attitude, and the nobleman quality of look which it indisputably bears. This is Mr. Grant's best picture in the present Exhibition.

544. "The quiet Lake." T. Creswick, A.

> So calm, the waters scarcely seem to stray.

Cows crossing on one side; a girl with a pitcher meeting them on the other. Richer in effect than is usual with this painter.

566. "Arthur and Eglè in the Happy Valley." J. Martin.

> Behold how alp on alp shuts out the scene
> From all the ruder world that lies afar:
> Deep, fathom deep, the valley which they screen,
> Deep as the chasms of cloud a happy star.
> Now as the night gently deepens round them, while
> Oft to the moon upturn their happy eyes—
> Still, hand in hand, they range the lulled isle,
> Air knows no breeze, scarce sighing to their sighs;
> No bird of night shrieks bode from drowsy trees,
> Nought lies between them and the Pleiades,
> Save where the moth strains to the moon its wing,
> Dancing the meshes near;—the prophet race
> Of the cold stars forewarned them not; the ring
> Of great Orion, who for the embrace
> Of Morn's sweet maid had died, looked calm above
> The last unconscious hours of human love.
> Each astral influence unrevealing shone
> O'er the dark web its solemn thread enwove:
> Mars shot no anger from his fatal throne,
> No Venus spoke trouble in the House of Love;
> Their closing path the treacherous smile illumed;
> And the stern star-kings kiss'd the brows they doom'd—
> 'Tis morn once more
> King Arthur, by SIR EDWARD BULWER LYTTON.

A blue expanse, with some of the excellences and all the defects of Mr. Martin's style.

568. "Portrait of a Gentleman." Mrs. W. Carpenter.

570. "Morning—St. Brelarde's Bay, Jersey." R. Leslie. By the son of the Royal Academician, and the best picture we have seen of his.

We must skip the forty pictures in the OCTAGON ROOM. It is unjust to artists for critics to condemn what they cannot see, and equally unjust to the public that they should praise under the same deprivation.

DRAWINGS AND MINIATURES.

In this room Sir William Ross and Mr. Thorburn reign supreme. Sir W. Ross excels in delicacy of finish and the general propriety of his details; Mr. Thorburn, in the way in which he adapts some received posture made popular by a great painter, and moulds it to his own uses. When we quote the catalogue, and refrain from comment, our readers must understand that we direct attention to what is worth seeing, while the opportunity for remark afforded by the several works is very slight indeed.

617. "Sir Thomas Gresham—enamel, after Sir Antonio More, in the collection of Joseph Neeld, Esq., M.P., &c." H. P. Bone.

625. "Enamel Portrait of Shakspeare, after the Chandos picture, by Burbage." W. Essex. This deserves examination; it is good. But the marvellous mezzotint from the same picture, by Mr. Cousins, which we have just seen, is still better.

630. "General Monk, Duke of Albemarle—enamel, after Walker, in the collection of the Earl of Craven, Combe Abbey, Warwickshire." H. P. Bone.

631. "Enamel of the infant Saviour—painted from the original picture in the National Gallery, by Murillo." W. Essex.

640. "Lutestring"—enamel on an illumination in the Library of Lambeth Palace. "Lutestring"—enamel from a picture in Lambeth Palace. H. P. Bone. The portrait of Caxton at Lambeth is now ascertained not to be Caxton.

643. "Sir Henry T. De la Beche, C.B., Director-General of the Geological Surveys of the United Kingdom, F.R.S., &c. &c."—enamel, from life. H. P. Bone.

647. "Medallion of W. R. Hamilton, Esq, F.R.S., F.S.A." R. C. Lucas.

652. "Head of the Virgin"—enamel, after Guido, in the collection of Joseph Neeld, Esq., M.P., &c. &c. H. P. Bone.

656. "Enamel Portrait of the Right Hon. Lady Nugent"—painted from the original picture by Sir Thomas Lawrence, P.R.A. W. Essex.

662. "Portrait of the Lady Clementina Villiers, in a costume worn at the Fête at Fulham, on the 19th July, 1848." J. B. Swinton.

678. "Mrs. Mowatt, the American authoress and actress." Emily Anne Scott.

695. "Portrait of the Rev. W. Kirby, M.A., F.R.S., F.L.S., President of the Entomological Society, &c., in his ninetieth year." F. H. Bischoff.

708. "Medal of Hogarth—executed for the Art-Union of London." L. Wyon. This, by Mr. Leonard Wyon, the son of Mr. William Wyon, R.A., is very good.

710. "Colonel Thomas Wood." R. Thorburn, A.

714. "Portrait of the Viscountess Jocelyn." J. R. Swinton.

722. "The Wife and Family of H. W. Eaton, Esq." R. Thorburn, A. A large vignette-shaped picture; excellent in point of execution.

725. "Viscount Encombe, son of the Earl and Countess of Eldon. Miss G. C. Stewart.

727. "Mrs. H. S. Leigh Hunt and Child." Miss Augusta Cole.

734. "Mrs. Webb." Sir W. C. Ross, R.A.

738. "The Earl of Macclesfield and his Grandson." R. Thorburn, A. The old Earl, in his robes, is leaning over his grandson. The contrast between age and youth is happily sustained.

751. "Sir Thomas Wilde, Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas." Sir W. C. Ross, R.A.

752. "Mrs. Graham." T. Carrick.

755. "The Viscountess Newport." R. Thorburn, A.

771. "Portrait of Mrs. Moon." W. F. Cunningham.

764. "Portrait of the late Lord Auckland." Miss Zeigler.

767. "His Grace the Duke of Marlborough." Sir W. C. Ross, R.A.

768. "Portrait of Mrs. Marshall." Sir W. Newton.

769. "Lieutenant-Colonel the Honourable F. Grosvenor Hood." T. Carrick.

770. "Portrait of a Lady:" painted in 1838. A. E. Chalon, R.A.

771. "Portrait of Montague, the third son of Charles Barron, Esq." Sir W. Newton.

772. "His Grace the Duchess of Marlborough, Lady Louisa Spencer, and Lord Almaric Churchill." Sir W. C. Ross, R.A. Sir Wm. Ross's largest and best enamel. It is in every way the gem of the room. Hilliard, Isaac Oliver, Petitot, or Zincke were never better. The Duchess is in blue velvet.

778. "Miss Blackiston." T. Carrick.

779. "Portrait of the Right Hon. Sir George Clerk, Bart." Sir W. Newton.

781. "Portrait of Herbert, the second son of Charles Barron, Esq." Sir W. Newton.

782. "Mrs. Sigmund Rucker." Sir W. C. Ross, R.A.

795. "The Right Rev. the Bishop of Carlisle." R. Thorburn, A. A full-length of the Bishop seated in his library.

806. "The Marchioness of Ely." Sir W. C. Ross, R.A.

815. "Oswyn Cresswell, Esq., and Son." Sir W. C. Ross, R.A. He has two dogs by his side.

819. "——Webb, Esq." Sir W. C. Ross, R.A.

825. "Portrait of Josephine and Brodie, daughter and son of Mr. and Mrs. De Zuluéta." Miss R. Raimbach.

827. "Portrait group—George Mould, Esq., Mrs. Mould, and their Son." T. Carrick.

828. "Lady Elizabeth Lawley." R. Thorburn, A.

832. "Mrs. Herbert Ashton." Miss Augusta Cole.

834. "Lieutenant-Colonel Henry Jones, Chairman of the Board of Public Works, Dublin." R. Thorburn, A.

843. "Portrait of Sir Thomas Marryon Wilson, Bart." Sir W. Newton.

845. "The Right Hon. Lady Burghley." W. Egley.

848. "Portrait of F. D. P. Astley, Esq." R. Thorburn, A.

854. "Portrait of John Cooper, Esq, of Drury-lane Theatre." S. J. Stump.

858. "The Burial of Isabella." J. A. Vinter.

> "No heart was there in Florence but did mourn
> In pity of her love, so overcast."—Vide conclusion of Keats' Isabella.

Mr. Vinter, like Mr. Millais, has gone with the same good taste to Keat's poem, but not with the same skill.

860. "Sketch of the general effect of a fresco intended to represent the Knights of the Round Table about to depart on the quest of the Sti. Greal." W. Dyce, R.A. This should be carefully examined, as Mr. Dyce has a handsome annuity from the Government for the express purpose of enabling him to do full justice to the story of King Arthur. A room in the New Houses of Parliament has been set apart for this story. There is great merit in this design, and it promises well for the general result.

> "Alas," said King Arthur unto Sir Gawaine, "ye have nigh slain me with the vow and promise that ye have made: for through you, ye have bereft me of the fairest fellowship, and the truest of knighthood, that ever were seen together in any realm of the world; for when they shall depart from hence, I am sure that all shall never meet more in this world, for there shall many die in the quest."
> And therewith the tears fell from his eyes, and he said, "Sir Gawaine, Sir Gawaine, ye have set me in great sorrow, for I have great doubt that my true fellowship shall never meet more here again."—Mort d'Arthur.

867. "Water-colour Portrait of William Essex, Esq." W. B. Essex.

903. "Cartoon of Griselda, painted in fresco in the New Houses of Parliament." C. W. Cope, R.A.

> He spoke no more, but up the child he hent
> Dispiteously, and gan a chere to make
> As though he wolde have slaine it ere he went;
> Griseldis all must suffer and consent,
> And as a lamb she stilith meke and still,
> And let this cruel sergeant do his will.—CHAUCER.

No. 117 is a coloured sketch for this cartoon. We have engraved the sketch in our Supplement of this week. The great merit of the cartoon is the simple way in which the story is told.

909. "Portrait of Miss Helen Faucet—a Sketch." F. M. Burton.

910. "Portrait of Mrs. Gardiner." A. E. Chalon, R.A.

912. "The late Charles Fox, Esq., Engraver." W. Carpenter, jun.

916. "The First Voyage." W. Mulready, R.A. A red chalk drawing, and very masterly in point of design.

920. "Maternal Instruction—Portrait of Miss Mitchell." A. E. Chalon, R.A.

934. "Portrait of Clarkson Stanfield, Esq., R.A." A. E. Chalon, R.A. A very excellent likeness of our great landscape painter.

936. "Battle of Meanee—an outline drawn under the inspection of General Sir Charles Napier, G.C.B." G. Jones, R.A. A pen and ink outline, and valuable as a map or muster roll of the battle.

Sir Charles Napier is with his staff on the bank of the dry bed of the Fulaili River, on the edge of a nullah, or wa erecourse, where parties of the 22d are attacking the Beloochees hand to hand, led by Major M'Murdo. The right and the centre of the 22d are firing from the bank, flanked by the artillery on the right; one gun is pe rcei ving a breach in the wall, and further up the val le is the breach defended by Captain Tew's company. The 12th 25th, and Native Infantry are coming into action with the 9th Bengal Cavalry and Scinde Horse. The Beloochee army descends the dry bed of the river, and extends, in enormous masses, in front of the British force. The officers introduced are General Sir Charles Napier, Colonel Wa rrington, Colonel M'Leod, Colonel Pennefather, wounded, carried to the rear; Major Wylie, Major Outram, Lieutenant Breeman, Lieutenant Polly, Lieutenant Thompson, Dr. Gibbon, and Ali Akbar, the interpreter Lieutenant, now Major, M'Murdo is fighting with Khan Mohamed, whom he killed.

944. "Norma of the Fitful Head relating the history of her life to Minna and Brenda." C. H. Stanley.

947. "Portrait of Professor Leslie, R.A." A. E. Chalon, R.A. Very like.

948. "Mrs. Laurie." F Cruickshank. The wife of the City Pleader, and niece to Sir Peter Laurie.

950. "Chantrey sitting in his studio by the stove at twilight, whilst engaged upon the equestrian statue of George IV. and the colossal bust of Sir Francis Chantrey." G. Jones, R.A. Mr. Jones has written Sir Frances Chantrey's life, and will, it is said, publish it shortly. We trust he holds the pen better than the pencil.

955. "Portrait of Master William Arthur Tooke, son of Arthur W. Tooke, Esq." J. Hayter.

960. "Shylock refusing thrice the amount of his bond, rather than forego the condition on which it was signed by Antonio." C. H. Lear. —(Engraved at page 360.)

971. "Whalley Lancastire, looking over Ribblesdale, from the grounds of John Taylor, Esq., at Moreton Hall." J. D. Harding.

985. "Portrait of Mrs. Valentine Bartholomew." J. Sharling.

992. "Portrait of George Lance, Esq." A. Stansfby. A good likeness of the best painter of fruit this country has yet seen.

993. "W. H. Carpenter, Esq." Mrs. W. Carpenter. An excellent portrait of the worthy keeper of the prints in the British Museum.

994. "Norwich, from Mousehold Heath." W. Westall, A.

998. "The Lady Clementina Villiers"—from the drawing by James Swinton, Esq. R. J. Lane, A.R.

999. "The Lady Clementina Villiers"—from the drawing by James Swinton, Esq. R. J. Lane, A.R.

1102. "Imperial Insurance Office:" interior view, entering from the corner of Threadneedle-street and Bread-street; from the designs and under the superintendence of G. A. Young.

1103. "Imperial Insurance Office:" interior view, principal staircase, as intended by design of G. A. Young.

SCULPTURE.

THE principal work in the Sculpture Room (or cell, as it should be called) is Mr. Baily's marble group of the Three Graces.

1196. Marble group: "A Nymph of Diana taking a Thorn from a Grey hound's Foot." R. J. Wyatt.

1117. "Cupid and Psyche," basso relievo, in marble. P. MacDowell, R.A.

1128. "Statue," in marble, of the late Countess of Elgin; to be placed in the Cathedral of St. Paul's. J. Steell.

1199. "Eve"—a model. P. M'Dowell, R.A.

His words replete with guile.
Into her heart too easy entrance won.
Fix'd on the fruit she gazed, which to behold
Might tempt alone; and in her ears the sound
Yet rung of his persuasive words, impregn'd
With reason, to her seeming, and with truth:
O sight
Pausing awhile—to herself she mused—Paradise Lost, book ix.

1202. J. H. Foley.

Beside, his grass-clad grave she kneels to mourn,
And thinks of days that never can return.

1204. "Marble Statue of Sir William Follett, M.P., Q.C." W. Behnes. Rather heavy, a fault common with the portrait statues of this artist —witness his "Dr. Babington" in St Paul's.

1205. "Marble statue—the startled nymph." W. Behnes.

1208. "Statue of the late John Flaxman, Esq., P.S.R.A." E. H. Baily, R.A. Very inferior in design, execution, and even likeness, to the fine statue in marble by the late Mr. M. L. Watson, which a committee, consisting of Mr. Rogers the poet, Mr. Eastlake the painter, &c., is about to erect to the memory of our great sculptor.

1209. "Group, in marble, of the Graces." E. H. Baily, R.A.

1210. "The Grecian Maid." W. C. Marshall, A.

Mother! sweet mother! it is true,
I cannot now the shafts e
That youth is in my heart and b
And Venus' kindling fires within me glow.
Fragment of Sappho.

1212. "Silvia and the Wounded Fawn." T. Earle. Mr. Earle was one of Sir F. Chantrey's pupils; but his heart has always been with the poetry of sculpture.

The bleeding creature leaves from the floods
Possess'd with fear, and seeks her known abodes,
His old familiar hearth, and household gods.
He falls: his fills the house with heavy groans,
Implores their pity, and his pain bemoans.
Young silvia hears her breast, and cries aloud
For succour.—VIRGIL'S Æneid.

1213. "Statue of Thomas Campbell, to be erected in Poet's Corner, Westminster Abbey." W. C. Marshall, A.

When wrapt in fire the realms of ether glow,
And heaven's artillery thunder shakes the world below;
Then, undismay'd, shall o'er the ruins smile,
And light the lamp of Nature's funeral pile.—The Pleasures of Hope.

Simple and dignified. We are sorry to hear that the subscription for this statue is so insufficient that the artist is likely to be out of pocket by his work.

1214. "The Infant Bacchus—a portrait, to be executed in marble." E. H. Baily, R.A.

1215. "Venus." J. Legrew.

"A little winged serpent, see,
Has pierced me, that men call a bee."
But she answer'd, "If the s ing,
Love, of such a puny thing,
Thus afflict thee, what must be
The pain of others stung by thee?"—Anacreon, Ode 40.

1216. "Sabrina." T. M. Miller.

1.1.. "Lurydice." L. Macdonald.

1218. "Zephyr and Aurora." W. C. Marshall, A.

1219. "The Earl of Arundel"—a statue, to be executed in bronze, for the new Palace of Westminster. W. F. Woodington. The Earl of Arundel was the great collector of works of art in the time of James I. and Charles I.

1222. "Ante-relievo"—part of a monument to the memory of two children. W. Theed.

1223. "Rachel." J. Fillans.

1224. "The Statue of General Nott," to be cast in bronze, and erected at Caermarthen. R. Davis.

1225. "Marble Statue of a Lady." T. Campbell.

1226. "Monumental Figures of the late Samuel Whitbread, Esq., M.P., and Lady Elizabe h Whitbread," to be placed in Cardington Church, Bedfordshire. H. Weekes.

1227. "A Grace." L. Macdonald.

1228. "Statue of the late Charles Norris, Esq., of the East India Company's Civil Service," to be erected by his friends in the Cathedral of Bombay. W. Theed.

1229. "Model of a colossal statue of the late Sir James Shaw, Bart.," executed in marble for the subscribers, and placed at the Cross of Balmarnock. J. Fillans.

1231. "The Hours and the Horses of the Sun." J. Gibson, R.A. Very classical in feeling and execution.

1232 "Model of a Monument to William Cowper, to be erected in Poets' Corner, Westminster Abbey. The bas-relief represents Cowper in his study with Mrs. Unwin and Lady Austen." W. C. Marshall, A. Cowper deserve to have had a monument in Westminster Abbey before this. We are glad, however, seeing Mr. Marshall's excellent design for the monument, that the honour has been deferred so long.

1233. "Monument to the Memory of the late Right Hon. Sir John Bayley, Baron of the Exchequer." E. B. Stephens.

1234. "The Lord Bishop of Norwich, D.D., F.R.S., F.L.S." W. Behnes. Very like. Mr. Behnes is by far the best of our bust sculptors.

1235 "Sir Felix Booth, Bart., F.R.S." W. Behnes.

1236. "A Colossal Bust, in marble, of the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of London." M. Noble.

1256. "Marble Bust of Mary, eldest daughter of the Right Hon. Henry Labouchere." C. Moore.

1257. "Marble Bust (posthumous) of the late Lord Abinger." H. Weekes.

1258. "Innocence"—a statuette. J. H. Foley.

1267. "Charles Barry, Esq., R.A." W. Behnes.

1270. "Bust of Samuel Warren, F.R.S., author of 'Ten Thousand a Year,' and 'Diary of a Late Physician.'" H. Weigall.

1271. "Marble Bust of Viscountess Castlereagh." G. G. Adams.

1272. "Monumental Bust to Lieutenant-Colonel Sir George Gipps, late Governor of New South Wales," to be placed in Canterbury Cathedral. H. Weekes.

1274 "Marble Bust of the Right Hon. Sir James Wigram, Vice-Chancellor." J. Durham.

1276. "Ruth and Naomi." J. R. Kirk.

1277. "Portrait of the late Lawrence, Esq." C. Moore.

1278. "Portrait of Mrs. W. Banks." Mr. A. Munro. A novelty of the kind, and one that augurs well for the sculptor's powers.

1279. "Marble Bust of Lord Walpole." L. Macdonald.

1280. "Marble Bust of Major-General Sir Harry Smith, G.C.B." G. G. Adams.

1281. "Marble Bust of Louisa, youngest daughter of the Right Hon. Henry Labouchere." C. Moore.

1282. "Marble Bust of Sir John Jervis, her Majesty's Attorney-General." E. Davis.

1283. "Marble Bust of Viscount Castlereagh." G. G. Adams.

1284. "J. L. Donaldson, Esq., Professor of Architecture in University College, London." J. Dobson. Teaches what to avoid in bust sculpture—shirt-collars and eye-glasses.

1285. "Bust of Sir Charles Lemon, Bart." N. N. Burnard.

1286. "Cuvier." J. Durham.

1287. "Marble Bust of his Grace the Duke of Wellington." H. Weigall.

1288. "A Girl Reading"—a Statue in Marble. P. MacDowell, R.A. A charming study of the same exquisite female figure which brought Mr. MacDowell into notice and into the Royal Academy.

1289. "Bust of the Right Hon. Knight Bruce, Vice-Chancellor." J. Durham.

1315. "Bust, in Marble, of a Lady." E. H. Baily, R.A.

1317. "Bust, in Marble, of James Matheson, Esq., M.P." W. C. Marshall.

1318. "Marble Bust of Lady Clementina Villiers." L. Macdonald.

1319. "Bust, in Marble, of the late Francis Baily, Esq."—(Presented by subscription to the Royal Astronomical Society). F. H. Baily, R.A. Very like the great astronomer.

1321. "Bust of Peter Finnie, Esq." H. Weigall.

1322. "Sir Claudius Smith." C. Blacker.

1323. "Sir Henry Lawrence—a bust." T. Campbell.

1324. "Bust of Lord Colchester Townshend." R. Westmacott, R.A. elect.

1342. "Marble Bust of Mrs. George Forbes." H. Weekes.

1343. "Marble Bust (posthumous) of the late Professor MacCullagh, LL.D., F.T.C.D., M.R.I.A." &c. Executed for Trinity College, Dublin. C. Moore.

1344. "Marble Bust (posthumous) of the Right Hon. C. Buller, Master of Bankruptcy, and late President of the Poor-law Board." H. Weekes.

1345 "Bust (posthumous) of the late Lord Wharncliffe, Lord President of the Council." R. Westmacott, R.A. elect.

1346. "Marble Bust of the Countess of Clarendon." C. Moore.

1347. "Marble Bust of his Excellency the Earl of Clarendon, K.G., G.C.B., Lord-Lieutenant General and Governor-General of Ireland." C. Moore.

1336. "Marble Bust of Thomas Hunt, Esq., author of the System for Stammering." Subscribed for, and presented to him, by his pupils, in testimony of his services of twenty-two years. J. Durham.

1337. "A bust of Sir David Davies, K.C.H., Physician in Ordinary to her Majesty the Queen Dowager." H. Weigall.

1341. "Musidora." J. Thomas. By the excellent sculptor the several statues, busses, &c., in the new Houses of Parliament.

And fair exposed she stood, shrunk from herself
With fainy b ing at the doubtful breeze,
Alarm'd and starting like the fearful fawn.
Vide THOMSON'S Seasons.

1341. "The Monument to the memory of Bishop Davies, of St. Davids, the first translator of the Testament into Welsh, in the reign of Elizabeth" executing in marble, by order of the Bishop of St. David's, and to be erected in Abergwili Church, near Caermarthen. E. Davis.

LITERATURE OF THE PAST YEAR.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

WE are often apt, without consideration, to judge erroneously of contemporary literature. A comparison between a well-selected collection of dead authors, and a mass of books heaped up on the bookseller's counter, by living writers, is not much to the advantage of the latter. We forget that we take from old authors only the best works; while of modern authors we have the entire heap of writings, without any distinction between bad and good. We are persuaded that if the forgotten works of a century ago were fairly examined, they would be found to consist of a much larger proportion of matter utterly valueless, than in the works of the present day, which, like them, are destined to oblivion. More than this, we believe the proportion of books which will stand the test of time, to be greater now-a-days. We may consider the epoch of English literature to have lasted for three hundred and fifty years: are there twice three hundred and fifty works that we care to remember? More, perhaps, if we take class works, and such as contain particular interest for particular readers. But of works that are of importance to the general student, we doubt if seven hundred could be named which would be seriously missed. Any year, then, which produces two works likely to be read by posterity, may be fairly said to be of average excellence.

These are not days for literary excitement. So much happens daily around us—we have been so familiar with wonders—our attention is distracted by so many different subjects, that we never fall into extacies about anything. Least of all, are we likely to suffer ourselves to be put out of the way by literary wonders. In the palmy days of the Edinburgh and Quarterly, the conversation in every man's mouth was the tone, temper, and ability of the last review. Literary criticism was a subject alike for the drawing-room and the club. Now, who asks, except on rare occasions, which is the grand article in the last Quarterly? Railroads and revolutions have put the finishing stroke to this sort of excitement, which had been gradually declining for many years past.

It thus happens that in the past twelve months we feel that the world has been very little agitated by any book that has been presented to it; and we might conclude hastily that the literary merits of the twelvemonth had been under the average. Yet how far is this from being really the case. Of works that will live, we have a full average, and those, too, of the highest order of literature. We will not anticipate our detailed criticism on the great works of the year by more than a mention of one or two, which are alone sufficient to stamp it with honour. Macaulay's History of England will stand beside the most important works in English literature. Grote's History of Greece is another great work on the highest of literary subjects, which, though not belonging exclusively to the year, still in part belongs to it. Of the adjuncts to history, those important publications which are the foundation of the historian's labour. The Fairfax and Castlereagh Correspondence are of first-rate importance. Amidst the writings of fiction, the greatest of living novelists has given us what, in some respects, is the greatest of his productions. Bulwer's Harold will always stand in the very first rank of works of fiction. In literary biographies, compiled in every instance from sources the most authentic and interesting, the twelvemonth has been peculiarly rich. The lives of Campbell, Lamb, Keats, and Hook have all been written in such a manner as to become the standard biographies of their respective subjects. Future writers may adapt or abridge, but these works will always be the foundation of their labours.

Science alone has not contributed its part to the interest of the year. Some of our first scientific names appear on the list of contributors—Somerville, Chambers, and several others; but the works they have produced have, it must be confessed, comparatively a minor importance.

We will not particularise further; but we must observe that almost every man of eminence amongst our literary writers has done something of importance within the year. Ainsworth, James, Talfourd, Dickens, Thackeray, Gore, Trollope, and Bell, have all worked with success for the public advantage. In the smaller publications, most of our great political names, who ever write at all, are to be found at the head of some treatise or pamphlet; while there is not a question amongst the multifarious list of modern enquiries, that has not been examined with more than ordinary care in the publications of the year.

We believe, then, that much interest cannot fail to attach itself to the analytical examination of the books published during the last twelve months, which we proceed to give in some detail.

HISTORICAL LITERATURE.

MACAULAY'S History of England.—English literature has been enriched, during the past twelve months, with a "model" History. Mr. Macaulay, the disciple and critic of Fox and Mackintosh, has commenced the adventurous task of filling up the outline they had faintly sketched, and of completing the gigantic historical work which both those writers successively undertook, but left fragmentary and unfinished at their deaths. The two volumes already published by Mr. Macaulay promise nobly for the future whole. With the energy and the leisure which the author now possesses, and the ample materials at his command, readers will hope he may retain, a finished work little inferior to anticipated, to which the range of English literature will hardly offer a parallel. Even as they stand, the already published volumes are epically complete. They furnish a rapid, but admirably drawn, sketch of the earlier stages of our country's history; and then, expanding into full and brilliant detail with the closing scenes of Charles II., carry us on to the termination of the struggle between the last bigotted Stuart and his people, until the curtain falls on the eventful 13th of February, 1688, when, amidst all the pageantry of the Plantagenets, and with the most scrupulous observance of all old forms and etiquette, a new race of Sovereigns, introducing new ideas and confirming new rights and liberties to Englishmen, was solemnly inaugurated. Histories—politics, social, and military—had appeared in multitudes before, but none written as Mr. Macaulay writes, or inspired with his genius. Even in its idea and plan, his work differs from all its predecessors. Many of the previous Histories were minute in detail, prepared with vast labour and research, and claiming, sometimes sincerely, the most perfect impartiality. But the spirit of the chronicler prevailed too much, even when the spirit of the partisan had been most carefully exorcised. The history of every reign or era was narrated according to the idea of that era; being prepared out of contemporary materials, very laboriously sifted or selected, but bearing still the impress of antiquity, and the narrow range of philosophy inevitable to writers whose ideas were little if anything in advance or the times concerning which they wrote. Mr. Macaulay, on the contrary, writes of the seventeenth century as a politician and philosopher of the nineteenth should write. He treats of them as a superior, entitled to judge of right and wrong, of motive and result. Looking down from the altitude of nearly two centuries, he is able to trace the intricate course of those long-past events through their most mysterious windings, but with a constant perception of those links which bind the past to the present, and deducing always from the causes which were then in greatest activity, the consequences of political freedom and social greatness wherein we are now partakers. The work furnishes an admirable proof of the power of genius to confer a contemporary interest upon the records of the past, without sacrificing the dignity or violating the impartiality requisite for the historian. If we endeavour to express in one word the leading idea which pervades the history of this Glorious Revolution, we should say that it is Conservatism. The author is a true Whig, and inculcates in his History, as in all other of his writings, genuine Whig principles. He has, moreover, been very bitterly criticised by Tory reviewers. Yet his view of the facts, and his deductions from the result of the unhappy reign of James II., is eminently Conservative. The Rebellion of 1688 differs from all that have succeeded it among other nations of Europe, in that the Nation had never lost what other people have violently endeavoured to regain. The limited Monarchies of the thirteenth century changed elsewhere, he relates, into absolute Despotisms. Surrounded by their pomp but glittering courtiers, and supported by vast permanent armies, the Sovereigns of France reigned in uncontrolled authority. In England, we enjoyed the blessing of accomplishing our revolutions while our Monarchy was still limited and our liberties still defined in law, and remembered in action. All that was necessary to secure our full possession of freedom was to revive and reproclaim the rights that had been for ages vested in every Englishman, and to reform and change the corrupt practices and bad men that had crept into the Executive. We repeat this necessary operation almost every year, in a greater or less degree. In 1688 the change in the Executive comprehended its head and Sovereign; but the Constitution received no shock, and the genius of all our British institutions remained absolutely unchanged. The consequence has been, the stability of our Government, while the storm swept away the proudest and oldest Monarchies.

Mr. Macaulay has been accused of partiality, and the charge has been supported by the traces of bias towards certain principles and parties throughout the course of his work. The proof is far too feeble to substantiate the allegation. Every writer must in some degree possess and exhibit his individual predilections, and the historian, perhaps, most of any. None but the merest chronicler can avoid the manifestation of bias: it is inevitable to all his attempts at clothing with warm and glowing life the dry bones of historical narrative. But there is a great difference between bias and partiality. All that can be asserted of Mr. Macaulay is, that, in narrating the innumerable incidents of the struggle carried on by the Whigs of James the Second's time against the various approaches of tyranny and bigotry, he has exhibited a somewhat too fervid admiration for the patriots, and occasionally manifested blame so severely as they deserved the lapses from virtue or consistency of which few or none could be entitled wholly innocent. This is not inexcusable. Mr. Macaulay writes English history as a descendant, and not an alien, of English blood. He, too, is one of the heirs of British greatness and freedom, and cannot always repress his gratitude to the forefathers whose sufferings and labours, if not invariably free from the taint of self, have, at all events, amassed and handed down to the present generation its magnificent inheritance.

The work has been reprinted in several forms, and at various prices, in America, where it has excited not less interest than in England. The transatlantic publication has, moreover, called forth no little controversy, but differing from the Tory strictures passed upon the book

[HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

In the week prior to the opening of each year's Exhibition to the public, the Royal Academy is honoured by a visit from the Sovereign. This year the day was Thursday, May 3, when her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert arrived in Trafalgar-square at three o'clock, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, and attended by the Marchioness of Douro, Lady Caroline Somers Cocks, Hon. Matilda Paget the Earl Fortescue, the Marquis of Breadalbane, the Duke of Norfolk, the Marquis of Abercorn, the Earl of Morley, Captain the Hon. J. Denman, Captain Francis Seymour, General Wemyss, and Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. Alexander Gordon.

The officers of the Royal Academy received the Queen and Prince Albert, and conducted her Majesty and his Royal Highness through the different schools. The Queen and the Prince remained until a quarter before five o'clock in the Exhibition, and then returned to the Palace.

THE BANQUET.

The Annual Dinner of the Royal Academy takes place in the Great, or East Room. It is given on the first Saturday in May, and on the following Monday the Exhibition opens. The great gilt chandelier in this room was a present to the Royal Academy from George IV.; and on the first day of its use (at the annual dinner), the links slackened, from the great weight attached to them, and the chandelier descended with a fearful crash, on a sort of gigantic dumb waiter, on which were arranged the quantity of wine-glasses, decanters, &c., necessary for the accommodation of so large a company.

The banquet took place on Saturday, the 5th instant, and was attended by a numerous assemblage of guests of the first rank and talent, among whom were—the Archbishop of Canterbury; the Lord Chancellor; the Lord President of the Council; First Lord of the Treasury; Lord Privy Seal; Secretaries of State for the Home, Foreign, and Colonial Departments; the Secretary at War; the Commander of the Forces; First Lord of the Admiralty; Lord Chamberlain; Lord Steward; the Speaker; Treasurer of the Navy; First Commissioner of the Land Revenues; President of the Board of Trade; Chancellor of the Exchequer; the French and Turkish Ambassadors; the Danish, Swedish, Belgian, Sicilian, American, and Prussian Ministers; Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas; Master of the Rolls; Lord Chief Baron; Vice-Chancellor of England; Attorney and Solicitor-General; the Lord Mayor; Governor of the Bank; Chairman of the East India Company; Chairman of the Board of Customs; Master and Warden of Dulwich College; President of the Society of Antiquaries; Presidents of the Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons; Dukes of Northumberland Bedford. Rutland Newcastle, Argyll, Beaufort; Marquisses of Anglesea, Westminster, Northampton, Granby, Waterford, Worcester; [illegible] Vernon Harcourt, [illegible] Sir J. Graham, T. B. Macaulay, W. E. Gladstone, Sydney Herbert; the Hon. F. Charteris; Justice Coleridge; Colonel Douglas Fennant, &c.

in England, inasmuch as the dispute has turned, not upon the principles of the volumes, but their spelling. The first American publishers who undertook to reprint the History, and who were favoured with proof-sheets from the London publishers—so that the publication took place in both countries almost simultaneously—adopted the system of spelling commended in Webster's Dictionary, a standard book in the United States, but formed upon a fashion which has been half a century obsolete on this side the Atlantic. Thence arose an outcry of falsification and even insult to the author, urged by the interest of rival publishers, who rapidly advertised their reprints as verbatim et literatim copies of the London work. The quarrel grew hot, and was at last referred to the author himself, who politely acknowledged the imputation attributed to his volumes, but begged that the American edition might be presented in the form most acceptable to Americans. This, it was declared, was throwing contempt upon the whole controversy, which is not improbable.

Miss Martineau follows Mr. Macaulay upon the ground of English history, and is even bolder in the period she has selected for elucidation. The History of England during the Thirty Years' Peace treats of times within the memory of many living, and cannot with correctness or strong bitterness be hardly past from the hearts and lips of the disputants. The History, however, resembles the one we have just quitted, in being the history of a people, not of an army. Progress, and not military glory, is the element of greatest importance through its pages; and it treats of them in a style at once popular and picturesque. Like Macaulay's great work, it is unfinished. Five instalments are at present issued, bringing down the narrative to the death of George the Fourth—exactly half-way between the peace of 1815 and the proposed termination of the series in 1845. The authoress's peculiar opinions on religious subjects are tolerably well known, and lend an occasional colouring to the historical narrative. But it is overborne by her earnest sympathies with the advance of anew edge and social happiness, and the far-spread philosophy which traces their connexion. Like Macaulay, she finds from victories of peace that far transcend in importance the victories of war.

A third volume of Wilson's History of British India has appeared within the year. Commencing where Mr. Mill broke off, in 1805, Professor Wilson promises to carry on the history of our magnificent Eastern Empire down to the year 1845. A great change had been accomplished in the system of British administration in India between the periods when these successive historians pitched their tents. Anterior to 1805, the English policy was that of conquest and plunder: Clive, Hastings, Wellesley, and other Governors-General and military chiefs, conquered, fired, security, and afterwards dominion, for the European traders. The frontier of the company's empire was gradually pushed northwards and westwards; until the area that owned allegiance to the merchant-monarchs of Leadenhall-street, more than equalled the surface of the whole continent of Europe. During that period, individuals who occupied even the most subordinate posts under the Company, enjoyed frequent opportunities of amassing wealth out of the spoils of conquered provinces. Incredible riches poured into England with every Eastern fleet; and the whole was jealously distributed among a comparatively few individuals. Monopoly ruled everywhere. On the coast, the mercantile scenes of profit were locked against all who did not belong to the brotherhood of the India House. In the interior, officials, bearing commissions from the same omnipotent Board, were becoming millionaires by the more summary process termed "shaking the Pagoda Tree." Between the two, a new class of society was formed—the East Indian Nabobs, who returned from the tropics to supply new characters for farces on the stage, and to make the fortunes of the Cheltenham trade-men. In the period treated of by Professor Wilson, it began to be understood that India, to continue profitable, must be managed on a different system than had heretofore obtained. Extensions of territory, accompanied by new wars, were found not to answer, even when the profits of pill-pot forts and armoured Rajahs was taken into the account. The country, in short, must be governed sacrificially, and not embarked in any European farm. Under this view, the condition of its ryots became a matter of importance. Their interests, therefore, were elevated in the scale of society. Laws were made for them, conferring equal rights with those enjoyed by the European; and it is to say nothing of these particulars which the native manners and habits rendered necessary. Of this gradual improvement, the Professor has to treat. The narrative is less exciting than that of military adventure, which had gone before; but the philosopher and the patriot may find in it a deeply interesting record of social progress and civilisation. The present volume ends with the expiration of the last Charter of the India Company. The detail of the consequences resulting from the opening of the India trade; and the romantic vicissitudes of war-fare in Cabul, Affghanistan, and Scinde, are to follow in due time.

In the Conquerors of the New World and their Bondmen, we have a history of another description than that we have lately discussed. It is the history of a trade—the Slave-trade. Egypt and the East possessed slaves from a date beyond the range of authentic history; but in modern Europe the introduction of purchased slaves dates from the beginning of the fifteenth century. The Canary Islands were discovered in 1418; and as the navigators of Spain and Portugal gradually pushed their researches along the western coast of Africa, the availability of the negro race to become household beasts of burden—the "servants of servants"—was very speedily ascertained. Some few years afterwards, the author states that enslaved Africans were imported into the Peninsula, and soon were abounding in Seville and other cities. A tax of one-fifth value on their importation, produced a considerable revenue to the Royal exchequer. When the New World was discovered, before ten years had passed, a supply of slave labour was drawn from the same doomed races—at first in small numbers; but as the aboriginal inhabitants of the Western World disappeared before their conquerors, the negro slave importation increased to a frightful extent. A stream of human life incessantly flowed from the African coast, which, after enduring all the waste occasioned by the sufferings of the "middle passage," the slave market, and every manner, rendered yet in quantity sufficient to supply the labour of the gold-mines and cane-fields of America and the West Indies. The work before us is as yet incomplete. It brings its record of the horrible traffic down to the year 1518, when the first laws were passed by Spain for the government of the Indians, settling the terms under which that valuable species of property might be imported, and regulating its transfer, employment, and safe custody. Connected with the subject of the Slave-trade, we should mention the publication of several pamphlets by Lords Brougham and Denman. These publications, however, are of a controversial character, and merely temporary interest. Two arguments were designed to controvert the growing impression with the public, that the policy of keeping up an African squadron, in the hopeless attempt to destroy the trade in negroes by contraband vessels, is dictated by a mistaken humanity. It is enough to say that the noble writers failed in proving their case. Not counting the cost in money, there are sufficient facts to prove that the sacrifice of European life in the African squadron is disproportioned to the relief it can afford to the African could justify. And even to the African, the result is not altogether beneficial. A few slave-ships may be captured, and their captives restored to freedom; but these, perhaps, may be prevented from engaging in the disgustful traffic; but enough still succeed in escaping with their living cargoes; and to these the sufferings of the passage are intinitely increased by the necessity of sacrificing all other considerations, in equipping the vessels, to the speed that may enable them to baffle the cruizers of the African squadron.

Grote's History of Greece is one of the most characteristic books of the time. Hitherto, our works on the subject had been of two kinds; either a simple narrative, taking without examination the events as they are stated in the classic authors; or else separate disquisition on manners and customs, and the antiquities of particular statements. Mr. Grote unites the two; as he proceeds, he investigates and explores his narrative at once agreeable and profound. His work, laborious, attractive, and philosophical, combines excellencies which are rarely met with in a historian. A regular analysis of his book, which only in part belongs to our year, would be out of place at present.

HISTORICAL MEMOIRS.

One old and valued friend, Samuel Pepys, is introduced to us afresh and with fuller detail, by Lord Braybrooke, in a new edition (the third) of the renowned Diary. Large omissions had been made in both the previous editions, when translating them from the cypher in which Mr. Pepys were left by the industrious and egotistical Secretary to the Admiralty. In some instances, it was the mistaken fear of prolixity; in others, the editor's wonderfully keen sense of an "impropriety" which led to the use of the pruning-knife. However, these excisions are now replaced; and, with very trifling exceptions, we have the whole diary as it came from bequeathed it. The new passages refer chiefly to the man Pepys, whom we now know better, and (amply do not like less, than ever before. We find him more than ever vain, gossiping, and self-indulgent; but he retains the regularity in business, and invincible good humour, for which we have been wont to excuse his little peccadilloes. His accessibility to a bribe is somewhat discordant with our present notions of official integrity; yet in this he was only the imitator of others, and may be said to repeat the apology of Lord Bacon—that if he had sold justice, he had never sold injustice. We learn, also, on higher authority, that in the course of our opinion about Pepys's pecuniousness. No doubt, he records with wonderful complacency the gradual increase of his worldly goods; and likewise rather too bitterly by accidental dilapidations which he makes. But upon occasion, he could be liberal enough even his economy savours rather the product of an unreasonable vanity than of miserly spite. He evidently enjoys a good dinner as he sets one out; only a little less than if it had been at another man's; and feels near as much gratification at a flattering word from the Duke as from the touch of a packet of gold pieces slipped into his hands by some supplicant. Certain, for services at the Admiralty Office.

Lord Hervey's Memoirs of the Court of George II. is another collection of contemporary "gossip," from which the future historian may winnow some grains of valuable truth. The volumes contain a copious record of Palace gossip, frequent hints at back-stairs intrigues, and a full description of the trivial incidents and laborious amusements which dervalled the monotony of Court existence. Our interest in these things somewhat [illegible] characters who figure there are mostly forgotten, in spite of the [illegible] and the events have lost [illegible] importance in the vicissitudes of centuries that have since passed over the surface of Europe. The habits of Court life and the current of English history have changed since then. We look back upon this period as from the other side of a flood, which has swept away all the loose and light materials into oblivion. Of all the Courts of Europe, that of George II. was probably the one in which the least history was made. His Majesty was scarcely English, either in ideas or in language; and his British subjects multiplied and prospered in their own fashion, leaving no room for the connexion of causes to reflect the hints of the Palace atmosphere. The principal information derived from the book regards the character of Lord Hervey himself, who appears a much more manly man in his Memoirs than could be expected from the pale valetudinarian depicted in Pope's Lord Fanny.

Lord Castlereagh's Memoirs relate to times in which we can feel a contemporary interest. Although assisting, in functions of more or less dignity, in some of the most important political events of his time, when the army of the great European struggle against Napoleon was to be set in order, or the [illegible] when the re-conquered Continent had to be parcelled out into New Empires at the Congress of Vienna—the personage for whom Lord Castlereagh lives most in remembrance, is the Irish Union. We still look back upon that measure with wond[illegible] Whatever opinion may be form[illegible] of the policy it prompted it, or of the results to which it has led, the event itself can be considered but in one light—as the [illegible] effort of human cunning and con[illegible] vance. The diplomatic art was never more artistically manifested. Consummate dexterity in the employment of corruption and intimidation; a perfect knowledge of the materials to be worked upon, and of the best working them; bribery the most delicate and the most universal; the adroitest sycophancy; the assumption of gentleness and the show of force—all combined to secure a majority in the Irish House of Parliament, in favour of a measure which was to swamp the independence of a people, proudly, and sometimes almost irrationally, independent; and to unite two nations who can never yet, or shall ever, be known the capabilities of amalgamation. The Memoirs contain, in two volumes, an ample series of correspondence and memoranda touching these hitherto forgot atoms, written while Castlereagh was Secretary for Ireland, and pulled the wires of all the puppets who figured in the transactions. The work is edited by his brother, Lord Londonderry, and appears not very well digested. Some explanation is necessary, and ought to say nothing of the omission of information concerning many particulars which could not have been kept from the portfolio of a Secretary. To explain this absence, the Marquis refers to the loss of a large mass of correspondence and papers, which were destroyed to save the trouble of a literary assistant to collect and arrange, and which were finally lost at sea. As we said of Lord Hervey, though for a different reason, these Memoirs of Castlereagh will be more useful as magazines of raw material for future historians hereafter, than from the interest they will create in their present voluminous shape, to readers of the living generation.

Two works have appeared which stand on the border-ground between the present and the historical novel. These are Mr. Crail's Romance of the Peerage, and Mr. Burke's Anecdotes of the Aristocracy. Both of these works are founded upon facts; both relate narratives of personages who had real existence; and contain a multitude of details that no doubt occurred pretty much as they are described, especially in reference to those particulars of birth, marriage, and death which are supplied by the attention of the Registrar-General. But the historical novel does almost the same thing; and, without making unwarrantable charges against the fidelity of the chroniclers, we may doubt the authenticity of the chronicles from whence later inventors have derived. We put nearly as little confidence in the adventures of private and noble individuals, founded upon their family archives, as on the pedigrees which upon proper payment, the Heralds' College will compile and emblazon for some new-risen nabob. This notwithstanding, there are many chapters of interest in the Romance and the Anecdotes. Mr. Crail has previously broken ground with the history of Lettice Knollys, whose marriage with the Earl of Essex, and attachment to Leicester, linked her fortunes with some of the most distinguished personages of the Elizabethan Court. In his succeeding volumes, he still lingers upon the same period of history, dwelling principally upon the adventures of those families who could prefer some claim to the Crown of England. These were sufficiently numerous during the early years of the Virgin Queen. Her two aunts, the daughters of Henry VII., Mary of France, and Margaret of Scotland, had each left a tolerable progeny behind them. Lady Catherine Grey, sister of the unfortunate Jane Grey, also lived and married, in spite of the Royal interdict. Marriages and divorces, questions of legitimacy and incapacities from religion, contributed to complicate the important question; so that, if Elizabeth's rule had been less vigorous or extended, there was a very fair chance of a civil war for the Crown, as violent as that of the Roses, and involving in a wider range of competitors. But before the forty and five years of her reign were over, Elizabeth had survived the greatest number of the rival successors, and had succeeded in extinguishing the hopes of the rest. The fate of one woman, Mary of Scots, has been more than sufficiently his oried and romanticised. Mr. Crail relates with much pathos the sufferings of another, the Lady Catherine Grey. Her maiden Majesty was never an admirer of matrimony among her nobility; but the marriage of one whose sister had been Queen, even for a few days, and whose children might become pretenders to the Crown hereafter, was an offence beyond pardon. This crime Lady Catherine committed, disobediently and secretly, with the Earl of Hertford. The young lady is, therefore, separated from her husband—confined in the Tower—banished certain leagues from Court—and allowed to live only under the Royal displeasure for many years. It is altogether a very tragical history. Mr. Burke treats us to lighter matters. A few adventures and lucky chances—and some amusing eccentricities form the staple of his book. A good proportion of the personages are pretty tolerably well known; such as the anecdotes of Lord Wharton's absence of mind, or the minute exigeances of Lady Compton, her Burdett Coutts of James the First's reign, when stipulating with her Lord for the establishment that was to help her to spend the enormous inheritance bequeathed by her merchant father. One of the best anecdotes in the work, is that of Lady Orkney. The poor lady was dead drunk—and, soon after the birth of her first child, was seen by the nurse to approach the infant's cradle, and lift a heavy stone over its head. The nurse was too horrified to arrest the descent of the mass; but was relieved by finding that the mother's intent was but to discover whether the child could be awakened by a start, and her delight was unbounded on finding that her own imperfection of the senses was not hereditary.

Mr. Kemble's Saxons in England contains a good digest of all that was previously known on the subject. There is less of novelty in this work than we should have imagined from the profound erudition of the author upon the subject; but some antiquarian points of considerable interest are determined for the first time, and several erroneous notions are set right. Besides this, a very complete view of the position and polity of our Saxon forefathers enables us to judge of the origin of the English political and judicial spirit better than any of our previous works. In fact, Mr. Sharon Turner's was the only work which made any pretence of the kind; and Mr. Kemble has all the advantage of Turner's labours, combined with his own great knowledge of the people and per fect mastery of the languages.

THE GREAT REBELLION.—Two works have appeared, containing new narratives, and some original documents having reference to the first or Great Rebellion. One of these is from a Royalist, the other from a Republican source. The Memoirs of Prince Rupert and the Cavaliers, by Mr. Eliot Warburton, contains a vast mass of materials, culled from the collection of Mr. Benet, Prince Rupert's secretary, which had passed into the hands of a descendant, and is now first opened to the public. It comprises some thousand letters of, and to, the Prince himself, Kings Charles the First and Second, and a multitude of distinguished agents in the civil war. Notwithstanding all that has been written by historians, biographers, and memorialists on every side, from the era itself to the present year, from Clarendon to Carlyle, we shall probably never come to an end of the narratives connected with that mighty struggle. We may form some estimate of the vast accumulation of details, from the fact that the mere enumeration of the titles of books, papers, and pamphlets, under the heads "Charles I." and "Charles II.," in the British Museum, occupies no less than forty-seven pages in the folio catalogue. The Memoirs of Prince Rupert furnish little that was previously unknown as to the greater events or principal causes of the rebellion. It does, however, supply an interesting picture of many individual adventurers among the chiefs of the Cavalier party, and especially of the hero, Prince Rupert, of whom it may be said that his private character has never failed to carry everything before it; but upon his return he always found his camp in the enemy's hand. We are told by Mr. Warburton that it was the dread of Rupert's fiery valour which mainly deterred Charles from marching upon London, when the victory of Edgehill seemed to place the capital at his mercy, because the Prince, it was believed, would have burnt the city, in his wrath at its rebellion! And his quarrel with Digby produced the fatal dissensions which rendered retrieval impossible to the Royal forces, already falling to pieces from the discontents of Newby. The second book is the Fairfax Letters, which, like the foregoing, have been exhumed from the dust of two hundred years, and prepared for publication by Mr. Bell. Fairfax was art and part of the rebellion. Under his hands it grew and strengthened; and for many years he was Generalissimo of the Parliamentary forces, and bid fair to become the foremost man of his time. Scarner or more unscrupulous spirits, however, superseded him; and the crowning act was put to the Royalist victory without his co-operation, and, possibly, against his will. The letters exhibit the changes of a mind very sincere and disinterested, but from the beginning somewhat weak, and gradually becoming dissatisfied under the growing predominance of Cromwell. Both Mr. Warburton and Mr. Bell have added large contributions, of an historical character, to the material furnished by the manuscripts placed in their hands, and both have done it well.

ROBESPIERRE'S MEMOIRS.—Still treating of revolution, we pass on to a narrative of the French Revolution, consisting of a Life of Robespierre, by Mr. Lewes. In a few months the "incorruptible" have overturned the character he had gained by the exertions of a life. Disinterestedness, morality, patriotism, humanity—all were claimed for him by his friends, and substantiated by the actions of a long and eventful career. Robespierre gained fame and power when the Reign of Terror set in; and to preserve the latter for a few weeks, amidst the [illegible] and insurrection, he yielded to, or prompted according to the theory adopted by the different parties in the controversy) those fearful massacres which have condemned his name to infamy. How far he was the master or the slave of circumstances—how much of the responsibility of wholesale murder must rest upon him—or in how much he was driven unwillingly onwards by the ferocity of Danton and St. Just, and the instinct of self preservation, remains in question. We have been the reporters of the Girondist writers on the panegyric of the Histoire Parlementaire. Mr. Lewes adopts the theory that Robespierre was an enthusiast; following the phantom of liberty sincerely and blindly, until he was landed in a despotism of the guillotine.

REVOLUTIONARY LITERATURE.

The past year of Revolution has gathered a vast mass of revolutionary literature of various descriptions—Chronicles, Constitutions, Apologies, and Theories. Most of these are naturally French in origin and design; but they have been repidly translated into English, and have stamped an impress upon English ideas which renders some mention of them indispensable in a catalogue of the year's literature. First in order stands M. Louis Blanc's celebrated work on the Organization of Labour. Events have form shed the sternest commentary on this work, which received the amplest refutation by the no es collected in the Luxembourg Palace, while the Committee of Labour pursued its sittings, to devise, according to the organisation theory, some forcible means for rendering this employed independent of the employer. Yet there was truth in the work, and the outline of a system which may yet ripen into useful life. Wonders have been done by combination among capitalists; it remains to be proved whether greater wonders cannot be accomplished by combination among labourers. Freed from its violent antagonism against property, and its wild exasperation against ranks and hierarchies, the organisation of labour may even now be made the agent of increased productiveness and more just distribution of wealth and comfort among the various classes that compose a nation. To M. Proudhon and a multitude of Socialist writers, we must assign the diffusion of theories still more dangerous and savage. They are, however, scattered among the loose leaves of innumerable pamphlets, or distributed into articles for the Socialist journal Le Peuple, and are known in the country chiefly by their echoes and catchwords. Propriété c'est le vol is the fundamental axiom of their social theory. It has gained, probably, not even a solitary disciple on this side the Channel; but has prompted many incidental articles, and occupied in its refutation many chapters of more elaborate works. The same principles traveling to America, have produced works which obtained some notoriety in this country. The Mission of Democracy, and Mr. Kellogg's book on Capital and Labour, belong to this class. The authors differ little in theory from Louis Blanc or Proudhon himself. In both works, the war between those who possess and those who produce is described as internecine and inhuman. The paymaster can, and does, always oppress the worker; the weight of accumulated capital is ever employed to crush and crush the operative, whom it keeps only just alive. Power in those who possess growing ever stronger, and want in those who possess not growing ever more bitter—this is the great wrong of the universe, which the theorist must contrive to redress. In the first-mentioned work, the cure is devised by an incessant and illimited application of the principle of universal suffrage, by which power reverts perpetually to the people, the ultimate source of power, and who are supposed to be always able so to use their votes as to secure their own welfare and prosperity. By the second book, states are recommended to reduce their rates of interest to one per cent., and thus forcibly destroy the supremacy, with the revenues, of the capitalist.

Three Cabinet Ministers, retired into private life, have successively published works, carrying on the war vigorously in defence of Royalty, Order, and Property. Lord Brougham, in his "Letter to Lord Lansdowne," vindicated the character of the lately-dethroned Monarch; detailed the improvements which his rule had been accomplished in France; and assigned, as the origin of his sudden overthrow, the outbreak of a momentary conspiracy, and the stupidity of an unexpected victory on the part of the Reformers. The volume dwelt little upon principles; and, being written early in the career of the revolution, assigned far too narrow a foundation to the Republican Constitution. M. Thiers followed, with a tirade upon "Property." It was written in defence of the much-abused bourgeoisie—in advocacy of the rights of those who had accomplished the revolution of July. A searching examination was therein made into the theories which represented the ouvrier, the working man as the only class now suffering from oppression, and yet the only class to whom all power ought to be assigned. It was not difficult for a consummate master of logic, like M. Thiers, to prove the converse of all the propositions enounced by Blanc and Proudhon. A simple statement of some of the most constant characteristics of human nature and of society sufficed to reduce their most elaborated systems into mere absurdities. While man remained subject to the wants and passions of humanity, it was demonstrable that the Socialist remedies, or the Ateliers Nationaux, must prove remedies far worse than the disease they were intended to cure. If the Socialists could show that property abused its rights, M. Thiers found it easy to prove that it performed many duties which could not be safely dispensed with. If their system succeeded, as was probable, in making the rich less rich, he proved that it would, notwithstanding, leave the poor more poor—that the only equality their theories promised was one of savage destitution. M. Thiers was more successful in disproving than in creating. The systems of the anti-capitalists he speedily demolished, but could set nothing little or nothing of his own. Order, labour, and contentment—an observance of the family duties and neighbourly charities, were the limit of his suggestions. For individual prosperity, these and the blessing of Providence were to be invoked. It might be granted that from these sources more individual good might be expected than from the overcasting of all ranks and disturbance of all employments, suggested by the Socialists; but the remedies they offered were too slow, too little like change and progress, to suit the temper of men not yet recovered from the delirium of the barricades. M. Guizot, who, by very important passage in the life of the poet, he does it the most ample justice.

Campbell is, in fact, the type of a literary man at the present time. He began his career, like a thousand other known contributors to the public press, with college distinctions. He attempted the bar, which he had neither fun is to reach, nor would he probably it. His first publication, The Pleasures of Hope, published at twenty, placed him at a height among his literary contemporaries which few have reached at so early an age. Strong to say, he never surpassed, if he ever equalled, this infant effort of his genius. His succeeding life was passed in writing and editing; and in both these capacities there was much to interest, more especially as his communications with other eminent men were constant and frequent. Still, if we recollect that scarcely an event greater than his marriage, his undertaking the editorship of the New Monthly, and his assisting in the establishment of University College, happened during his long life—if we recollect this, we readily understand that this unconscious egotist were to require, filled with very uninteresting matter. Still, as we have observed, the interesting parts of Campbell's life are so exceedingly well done, that an abridgment of the whole work would be as easy as it is desirable. The task would be limiting one of comfort, leave out two-thirds of the letters, and long accounts of passages of minor interest. This done, we shall have one of the most desirable biographies in the language. We should recommend, however, that the greater part of the criticism be omitted from the abridgment. Exertions charged by the family with the duty of drawing up a poet's memoirs, are not likely to be very impartial critics. Throughout the work, the criticisms consist of such unvarnished and unsophisticated eulogisms, that the reader is at once tempted to skip the pages. Campbell, with all his merits, is not a man about whom one tolerates uncontrolled and ceaseless ecstacies.

A far different volume is Serjeant Talfourd's Memoirs of Charles Lamb. Campbell has a little of the common-place about his character, as much almost as is possible with true genius. Nothing could be less common place than Lamb. Slightly tinged with insanity himself, he devoted his life to the care of a sister who had been herself, during a paroxysm of madness, the destroyer of the existence of her own parent. The sons of intellect (the dangerously placed), and framed of the most delicate mould, and with perceptions the keenest and the most sensitive, created of necessity a world of their own, in which they wlowed all around them in a new and original light. With the gentlest and kindliest of dispositions, and an ample fund of humour, the brother and sister communicated, first to one another, and then to the world, the impressions and emotions of minds so peculiarly constructed. The consequence has been one of the most beautiful and original works in any language—the Essays of Elia.

In the biography we are noticing, Serjeant Talfourd, like Dr. Beattie, an executor of the subject of his narrative, has chiefly acted the simple part of an editor. Lamb is, for the most part, the narrator of his own life, and as such, discloses without reserve or conceit what portion of his soul. There is so much lamentableness mixed with the melancholy—so much melancholy with the happiness, of every passage, a most, in Lamb's life, he had the faculty of smiling and weeping at once and the same time over all that occurred to him, that this autobiography of Elia's would deserve a perusal were it unaccompanied by remarks, and the generous and Recollections of Italy, written by an Engl sh author, Mr. Macfarlane. The Count's work was published in the spring of last year, at a time when it was believed that the violent rupture of all the old bonds which united discordant nationalities under one sovereign power, would lead to their mutual separation and re-organisation, according to the distinctions and conformations of race, into new communities. Slave and Saxon were then, it was prophesied, to gravitate each around their appropriate centres, according to the natural laws of affinity, and empires, without the aid of the iron links of despotism, and whose people might rapidly advance into grandeur under the beneficent influence of free institutions. As the chief centre of the Sclavonian race, the author, with natural partiality, foreboded a glorious futurity for his native Poland. A few months are but a moment, comparatively, in the history of a nation; but, as far as experience has yet sufficed to reveal to us the secrets of destiny, the prophecies founded upon distinctions of race, have been altogether falsified. New combinations are now forming; and the ancient boundary lines of empires will become, ere long, shifted and effaced. But the renovated world will rise out of the chaos under very different conditions than has been shadowed forth by the system makers. Antipathies stronger than those of race, and appetences more powerful than those which have been inherited from the identity of a common ancestry in bygone ages, are called into play; and by these will the configurations of states and empires be henceforth determined. Mr. Macfarlane's description of the result of the Italian Revolution is of the genuine country gentleman and poet-wine Tory school. If the Italian subjects of Austria suffered and dwindled under the despotism of a foreign yoke, the British traveller fared none the less sumptuously. Provided his purse was well replenished, and no objectionable—that is to say, liberal books were discovered in his portmanteau, no drawback existed to his making a most luxurious tour through the most luxurious climate in the world. The English traveller found all the embarrassments of the passport system carefully smoothed away. At few frames, paid at the successive frontiers, were sufficient to set him free of the country, wherever it pleased him to hired a cicerone, inspected galleries, cheapened antiquarian relics during the day, and at evening returned to enjoy his bacchica and lacryma Christi at his hotel in full serenity. Austrian dungeons and domiciliary visits from the police to torment him? and if he found no political grievance to enjoy "leader" in the Diario of Rome or Florence, it was but a temporary deprivation, which increased his appetite for the daily luxury of a free press upon his return to England. The revolution in Italy changed all this, and much more, to Mr. Macfarlane's displeasure. It emancipated the thoughts, the tongues, and the pens of Italians, but it spoilt their hotels. Innumerable newspapers, pamphlets, and broadsides communicated intelligence or propagated political theories throughout the country; but the improvement of the mind was accompanied by an unpardonable neglect of the body: and the English traveller, rising from a bad bed, to which he had retired from a worse dinner, could find no excuse for the infraction of old customs and ordinances, of which Pope Pius had given the example. A work conceived in a far different spirit, although composed somewhat before the advent of the Republican principles in Rome, is Mr. Whiteside's Italy in the Nineteenth Century. The book, nevertheless, belongs to the category of revolutionary literature, as detailing the first symptoms of the change in the centre of Catholicity effected by the new Pope, the influence of which in Italy must have contributed largely to carry the French Revolution into successful consummation, and thence travelled back into Italy, where it has driven the Pope from Rome, and the Grand Duke from Florence, and implanted ideas of freedom and popular rights, which will survive even the suppression of the spiritual and the temporal Sovereign in their respective seats. Mr. Whiteside has Republican tendencies himself; and before Italy dreamt of a Republic, appears to have cadivined the awakening spirit, and speaks with prophetic fervour of the rapid change which the first breath of reformation had effected upon the hitherto stagnant and corrupted surface of Italian life. North and South, from Paris to Palermo, and onward to Pesth, we appear as yet to see only the beginning of things. Many chapters of revolutionary history have yet to be written; and years, probably, to elapse before we may venture to sum up its results, and compare its prophecies with their fulfilment.

LITERARY BIOGRAPHY.

To literature, properly so called, the lives of literary men form an appropriate introduction. The Life of Campbell, by his executor, Dr. Beattie, is one of the most full and complete biographies that we have of any writer of similar celebrity. All the papers of Campbell were placed at the Doctor's disposal; and a mass of letters was contributed by a host of correspondents, who came forward with their treasures sometimes too freely, occasionally, for the reader's convenience. In fact, a life of so little incident as that of Campbell, can scarcely fill with matter, worth relation three enormous octavo volumes. And thus in Beattie's work we have a large quantity of twaddle—an immense variety of anecdotes scarcely worth the telling—disquisitions respecting the poet's minutest actions and ideas, and those actions and ideas put by himself in every possible form of triviality in his multitudinous communications to all sorts of people. Dr. Beattie, like most men employed very largely upon a single subject, has greatly over-estimated the importance which the generality of people are apt to attribute to facts which he estimates himself by the trouble which it cost him to procure them. With all this is mixed up some chapters of great interest—for when the Doctor gets hold of a really important passage in the life of the poet, he does it the most ample justice.

Campbell is, in fact, the type of a literary man at the present time. He began his career, like a thousand other known contributors to the public press, with college distinctions. He attempted the bar, which he had neither fun is to reach, nor would he probably

A work conceived in a far different spirit, although composed somewhat before the advent of the Republican principles in Rome, is Mr. Whiteside's Italy in the Nineteenth Century. The book, nevertheless, belongs to the category of revolutionary literature, as detailing the first symptoms of the change in the centre of Catholicity effected by the new Pope, the influence of which in Italy must have contributed largely to carry the French Revolution into successful consummation, and thence travelled back into Italy, where it has driven the Pope from Rome, and the Grand Duke from Florence, and implanted ideas of freedom and popular rights, which will survive even the suppression of the spiritual and the temporal Sovereign in their respective seats. Mr. Whiteside has Republican tendencies himself; and before Italy dreamt of a Republic, appears to have cadivined the awakening spirit, and speaks with prophetic fervour of the rapid change which the first breath of reformation had effected upon the hitherto stagnant and corrupted surface of Italian life. North and South, from Paris to Palermo, and onward to Pesth, we appear as yet to see only the beginning of things. Many chapters of revolutionary history have yet to be written; and years, probably, to elapse before we may venture to sum up its results, and compare its prophecies with their fulfilment.

NOVELS.

First amongst the fictions which have appeared within the limits which we have prescribed to ourselves, stands one of the greatest works of the greatest of our romancists. Harold, the last of the Saxon Kings, contains the best descriptive writing that Bulwer has penned; and, all things considered, the finest of his characters. The portraiture of Harold, the warrior, philosopher, patriot, lover, by turns, is the finest instance we have yet seen of the old Saxon heroes, to whose grave energy of character their descendants owe so much of their [illegible]. Contrasted with Harold, the wily and dissolute Norman stands in bold relief: even here we can trace the man of fashion elbowing somewhat scornfully the man of business. Bulwer possessed the fullest knowledge of the period he has chosen to illustrate, and the philosophic vein which runs through his historical allusions, contains so much of novelty and force, that we scarcely know a history which teaches so well what history ought to teach, as this work of fiction. Pathos of a deeper kind than we had supposed Bulwer capable of, gives the most intense interest to many parts of the story. The affectation which so often dar cares the writings of this author, is laid aside: we never see the fine gentleman peering out of the preceptor's robe, but the deep-thinking and acute man of genius developing a period when the fiercer passions alternated their sway with the civilities of modern life; when the dandy, social and polished, just ventured to intrude amongst the the stern, mailed warrior of the middle ages; when the germs of modern society, with its faults and virtues, are found scattered everywhere amongst the European nations, and the first vestiges of the motley and heterogeneous humanity of our own times—containing every extreme of temper, passion, manner, and habit—make their appearance in the world. Such a time demands the keenest thought of the acutest writer; and thus one of the noblest romances in existence has been formed out of difficult, yet most excellent, materials. The influence of greatness of character over the imperfections of civilisation, was never yet so nobly demonstrated.

Beside Bulwer stands a philosopher of a very different cast. We hesitate, perhaps, when we call Mr. Harrison Ainsworth a philosopher; but his writings reveal daily betray a depth of sentiment which few philosophers can surpass. The Lancashire Witches is to Ainsworth's other novels very much what Harold is to those of Bulwer. The foppery and vulgarity which mar Ainsworth's best writings, have disappeared. The subject, it is true, is one of the same grotesque horror which this romancist always affects; but both the grotesqueness and the horror are softened in the present instance, both by the circumstance and much of the tone of the story. The witches become such under the influence of a deep curse pronounced under terrible aggravation. This at once ennobles the inherent vulgarity of the witchcraft. Then again, we have a similar contrast, as in Harold, between the relics of popular barbarity and the intrusion of more refined and philosophic sentiments. The land of Lancashire in the fifteenth century, bears some comparison, in point of civilisation, with the Saxon gentleman of the eleventh. The entire superstition of one set of men, contrasts finely with the half superstition of another, in both novels.

[illegible] to return to Paris along with Rezzio, and find the city pacified and ornamented by Francis I. There is little or no fighting in this book; but, to make amends, we have innumerable attempts at murder by poison or steel, some of which are successful; and the story concludes with the assassination of the hero, after he had been sent according to the history, in the chamber of Queen Mary. Some interest attaches to the work as being the production of William Ireland, the author of the Shakspeare forgeries, and written before the foundation of the modern school of historical fiction were laid by Walter Scott. It has long remain en in the hands of various publishers, and is now edited and improved by Mr. James.

The Course of a Revolution is a novel founded on the events which threw the Neapolitan Court from its capital during the first Revolution. Lord Nelson, Lady Hamilton, and the other historical personages of the Revolution are introduced; and the stirring events of the time make almost of necessity an exciting tale. For an historical novel, the period is peculiarly well chosen.

Novels of manners claim the next place to those of history. Under this head, Mildred Vernon and Mary Barton call for our attention. The first appeared at the middle of last year, and excited much attention. Pictures of French society, drawn after the French method, by an English hand, were not very common. The writer was evidently well acquainted with the tastes and habits of our neighbours, and had the talent of communicating to his descriptions the piquancy and abandon of the French school, with much of the energy and sound sense of the English. Mothers who would have shuddered to permit their daughters to read the details of the intrigues and fascinations of Parisian lionnes in the pages of Paul de Kock and Sue, permitted the entrance of Mildred Vernon into their drawing-room without scruple. The tale itself [illegible] and improbability; its parts, a complete and descriptive power, was a happy thought for the Liverpool lady who undertook it. The work itself had all the freshness and vigour of a young writer, with the quiet assurance of an old hand; and the only thing

"A SEE-SAW."—PAINTED BY T. WEBSTER, R.A.

Both these pictures are in the Great, or Fast Room.

91. "A See-Saw." T. Webster, R.A. A master-piece, and Engraved for our present paper. It tells its own story, and belongs to Mr. Gibbons, of the Regent's-park, the same gentleman who has the additional good fortune to possess "The Slide," by the same thoroughly English artist. The fear expressed on the face of the boy who is mounted above at the end of the plank, is capitally contrasted with the enjoyment of the boy who is only a looker-on.

23. "Religious Controversy in the time of Louis XIV." A. E. Elmore, A.

The King had declared his intention "to employ only good Christians in public situations," meaning Roman Catholics; and the most tempting encouragement was held out to such as should set a public example by abjuring their Protestant tenets. Accordingly, it was not uncommon for an intending convert of rank to invite some leading Protestant clergyman to meet some leading Catholic in his house, there to debate respecting their differences, to satisfy the mind of their host which religion was preferable.—Louis XIV. et son Siècle.

This is one of the best painted pictures in the present Exhibition. The scene is animated, the grouping good, the heads fine, occasionally grand, and always reflective. There is that proper heat of debate in every part of it worthy of the importance of the subject. The hands and extremities are carefully painted. This is certainly the best picture Mr. Elmore has yet painted, and, while it shows a stride, contains a further promise.

The two pictures next Engraved, are in the Middle Room.—

372. "The Destruction of Idolatry in England. Coifi, the High Priest, on his conversion to Christianity, destroying the idols of his former worship, in the presence of Edwin, the Saxon King. A.D. 625." The subject is described by Sharon Turner. G. Patten, A.

After several of the Witena and Counsellors of King Edwin had delivered their opinions on the subject of religion, the high-priest, Coifi, desired to hear Paulinus, who was the chief of the Christian missionaries. The Bishop obeyed, when Coifi exclaimed, "Formerly I understood nothing that I worshipped: the more I contemplated our idolatry the less truth I found in it; but this new system I adopt without hesitation: let us, then, O King, immediately anathematise and burn the temples and altars which we have so uselessly venerated." On this bold exhortation, Coifi was asked, who would be the first to profane the idols and their altars, and the enclosures with which they were surrounded. The zealous convert answered, "I will." He requested of the King weapons and a war-horse; he girded on a sword, and, brandishing a spear, mounted the King's horse, and rode to the idol temple; the people without thought him mad; he hurled his spear against the temple, to profane it, and commanded his companions to destroy the building and surrounding enclosures. The scene of this vent was a little to the east of York, beyond the river Derwent, at a place, in Bede's time, called Godmundingham.

This, by Mr. Patten, we have engraved for our present paper. It is almost the only strictly historical picture in the present Exhibition.

Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his colour in the cup. . . . At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder.—Proverbs, xxiii 31.

ARCHITECTURE.

In the Architectural Room, the chief features are Mr. Cockerell's large drawing, the Professor's Dream; Mr. Pugin's elevation of his own house at Ramsgate; and one or two designs of works which Mr. B. Ferrey has at present in hand.

1006. "Design for a Monument to a late Venerable Archdeacon, intended to be placed in a church of Greek Doric architecture, in the manner of a chantry chapel." A. Ashpitel.

1011. "South-east View of Charlecote Church, Warwickshire, now rebuilding for Mrs. Lucy, of Charlecote Park." J. Clarke. This is the church in which Shakspeare's Sir Thomas Lucy is buried, and where there is a very interesting monument to his memory.

1012. "A Design for a Parsonage House." J. S. Ancona

1013. "New Dining-hall, now erecting for the Right Hon. the Earl of Shrewsbury, at Alton Towers." A. W. Pugin.

1014. "Design for a Parish Church." J. F. Wadmore.

1015. "The Private Chapel and Cemetery, recently erected at Carshalton, near Dumfries, for the late Right Hon. Sir Alexander Johnston." T. B. Lamb.

1016. "Design for the Chichester Training College for Masters." F. W. Ordish.

1017. "Athenæum and Mechanics' Institute, lately erected at Sheffield." G. Alexander.

1018. "Roslyn Chapel." S. Read.

1019. "Dryburgh Abbey." J. Dobbin.

1020. "The Ceiling of the Drawingroom of the Oriental Club, as designed and executed by L. W. Collmann."

1023. "Melrose Abbey." J. Dobbin.

1024. "An idea for a country parish church." T. H. Rushforth.

1031. "Design submitted for the Edmonton new Church." F. E. H. Fowler.

1032. "Interior View of St. Peter's Church, Cheltenham," lately erected from the designs of W. Daukes, Esq. F. Wehnert.

1034. "Interior, looking east, and Interior, looking west, of the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, Hadleigh, Middlesex, as restored under the direction, and from the designs of G. E. Street."

1036. "South-east View of the Church of England Training College for Masters, now erecting at Cheltenham, from the designs and under the superintendence of S. W. Daukes."

1044. "Meanwood Church, erected near Leeds, for Miss Beckett an [illegible] Beckett." W. Railton.

1045. "An elevation of St. George's Catholic Church, Lambeth, showing the tower and spire as they are intended to be finished." A. W. Pugin. This, when finished, will be a very noble building. We are glad to observe that Mr. Pugin retains all his early admiration of the spire of Salisbury Cathedral.

1059. "Entrance Porch, Spratton Lodge, Northamptonshire," executed for the Dowager Lady St. John. G. F. Jones.

1060. "The Terrace now erecting at Windsor, on the road to Ascot." S. S. Teulon.

"THE AWAKENED CONSCIENCE."—PAINTED BY R. REDGRAVE, A.

1064. "The New Chapel of Ripon Palace, the gift of the late Archbishop of York to the See of Ripon." W. Railton.

1072. "St. Giles's Church, Cripplegate, proposed to be restored in accordance with the design, and under the direction of A. D. Gough."

1075. "Interior View of St. Paul's Church, Maidstone, restored to the date of its completion, about A.D. 1403." J. Whichcord, jun.

1085. "A View of St. Augustine's, Ramsgate, the residence of A. Welby Pugin, and the adjoining Church now erecting." A. W. Pugin.

1091. "Design for a Building for the reception of the Vernon Gallery, and other productions of Modern Painters," by R. M. Phipson.

1102. "The Professor's Dream." C. R. Cockerell, R.A.

A synopsis of the principal architectural monuments of ancient and modern times, drawn to the same scale, in forms and [illegible] ascertained from the best authorities, and arranged on four tablets [illegible] Egyptian, Grecian, Roman, and Mediæval [illegible] which allows more particularly the comparative height: this synopsis being a development of that first published in the "Useful Knowledge" Society's "Lives of Sir Christopher Wren."

Most carefully and fairly grouped, and quite a study for the young architect. Many of our readers will recollect, in common with ourselves, the similar good service which Mr. Cockerell rendered a few years back to the memory of Sir Christopher Wren.

1113. "Venice." J. D. Harding

The moon is up, and yet it is not light
Sunset divides the sky with her.—Byron

1114 "St. Matthew's Church, Denmark-hill, Camberwell," in course of erection from the design, and under the direction of A. D. Gough.

1117. "A View of Hilton Grange Rugby, the seat of Washington Hilbert, Esq." A. W. Pugin.

1134. "Old St. Pancras Church," recently reconstructed, enlarged, and restored, from the design, and under the direction of A. D. Gough This is the little interesting church of which we gave an illustration when Mr. Gough's reconstructions were completed.

1139. "Design for the Army and Navy Club-House," to which the second premium was awarded. F. E. H. Fowler.

1140. "The Training and Middle School for the Diocese of Worcester" about to be erected from the design, and under the superintendence of B. Ferrey.

1173. "Some additions lately made to the west front of the Episcopal Palace, Wells," under the superintendence of B. Ferrey. Made in excellent taste.

1182. "South-west view of the New Church, Weybridge, Surrey," erected from the designs, and under the superintendence of A. Johnson and J. L. Pearson.

THE [illegible] OF BOCCACCIO IN [illegible] . . . PAINTED BY C. J. [illegible] A.

which denoted inexperience was the frame-work of the story, which was fashioned upon the stale notion of an innocent person suspected of murder, and acquitted in the end by the discovery of the real criminal. But in the work itself the feelings of the manufacturing classes were portrayed with the greatest vigour. The relations of workmen and masters—the trials of the former and the shortcomings of the latter, were illustrated in a style not alone of great interest, but powerfully awakening our sympathies for a class of persons hitherto little known out of their peculiar sphere. The heroine, like most other heroines, was comparatively a failure; but about the subordinate characters there was a reality and a truthfulness in many of the scenes which was very charming.

A novel, on a subject somewhat similar, has made its appearance since the beginning of the present year. Harley Berkford turns on the passions and sufferings of the working-classes in the north of England during one of the moments of the period which ended in the Reform Bill. There is some vigour in this book, but a general want of truthfulness and reality, which places it at a great distance below Mary Barton.

We must consider Mr. Cooper as a contributor to English literature, as his works are almost all published in this country. The Red-Rover is a tale of the Red Indian—Mr. Cooper's own peculiar property. The book undertakes to develop a curiosity in its way—the workings of a Red Indian's mind; and this he has managed very cleverly, sufficiently so to give an interest to his tale, which is less full of interest than most of his other novels. His last work, the Sea Lions, is one of the most powerful and original he has written. It narrates the adventures of two rival seal-boats blocked up by ice in the Antarctic ocean, with all the vivacity of real events and the ingenuity of fiction. His characteristic impertinences are absent almost or altogether from both of these works.

Next to these come the Irish novels; all, with one exception, founded on the same model: the rollicking, careless, warm-hearted being getting into all sorts of scrapes; many of his characters relieved by the buoyancy of his temperament. Such was Mr. Trollope's Kellys and O'Kellys, and several periodical tales, which we have noticed elsewhere. The exception we speak of is Mr. Higgins's excellent tale, entitled "My Uncle the Curate." In this novel we have English characters acting under Irish circumstances. The Curate—a stout, unsophisticated, manfulish, determined man, without polish or affectation—is one of the best heroes we have met with for a long time. The tale itself is better in its parts, which are excellent, than as a whole: for the denouement of the story, which turns upon an abduction and a rescue, is crude and common-place. As an Irish novel, it stands alone—quaint, quiet, unaffected—maintaining its interest throughout with very little aid from Celtic particularities.

Mrs. Gore contributes one novel, The Diamond and Pearl; and Miss Trollope another, The Young Countess, to their already extensive list. Both of these works, the last especially, contain many points of excellence, and have added to the fame of their authoress.

The ladies have thus vast given rather considerable additions to what may be styled novels of morality. Miss Costello's Clara Fane and The Discipline of Life are works of the class; and so is Affection; its Flowers and Fruits. The latter is a clever and exciting tale. Of the two former, the tinings most noticeable are the lacrymæ of the first, and the unaffected feeling of the second: without any extraordinary merit, either of plan or execution, this work cannot fail to interest.

The novels of simple circumstances which have appeared within our period, have, on the whole, been wanting in interest. Lucile Belmont is an illegitimate daughter of peculiar rank, whose illegitimacy is studiously concealed, though known to all sorts of people. On this thread is hung an affected tale, full of fantastical absurdities. Helen Charteris. Trevethlon, and Friends and Fortune, have but little to distinguish them from the ordinary run of novels. The last of these is the best; and contains, occasionally, passages of much interest. Acton Bell's Tenant of Wildfell Hall is the novel of this sort which has most pretension. Their is force and power about it, but of a wrong kind; its great points are mostly made by exaggeration. Some of the descriptions of the habits of the lower classes are of the kind are so unreal, that we are obliged to suspect a female writer drawing upon the inventions of a somewhat malicious imagination.

ROMANCES.

Two works of fiction, neither of which can be classed as novels, have appeared within the last twelve months—both of especial excellence. The Old Judge, Haliburton's latest work, appeared originally in Fraser's Magazine; but it has been published collectively within the time prescribed.

In this work we miss the flow of natural and unconstrained humour which distinguished Sam Slick. In that immitable series we seem to feel the followings of a mind crammed to the full with quaint and droll observation. In the Old Judge the humour is somewhat constrained; the writer is always going out of his way to find something to laugh at, instead of meeting it spontaneously. This is natural enough in a late work on a subject already somewhat exhausted; and, best of all, the Canadians are by no means so racy a people as the Yankees. Indeed, for humorous treating, is not altogether a good one. So the author has infused a dash of the horrible: several black stories, after the model of Washington Irving, are introduced as foils to the sketches of Canadian travelling absurdities and incongruities. Haliburton has been very successful in his characters. Master Stephen and Miss Lucy are especial favourites with all readers. The utter unconstraint of sarcasm and smart sayings, disagreeable enough in reality, are to the last degree amusing in fiction, when cleverly managed. Colonial rusticity is fairly quizzed in the most [illegible] manner, and the [illegible] habitudes of the old settlers. On the whole, the book is not only amusing, but affords a capital insight into the realities of British North American existence.

The other work is a strange one. Herman Melville's Mardi, and a Voyage Thither, is one of those grotesque volumes we have met with for a long time. All the subjects most difficult and uncertain in modern discussion—the mysteries of politics, manners, and religion—are transferred for discussion amongst the feathered savages of the rocky islands of the Pacific. The very idea of the work is one that we scarcely know whether to admire or condemn. A sailor, sick of whaling in the Arctic Seas, and longing for the sunny skies of the South, makes his escape in an open boat, with the assistance of a blunt, unsophisticated Scotchman—his fidus Achates in his subsequent adventures. The description of the passage across the ocean, with its storms and calms, contains some of the finest nautical description that the world has ever seen; and the observations and illustrations, as the monsters of the deep are encountered, one after another, are expressed in language elegant and expressive; sometimes even beautiful to the last degree. The boat at last falls in with a ship navigated solely by a company of savages, half mythical than otherwise, and afterwards with a being altogether mythical—a Pacific fairy carried off to sacrifice, whom the author rescues and marries. He is forced, in the rescue, to kill an old priest and his family; and, before his marriage, reaches Mardi, which he describes as one amongst a group of Pacific islands, regularly governed by a King and Court, who receive him with all hospitality. His fairy soon vanishes; and he undertakes a voyage from island to island in search of her, in company with his Royal host and a large suite, and pursued by the spectres of the avenging priests. The suite aforesaid contains several droll characters; and the conversations they hold as they meet with adventures amidst the islands they inspect successively, make what the author intends to be the moral of his book. They are introduced to satirize European belief and practice, after a Pacific fashion; and, like all other odd things, are of every possible degree of merit—often highly quaint and ingenious; still more often absurd and ridiculous. The latter are readily forgiven for the former; we are quite content to take the book, with its merits and defects, as one of the most extraordinary on our list.

In the same category we must place Mr. E. W. Landor's Lofoden; or, the Exiles of Norway. The author has a new field at his command, which he cultivates very vigorously, but with instruments somewhat too ponderous. The wild nature of the scenery, and the peculiarity of nobles condemned to mines, instead of the hackneyed dungeons of old, give this tale a peculiarity which interests us considerably, though the author spoils his subject by his coarse way of handling it, and his constant tendency to exaggeration.

Raphael, by Lamartine, was produced simultaneously in French and English, and must be classed among the literary events of the year. It is a singular work, exhibiting the marvellous power of a gifted and practised author, in elaborating a single idea through two hundred pages, or in prolonging the vibration of one chord, which never changes its tone, yet never becomes monotonous. Raphael is a long monologue of love, written as the autobiography of an impressionable and wo[illegible]minded youth, who passes a few days amidst the madness and the rapture of passion, and then lives for ever afterwards upon its remembrance. Rousseau and Chateaubriand have supplied much of the materials which Raphael reproduces; and in the eloquence of its language it has no way short of its models.

We sum up the works of fiction with a book which, as a translation, scarcely belongs to us, but with the original of which so many Liberties have been taken as to make it partly our own.—Eighteen Hundred and Twelve contains some of the most graphic sketches of that "romance of History," Napoleon's Russian campaign, that have yet appeared. As a mere romance it has many excellencies, though tainted with the German fault of unreal sentiment, and a constant tone of affectation.

TRAVELS.

The "foreign parts" in which an Englishman must always feel most thoroughly "at home" are those inhabited by our cousins-german of the United States. We begin, therefore, our list of travellers' literature with a work which is, on other accounts, the most important and complete of its literary compeers—The Western World, by Alexander Mackay. The recollections of 1812 are now faded almost into oblivion. The "harry-nigs" and burnings on the coast by the crews of English frigates—the daring but profitless sortie which resulted in the conflagration of the Washington senate-house—all the sufferings and hatred engendered by war have been forgotten by the new generation. In spite of the brief dread of the Canadian "sympathisers," or the threatening controversy respecting the Oregon boundary, we have learned to regard the Americans even as possible enemies. Free-trade has cemented the friendship between us. A strong bond of self-interest unites into peace the congenial nations, who cannot come into collision without crushing the famines and destroying the livelihoods of some thousands of their subjects. Reason may hereafter proclaim an universal and perpetual peace upon the earth; but in the present time, the more intelligible and powerful dictates of interest have placed a war between England and America almost beyond the ordinary chances of political casualty. Mr. Mackay has properly appreciated the pacific ordinances under which the future conversion of the two countries will be maintained. Accordingly, he looks at the illimitable elements of grandeur in population, production, and wealth, which the great American continent offers to its inhabitants, with no jaundiced eye. It is not the growth of a rival or the expanding power of a foe that he sees in the increase of America, but rather the prosperity of a friend, in which England will unfailingly share, unless her participation in the common prosperity be balked by some unspeakable folly on the part of her rulers. In The Western World, therefore, we find a flattering picture of the Americans under their chief denomination—that of money-makers. Riches flow upon them in a tide from earth and waters, even putting the questionable wealth from the "gold diggings" on the Sacramento wholly out of the account. Already do the returns [illegible] annually increase considerably [illegible] than in the most [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] productions and position. There were kingdoms of nature's own making great river basins—sometimes two or three in a political territory, sometimes subdivided as often—possessed throughout an immense extent a similar feature for each in particular, and a distinction the most broad and marked amongst one another. All this was forgotten in the common geography. Besides this, there were a thousand philosophical considerations arising out of the physical variations on the earth's surface, which belonged properly to geography, but which were omitted in the manual. Nothing, in fact, is omitted: we scarcely know a book in which every thing pertaining to the subject is set down so fully—too fully, perhaps, sometimes; but the next and elegant way this lady has of handling her topics makes amends for her occasional diffuseness. Still, considering that young persons ought to be carefully indoctrinated with the science of "physical geography," it is a pity that a shorter work, by a hand equally able, is not to be had. Some selection is required amidst so enormous a mass of information.

Jackson's Minerals and their Uses is a very useful book. The author is a Russian resident, Professor of Mineralogy at the St. Petersburgh Academy, and has had great opportunities of studying his subject. The Russian territories are, as all collectors know, the great storehouses of minerals and mineral information. Jackson's book is, in many respects, a more popular book than those of his predecessors, which were apt to be grievously learned and tiresome. He has mixed a good many anecdotes with his facts; and having, besides, the advantage of the excellent works on classification which have appeared of late years, he has had great advantages, of which he has not failed to make proper use.

Chambers' Ancient Sea Margins, like all Mr. R. Chambers' productions is an ingenious work. The writer has a theory, and presses every fact he can meet with into his service. When the facts are for him, nothing can be more philosophical than his way of treating them; but he deals with them somewhat like an advocate when they are against him. The attempt to define the boundaries of the ancient ocean is a bold one, and it is a great merit in any writer to have succeeded even partially in such an attempt. More than this we cannot say of Mr. Chambers' book, which, while we read, we felt to be more clever than convincing—more ingenious than sound.

The Purity of Science, by Robert Hunt, is one of the best ideas possible. To take out of science its striking and picturesque facts—to point out those wonders of actual science which equal, if they do not exceed, the fables and poetic wonder of demigods, wizards, and necromancers—all this has been with Mr. Hunt a noble task.

M. Quetelet's Theory of Probabilities is a work to which we will give a passing notice, though a translation. Our business prosperities are so intimately mixed up with this subject, that a good treatise thereon, in the practical consideration of probabilities, is of the greatest importance. Few subjects come more home to the necessities or the provisions of men engaged in the professions them life assurance. Previous works on the subject were very far from satisfactory; and this work of the Belgian astronomer, capitally translated by Mr. O. G. Downes, of which Edinburgh is made, is one likely to be of permanent value. No man among the many connected with insurance offices should be without it.

The Year-Book of Facts deserves mention, as almost the only popular collection of the scientific facts and discoveries of the year which we possess. Such a work in a more intelligent year would be doubly welcome. As it is, it is a valuable summary, and affords a useful means of reference—not for science only, but for art and manufacture.

The subject of California has called several pens into action, and the public are likely to become very good mineralogists in consequence. —at all events, as far as gold is concerned. Ansted's Gold-seeker's Manual is the best of these works: the author is well known as a practical geologist.

On the subject of Natural History, one of the best books of the year is Mr. Thompson's Natural History of Ireland. The author wisely confines himself to the anecdotes and phases of animal existence in his own country; he enters into no general discussion, and has added many valuable facts to the previous stock of knowledge on such subjects. Some useful small works have likewise appeared on the science, which we have noticed among our serials. We must not, however, forget the Natural History of Godalming, a successful imitation of White's Selborne, written evidently by an ardent lover of nature, field sports, the country, and all that pertains thereto.

Chemical Science has been illustrated in numerous volumes published within the twelvemonth. No very striking feature has, however, presented itself, and the progress of discovery has been limited to the practical adaptation of certain principles already well known, of which the most brilliant is that of the Electric Light. The principal works lately issued supply abstracts of the various branches of chemistry, collected generally from previous publications, but arranged with special reference to the convenience of the instruction of different classes of readers. Mr. Normandy has published an excellent translation from the German of Professor Rose's celebrated Practical Treatise on Chemical Analysis, with an introduction of his own, and a multitude of tables calculated with great minuteness, and varied in every way, to save labour and insure accuracy in performing the delicate operations of analysis. As an introduction to a forthcoming series of chemical works, Mr. Noad has issued a volume on Chemical Manipulation and Analysis. His description of the instruments and processes to be employed, and of recipes for a multitude of operations, will be infinitely serviceable to the analytical chemist. The science is now so generally included among the necessary elements of a liberal education, that initiatory works on the subject issue almost beyond counting, as school-books. In the pause of great discoveries, this rapid spread of the study among the non-professional educated public, is the fact of most interest in a literary point of view.

ILLUSTRATIVE AND ARTISTIC LITERATURE.

PERHAPS one of the subjects most congenial to modern taste, is the description, by monuments, of the habits and manners of distant climes or remote periods. The indefatigable energy of the British traveller enables him to penetrate everywhere; and he is never unskilful or unplayed as when he is raking up the sites of ancient cities, or delineating the scenery and costume of the wilder portion of civilization.

Few books—even those by the highest names in our literature—have excited more attention than Layard's Nineveh. We believe that, at the present time, no work of mere mental power by any writer could or would have been so much talked about. The costumes and manners of the old Assyrians—a nation beloved by a thousand associations both of our religion and our learning—the cradle of the civilization of the world—the costume and manner of such a people were for the first time actually presented to our eyes in all their authenticity. "Assyria delineated by Assyrians!" Who but would have laughed at such an idea a few years ago! Yet the very thing is before us. Mr. Layard's book forms an epoch in our modern literature. Antiquities were never yet more ably and more fortunately explained: most other works bear about them that heavy antiquarian rust which not once repels the general reader. Layard's volume interests everybody. The illustrations of Assyrian mannners, customs as they are, and comprising multitudinous illustrations of their warfare, their polity, their costume, and the natural history of their country, are only a small part of what we may expect hereafter. The book, ably etched and engraved, is about the most desirable acquisition for the drawing-room table that we know of.

We have classed this amongst the illustrative works because its real importance is derived from its illustrations, and because a new field for research and speculation on this head is opened by its appearance. But, as a mere book of travels, it is no ordinary production. The various scholar or antiquarian might sometimes quarrel with the author, as he interrupts or delays his archæological researches by descriptions of his own difficulties and adventures amongst the wild fellows who looked on his proceedings with the most unfeigned admiration. We can understand the scholar's provocation, but we cannot sympathise with it, for we are glad to find antiquarian research and learned lore made so palatable by the admixture of graphic and amusing matter, which every one can appreciate. We are seldom more disposed to follow any one than when we accompany Mr. Layard through the halls of the old Ninevite palace, covered with the sepulchres of another race—itself long since passed away. The magnificence of one dynasty concealed by the tombs of another—both belonging to people almost lost in the mist of antiquity—a grave and curious lesson.

The light already thrown by these illustrations, not merely on Assyrian history, but on that of the whole primæval Eastern world, leads us to hope that these discoveries are only just begun, and that, hereafter, we shall find our lives upon the first dawn of civilization—that most interesting of inquiries—enlightened to a degree of which we have at present little conception. There is no period in existence so interesting, so fraught with instruction, or of which we had hitherto a small heaps of information, as that which gave birth to society and civilisation—the period of the old Assyrian empire. Should any Layard discoveries enlighten us as to the language of those times, it is impossible to estimate the extent and value of the knowledge which we may acquire.

Two books, of which the chief merit depends on the illustrations, has appeared on the Oriental subject—Curzon's Monasteries in the Levant, and Forty Days in the Desert. Both contain some capital views of Eastern scenery. The latter, as a book of travel, is not worth much; but some of its plates are very beautiful. The former is a work of a gentleman carried by his love of books into the most obscure recesses of the Oriental libraries. The illustrations of the old Greek architecture are excellent in their way; though the specimens are not particularly fine; in fact, the style of monastery building in the East was far inferior to those magnificent abbeys and convents the ruins of which we regret so much as artists and antiquaries, in Scotland. M. Milman's Horace, for classical illustration, is an excellent specimen of modern Art.

The Babes in the Wood, illustrated by Lady Waterford, is a production deserving especial notice, for the singular excellence of the illustrations, designed and engraved, it is said, entire by the hands of the accomplished amateur. We can easily understand how amateur genius should attain great excellence in design, when it belongs more to conception than anything else. In the present work, the manipulation is beautifully finished, and the whole affair has the appearance of the touch of a finished artist

Mr. Apsley Pellatt's Curiosities of Glass-Making is a valuable and comprehensive treatise on a subject full of interest, but which has received little attention from writers. The work is full of instruction and amusement; and the author, as a practical man, exhibits that thorough acquaintance with his subject which long experience can alone give. The illustrations are singularly good. The original drawings from which they had been laid on by hand, but they are all printed from stone, as many as nine or ten stones being used for a single plate. It is, perhaps, the greatest effort hitherto of this branch of art.

ILLUSTRATED WORKS ON NATURAL HISTORY are so numerous that it is difficult for criticism to keep pace with them. One work of the year, however, exhibits peculiar talent; we mean the Episodes of Insect Life. The quaint drawing up of the little winged creatures is most amusingly done. We have rarely seen more clever and original vignettes than those in this style appended to the book. In some respects they surpass even Bewick, though there is some affectation about them, and they fall infinitely short of that excellent designer in simplicity and quiet humour.

IN ARCHITECTURAL HISTORY, we have two works of some pretension—the Artists of Spain, and the Life of Collins. In the former book, by Mr. Stirling, the historical part is done better than the artist. Mr. Stirling traces Spanish art from epoch to epoch—shews the manner in which art was affected by the alteration of manners and politics—gives clever sketches of the lives of the artists, and so far has produced a very praiseworthy book; but for art in particular he has but little feeling. His descriptions of paintings are evidently taken from second-hand authorities, and he entirely, and with little gusto for his subject. We long to introduce a little more enthusiasm into his correct and instructive lucubrations.

The Life of Collins, by his son, Mr. Wilkie Collins, has suffered from the necessity which all biographers seem to feel at present—of writing huge biographies. So much has been shovelled about the life of a painter writer seems to feel that he does injustice to his subject if he does not keep pace with the rest. In consequence, we have in the present case the materials for one moderate volume spun into two. Collins's life was not an eventful one; and the main facts of his life, with such information connected with his contemporaries as those facts bring forward, are here diluted with so much extraneous matter that we lose the spirit and zest of a good biography.

ARCHITECTURAL ART. The great work of the year on this subject has but just issued from the press. Mr. Ruskin is known as one of our best writers on art; and his Seven Lamps of Architecture cannot fail to excite attention. The subject is Gothic Architecture, illustrated, not according to any peculiar style, but according to the peculiar principle which prevailed at the execution of the structure. The author divides his work according to the lamps of "Sacrifice, of Truth, of Power, of Beauty, of Life, of Memory, and of Obedience;" and illustrates them by the architectural examples belonging to the ideas of each. The illustrations are vigorous, somewhat rude, but highly expressive—taken from the most celebrated instances of mediæval architecture.

Barry's New Palace at Westminster has been well illustrated in the course of the year; and the first number of a good work on architecture, with illustrations, has just appeared, by Mr. G. Godwin.

RELIGIOUS LITERATURE.

THESE books have severally attracted considerable attention by their vehement assaults upon religious generality, or its embodiment in the forms of the Church of England. Singularly enough, two of them are from the pens of clergymen lately or still belonging to that church, while the author of the third has been throughout his life closely linked with the most earnest and highest of the High Church party. The attacks upon religion therefore have come from above instead of below—it is not an enemy that has done it. Christianity and Church-of-Englandism are assailed by the writers because they are not good enough for their ideal of faith and holiness.

First—if not in date of publication, at all events in talent and singularity—is the Nemesis of Faith, by Mr. Froude. With a plot of semi-fictitious character, the book is evidently an autobiography. Its hero bears, under the title of Markham, the tokens of identity with the author himself, almost painfully apparent. To deal with his peculiar doctrines—or, rather, doubts and denials of all doctrines—is beside our purpose. Enough to say that the book contains a picture of a mind utterly wrecked by its own presumption. Aspiring after a morality purer than that of Christianity, Markham sinks into an abyss of temptation: almost without a struggle, from an extreme of self-confidence, wherein he queries daringly the most unfathomed mysteries of Providence, he passes into its opposite, and places his private judgment blindly in the keeping of a father confessor. There is this moral to the work—that when the supporting influence of faith is withdrawn, the whole moral fabric falls inevitably into ruin. But Mr. Froude has not worked this out. He has dwelt at full length upon the details of doubt, perplexity, and inconsistency with which faith can be attacked, and has left the insidious arguments unrefuted at the end.

The Rev. Mr. Allies publishes his condemnation of the Protestant Church of England in the shape of a book of travels, entitled a Journal in France and Italy. The reverend author visits the cathedrals of Catholic countries, assists at Catholic ceremonies, and is introduced to the poor maniac girl whose body was supposed to bear a miraculous impression of the stigmata, or five wounds of the Saviour. Of all these things Mr. Allies writes long and lovingly, and winds up his narrative with the frequent expression of his desire to see the Church of England once more united with Rome, by an abandonment of all the heresies preached at the Reformation. His hopes, notwithstanding, his preferment under the Church he disparages; but, it is said, he cannot himself from ejectment by a promise not to publish a second edition of the Journal. The Rev. Baptist Noel sights with the Establishment openly and honestly. Having quitted its communion, and sacrificed all the personal interests that depended upon his ministry, he publishes the reason for his secession, under the title of Church and Dissent. These reasons bore not only against the Established Church of England, but against the very principle of establishments. A connexion with the State Mr. Noel pronounces unadvisable and unscriptural. The patronage of the rival power is purchased too dearly, by the inevitable subservience of the ministry and unsleading of the congregation. Most of the arguments are of long-standing, and have furnished weapons for many generations of dissenting religionists. They are, however, forcibly and earnestly re-stated by Mr. Noel, and thrown into wider circulation by the celebrity of his rank and secession.

The Jesuits have, within the year, been made the subject of works which have attracted more than ordinary attention. The first of these, by the Abbé Leman, and called the Secret Plan of the Jesuits, had to the expectation that many of the mysteries of the order would be exposed, and that certain doubts and questions, long agitated, would be set at rest. These expectations were disappointed; the principal part of the book consisted of a long conversation, supposed to be overheard by the author, and held by the leaders of the party for the purpose of restoring their ascendancy in the world. The means proposed were simply those long known to the world as Jesuitry—mere unscrupulous employment of falsehood and artifice. There was some dramatic power shown in the adaptation of the harangues to the supposed speakers, otherwise the book was of little value.

M. Steinmetz's History of the Jesuits is a most laborious work. He is a fierce antagonist of the order; and the mass of information he acquires respecting their doings is astonishing—so enormous, in fact, as sometimes to weigh down the author and reader together. His own feelings carry him away without his knowing it; and, with the best intentions, he has produced a partial and party work. Even in the midst of his labours, we cannot help feeling astonished for a set of men so indomitable in resolution—so earnest in purpose—so resolute in means only. So far the author disappoints his own end. As a work of information—especially on the present state of the Jesuits—this book is invaluable; and it is much to be regretted that it should be so utterly disfigured by prejudice and ill-will.

Loyola and Jesuitism is the most recent book on the subject: it is a fair analysis of the life, spirit, and plans of the founder of Jesuitism.

Mr. Sheridan Knowles' Rock of Rome deserves attention, principally from the oddity of a work on controversial theology from such a writer. The book consists of little but the old and oft-urged objections to Roman Catholic doctrines. Use and Abuse is a romance of the ultra-spiritual school. The life and practice of the infidel are contrasted with those of the believer, in a manner somewhat transcendental and highly coloured—but vigorous and effective. Some of the passages exhibit considerable talent.

In Divinity, properly so called, the most important publication is the edition of Chalmer's works, which contain much matter never before published from the pen of that lamented divine.

The Memoirs of Channing are more valuable from the extracts inserted in the work from his correspondence and manuscripts than from the details of his life itself. The latter is interesting sometimes, but contains few striking passages. The former exhibits some of the deepest, most truthful, and often original, thought that has been produced even in this thoughtful age. Many a lover, to his own country, to ours, to humanity in general, is fired and with profoundest force in these admirable extracts.

We close this part of the subject with the Testimony to the Truth. It is the record of a converted Atheist, who, in the wilds of Australia, felt the necessity of religion. The workings of a simple mind are clearly laid open, without any of the violence and affectation which generally make books of this kind repulsive to men of the world.

SERIAL LITERATURE.

A SMALL library issues from the press on the 1st of every month. It is a new and increasing fashion in literature to carve out works into slices and serve them up fresh and fresh twelve times in the year. Prose and poetry, original and selected, translations and republications of every class and character, are now included in the list of serials. The mere enumeration of titles would require more space than we can command; and any attempt to analyse the contents, or to estimate the influence which this class of reading has on the literary taste of the day would expand our remarks into a volume. We must mention, merely as an event, the appearance of the first number of a new story, David Copperfield, by Dickens, the chief and founder of the serial novel. His serial humour—as all his story, has finished one and begun another of domestic histories within the twelvemonth. The new story, Pendennis, has journied seven-twentieths of the way to completion. It bears a strong family likeness to its predecessor, so far as we may judge of an unfinished work, and manifests the same powers of minute observation and delicate delineation of character. Lever rules double with Roland Cashel and Con Cregan, making their panetual appearance upon the appointed days. His heroes are Irish, of course, and belong to the same family as himself has created, as much as Cooper created the red men of his novels. The types of both are family-like; happily, the real men, either Irish or Indian, differ widely from their portraits in the romantic pages. In Mr. Lever's two serials, now running their course, the respective heroes are taken from the extremes of wealth and poverty. They are, nevertheless, much alike in many respects, both possessing the same very peculiar standard of morality, and both spirited, and generous, and inclined to vagabondism. Mr. Albert Smith treats the "slow" and the "dull" as synonymous, and supplies the exact converse of both characters in his Pottleton Legacy. Fast and downright things move, act, and talk: the story opens with the opening of a railroad, and travels at a railroad pace all the way. We speak of the above as things that are, and are to be; and, therefore, with proper reservation for the numbers not yet published. Clement Lorimer, by Mr. Angus Reach, has come to the age of binding, and stands complete in its livery of purple and gold. It is a romance of striking interest, where a wild and almost supernatural passion of revenge is exhibited working in the midst of a polished and civilised society. The contrast is effectively contrived between the barbarism of impulse and refinement of manner in the inheritor of the vendetta; and the incidents by which the scheme of vengeance is at first aided and finally frustrated are devised and sustained very artistically. Of another order is Mr. Jerrold's Man Made of Money. Incidents are of little consequence to the author, except by way of pegs to hang reflections and conclusions upon. It is not a story that he has to tell, but a theory he wants to establish, which stimulates the production of most of Mr. Jerrold's works, and the Man Made of Money among the rest. His theory is tolerably widely known, thanks to the earnestness with which he has propagated it. To sum it up briefly, it is, that riches are evils and the source of evils; and that poverty is good and the opportunity for good. Like very many other theories, it is right in part; and, though Mr. Jerrold may advocate it with too little reserve, there are plenty of counteracting influences at work to restore the equilibrium of opinion on the side of wealth. In the minute touches of descriptive and incidental reflections, the author of the Man Made of Money is then, as always, most felicitous.

Passing over the long list of magazines and reviews as belonging to another class of publication, we come to a numerous series of reprints, new editions, &c, issued in monthly parts, and generally in cheap and compendious form. Shakespeare and Byron among the poets, Bulwer, Dickens, and James among the novelists, appear pretty regularly—the poets being enriched with notes and illustrations. Other writers and miscellaneous novels find republication in the Parlour Library of Fiction, with so rigid an application of economy, that for two shillings we may purchase a guinea and a half's worth of the most popular romances at the original price of publication. Besides the works of imagination, and above them in value, stand Knight's series of Monthly Volumes, Murray's Home and Colonial Library, and the Scientific and Literary Libraries of Mr. Bohn. The contents of these collections are very diversified; many volumes are altogether original, and others are new translations of foreign works, or modernised versions of antiquarian authors. A large mass of the most valuable works contained in our literature may be found in Mr. Bohn's Library. The class of publications introduced in them all partakes but little of the serial character. It is only the form of their appearance which gives them a place among the periodicals.

STATISTICAL LITERATURE.

UNDER this head we class three books which have entered very fully into the greater features of the people they illustrate. Life in Russia contains a good deal of this kind of information. But Mr. Thompson's Austria and Sir J. Phillips' Wales almost exhaust their subjects. About the internal polity of Austria very little was known; and Mr Thompson gives very complete information in a thoroughly lucid style. Sir J. Phillips is a complete Welshman—eager, impassioned in defence of his countrymen; admitting and defending all their prejudices, which he himself shares in no small degree. His work is that of a partisan, but a temperate one; and his collection of the facts relative to Wales is by far the most complete that has yet appeared.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

"SHYLOCK REFUSING THRICE THE AMOU HIS BOND."—PAINTED BY C. R. LEAR.

In the first picture—Mr. Lear's "Shylock refusing the amount of his Bond" (No. 699, in the Room with the Drawings and Miniatures), the artist has not painted a theatrical or conventional version of the amous scene from Shakspeare's Merchant o, Venice, but he has rendered it according to his own conception of the poet's incident: the treatment is, therefore, perfectly original.

In the second picture—"Cattle Returning," painted by Mr. Lee and Mr. T. S. Cooper" (No. 377, in the Middle Room) there is a kind of contest for superiority, and each artist has done his best.

PICTURESQUE SKETCHES OF LONDON, PAST AND PRESENT.

BY THOMAS MILLER.

CHAPTER XII.—GREENWICH PARK, AND RIVER SCENERY.

All doubts about the immense population of London would vanish from the mind of a stranger, if he but occupied some commanding position below the bridges and witnessed the many thousands who, on a fine summer day pass along the Thames;—to say nothing of the numerous railways which throw out their iron arms into the country from every corner of the metropolis. He would, on the river alone, see a sight to convince him that the population of London takes the lead of the whole wide world, and sinks into insignificance all other cities in the universe. It is, indeed, a grand sight to see the busy steamers darting to and fro, and cleaving the sparkling waters asunder in their rapid course, while the decks are crowded with happy holiday passengers, some going up towards Richmond or the pleasant meadows of Twickenham, while others are on their way to the Nore, Gravesend, or Woolwich; but the greater number to wander through the beautiful avenues of Greenwich Park, or run down the steep hill-sides, and recline on the green slopes, which are everywhere overhung with pleasant trees, just as our artist has pictured them. But, beautiful as Greenwich Park is within itself, with its long aisles of overhanging chesnuts, through whose branches the sunlight streams, and throws upon the velvet turf rich chequered rays of green and gold, it is the vast view which stretches out on every hand that gives such a charm to the scene. What a glorious prospect opens out from the summit of Observatory Hill. London, mighty and magnificent! piercing the sky with its high-piled towers, spires, and columns, while St. Paul's, like a mighty giant, heaves up his rounded shoulders as if keeping guard over the outstretched city. Far away the broad bright river is lost to sight, until it loses itself in the dim ground of the hazy distance, while its course is well pointed out by the spreading sail, which hangs like a fallen cloud upon the landscape. Along this ancient road of the swans do vessels approach from every corner of the habitable globe, to empty their riches into the great reservoir of London, from whence they are again sent through a thousand channels to the remotest homes in her islands.

About June, Greenwich-park may be seen in all its bloom and beauty; the fine old hawthorns are then generally in full blossom, and the hundreds of gigantic elms and chesnuts are hung in their richest array of summer-green, while here and there the antlered herd cross the shady avenues, or crouched amid what is called the Wilderness, lie half buried in the fan-like fern. The hill above and the plain below are crowded with the gay populace of London, all clothed in their holiday attire, the ladies looking in the distance like a bed of tulips, so rich and varied are the colours of the costume and parasols. At every few yards you meet with a new group, while the long avenue which leads up to Blackheath is one continuous stream of people. On the brow of the hill, and at the front of the Observatory, you see the old pensioners with their telescopes and glasses of every colour, which seem to give a golden or a purple hue to the landscape, or sometimes to change the scene to that of a country covered with snow. Some of these old heroes have lost a leg, others an arm, and yet they go stumping about as happy, to all appearance, as the credulous cockneys whom they delight to crain with an improbable yarn, while they shoot cannon-balls to a distance which can be compared with nothing except Warner's "long-range."

Rare fun is there amongst the younger visitors, as they scramble for the oranges, which are often bountifully rolled down the hills. Off goes the luscious fruit, cantering like a ball of gold along the greensward. It strikes and clears the head of the first youngster who rushes on to catch it; a second misses it and falls; and it vanishes somewhere amongst a round dozen of the competitors, who are all tumbling and struggling hickety-pickety together, like a pack of hounds who are in at the death. Further on you see a little love-making; you can tell by the half-averted head and downcast eyes, that the little lady has not yet made up her mind whether to accept the offered arm or not. But see—her boy-lover has purchased some oranges. She accepts one; he sends another down the hill. You hear her clear merry voice ringing out like a silver bell with joyous laughter. Ten to one it is a match!—at least for the remainder of the day. Old and young are alike happy—the former sit in little groups talking of former times; the latter are tumbling head and heels upon the grass without a care about the coming morrow. Business and pleasure go hand in hand. If you take every card that is offered, you will have a score or two before you cross the Park:—"Tea, eightpence—with a pleasant view of the trees." "Tea made with shrimps, ninepence"—a beverage we have no wish to taste; but, poor woman, she is unconscious of the mistake and no doubt the pointer faithfully followed his copy. They are the most accommodating people in the world at Greenwich. You can walk into almost every other house, order tea, and receive thanks at your departure, for only a few pence. Numbers come into the Park ready provided. They eat and drink while on the steam-boat, feel a fresh appetite as soon as they have climbed the hill, are hungry and thirsty again after a donkey-ride on Blackheath, and should anything remain, in either basket or bottle, they finish it as they return by the steam-boat.

Observe the stealthy step of that tawny gipsy girl. She is her harvest, and many a fortune will she tell before mourise. She has golden promises for all; would that the world could roll on as she prophesies, there would be but little of either sighing or sorrow in it. What though she is an arch impostor, she has yet her promise of another pleasure to the day's delight; happiness now and happiness in store may gladden many a future hour, which would otherwise be gloomy but for the hope with which the gipsy has gilded the future. It is a question, after all, whether the sixpence could have been better spent, though it has but purchased a harmless string of pleasing falsehoods, "which give delight but hurt not." The poor gipsy-woman must live, and she is at the worst but an open and honestly-avowed cheat—an holiday evil, that might be worse employed than in rolling fortunes. What a burst of laughter! It is just as we expected; the jolly sailor, with the corners of his neckerchief streaming out like the mane of a war-horse, has gone down the hill with a roll, and carried his partner, the dashing lady from Wapping in the pink bonnet, along with him. There will be many similar disasters before night, which end at the worst in a crushed hat or bonnet, or a few harmless bruises.

Much as we have murmured about trespassing, and prosecution, and enclosures, we really feel grateful to the Government for throwing open such a splendid Park as this, over which the valley we can never know. Those ancient barrows, which lie scattered about the park, are the resting places of the early inhabitants of Britain; beneath them lies the dust of the old Cymri—distarb it not.

I have on a former occasion described Greenwich Park in my "Pictures of Country Life," as it is supposed to have appeared a few centuries ago, in the following passage:—Let us pause on the brow of this hill, and recall a few of the stirring scenes which these aged hawthorns have overlooked. They are the ancient fences of the chase, and many of them have stood through the wintry storms of past centuries, and were guarded, and knotted, and stricken with age, long before Evelyn planned and planted those noble avenues of chesnuts and elms. Below, between the plain at the foot of the hill and the river, stood the old Palace of Greenwich, in white. Henry the Eighth held his revels, and where Edward the Sixth, the boy-King, died. The early chroniclers say that his death was caused by poison, which he inhaled while smelling a nosegay. That ancient palace was no doubt rich in the spoils of many a plundered abbey and ruined monastery; in vessels of gold and silver which had once been dedicated to holy purposes, but were then red with the drops of the wine shed at many a midnight revel by the Defender of the Faith and Woman-Murdering Monarch. Perhaps the walls of that old palace were hung with the portraits of the wives he had caused to be beheaded, while his own likeness in the centre looked like a fiend out of the frame upon its prey.

On this hill Cardinal Wolsey may have meditated with all his "blushing honours thick upon him." Katherine, the broken-hearted Queen, may here have refused him her parting gift from this aged hawthorn have torn off a spray, when it was, as now, fragrant and white with May blossoms, and presented it with a smile to the Royal savage who rode beside her. On yonder plain, where so many happy faces are now seen, in former days the tournament was held. There gaudy galleries were erected, over which youth and beauty leant as they waved their embroidered scarfs. We can almost fancy that we can see the crowned tiger smile as he closes the visor of his helmet, bowing his plume while he recognises some fair face, which was soon to fall, with its long tresses dabbled in blood, upon the scaffold—the blood which then ran so clear, and joyous through the violet-coloured veins which streaked the ivory of that graceful neck. In this park the crafty Cecil mused many an hour as he plotted the return of the Princess Mary, while the ink was scarcely dry with which he had recorded his allegiance to the Lady Jane Grey. The whole scenery teems with the remembrance of old stirring events, and grave historical associations. Hal, the murderer, comes straddling and blowing up the hill; the pale and sickly boy-King rides gently by, and breathes heavily as he inhales the sweet air on the summit; the fitter and merry laugh of ill-starred Queens seems to fall upon the ear from behind the trees that conceal them. Then we hear voices of mourning and loud lament from fair attendants—who refuse to be comforted—for those whom they loved and served were there no more. Such are a few, amongst the many scenes which have been enacted on the very spot which is now the favourite resort of the Londoners at Easter and Whitsuntide.

Blackheath, which is only divided from its aristocratic neighbour, the Park, by a wall, pleasantly overlooks a portion of the counties of Kent and Surrey, and affords such extensive views of the distant scenery as can only be exceeded by climbing Shooter's Hill, or some of the neighbouring heights on the left of the heath. In past times it was planted with gibbets; the bleached bones of men who had dared to ask for an extension of liberty, or who doubted the infallibility of Kings, were here left to dangle in the wind. In the distance, the ancient palace of Eltham heaves up like a large barn, attracting even the eye of a stranger by its bulkiness, for not an architectural ornament from hence is visible. Blackheath at Whitsuntide, and all summer long, is infested with asses, which ever stand, saddled and bridled, in readiness for the first comer. A donkey ride is one of the favourite amusements of our holiday-loving Londoners of both sexes, nor is the day's pleasure considered complete without it. The charges vary from a penny to a shilling, according to either the time or the distance; and a strange, rough, and inharmonious family are the proprietors, who beat and let out these animals. Their chief delight appears to consist in abusing one another, and running down the qualities of the poor long-eared quadrupeds—each applicant, at the same time, extolling the strength and speed of his own donkey. Here they may be found with side-saddles for the ladies, and neat chairs, covered with white drapery, and so secured that the little children can ride with safety.

A countryman who went by water for the first time from London to Greenwich, would be astonished to find that, with the exception of a few yards here and there, the whole five miles, on each side of the Thames, was one continuation of houses, warehouses, docks, and manufactories; that the [illegible] of Bankside, which were London when Queen Elizabeth went down to Tilbury, had continued almost uninterrupted to Deptford and Greenwich. Behind the marshes and the Isle of Dogs up to the Blackwall piers; and from the height in the neighbourhood could he, at one glance over this lengthy range of continued streets. Twelve miles would scarcely exceed the almost unbroken link of buildings which extends from Blackwall to far beyond Chelsea, where street still joins to street in apparent endless succession. And all around this vast city he miles of the most beautiful rural scenery. Highgate and Hornsey and Hampstead on the Middlesex side, hilly, wooded, and watered; and facing these, the vast range called the Hogs-back, which hems in the Surrey side, from beyond Norwood far away to the left to where we have carried our readers in this article; while the valleys on both sides of the river are filled with pleasant fields, parks, and green winding lanes. Were London to extend five miles further every way, it would still be hemmed in with some of the most beautiful rural scenery in England; and the lowness of fares, with the rapidity of the railways, would soon make up for this extent of streets. We, who care not for travelling in your first-rate carriages, are often tempted on a fine day to take a third-class ticket to Croydon and back, which frees us both ways for the sum of one shilling—a distance of nearly twenty miles.

THE RIVER THAMES, FROM ETON TO THE NORE.

PENNANT, in his pleasant quarto of "Some Account of London," says:—"I should speak with the prejudices of a true Englishman, were I to dignify the Thames with the title of the chief of rivers." He then qualifies his patriotism with its just claim to that of first of island rivers; adding, "there is no river in any part of Europe which can boast of more utility in bringing farther from the ocean the largest commercial ships; nor is there any which can bring the riches of the universe to their very capital." If these observations were applicable in the last century (when they were written), how much more characteristic must they be of the spectacle of wealth and power which this magnificent river presents in our day to the spectator from either parapet of London Bridge? The "very head" of this renowned stream lies "in a secluded dell, overhung with a luxuriant canopy of foliage," yet, as if foreboding its greatness, the crystal water gushes from out the rock, whirls, and starts

> Off with a sally and a flash of speed,
> As if it scorn'd both resting-place and rest.

Then, as the mind's eye tracks the sinuous stream from its solitary head in its majestic course to the metropolis, we shall not fail to be struck alike with the glowing imagery and truthful beauty of the poet's celebrated lines:—

> From its rocky bed
> Old Father Thames advanced his reverend head.
> His tresses dropped with dew, and o'er the stream
> His shadowing horns diffused a watery gleam.
> Graved on his urn appear'd the moon, that guides
> His swelling waters, and alternate tides.
> The figured streams in waves of silver roll'd,
> And on his banks Augusta rose in gold.
> Around his throne the sea-born brothers stood,
> Who swell with tributary urns his flood.
> First, the famed authors of his ancient name,
> The winding Isis and the fruitful Thame;
> The Kennet swift, for silver eels renown'd;
> The Loddon slow, with verdant alders crown'd;
> Cole, whose dark streams his flowery islands lave;
> And chalky Wey, that rolls a milky wave:
> The blue transparent Vandalis appears;
> And gulphy Lee his oozy tresses rears;
> And sullen Mole, that hides his diving flood;
> And silent Darent, stain'd with British blood.
> POPE'S Windsor Forest.

Before, however, we start with the reader upon our descriptive tour, as an accompaniment to the Picture-Map upon the preceding pages, let us glance, in a few lines, at

THE TOPOGRAPHY OF THE RIVER.

The Thames was known by the name of Tamys or Thames at least as early as the seventh century, if not long before—even in the Roman times; and it was so called, in the upper part of its course, long prior to its junction with the river Tame; where, according to Camden, "the Tame and Isis uniting, do, as it were, join hands in wedlock, and with their streams unite their names." The Thames may properly be said to owe its origin to the confluence of several small streams which issue from the eastern side of the Cotswold Hills, in Gloucestershire, the most remote of which has been, from time immemorial, called the Thames Head. This is a copious spring, rising near the village of Tarlton, about three miles to the south-west of Cirencester. In the summer season, however, a long drought renders its spring so nearly dry as to appear little otherwise than a large dell, but covered with weeds and stones. At about a mile from its source, the stream receives a considerable accession from various springs; and here the Thames river may properly be said to form a constant current; which, according to Ireland, "though not more than nine feet wide in the summer months, becomes in the winter season such a torrent as to overflow the neighbouring meadows for many miles around."

A tourist has thus pleasantly described the Thames Head—which, however, must not be confounded with "the very head" already referred to, and issues from "Seven Springs," about three miles south of Cheltenham:—"After a long ascent (says our tourist), you come to some solitary grassy hills; on the top of these, under the shade of two or three alders, is a little group of plashy springs, which trickle away, forming, as far as the eye can follow them, an insignificant brook. Such is the infant modesty of the proud Thames! I felt a tide of poetry come over my mind as I thought how, but a few hours ago, and a few miles hence, I had seen these same waters covered with a thousand vessels; but this glorious stream, in its short course, bears on its bosom more ships, and more human beings than any of its colossal brethren; how the capital of the world lies on its banks, and, by her own omnipotent commerce, may be said almost to rule the four quarters of the globe."

Although the Thames rises in Gloucestershire, it soon enters Wiltshire, and runs eastward to Cricklade, in that county, receiving in its passage the waters of the river Churn; thence it flows on to Lechlade, being joined in its course by the Coln and the Lech. It then pursues a winding direction between the counties of Oxford and Berks, its stream being augmented by the rivers Windrush, Cherwell, and Thame, flowing from the north; and the Ock, the Kennet, and the Loddon, from the south. Passing by Windsor and Eton, its channel divides Middlesex from Surrey, throughout the whole extent of their devious and opposing shores.

After receiving the tributary waters of the Coln, the Thames flows between the towns of Staines and Egham, and passing by Chertsey to Weybridge, is there joined by the river Wey, from the south-west of Surrey; thence it takes its course by Walton-on-Thames to West and East Moulsey, between which place it is joined by the Mole, another river of Surrey. After proceeding eastward to Thames Ditton, it takes a northward course, and passes the towns of Hampton, Kingston, and Richmond. Then flowing between Brentford and Kew, it receives the Brane, or Brent, from the north. It next winds between Chiswick, Hammersmith, Fulham, and Chelsea, on the northern bank; and Barnes, Putney, and Battersea, on the south; the little river Wandle falling into it near Wandsworth. Thence proceeding to the north-east, its broad stream separates the cities of Westminster and London from their long-extended southern suburbs, Lambeth, Southwark, Bermondsey, and Rotherhithe. It next divides the counties of Essex and Kent, from both of which it receives several tributary streams (the Medway being the most important of the whole), and, gradually expanding into an arm of the sea, it unites its waves with the German Ocean about the point called the Nore, between the Isle of Sheppy and Shoebury Ness. From the original spring at Thames Head to the termination of its course, the length of this noble river is about 220 miles; of which nearly 150 miles are navigable. At its source, the stream is computed to be about 280 feet above the level of low-water mark at London Bridge. Between this and Westminster Bridge, the mean velocities of the flood and ebb are—flood, three miles an hour; extreme, three and a half; ebb, three and one-sixth; extreme, three and three fourths."

A RIVER HOLIDAY.

A pleasant writer has thus sketched the temptation of a bright summer's day to a Londoner:—

"On such a soft, sunny, balmy morning as this, the eye and the mind are athirst for the green fields: desire of the country asserts its supremacy like an instinct, and we cannot, do what we will, expel it from our thoughts. We are restless, unsatisfied, and sentimental, like men in love; and so we are—in love with Nature; and it is the memory of her sweet face, and the pleasures we have erewhile enjoyed in her society, that now haunt us like a vision of delight. We cannot go on with our work: pen, paper, and ink, without, how tantalizing the clear blue sky, transfixed by a thousand soaring chimney-pots, and the balmy breeze wafting along city odours and city dust! The sunbeams, gilding puddles that the watering-carts left, mock our own reflectionment with their glancing: we feel as prisoners in a dungeon, when moonlite lets a downward ray of sunlight into their miserable cell. We are mewed up; and, while fi wers are springing from the grassy turf, the birds singing on every spray, and the little flies swarming in the sunny beam, we are here improunded between double files of ugly brick houses, hard flags under our feet, a Babel of discordant sounds around us, and nothing of quiet, beautiful nature visible but the narrow strip of heaven's azure overhead! 'Tis too much; we can stand it no longer!"

Of all Holidays enjoyed by the Londoner, there is nothing like a ramble on his famous river, east or west of London-bridge. Compared with this, a railway excursion is a most monotonous affair. the iron road, with its sulphurous clouds from the blutant locomotive, must not be placed in comparison with the "silver-winding way" of the Thames. True it is that steam has not yet accomplished such wonders by river as by rail; but what the navigator loses in speed he surely gains in the full enjoyment of the delightful scenery of his river, which is so richly fraught with interest, so laden with poetic association, and so freighted with the golden stores of the past, and the ready wealth of the present, that it were but an act of thankless nature to be whirled through such sweet delights at railway rate. Our Whitsun Holiday Ramble shall, therefore, be by river; and start we

FROM LONDON BRIDGE TO ETON AND WINDSOR.

London Bridge itself is unrivalled in the world, in "the perfection of proportion, and the true greatness of simplicity." We shall not look through the vista of eight centures, during which a bridge or mode of communication has existed between the City and the opposite bank, in this locality, but content ourselves with stating that the new Bridge is at about 100 feet higher up the river than the old one. Of its five arches, the centre one, 152 feet 6 inches span, and 37 feet 6 inches rise, is, perhaps, the largest elliptical arch ever attempted. The piers and abutments stand upon platforms of timber resting upon piles ab ut 20 feet long; and the masonry is from 8 to 10 feet below the bed of the river. The roadway, too, is 52 feet in width. The vast work was begun in 1824; the foundation-stone laid in 1825, in the presence of the late Duke of York; and the bridge was opened, with great state, by King William IV. and Queen Adelaide, in 1831. The cost of the Bridge and approaches nearly reached a million and a half of money. The latter are very fine, especially the roadway leading into the heart of the City, where a statue of King William has been set up to commemorate the "opening" event.

Fishmongers' Hall occupies a granite platform at the south-west angle of the bridge; the river front having an arcade and terrace, above which rises the Grecian Ionic Hall. In delightful situation, elegance of design, and capaciousness and convenience, this edifice equals, if not excels, the other City Companies' Halls. Westward are the steam-boat piers, where a fleet of steamers ply throughout the day.

Saint Saviour's Church, on the opposite bank, is here seen to possess much of the grandeur of a cathedral: from its lofty pinnacled tower, 150 feet high, Hollar drew his celebrated view of London. It has a set of twelve bells, the weight of which are ranked among the heaviest in the kingdom. A great portion of the banks, thence to the Southwark Bridge, is occupied by Barclay and Perkins's brew house, including the site of the Globe Theatre. Upon the opposite bank, one of the most interesting features is Queenhithe, anciently a Saxon haven, now a steam-boat dépôt.

At Queenhithe and Dowgate (where stood one of the Roman gates), customs were paid by ships resting; and near here the ancient Walbrook, or river of wells, runs into the Thames. In the church at Queenhithe (St. Michael's) rest the remains of the good Sir Richard Whittington; and, emblematic of the hide, the vane of the church is a gilt ship, the hull of which will hold a bushel of corn. The Three Cranes was the Royal wine-wharf, and the Vintrie the vast wine-house and vaults, in times when the best foreign wine was sold at 12d. a gallon.

From London Bridge to Whitefriars was formerly occupied by the "inns" or town houses of great men, whose names are now affixed to lanes and wharves. Thus, we have Cold Harbour, a tenement in the reign of Edward II.; Trig, where the Abbot of Chertsey had his City mansion; Baynard's, from Baynard Castle, where Shakspeare has laid scene vii. act iii. of his "Richard III.," and several others.

Southwark Bridge is a wonder of our iron age. It was cast at Rotherham, in Yorkshire, and its construction was begun in 1814, and completed in 1819. Its solid ribs, segmental pieces, tie-braces, sockets, and wedges, are seen to advantage from the river; its arches, by the way, rise and fall about an inch within the usual range of atmospheric temperature.

Saint Paul's Cathedral, with its proudly swelling dome, and its beautiful clock towers, next arrests our attention: the dome is, however, better seen from Blackfriars Bridge, where it appears in impressive contrast with the less harmonious body of the building. The cross is 360 feet in height from the pavement of the nave of the church, and is level with Jack Straw's Castle Tavern, on Hampstead Heath. The Cross, Bali, and Golden Gallery have lately been re-gilt.

The City Steam Pier, east of Blackfriars Bridge, is the most important accommodation of its class: it has no pretension to ornament; but, as a convenience for the many thousand passengers who embark and land at this point, is of importance.

Blackfriars Bridge is next reached. Its recent repair has been a very costly business, and the lover of architecture will scarcely forgive the engineer for his removal of the graceful balustrades, and substitution of a solid parapet. It was built 1760-70—of Portland stone, and with too great a declivity of road, which rendered these alterations indispensable.

The City Gas-Works, just beyond Blackfriars Bridge, nearly occupy the site of the ancient sanctuary of Whitefriars, the Alsatia of James the First's day, repeopled by Scott, in his "Fortunes of Nigel."

The Temple Gardens be just above—a green spot in a desert of brick and mortar; they are historically commemorated by Shakspeare, in his "Henry VI.," pt. i., wherein were plucked the two emblems under which the houses of York and Lancaster fought for half the country. The Temple, with its beautifully restored round church, and its countless associations with great names, is one of the most famous London localities. East of the garden, a red brick and stone pile of building in the Tudor style is in course of erection, but all asserts with the rest of the Temple buildings.

Somerset House is next reached, and its Venetian front is of striking magnificence; whilst its balustraded terrace forms a charming promenade, and affords a most enlivening prospect of the river. Somerset House is Sir William Chambers's noblest work, and cost upwards of half a million sterling.

Waterloo Bridge, pronounced by Canova to be the finest structure of the kind in the world, now claims our notice. It was commenced in 1809, and opened with great ceremony, on the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo, in 1817, by George IV., then Prince Regent, and the Duke of Wellington. Each of its nine arches is 120 feet span, and its level line of roadway is the perfection of bridge-building; it cost more than a million of money, a larger sum than the expense of building St. Paul's, the Monument, and nine of our finest metropolitan churches.

The Shot-Tower, to the left of Waterloo Bridge, exceeds in architectural beauty many of our public structures, and has been pronounced finer than the Monument of Wren.

The Adelphi Terrace is another instance of what individual taste and liberality have done towards the embellishment of the metropolis; the prospect from this point is indescribably beautiful. We must not pass over the richly ornamented Water-gate on the terrace facing the end of Buckingham-street; this was the work of Inigo Jones, and is all that remains of the princely mansion of the Duke of Buckingham—telling of the pageant splendour of the Thames in the olden time. In the last house towards the river, on the east side of Buckingham-street, lodged Peter the Great. We now reach

The Hungerford Suspension Bridge, communicating with Hungerford Market—a noble provision for public convenience, but ill requited by public patronage: the design is cleverly adapted from a Roman model. At Hungerford is the great focus of the Thames steam navigation; it being calculated that upwards of a million persons embark and land at this point annually. The Suspension-bridge, by Brunel, is a fine specimen of mechanical skill: it consists of two brick piers in the Italian style, over which are carried the chains, forming a triple span, the central one being 676½ feet, or 110 feet wider than the Menai Bridge; the length between the abutments is 1352 feet; weight of the bridge, 700,000 tons; the viaduct being twenty-eight feet above high water—[illegible] feet higher than the crown of the centre arch of Waterloo. The toll is one halfpenny at either end for foot passengers. With the exception of the Wire Bridge at Fribourg, this is the [illegible] suspension bridge in existence.

We [illegible] little to notice until we reach Westminster-bridge, if we except the extensive pile of Northumberland House, and the mansions of Whitehall Gardens, among which that of Sir Robert Peel rarely fails to attract attention. In this locality was the ancient Palace of Whitehall, a Royal abode from 1530 to 1698, when the whole was burned, except the Banqueting House, now remaining; and which, though used as a chapel, has never been consecrated. In Whitehall Yard, adjoining, is the United Service Museum, which may be inspected gratuitously every day, on the introduction of an order from a member of the [illegible]

Westminster Bridge has been an expensive job from first to last. Labeye, the architect, states the quantity of stone contained in it [illegible] double that employed in St. Paul's Cathedral. It was opened in [illegible] years after the [illegible] and nearly half a million of money! A short time since, [illegible] the Royal Agricultural Society [illegible] the Royal Exchange, and [illegible] to 42 per cent. of rubbish [illegible] procured; the Duke of [illegible] with wate[illegible]

Mr. Barry, [illegible] stone bridge, [illegible] right and graceful design. We now reach

The New Houses of Parliament, with their river front, upwards of 800 feet in length, a lofty clock tower, and the Victoria entrance tower, not yet completed. The "New Palace," as it is termed, will eventually be a truly magnificent pile, including ancient Westminster Hall in its plan. To the right is Westminster Abbey, built, by the way, upon a [illegible] foundations. The Church and its richly-decorated Chapel of Henry VII. are the architectural studies; and the monuments of kings, warriors, statesmen, philosophers, and poets, which it enshrines, must ever render it dear to English memories.

The Penitentiary, at Millbank, was built some thirty years [illegible] cost of half a [illegible]. The [illegible] reform of prisoners: the prison is octagonal in form, and [illegible] inclosed within the [illegible] wall. The [illegible] is a healthier locality [illegible] vast extent of buildings which have [illegible] almost within the present century upon a [illegible] Thames, is in part, the [illegible] palace-houses, to which [illegible] circumstance of [illegible] David.

Lambeth Palace, on the opposite side of the river, is, in many respects, the most interesting antiquarian pile in the suburbs. Its lofty gateway towers are fine specimens of early brickwork, as is also the Prison House of the Lollards, the Hall, &c. This has been to more than [illegible] the palace of the Archbishops of Canterbury; and, as each primate has kept the establishment in repair, or added to its appurtenances, it presents a rare aspect of stately grandeur; the well-timbered grounds, too, [illegible] as seen from the river. Within [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] Library, a tower of the time [illegible] lately restored.

Vauxhall Gardens, higher up, merit passing notice, though rather for their old [illegible] country than their present fortune: their fame is upwards of a century and a half old; but all recollections of Sir Samuel Morland, by whom the gardens were originally planted, of Addison and Steele's Mrs. Tofts and Hogarth and Hayman's pictures, have been swept away by the macadamized demands for novelty.

We are now beginning to escape from the smoke of the great town; but tall chimneys still threaten us occasionally with their blackening clouds. To the left are Steam Boat Piers; and close by a not unpicturesque windmill is the landing-place for passengers by the South-Western and Richmond, Wimbledon and Staines Railways.

Chelsea Hospital is next seen to the right, extending 800 feet in length—a noble monument of national munificence and gratitude. In 1838, its stately gardens, which had been closed to the public, were re-opened for their gratification. The Hospital and its pensioners should be seen; the chapel and hall, with their war-stand ards and paintings, are also worth inspection. To the benevolent Sir Stephen Fox is attributed the building of the Hospital;—"No matter," says Faulkner, "with whom the idea may have originated, whether with him, with his master (Charles II.), with Nell Gwynne, it is certain that but for his exertions the project would have come to nothing. Opposite the Hospital terrace is "the Red House," about 50 yards west of which, Cæsar is believed, by some antiquaries, to have forded the Thames.

Chelsea, with its river-side walk, is enlivened by the crowds flocking to its steam-boat quays, but its olden celebrity is well nigh forgotten, and the buns are nearly as rare as the china. The Thomas More's house was taken down more than a century [illegible] Street, [illegible] is the [illegible] Botanic Garden of the Apothecaries' Company, founded by Sir [illegible], whose statue is in the grounds, as well as a pair of [illegible] elephants.

Battersea Bridge is next reached; it was built of wood, in 1771, and is altogether unworthy of its position across a river spanned by some of the finest bridges in the world. The village of Battersea is chiefly remarkable for its association with Lord Bolingbroke, who was born in the family mansion here, and who lies beneath a stately tomb in the church. In a parlour of the mansion Pope wrote his "Essay on Man." A very picturesque "Decorated" church has just been erected in this parish.

Battersea is noticeable as the first fishing-station: formerly, Blackfriars and Westminster-bridges were favourite places of resort, but various causes have driven the fish further up the river. Boat and dace-fishing may be had during July, August, September, and October, from a boat fastened to the piles of Battersea Bridge; and the same kind of fishing may also be had at Putney-bridge. Two hours before and one after flood are the best periods for these stations. Among Thames fish, trout are few in number; pike and jack are more numerous; and the following fish are abundant in all parts of the Thames, from Battersea-bridge upwards, viz. perch, barbel, chub, eels, lampreys, flounders, roach, dace, gudgeons, bleak, [illegible] pope, ruffe, and minnows; [illegible] tench are taken. In the rich alluvial [illegible] great quantities of asparagus are grown.

Cremorne House is at a short distance above Battersea Bridge, on the right bank: the mansion was formerly the elegant villa of Lord Cremorne, who had here a fine collection of Italian and Flemish pictures; and adjoining was the residence of Dr. Hoadley (brother of the Bishop), the author of "The Suspicious Husband." Cremorne has been converted into a place of public entertainment, for which the grounds are admirably adapted; and shoals of company are landed here from steam-boats.

Putney Bridge, with the twin villages of Fulham and Putney, is next reached. The bridge is of wood, and was erected in 1729, by subscription. Alongside the piles, for about two hours before low water, some large roach may be taken.

Fulham parish is the great fruit and kitchen garden, north of the Thames, for the supply of London. The church is of stone, and has a stone tower of the 14th century, which, about three years and a half since, was restored and in part rebuilt, under the able superintendence of Mr. G. Godwin, F.R.S. This church and churchyard have been the burial-place of all the prelates of the See of London since the Restoration, except Bishop Porteus. The manor-house of Fulham has been the palace of the Bishops of London from the seventh century, the present house [illegible] brick, and was in part built in the reign of Henry VII.; and the grounds are surrounded by a moat. In a small house, near the church and facing the river, lived for many years Theodore Hook, the popular novelist.

Putney has an ancient church, with Bishop West's beautiful chapel, in the style of Henry the seventh's, at Westminster. The Bishop and Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex, contemporaries, were both natives of Putney; the father of one being a baker, and of the other a blacksmith. Both fell victims to Henry the Eighth: Cromwell was beheaded, and Bishop West died of grief at the loss of his Sovereign's favour. Gibbon, the historian, was also born at Putney. [illegible] who built here a gallery for the portrait of the celebrated Kit Cat Club. At Barnes-terrace [illegible] Richmond and Windsor branch of the South-Western Railway will cross the Thames by an iron bridge of three arches.

Chiswick, with its church, tower, and suburban villas next. Here lie all that remains of Kent, the gardener; Lord Macartney and Charles James Fox, the statesman; Ralph, the architectural critic; Loutherbourg, the painter; Garrick, with an epitaph by Garrick; and Mary, Countess of Falconberg, daughter of Oliver Cromwell: and here, too, is the Duke of Devonshire's Palladian Villa, where Fox died, in 1806; and Canning, in 1827.

After passing Chiswick, on the Middlesex bank, and Mortlake, on the Surrey side, we reach [illegible] arches, completed in [illegible] years since for £222,000. A little higher on the Middlesex bank, is Brentford, the county town, where members of Parliament are elected. Below Brent falls into the Thames. The town is a long, [illegible] which George II. liked from its resemblance to Lüneburg. A new bridge has been erected across the bridge. The church stands upon Kew Green: it was [illegible] erected through the munificence of King William IV., [illegible] 1838, nearly [illegible] to have been set aside for the completion of the work. [illegible] churchyard are buried Meyer, Zoffani, and Gainsborough, the distinguished painters. Among the mansions surrounding Kew Green are those of the King of Hanover and the Duke of Cambridge. The old red brick "Palace" was occupied by Queen Charlotte as a nursery for her children; and here she expired in 1818. The Royal pleasure [illegible] open to the public on Thursdays and Sundays, from Midsummer [illegible] Michaelmas: the Pagoda was designed in imitation of the Chinese Tea in 1757; it consists of 10 stories, 163 feet in height. There are several other ornamental buildings in the grounds, besides an observatory, used for some time by the British Association for the Advancement of Science. The Botanic Garden at Kew are open to the public from one till six every day, except Sundays; the entrance being from Kew-green. The [illegible] completed here, is perhaps the finest in Europe [illegible] the ribs and columns are of wrought iron, and the roofs are [illegible] sheet glass, lightly tinged with green; the floor is of [illegible] iron, under which are laid the pipes, &c. for warming by hot water; also the smoke is conveyed from the furnaces by a flue, 470 feet, to an ornamental shaft or tower, 60 feet in height. The cost of this magnificent Palm-House has been upwards of £30,000. The Gardens are visited by many thousand persons every season; during Dunham's judicious [illegible] ship of Sir W. J. Hooker, have been greatly extended and improved:—

So sits enthroned in vegetable pride
Imperial Kew, by Thames a glistening side.
Orchid nuts from realms [illegible]

Among the rarities here, is a wee[illegible] [illegible] Napoleon's tomb [illegible] papyrus; the bread fruit tree from the South Sea Islands; the cocoa-nut, coffee, and cow trees; the banana and cycas (sago); the gigantic [illegible]

In short, a more delightful addition has not of late been made to the public recreation than in the extension of the Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew.—(See the "Popular Guide," by the Curator.)

Syon House and grounds, the seat of the Duke of Northumberland, are seen by retracing our course to the river, which appears to unite with the gardens. The mansion, built on the site of an Augustine nunnery, by the Protector Somerset, became the residence of Lady Jane Grey, who was conducted from here to the Tower. The grounds form a [illegible] lawn, extending from Isleworth to Brentford.

Isleworth, with its picturesque ivy-mantled church tower, is next reached. And now, a few words as to Thames fishing. The salmon has been driven from the river by the gas-pollution and navigation; though many were taken formerly, of a peculiarly fine quality, at Mortlake, Isleworth, and other places. "Richmond and Kew afford some good fishing, in which barbel, roach, dace, &c. are taken. From Richmond to Isleworth there is good perch fishing. Except when the tide is flowing, roach and dace may be taken almost all the way from Richmond Bridge to Kew Bridge, by angling off the towing-path."—(Carpenter's "Angler's Assistant.")

The river is next crossed by a handsome railway bridge, of iron, with three arches, each 100 feet span, on the Richmond, Windsor, and Staines line.

Perhaps, there is not a finer portion of the river than that from Kew to RICHMOND.

On a bright summer's day, the beautiful scenery of Richmond and the river reminds one of the olden appellation of the place, Shene, or Sheen, bright or splendid. Mr. Holland has left us an unaffected picture of the peculiar charm of the place:—"The amateur painter may find here abundance of subjects on which to exercise his pencil, or gratify his taste for nature and art; admiration of the former, and knowledge of the latter, being alike called into action by the scenery around him. The placid stream, sweeping Denham's description—

Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full presents on one side emerald turf, of the first texture and brightest verdure, lofty elms, interspersed with chesnuts, poplars, acacias, and all the lighter shrubs, shading noble mansions with hanging gardens, and elegant cottages ornés; while, on the other, is seen the ancient village of Richmond, rising terrace-wise, and exhibiting every form of stately and of rural dwelling. A peculiar air of cheerfulness every where pervades the scene, which is alike remote from the noise and confusion attendant on the metropolis, and the sequestration which belongs to isolated dwellings in more remote districts. The pleasures of society, the tranquillity of retirement, are nowhere better combined, and completely enjoyed, than in this beautiful village and its vicinity." The bridge connects Richmond with Twickenham; it consists of five stone arches, and was built from Payne and Couse's design, in 1779. The olden celebrities of Richmond are too numerous to be pressed into a column: of its Tudor palace, a gateway remains, on the Green.

Here Thomson sang the Seasons, and their change, and the poet lies buried in the old church; where also rest Mrs. Yates, the tragic actress, and her husband, and Edmund Kean. The Royal Park abounds with fine forest scenery, and the herd of fallow and red deer is very numerous. One of the lodges is the residence of Lord John Russell; and on the hill side the Marquis of Lansdowne has a mansion, embosomed in shrubbery and picturesque wood. These statesmen, by the way, are not by some scores the first who have found relief from the fatigues of office amidst the "pendent woods" and embowering walks of Richmond. The highest point in the Park commands views of Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's, with the Hampstead, Highgate, and Harrow hills; but Windsor Castle has been shut out of the prospect by the new plantation near the terrace. Lord Byron provokingly describes the prospect as all smoke and water; Thomson and Maurice have, however, enshrined its beauties in the amber of their verse; though the former modifies his enthusiasm with the line—

To where the silver Thames first rural grows.

From the hill there is a delightful forest walk to Petersham and Ham House, with a fine gallery of portraits by Vandyck and Lely, and tapestry, carvings, &c. At Richmond, the angler will find the first and most extensive deep or preserve on the river. The best station for barbel is about 200 yards above the bridge, from the middle of August to the end of October: the dace are also here very large. "To make the most of a day at Richmond, the neap tide should be chosen, that is, when it is high water at London Bridge at 6 A.M. It will then be high water at Richmond between 8 and 9 in the morning, with but little tide: you may then commence at 9, and continue to fish till 7, when it will be flood, and you will then have the best hour's fishing of the whole day." —(Hoffland's "British Angler.") Of the steamers we need say little. Many boats leave the metropolis in the morning and reach Richmond in about two hours. The railway affords a much quicker but far less agreeable transit.

Twickenham lies in a bend of the river bank. Pope's Villa and Strawberry Hill have been dismantled within these few years; but in Twickenham Church lies the medallion monument to Pope erected by Bishop Warburton. The Twickenham bank is adorned with many tasteful mansions, whose grounds boast of luxurious trees, or slope to the water's edge embellished with clumps of brilliant flowers. Twickenham Ait, on which stands the Eel-pie House, is a little below the deep, and some many boats leave the metropolis in the morning and reach Richmond in about two hours. The railway affords a much quicker but far less agreeable transit.

The Twickenham bank is adorned with many tasteful mansions, whose grounds boast of luxurious trees, or slope to the water's edge embellished with clumps of brilliant flowers. Twickenham Ait, on which stands the Eel-pie House, is a little below the deep, and some large club may be taken under the horse-chesnut trees, on the west end of this island. Among the notabilities must not be forgotten Orleans House, which was for some years tenanted by Louis Philippe, when Duke of Orleans. In the parish are grown great quantities of strawberries, raspberries, and peas, for the Londoners.

Teddington, its church and locks, lie next; and from the village the famous chesnut road through Bushy-park to Hampton Court—the very Tempé of pic-nic parties. From Teddington Locks to Windsor plenty of gudgeons are found from June till August; when roach, dace, and barbel fishing commences, and continues till Christmas; and Teddington is the first place in the river where trout are taken.

Kingston lies on the opposite bank of the Thames, and has been a place of note from "the Saxon's time," some of whose monarchs were crowned here. It is a corporate town, and has two churches, and the place has many bits of antiquity: the Town Hall was rebuilt in handsome Italian style in 1840. There has been a bridge here for many centuries; the present bridge, of five arches, was completed in 1828. Kingston has long been noted for its public games, the only relic of which is foot-ball, played in the town on Shrove Tuesday: the custom dates from the head of a Danish general having been thus kicked about the place on a Shrove Tuesday. The South Western Railway passes within a mile of Kingston, where a "railway town" has sprung up.

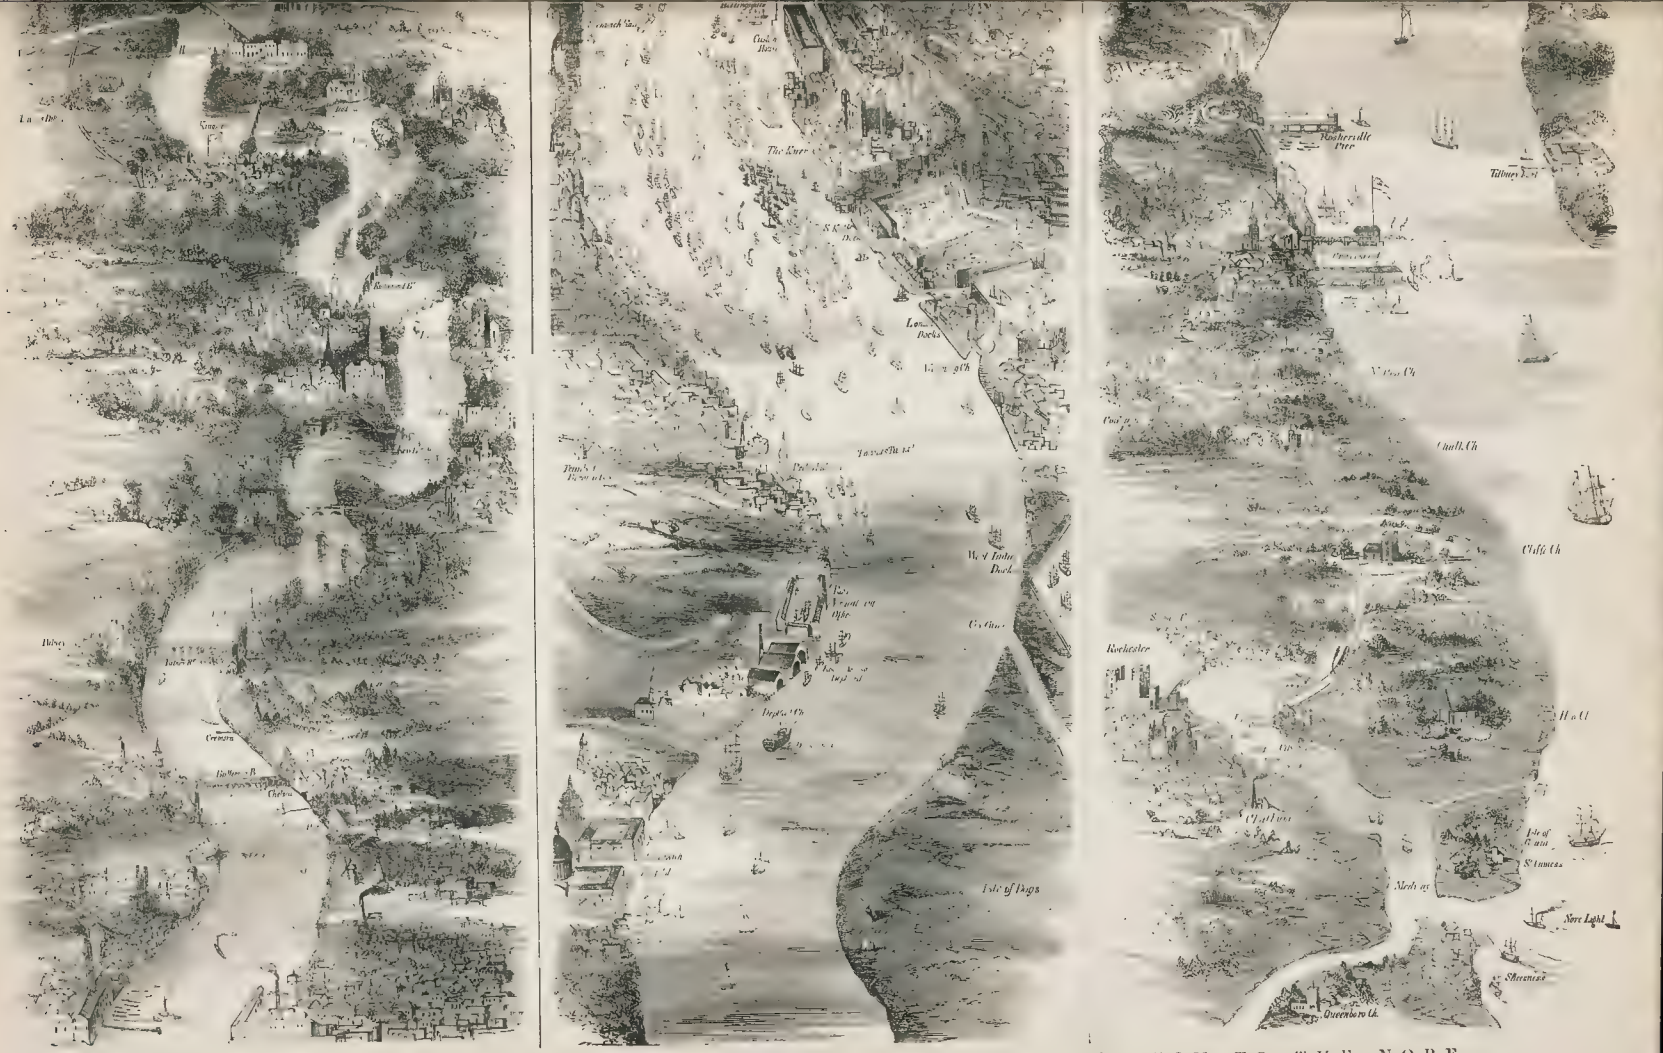
Thames Ditton, with its pleasant river-side inn (the Swan), is well known among anglers: fine barbel and gudgeons may be taken here, as well as roach, perch, dace, and chub, with sometimes a jack and a trout. From Ditton to Kingston Bridge, and thence to Richmond, including Teddington and Twickenham, there is some good fishing, especially in Bushy-park Meadows; and in the Deer-[illegible] of Twickenham there is capital roach and dace fishing. At Moulsey [illegible] Hurst Bridge, the silent Mole falls into the Thames, and a portion is preserved for subscribing anglers. There are nine[illegible] of deep swims, with jack, roach, dace, chub, pope, bream, perch, eels, &c.

The Eagle steamer, for the purpose of preserving the fish in the Thames, has prohibited angling during March, April, and May; and an association of the lovers of the art, known as The Thames Angling Preservation Society, has done good service by its exertions to ensure the observance of the law, and to render the waters of the Thames rife with sport. Illegal fishing is all but abolished: and the result is, an increase in the quantity and quality of all kinds of fish in the river. The angler, by the way, should provide himself with Netherclift's Map of the Thames, which gives a list of the fishing stations, houses of accommodation, [illegible]-men, [illegible] and hints [illegible] books entitled "Thames Angling," (See Carpenter's "Angler's Assistant.") We soon reach

HAMPTON COURT.

Hampton Court, which has a charm for thousands of pleasure-seekers from the dense and dusty vastness of London; and, thanks to our gentle Queen, one of the first acts of her reign was to throw open this palace and its artistic treasures to the humblest of her subjects. The [illegible] royal road to Hampton Court is, undoubtedly, by the Thames: from Wolsey's route hither from Whitehall, and his successors so traversed between Hampton and Greenwich, then a Royal residence. For nearly two centuries afterwards, it was the fashion for the rich, under canopied barges, to glide on the smooth river in silence, broken only by the measured music from the oars of their liveried rowers. In our time, this is accomplished for a trifle by steam; and steamers ply from the metropolis as far as Hampton Bridge soon after breakfast. The residents on the banks of the Thames above Hampton Court need not be reminded what a delightful means of reaching Hampton their clear, lively river offers—rowing up or punting down, and being towed back by an up-country barge.

Truly picturesque objects are these barges, as the reader may recollect one of our accomplished Artists has shown, in a charming picture of the stately Palace, in the Second Volume of this Journal. Taking up the sketching station on the Surrey bank of the Thames, just above the débouchement of the Mole, our landscape-painter, by aid of a barge and boats, the river and its banks, has presented the regal edifice in a charming point of view—all adapted as are the long and almost unbroken lines of the south and east fronts of the palace. At the time, that picture [illegible] with other [illegible] Palace [illegible] impressed us with the [illegible] Wolsey's [illegible] [illegible] Thames, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]



GUIDE FOR EXCURSIONS ON THE RIVER THAMES, FROM ETON TO THE NORE.

ETON TO VAUXHALL.

VAUXHALL TO GREENWICH.

BLACKWALL TO THE NORE.

"Gossip's Bridle," presented to the parish in 1633, by a person named Chester, who lost a valuable estate through a careless woman's talk. It is inscribed:—

Chester presents Walton with a Bridle,
To curb women's tongues that talk too idle.

The River Wey next debouches into the Thames, and near it is the village of Weybridge, with Oatlands, and an elegant campanile lately added to the villa; the picturesque park and pleasure-grounds, and romantic grotto. Above, is Shepperton, on the Middlesex bank, where the deeps are well stored with roach and dace, chub and barbel; and off Oatlands Park are jack, perch, &c., especially in the spring.

Chertsey Bridge is 20 miles from London, and is of stone: there are two deeps here. The market-town of Chertsey lies in Surrey, at a short distance from the Thames. The church is one of the best in the county; and the curfew-bell is tolled here from Michaelmas to Lady-day. A few fragments of the famous Benedictine abbey are traceable; and Mr. Hoffand believed the Abbey Mill River to contain jack, perch, chub, &c., "probably the descendants of those fish which fed the brethren of the noble monastery planted on its banks." In the town is the house wherein

The last accents flow'd from Cowley's tongue

About a mile above Chertsey Bridge, on the Middlesex bank, lies the rural village of Laleham.

Staines Bridge has three flat semicircular arches of granite, with remarkably small piers, from the design of Mr. George Rennie. It was opened by King William IV. and Queen Adelaide, in 1832. Adjoining, on the Middlesex bank, is the town of Staines, whence the road extends to Egham, on the opposite bank. A little northward of the bridge is the City Boundary Stone, inscribed, "God preserve the City of London, A.D. 1280." This marks the limit of the Lord Mayor's jurisdiction over the Thames, the fish of which, not less than the navigation, are, from here to Yantlet Creek, below Gravesend, under his Conservancy, and are protected by certain laws and regulations. From Staines down to Chertsey deeps, the angler may find some tolerable sport.

The inspection of the river, or, as it is termed, "The Lord Mayor's View of the Thames," is an affair of state and conviviality; when his Lordship and party proceed to Oxford by land, and thence down the river in the gilded state barge, with gay shallops, &c. The last "View" took place on August 5, 6, 7, and 8, 1846, in the mayoralty of the late Alderman John Johnson; of a minute account of this ceremony, and the localities, with several Engravings, will be found in THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for August 15, 1846. At the boundary stone at Staines, the civic party disembark, there is wine drank on the stone, money thrown among the spectators, &c.; and sure sheriffs and Aldermen as are not "Free of the Water," are bumped at the stone.

Nearly opposite Staines, and at a short distance from Egham, is Cooper's Hill, "where the muses sport:"—

On Cooper's Hill eternal wreaths shall grow,
While lasts the mountain, or while Thames shall flow!
Here has first lays majestic Denham sung.

Just above Staines, the river "Colne" separates Middlesex from Bucks, and flows into the Thames. The fishing commences in May, and the former river abounds with roach, dace, perch, and pike.

Adjoining Egham, on the north side, and extending for a considerable distance along the borders of the Thames westward, is the celebrated Runnimede, the identical old spot where King John signed Magna Charta, June 15, 1215:—

Then, who the verdant plains at Runnimede survey,
Whilst Thames runs by the base of Windsor's towering bowers,
Retires, O stranger! with awe, and thinks the hallow'd ground
Around contemplates well.

ALKESIDE.

These lines are from an inscription which for a commemorative column to have been set up at Runnimede, in the last century, a design not likely to be executed in ours, when sensible and liberal men call Magna Charta itself as the result of an uninteresting squabble between the King and the Barons. The name of the meadow, Runnemead, quasi Running-mead, has suggested the use of it as a race-course: races are held here on the last Tuesday and two following days in August; and the late King, William IV., gave a hundred guineas plate to be run for. The Magna Charta celebrity is also claimed for "Charter Island," on the opposite side of the Thames, where a refreshment room has been built for visitors; but this claim is set aside by the Charter itself stating to have been signed "in the meadow called Runnimede, between Windsor and Staines." At Ankerwyke, on the opposite bank, is a yew-tree in full vigour, though held to be older than Magna Charta.

The river now takes a sharp turn, and we soon reach Old Windsor Ferry, and the village of Datchet, where the Redmond, Windsor, and Staines Railway has a station; and a wooden bridge crosses the river. You will, perhaps, look out for Faustuff's Datchet Mead and the muddy ditch close by the Thames side: the mead is now inclosed by a wall. Datchet is a favourite resort of anglers; and on the river is an eyot belonging to the Provost and Fellows of Eton College. Sir Henry Wotton and Izaak Walton here enjoyed together the amusement of the rod and line. At Datchet, too, Charles II. was wont to exercise his angling skill, commemorated by Lord Rochester:—

Methinks I see our mighty Monarch stand,
His pliant angle trembling in his hand.
* * * * *
Last night he sat on yonder grassy bank,
Loden with spoils of many a tedious hour.

We are now [illegible]

WINDSOR, AND ITS ROYAL CASTLE.

In the neighbourhood of the Castle there is excellent gudgeon fishing, and a few trout may be taken. Benjamin West, the President of the Royal Academy, during his stay at Windsor, was very successful in taking trout in the sharp stream below the old bridge. The name of Windsor is from Windlesofra, or Windlesheve, from the winding course of the Thames at this point. This, however, relates to old Windsor (about two miles south-east of new Windsor), where our Saxon kings had a palace, and the Confessor kept court. By him it was granted to the monks of Westminster, who exchanged it with the Conqueror. William soon built a fortress on the site of the present Castle: it was enlarged by Henry I., who removed there from the Saxon palace at old Windsor, and there kept Pentecost, or Whitsuntide, A.D. 1110; so that Windsor Castle has been a Royal residence for 739 years. With both Edward I. and II., it was a frequent and favourite abode. Edward III. was born at Windsor; and he raised the Castle to its present form and magnitude, under the direction of William of Wykeham, at one shilling per day, king's wages! The round tower, the general plan of the Castle, its flanking towers, and heavy gateways, are all manifestly Edwardian. The chapel of St. George was built by Edward IV. and Henry VII. and VIII.; and the tomb-house by Wolsey. Henry VIII. rebuilt the great gate of the lower ward; and Charles II. lengthened the northern terrace to 16.0 feet, thus making it the noblest walk in Europe. The restoration of the entire pile has been the work of the last 20 years, at the cost of more than a million; but no expenditure of the public money has been more satisfactory. The Round Tower is the grand feature: its entire height above the quadrangle is 168 feet; and, as says the poet Bowles, "most imposing is its distant view, when the broad banner flats or sleeps in the sunshine, amidst the intense blue of the summer skies; whilst its picturesque and ancient architectural vastness harmonises with the decaying and gnarled oaks, coeval with so many departed Monarchs." In short, in Windsor, England's history is presented to the eye: the fancies of a thousand years crowded together into one instant.

A bird's-eye view of the Thames from this point, would show the river

The north-west view of the Castle from the river is very fine. The Terrace is seen in its full extent, commencing with King John's Tower and Queen Elizabeth's Gallery. The architectural line is next broken by George the Fourth's Tower; the Curfew and Clewer Towers, and the Brunswick Tower. We close this excursion with some useful information for viewing Windsor Castle, the crowning glory of the journey.

The following State Rooms are now open to the public:—The Queen's Audience Chamber, the Vandyke Room, the State Ante-room, the Grand Staircase, the Grand Vestibule, the Waterloo Chamber, the Grand Reception Room, St. George's Hall, the Grand Chamber, and the Queen's Presence Chamber. These apartments are shown to the public in the order above given, on Mondays, Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays. The Lord Chamberlain's tickets may be obtained in London, gratis, of Messrs. Peat and Dominic Colnaghi, printsellers, 14, Pall-Mall East; Mr. Moon, printseller, 20, Threadneedle-street; Mr. Mitchell, bookseller, 33, Old Bond street; and Messrs. Ackermann and Co., printsellers, 96, Strand; of whom, also, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] river at Blackwall; and the sediment off Woolwich Dockyard had so accumulated that, by the old method, it would have taken five years and £152,000 to remove it.

The late Sir Anthony Carlisle, the physician, has left us this nice bundle of facts for the "Health of Towns" agitators:—"The ebb and flow of the tides in the river, and the regurgitation of fresh water, deposit on the exposed banks a large portion of the filth produced in the metropolis, and subject to evaporation along the wide spaces of the borders of the river. As the sea-water does not ascend three miles above the bridges, a large portion of the Thames water charged with filth must pass and repass the town at every tide, and deposit its sediments. The shores of the river, as it ebbs through the town, are largely exposed at low water, and exhibit banks of putrescent mud, which, in the summer season, abounds with the larvæ of gnats, which live upon, and help to consume the filth; in fact, they are invaluable scavengers." With all, the humorous clamour that has been raised against the Thames water, it should be recollected that with filtration—and this is attended to at the London Water-Works—the Thames water is even purer than that procured immediately from a spring. The adulterating matters are, also, in some measure, decomposed by the action of the bottom and sides of the Thames, a fact of great importance, first explained by Mr. Brande, the chemist. Little more than a century ago it was believed, upon the authority of a F.R.S., that "the Thames water, taken up about Greenwich, at low water, where it is free from all brackishness of the sea, and has in it all the fat and sullage from the great city of London, makes very strong drink;" and, again, that for sea-stores, "it will of itself alone, being carried to sea, ferment wonderfully; and after its due purgations, and three times standing (after which it continues sweet), it will be so strong that several sea commanders have told me it would burn, and has often fuddled their mariners."

We are now getting into pleasant country, though the Kentish bank has the advantage of its Essex opposite neighbour. The first bend of the river, known as Gallion's Reach, and distinguished by its buoys, placed by the Corporation of London for the use of Indiamen coming into port, is followed by Barking and Halfway Reaches. Barking Creek, on the left, opens to the Thames, and vessels can ascend it to the Essex town of Barking. At the entrance of Halfway Reach, on the brink of the Kentish shore, is the wall-washed public-house, mid-way between London and Gravesend.

Erith, which appears "over the way" upon the Essex bank, and its clustering cottages, is now in sight, backed by the wooded uplands of Belvidere. The newly erected Pier Hotel promises well for a visitor or sojourner in the rural, river-side retreat. Belvidere, the well-appointed mansion, is open to the public by the courtesy of its noble owner, Lord Skye and Sele. Its splendid gallery of Italian and Flemish pictures, and the grassy slopes and massive foliage of the grounds, with occasional peeps at the shining river, will amply repay the visit. Cherries, the pet fruit of Kent, are sent to London in great quantities from Erith.

Purfleet lies on the Essex coast, nearly opposite Erith. here Queen Elizabeth planted the standard of England when the Spanish Armada threatened our shores. The low-roofed grey buildings contain many tons of gunpowder, stowed there by Government for the army and navy.

Greenhithe, on the Kentish bank, is next reached. it is a picturesque group of red brick cottages, tall chalk cliffs, backed by the dark woods of Swanscombe. From this point, June 19, 1845, sailed Sir John Franklin's Expedition, the Erebus and Terror steam-ships, for the Polar Seas; and whose absence to this day is a subject of painful public anxiety. There is a landing-place at Greenhithe, as well as at Ingress Abbey, Mr. Harmer's fine seat, lies beyond Erith, opposite West Thurrock: it was built from the stone of old London Bridge, a material seasoned by many centuries. The ingress grounds are very delightful. The chalk-pits here furnish annually many thousand tons of flints, which are shipped at once for Staffordshire, for its pottery, and even to China, for similar purposes.

The Ann's-house beyond Ingress, with a handsome Gothic church, are a very interesting group on the south side of the channel. It is a range of dwellings, forming a "happy port and haven" for poor residents who have attained the age of sixty.

Northfleet lies next: its valley was once covered with water, and was once used by the Danes as a winter station for their navy. Northfleet presents to the river a precipitous face of chalk, picturesquely variegated with verdure and brushwood, sand and gravel. Here is Pitcher's extensive ship-building yard, whence many very fine merchant and war ships, and steam ships, have issued for years; and in 1831 Mr. Pitcher constructed here a landing-jetty, at which more than 40,000 persons were landed in one season for Gravesend, though they had to walk a mile. This success set the Gravesend Corporation to work, though they had long resisted the building of a pier, lest it should injure the watermen. The Gothic tower and pier belong to Rosherville, a fairy compound of Vauxhall and the Zoological Gardens, in which the natural beauties of the spot have been turned to picturesque account for the jaded Londoner: these Gardens will be opened next Monday. Next are the Gravesend baths,

Fantastically set
With cupola and minaret.

GRAVESEND.

Gravesend is now reached, and a strange assemblage of narrow streets and lanes and spick-and-span new houses it presents; yet such as might be expected from its rapid increase—the population rose in ten years (1831 to 1841) from 3455 to 15,655 inhabitants. The traffic with the metropolis is astonishing: nearly 400,000 persons having been landed at the two Gravesend piers in June, 1844, a season of low steam-boat fares and fine weather. Of new villas, streets, and terraces, we have little to say, especially as the neighbourhood is thickly dotted with pleasant rural villages, and places to "go to;" whilst from the foremost of them, Windmill Hill, the prospect is very wide. In one side, lies the town and the river—its ships and steamers betokening the anxieties of trade and City life. Turn round, and the eye roams over the fields of Kent, drinking repose and rural peace. Utrum horum mavis accipe.

Across the river here, above half a mile wide, lies Tilbury Fort, a place of note, from the time of Henry VIII. to that of Sheridan and his "Critic." The ferry fare is but 3d., and visitors are admitted on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays. The fort originated in an oil beacon-tower of Richard II., which Henry VIII. enlarged. Charles II. erected the present fort, the oldest portion of which is the gateway or blockhouse: its armament consists of 60 dismounted guns, and a garrison of 60 invalided veterans; the effective force being a corporal's guard, and a master-gunner; but, formerly, Tilbury could be armed and manned in a couple of hours by steamers, with stores and a garrison from Woolwich. A very circumstantial account of Queen Elizabeth's visit to Tilbury in 1588 was printed at the time, and is in existence. And, lastly, a very beautiful picture of this place is Mr. Stanfield's finest contribution to the present Exhibition of the Royal Academy; in the Catalogue, No. 12, "Tilbury Fort—Wind against Tide."

Among the pleasant excursions from Gravesend, is a visit to the villages of Milton, Chalk, Cliff, or Hoo, all which are shown in the Print, with the railway leading thereto. But the highest treat is a walk to Cobham, its hall, church, and college. Cobham Hall, can be viewed only on Friday, by tickets, to be obtained at Gravesend and Rochester: it is a fine Elizabethan mansion, in plan a half H, though not improved by Inigo Jones's Corinthian pilasters. The Hall is famous for its pictures, including first-rate specimens of Titian, Paul Veronese, Reynolds, Rubens, Vandyck, and Salvator Rosa. The church is hardly less famed for its ancient sepulchral brasses, remaining in numbers, probably unmatched elsewhere.

Another excursion is to Upnor Castle, and thence to Strood, Rochester, and Chatham. The view from the summit of Strood Hill over this whole district, and the Medway, its shipping, the dockyards and houses, the bridge, cathedral, castle, and distant heights, is full of interest and variety. Strood has little to detain you, and, says Leycester, "in a long summer's day, you will not cross the bridge before wandering about its wharves, which exhibit most picturesque groupings of the vessels at their moorings, and the castle rising from the cliffs, of which Calcott has painted a descriptive poem. The best views are at the north side of the bridge. The scene of the Medway from the cruhnis of the bridge partakes a good deal of the character of the 'Lake District.' The time to see it to the best advantage is when the river is full, and the sun is setting behind the chalk heights, at the foot of which passed the pilgrim's road to Canterbury." The most important natural feature of the place is the Medway, which flows with great swiftness. The extent of Rochester's old walls may be traced in picturesque ruins, making pleasant flower-gardens and walks for the inhabitants. Its natural advantages made the city a great fighting place, giving it the name of the "Kenti-human's Castle," under all the masters, Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans. Until the time of Edward the Fourth, its castle and walls were constantly in need of repair, all his Royal predecessors besieging or defending the city by turns. The Cathedral is one of the few specimens of church-building left by Gundulph, who built the Castle, and the White Tower of London. The Cathedral service [illegible] and the decorated [illegible] and transepts [illegible] are peculiarly fine, and the crypt is very remarkable. The Cathedral may be seen any day of the week, even Sunday. The main feature is Gundulph's Keep, built under William Rufus. "Ascending and descending its corkscrew staircases—scrambling through its ruined passages—exploring its dark rooms and cloisters—sketching the remnants of Norman mouldings which are here and there perceivable—reaching the battlements, and taking bird's-eye views of the three places (Stroud, Rochester, and Chatham) below—and all their features at once, both on land and water, might well fill up a whole summer's day."

A sixpenny guide-book, to be had at Rochester, tells the history of the fortress: its grand features are its twelve-foot thick walls, the ornamented arched gateway, and the columns and arches of the chapel. The whole height of the interior (five stories) is here seen from the basement. The height of the towers, from the foundation, is 112 feet. A broad and deep ditch surrounded three sides, the Medway protecting the fourth. "An ancient castle was a sort of armed town on a small scale, with all kinds of provisions for feasting, residence, fighting, praying; and Rochester still retains enough of its characteristic features to enable us to identify many of its parts." To appreciate all its picturesque points, you should pass all round the castle, both within and without its walls. "Ascend to the summit, and let your eye wander up and down the beauteous valley of the Medway. See, on the one hand, Chatham, with its barracks, dockyard, and extensive fortifications—the naval and military character struggling for pre-eminence—with Frindsbury, Gillingham, and Upnor Castle. As far as the eye can reach, let us track the river's course, as—

In meanders to the neighbouring plain,
The liquid serpent draws its silver train.

On the other hand, moulded amongst umbrageous trees, one pert fat village succeeds another, dotting a broad expanse of corn-clad lea, till all is lost in the hazy distance." Chatham, with the Dockyard and the Lines, its forts and batteries, is a very interesting sight; and the siege operations, occasionally given for practising the troops in attacking and defending a fort [illegible] are grand military spectacles, worth the journey from London in a coach. The Dockyard may be seen, by permission, [illegible] to 2 P.M. It was commenced in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and much enlarged by Charles I. and II. The Lines were first formed in 1756, when the country was threatened with a French invasion.

Upnor Castle is a stone fortress, of Elizabeth's reign, nearly opposite Chatham Dockyard. it contains an extensive powder-magazine for the use of the Navy, and is garrisoned with some thirty men. Near the Castle is the City Stone, asserting the limit of the conservancy of the Corporation of London, just as the western stone does at Staines.

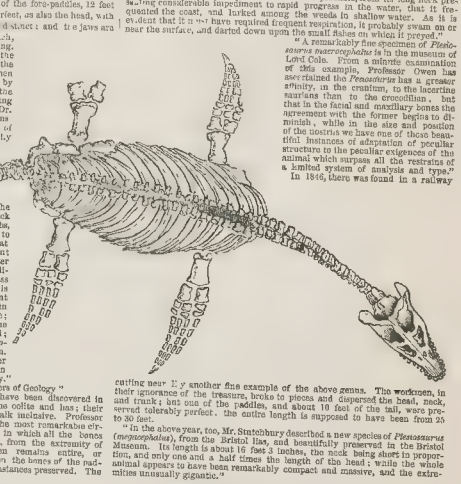
The Isle of Grain separates the mouths of the Thames and the Medway; and we then reach the Nore Light. Sheerness lies at the north-western extremity of the Isle of Sheppy, and defends the entrance to both the Thames and Medway; and has a fort, docks, fleet, &c.; and on a creek of the Medway lies Queenborough, long noted for its lucrative oyster-fishery for the supply of the metropolis.

Here our "below bridge" excursion ends; and we take leave of the reader, wishing him health and fine weather to enjoy the recreations of the River Thames.

PLESIOSAURUS FOUND NEAR WHITBY.

THIS very interesting relic of a former world was mentioned in our Journal a short time since; and we have now the pleasure of forming it from a sketch obligingly forwarded for that purpose. It is the specimen of the Plesiosaurus macrocephalus, found in the Kettleness Alum Works, belonging to the Marquis of Normanby, a few miles north of Whitby, in Yorkshire. It was discovered deeply imbedded in the alum rock, 120 feet below the surface of the ground. Its length is 22 feet 4 inches; and, from point to point of the fore-paddles, 12 feet 9 inches. The ribs are about 3 feet long and very perfect, as also the head, with the blow-hole, eye-sockets, and [illegible] quite distinct; and the jaws are closely set with teeth. It was [illegible] and although that the extreme joints of one hind paddle are wanting. These were kneaded off by the labourers in working the rock, and wheeled on to the calcined heap before the remains were discovered. Mr. Kark, the finder of the specimen under his care, at Mulgrave Castle. It was explained by Mr. Chadwerth, the geologist, at the meeting of the British Association, in 1844; and at last year's gathering of the Society, the Dean of Westminster (the Rev. Dr. Buckland) read a letter containing its main discussions We subjoin a few notes descriptive of the [illegible] which, from Dr. Mantell's clever and beautifully [illegible] work, the "Medals of Creation"

"The animals of the genus Plesiosaurus possessed, in their osteological structure, a remarkable deviation from all known and recent fossils: uniting the characters of the head of a lizard, with the teeth of a crocodile, to a neck of inordinate length, with such modifications of the ribs, the pectoral and pelvic arches, and the paddles, as to justify the graphic sim ile of an eminent Professor, that the Plesiosaurus might be compared to a serpent threaded through the shell of a turtle. The character which immediately strikes the observer is the extraordinary length of the neck, and the relative smallness of the head. The neck, which, in most animals, is formed but of five vertebræ, and in the extremest recent example (the swan) does not exceed twenty-four, in the Plesiosaurus composed of from 30 to 40 vertebræ; and, in some species, is four times the length of the head, and equal to the entire length of the body and tail; while the length of the head (in Plesiosaurus dolichodirus) is less than one thirteenth of the entire skeleton. The paddles are composed of fewer and more slender bones than in the Ichthyosaurus, and must have been of a more elegant form, and possessed greater flexibility."



We add a few details from the same author's "Wonders of Geology"

"The remains of numerous specimens of Plesiosaurus have been discovered in many places in this country and on the Continent, in the oolite and lias; their range being in all the deposits from the lias to the chalk inclusive. Professor Owen has described nearly twenty British species. The most remarkable circumstance relating to them is the connected state in which all the bones of the skeleton occur. The entire osseous framework, from the extremity of the snout to the last vertebra of the tail, often remains entire, or but very little displaced from its natural position: even the bones of the paddles, with their cartilaginous appendages, are in some instances preserved. The indigestible portion of the food of these carnivorous marine reptiles, as the scales teeth, and bones of fishes, and their coprolites, frequently met with in the abdominal cavity. These facts show that the carcases of these animals were imbedded in the soft mud at the bottom of the sea, without having been exposed to the action of the billows, or to long transport by rivers or currents.

"The collection of Mr. Hawkins, now in the British Museum, contains a skeleton 11 feet long, and so nearly perfect, that the entire form of the original creature may be completely restored. Mr. Conybeare compares the Plesiosaurus to a turtle stripped of its shell, and thinks it probable, from its long neck presenting considerable impediment to rapid progress in the water, that it frequented the coast, and lurked among the weeds in shallow water. As it is evident that it must have required frequent respiration, it probably swam on or near the surface, and darted down upon the small fishes on which it preyed."

"A remarkable example of the [illegible] of Plesiosaurus macrocephalus is in the museum of Lord Cole. From a minute examination of this example, Professor Owen has ascertained the Pleasaurus has a greater affinity, in the cranium, to the insectine saurians than to the crocodilian, but that in the facial and maxillary bones the agreement with the former begins to diminish, while in the size and position of the insertion we have one of those beautiful instances of adaptation of peculiar structure to the peculiar exigences of the animal which surpass all the restrains of a limited system of analysis and type."

In 1846, there was found in a railway cutting near Lyme another fine example of the above genus. The workmen, in their ignorance of the treasure, broke it to pieces and dispersed the head, neck, and trunk; but one of the paddles, and about 10 feet of the tail, were preserved tolerably perfect. the entire length is supposed to have been from 25 to 30 feet.

"In the above year, too, Mr. Stutchbury described a new species of Plesiosaurus (macrocephalus), from the Bristol lias, and beautifully preserved in the Bristol Museum. Its length is about 16 feet 3 inches, the neck being short in proportional aggregate, to have been remarkably compact and massive, and the extremities unusually gigantic."

LITERATURE.

THE WESTERN WORLD; OR, TRAVELS IN THE UNITED STATES IN 1846–47. By ALEX. MACKAY, Esq 3 Vols. Bentley.

At the outset of the introduction to this work, the author remarks, that some time has elapsed since the appearance of a work professing to give to the English public a general account of the social, political, and material condition of the United States, notwithstanding their rapid development and the great changes which they are constantly exhibiting in every national point of view. Its transition state one would have thought an infringement on copyright, but it has proved the reverse. The present work aims at supplying this want, and we think with success. It is not the result of a hurried visit, but of some years spent in the country before the journey described in the book was undertaken. The author says, "The journey upon which the work turns was commenced in 1846, when I visited America for the second time, residing for several months at Washington, during a very critical period in our international affairs, and enjoying throughout the honour and advantage of a familiar intercourse with most of the chiefs of both Houses of Congress, and with many intimately connected with the executive government. PICTURE-MODEL OF "THE STORMING OF BADAJOZ," AT THE SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

graining of Cashmere will be opened in a few days. What a treat for the wearers of the famous fabrics of this fairy land!

The Diorama, Regent's Park, has the Valley of Rosenlaui, with its Alpine chorn, and the Interior of Santa Croce, at Florence, with its lights and shadows, and Davison and Gray's Grand Machine Organ.

The Colosseum, Regent's-park, has its Panorama of Paris, with the Revolution ction: its Modern Sculptures and Classic Ruins, its Conservatories and Swiss Cottage, and Stalactite Caverns. Add to this "the Cyclorama, with its moving Picture of Lisbon and the Tagus, and representation of the Earthquake of 1755. The picture has the broad and beautiful character of De Loutherbourg; and the catastrophe is a marvel of mechanism. There are both day and evening exhibitions, at one-third the price originally charged by the projector for viewing the imperfect Colosseum.

The Mirioramas Pictures, Banvard's at the Egyptian-hall, Piccadilly; and Risley and Smith's, in Leicester-square, are both day and evening sights.

The Dulwich Picture Gallery is open every day, except Friday; the admission by free tickets, to be obtained of Colnaghi and Puckle, Cockspur-street; Graves and Co., Pall-mall; Ackermann, Strand; Jeffries, Cheapside; and Moon, Threadneedle-street; but not to be procured in Dulwich. The collection is strong in the Flemish and Spanish Schools.

The Cosmorama, Regent-street, has a new and superior set of pictures.

The Polytechnic Institution has some Dissolving Views of Van Diemen's Land, besides its Bude, Hydro-oxygen, and Electric Lights, our old friend, the Diving Bell, and the Diver, &c.

Madame Tussaud has refreshed (?) her collection from Stanfield Hall. This is the best Exhibition of Wax-work ever known; and Mrs. Salmon's figures would have melted with indignation in the rivalry.

The Wonder of the Sea is the name of a strange creature to be seen at the Cosmorama Rooms. It has lately been captured off the Northumbrian coast, and has been shewn at Newcastle; the exhibitor associating it with the Sea-Serpent.

Vauxhall Gardens will be open under a new régime, both of amusements and refection. A considerable sum has been expended in reviving this olden place of entertainment.

The Surrey Zoological Gardens have the new Picture-Model of the Storming of Badajos, which we have Engraved; then there is the Concert, the Zoological Collection, &c.

The Museums, we venture to say, will be thronged. The British Museum is now completed internally. The Great Zoological Gallery is an especial treat for holiday folks; as are also the principal Saloons of Antiquities. Some of the new smaller rooms up-stairs, as the Egyptian, Etruscan, Ethnographical, Coral, &c., are extremely attractive. Do not forget the Portraits in the Long Galleries, perhaps the most interesting ever collected.

The East India Company's Museum, Leadenhall-street, is open on Tuesdays and Thursdays, by Directors' Tickets, and on Saturday, free. The contents are Oriental MSS., Sculpture, Implements of War, Oriental Boats, Zoological and Botanical Collections, &c.

The Missionaries' Museum, Bloomfield-street, Moorfields, is open free, on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays. It is rich in ethnographical rarities, especially relating to heathen worship, collected by Missionaries during their travels.

The United Service Museum, in Middle Scotland Yard, Whitehall, is open throughout the year; the admission being by Tickets from Members, who are upwards of 4000 in number. The principal objects are models of implements of war, by sea and land, natural history specimens, &c.

The Museum of the College of Surgeons, in Lincoln's-inn-fields, is open daily to the public, except Friday and Saturday, from twelve to four; the admission being by a Fellow or Member's introduction or order. It is rich in specimens of Natural History, Comparative Anatomy, Physiology, and Pathology.

The Museum of Economic Geology is still in Craig's-court, Charing-cross; but the handsome suite in Piccadilly is nearly ready for the collection. It is open to the public, daily, and free; it contains Mineralogical and Geological Specimens, Models of Mining Machinery, &c.—each specimen fully described; the object being to afford practical information to all who are engaged in manufacturing pursuits connected with Geology.

Sir John Soane's Museum, 13, Lincoln's-inn-fields, is open on Thursdays and Fridays. The admission is by free tickets, to be applied for a day or two before. The visit is a rich treat for the lover of architectural antiquities of Egypt, Greece, and Rome; and there are some matchless pictures by Canaletti and Hogarth.

The Royal Institution Museum, in Albemarle-street, may be viewed daily, by a Member's free order. The collection consists chiefly of specimens of British Minerals. The Laboratory of the Institution, too, is well worth inspection.

The Zoological Society's Museum, in their Gardens in the Regent's-park, may be inspected at the same time with their Living Collection, which now numbers nearly one thousand animals. The public are admitted to the gardens on Mondays, at sixpence each.

The Society of Arts, in the Adelphi, open their Establishment daily, except Wednesday, free to strangers, the Model Room is extremely interesting; and Barry's pictures have been cleaned.

The Thames Tunnel, though much less frequented than formerly, has its fair quota of visitors.

The Tower of London continues a reactive. The Horse Armoury and the Regalia may be seen, each for a sixpenny fee, daily. To see the other portions, requires a special order: the White Tower is a stupendous specimen of the old fortress.

Cremorne Gardens, on the Chelsea bank of the Thames, have their day and evening attractions. A representation of the Siege of Moultan is among the latter.

Beaherville Gardens, "The Elysium of England," will be opened on Monday.

The American Bowling Saloon, 393, Strand, is a novelty, in idea, imported from the "States." In consists of a beautifully embellished apartment, in which the American game of bowls is played. The walls are shaped into panels, inclosing pictures of classic subjects, relieved by looking-glass; the spandrell and other segmental portions are in rich taste; the ceiling has some tasteful medallions, bas-reliefs, wreaths of flowers, &c., and a clever means has been adopted to convert a portion that would otherwise have spoiled the room, into a sort of side corridor or arcade, enriched with pendents, armorial shields, &c. At the end of the room, before dark crimson draperies, are placed casts of the Graces, Dians, Ceres, &c. The embellishments have been executed by Mr. Horwood, of Hoxton, and they are highly commendable specimens of decorative art.

BADAJOZ, AT THE SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

THE great holiday novelty at this Establishment is a Picture-Model of the Town, Castle, Fortification, and out-works of Badajoz, one of the strongest cities of Spain, situate in a vast plain, at the confluence of the River Guadiana with the Rivillas. The model is constructed upon the banks of the lake of the Gardens, which, accordingly, serves for the Guadiana; on the right of the picture is a stone bridge of twenty-eight arches, which communicates with Fort St. Christoval, on the extreme right: on the left flows the Rivillas, which skirts the base of the whole eastern line of fortification, and empties itself into the Guadiana, under the walls of the Castle, which nearly occupies the centre of the picture; the left of which is filled up with the detached forts of San Roque and La Pienrina, the Cathedral of St. John, and other public buildings. The picture has been modelled and painted by Messrs. Danson and Sons, and is a remarkably clever and effective work, equalling, if not surpassing, either of the picture models exhibited upon the same site.

Still-life however, is not one of the attractions of the Surrey Zoological Gardens, and the proprietors have, accordingly, turned Messrs. Southby's pyrotechnic skill to historical account in representative, in conjunction with the picture-model, the celebrated storming of Badajoz, in 1812, which cost General Kellerman eight sentences, yet was taken by Lord Wellington, in the presence of two hostile armies amounting to 80,000 men, and certainly one of the greates of the Hero's "hundred fights." Its leading incidents have been thus vividly described:—

"The Cathedral of St. John's struck ten, when the storming party silently moved forwards—one solitary musket was discharged beside the breach, but none answered it. The divisions were now on the brink of the sheer descent, when a gun boomed from the parapet; the earth trembled; a mine was fired; an explosion; an infernal hissing from lighted fuzees succeeded; and, like the rising of a curtain on the stage, in the hellish glare, the French lining the ramparts in crowds, the English storming parties descending the ditch, were distinctly visible to each other as if the hour was noontide."

"A tremendous fire from the guns of the place, which had been laid upon the approaches to the breach, followed the explosion. Undauntedly the storming party cheered, and brave as they the French answered it; a murderous scene ensued for the breach was utterly impassable. Notwithstanding the withering fire of musketry from the parapets, light artillery was brought to bear immediately upon the breach; and, amidst the grape from every gun upon the works that could play upon the assailants or supporting columns, the British mounted"

* * * * * * *

The contest lasted about an hour; fire-balls constantly lighting up the scene; the cheering and bugles sounding the advance, being heard above the roar, when the place was carried by storm."

The stages of the great struggle are represented with very dramatic effect: as the approach of the storming party, the instantaneous lighting of the whole fortress, the rush to the breach by real troops, the roar of artillery, the conflagration, the explosion, and the victory. The fearful reality with which these movements are enacted, forms a very impressive spectacle, accompanied by music, and altogether producing a perfect illusion. It would be well for mankind if such scenes were confined to planks and canvas, paint and pyrotechy, to show up the waste and wantonness of war! This by the way, however; and we recommend holiday-makers to see this artistic picture, as well as to witness the evening spectacle of the siege; in addition to the more pacific attractions of the Concert, the refreshing gardens, and that "zoological" tenant.

TIMES OF DEPARTURE FOR HOLIDAY EXCURSIONS BY RAILWAY AND STEAM-BOAT.

WE have taken considerable pains to collect, direct from the proper sources, the following information as to the special arrangements for the Whitsun Holidays:—

The South-Eastern Railway Company start extra express trains for Paris (viâ Calais or Boulogne), from their station at London Bridge, on Saturday, the 26th inst. at 15 minutes past 7 A.M.; and on Monday, the 28th, at 30 minutes past 9 A.M., arriving in Paris the same day. The return from that capital will be on June 3rd, at 15 minutes past 10 A.M.; reaching London on the 4th, at noon.

Fare, to and fro	...	1st Class	...	...	£3 3 0
Ditto	...	2d ditto	...	...	2 6 0

From the same station (London Bridge), the London, Brighton, and South-Eastern Railway Company start pleasure trains between London, Brighton, Lewes, Eastbourne, Hastings, Worthing, Arundel, Chichester, Portsmouth, and the Isle of Wight; there and back, to either of these places, at single fares, to return any day, up to Wednesday, the 30th instant (inclusive); starting at three o'clock P.M. on Saturday, the 26th; Sunday morning, the 27th, at eight o'clock; and on Monday, the 28th, at the same hour. The South-Eastern Company will, also, on Whit Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday run first, second, and third class trains to all stations on their main line, to go and return on the same day, at single fares, to and fro, starting at 30 minutes past 6 A.M., and returning from Margate at 25 minutes past 6 P.M.; Ramsgate, 10 minutes past 8; Deal, 15 minutes past 6; and Dover, at 15 minutes past 7 o'clock P.M.

By the South Western there will also start for a Parisian excursion, from the Waterloo Station, on Saturday morning, the 26th instant, at half-past FOUR A.M., trains under the direction of Mr. Crisp, who conducted the late national visit to Paris. The prices for this Whitsuntide trip are:—

First Class, including bed, breakfast, attendance, &c., at first-rate hotel	...	...	£5 0 0
Ditto, ditto, including dinner, wine, &c.	...	...	6 6 0

ORLEANS.

First Class Trains	...	...	3 3 0
Second Class Trains	...	...	2 2 0

From the same Station will run, also, trains to Southampton, Portsmouth, and the Isle of Wight, starting on Saturday morning, the 26th instant, at 6 o'clock, with a scope of four days for returning, on either of those days; paying for the trip out and home only the amount paid for one passage—that is, in fact, half price. The same company will run excursion trains for Windsor on Monday, the 28th instant, and on Tuesday, the 29th, starting on each day at 10 o'clock in the morning, for 2s. 6d. there and back.

The other great lines, from the answers we received at their offices, appear to have made no extra arrangements for the coming festival. The unpicturesque nature of the country through which they run, probably suggests that they cannot successfully compete in pleasure excursions with their southern neighbours. Birmingham, Sheffield, Nottingham, and Manchester are rarely made the objects of such trips.

The river Thames, too, will have its attractions. There will be excursions both up and down the river. The Hampton Court, Richmond, Kew, and Chelsea boats will be all in play on Monday.

The Hampton Court Boats start every day at 10 o'clock, from London-Bridge, calling at all the stations between there and Hampton Court. Fares, there and back, 2s. 6d.

The Richmond Steam-boats also commence running on Sunday next, and start at a quarter before 10, from London Bridge.

The Citizen and Iron Steam boats start every ten minutes from London Bridge to Chelsea, for 2d., and from thence to Kew, 6d., every half-hour. They return up to 6 o'clock, landing passengers at all the piers from thence to London Bridge, on the same terms as the upward fare.

Below bridge, as it is nautically called, there will be plenty of chances for the holiday seeker of River amusement.

The Prince of Wales steamer, we see, will start from the City Pier, London Bridge, on Whit Monday, at nine o'clock A.M., for the Nore Light, and a trip round her Majesty's Fleet at Sheerness and in the Medway, returning the same day—a distance of more than 120 miles—for 2s. 6d.

Trip to Margate, calling at Herne Bay. The Royal William will start from London Bridge Wharf on Whit Sunday, at eight o'clock A.M., and return the same day. Fares, 6s. and 7s.; and 4s. children.

The Old Woolwich Company's Boats, calling at all the Piers between Lond n Bridge and Woolwich, will start, during the Whitsun week, at least twice each hour; viz. quarter before and quarter after each hour, or as often as necessary. Fare, all the way, 6d.

The Star Company's Boats also (viâ Blackwall Railway) leave the Brunswick Wharf, Blackwall, for Gravesend, calling at Erith, Purfleet, Greenhithe, Grays, and Rosherville; the trains for which conveyance leave Fenchurch-street Station, for Blackwall, for the steam-boats, at 9, 10, 11, 12, 20 minutes past 1, 3, 20 minutes past 4, 20 minutes past 5, 6, and 40 minutes past 6 o'clock daily. Fares, to or from London, 1s. and 1s. 6d.

A Trip to Holland—to see the sights at Rotterdam, Delft, the Hague, Leyden, Haarlem, and Amsterdam—will take place on June 9th, to return on the 17th; the expense of which, including all hotel charges, passage there and back, for eight days, will be £6 6s. each traveller!!

Railway Excursion Trains from Waterloo Station start on Whit-Monday and Tuesday for Hampton Court, at 11 o'clock in the morning, returning from thence at half-past 6 o'clock in the evening, for London Fares, there and back, 2s. A cheap and pleasant ride. The Van-Omnibuses, and other conveyances will be in abundance.

There will be a Steam-boat Excursion to Hampton Court, and all intermediate piers, in addition to those enumerated, by the Cardinal Wolsey, on cheap terms—as they call it, for the million. She starts from London Bridge, Old Swan Pier, on Whit Monday, at a quarter-past 9 o'clock. Fare, there and back (on purchasing tickets), only 2s.

THE NEW YORK RIOTS.

Theatrical disputes are notorious for their bitterness. The mutual animosities between the faction of "Tweedle-dum" and that which pins its faith upon "Tweedle-dee," have been sung by one of the best masters of English satire, and are as keen in our day as they were in his. In no part of the world, however, are these disputes upon matters of taste carried to such a height as they are among the Anglo-Saxons. The annals of the stage in France, Germany, Italy, and, indeed, throughout continental Europe, present no such examples of protracted and fierce hostility as the celebrated "O.P." riots which disgraced London in the year 1809. The enthusiasm of the French, Germans, and Italians in theatrical matters is always on the side of admiration. They may idolise, but they never execrate an actor or singer. They never, as far as we have heard, wage war against a manager or a performer. Their combativeness is reserved for political questions. With us, however, and with our brothers in America, the case seems to be different. The combativeness of low and vulgar ruffians breaks out now and then upon matters of mere taste; and a mimic war is excited in theatrical circles, which parodies in intensity the more important conflicts of politics, and creates to the full as much ill-will in the limited sphere of its operations. Within the last four or five years London has been the scene of two such feuds: the one to hoot a particular Englishman off the stage, a case to which we do not wish more particularly to allude; and the other, about this time last year, when the French troupe of Alexandre Dumas, threatening us with plays in ten and twenty acts, were driven from Drury-lane Theatre by the illiberality and violence of a paltry clique of minor actors, who took the British drama under their absurd protection, and brought disgrace upon the metropolis by their prejudice and vindictiveness against a few unoffending Frenchmen.

But all the theatrical conflicts hitherto recorded sink into insignificance compared with the riot which took place in New York on the 11th of May, on the occasion of Mr. Macready's appearance at the Astor House Theatre; a riot not only disgraceful in the highest degree to the mob of New York, but most deplorable in its results, as causing a loss of life to no less than twenty—one account says twenty-two—individuals. The circumstances of the miserable feud which produced this tragic catastrophe are by no means complicated or of difficult comprehension. It will be remembered by the play-going public of the metropolis that an American actor of the name of Forrest made his appearance here some years ago; that he was very ambitious of being considered a great tragedian; and that, with scarcely an exception, the theatrical critics of the daily and weekly press agreed in considering his high pretensions to be unsupported by anything like genius. In short, his appearance in London was a failure, except in second or third-rate melodramatic parts, in which it was acknowledged that he might pass muster. This Forrest, having more vanity than common-sense, took this failure very much to heart; and, to soothe his egregious self-love, which had been deeply wounded in its sorest part, represented to himself, until he seems to have believed the falsehood, that he had failed, not because he was a bad actor, as he would have done had he been an Englishman, but because the London press and the London public were in a conspiracy to run him down because he was an American! He also chose to link Mr. Macready—the greatest living tragedian, and a gentleman who, in his private capacity, would confer honour upon any station in life—with his failure, and asserted to himself and to his friends that Mr. Macready had bribed the London press to depreciate and abuse him. With this belief in his mind, he endeavoured to revenge himself for his failure, not only by public and private abuse of Mr. Macready, but by going to the theatre on purpose to hiss him—a piece of bad taste, to say the least of it, which showed a total ignorance of the respect due to himself, if not to Mr. Macready. The charge against Mr. Macready, to those who know anything of the London press, was too ludicrous even for comment, and fall to the ground unnoticed, from its own absurdity. The charge, too, which Mr. Forrest brought against the London public, that they conceived a prejudice against him because he was an American, was equally ridiculous. People pitied his hallucination, or laughed at it. They remembered, too, that a very popular American actor had been drawing large houses, and making large profits at one of our theatres but a very short time previously; that, in fact, the enthusiasm excited by the appearance of Mr. T. D. Rice as "Jim Crow"—a popularity which introduced a new favourite into our London streets, gave a contradiction to the calumny, and proved that the London public cared nothing for the country of an actor, provided he had genius, originality, or high talent to recommend him to their favour. Indeed, the assertion displayed such gross ignorance on the part of him who made it, as to defeat its own purpose. People shrugged their shoulders, and felt that it was not alone as an actor that Mr. Forrest was deficient in the qualities which should command respect. In the course of time, Miss Cushman, an American lady, whose genius was unquestionable, made her appearance in Shakspearian characters, and aspired to tread the highest walks of the drama. Her claim was at once acknowledged; genius, in her case was seen to be genius, as mediocrity in the case of Mr. Forrest was seen to be mediocrity; and he and his libels were alike forgotten.

In New York, however, the case was different. As the French journal says, "Chaque sot a un plus grand sot qui l'admire," Mr. Forrest had his partisans at home—not among the educated classes, who can appreciate or even understand such high Shakspearian impersonations as Mr. Macready can give, but among the admirers of coarser dramatic aliment, with whom the louder and more vulgar the rant, the greater and more attractive the actor. To this class he repeated, through the American newspapers, the story of his English reception and its supposed causes. As soon as Mr. Macready set foot in America on his professional tour, the charge was specifically made against him by Mr. Forrest. Judging of the character and practice of London newspapers by those of their own, a large class of people in New York believed what was stated, and a party was formed to hoot the Englishman off the stage. Though Mr. Macready grappled with the charge immediately, and disproved it to the satisfaction of every honourable and impartial person who took the trouble to investigate it, the calumny spread. National prejudice and vanity were enlisted in the cause, and a portion of the ignorant mob of New York, who hate England and Englishmen with an intensity of bitterness difficult either to believe or to account for, took it up in default of more exciting or more important topics. The result ultimately was the deplorable riot recorded in our columns, which has carried death and mourning into many families of New York, disgraced the city, filled the educated classes with regret and humiliation at the misconduct of their ignorant fellow-countrymen, and exasperated that feeling of ill-will against Englishmen, which is the worst feature in the character of the American populace.

To Mr. Macready it must ever be a source of pain and regret that even involuntarily and most blamelessly he should have been the cause of such a catastrophe. Nothing could be more admirable or more heroic than his conduct in the trying circumstances in which he was placed. In consequence of many earnest solicitations on the part of some of the most respectable inhabitants of New York, amongst whose names appears the illustrious signature of Washington Irving—to make another appearance on the stage after the first disturbances of the Monday evening had taken place, Mr. Macready made a sacrifice of his own feelings to their presumed better judgment of what was due—not to himself, but—to their city. His whole conduct was modest and retiring, and not the slightest particle of blame can in any way attach to him for what has occurred. It seems to us, also, that the conduct of the Mayor, the police, and the military of New York was in the highest degree creditable to them; and that the guilt of blood lies not upon their heads, but upon the heads of those who fomented and aided the riot. We are certain that in this country no ill-will need be anticipated in any man's breast against America or American institutions in consequence; and that no American actor or actress will receive other than the kindly reception due to his or her merits, because a New York mob has been betrayed by its ignorance and evil passions into these atrocities. Mobs are mobs all over the world, and brutality and ignorance are twin brothers in one place as in another. Although we deeply deplore the existence of such a spirit amongst any portion of the American people, we know that neither America or England is to be judged of by the floating blackguardism of its large cities; and we are certain that every American gentleman will far more deeply regret these occurrences than any Englishman can do.

We cannot conclude our notice of this catastrophe without expressing our opinion that it is due to Mr. Macready, whose arrival in his own country may be daily expected, that some expression of public respect for the integrity and uprightness of his character as a man and a gentleman should take place immediately on his landing. Opinions differ amongst ourselves as to his merits as an actor. He has his adverse as well as his favourable critics—his article opponents as well as his admirers; but there is no difference of opinion upon his estimable character in private and public life. We do not imagine that one individual in England believes him to have had the slightest jealousy of Mr. Forrest, or thinks the charge brought against him had any other foundation than the preposterous and offended vanity of a man accustomed to applause for splitting the ears of the New York groundlings, and annoyed that no similar applause was to be gained from the severer and juster critics of our metropolis. Americans in London will no doubt be proud to attend such a meeting as we suggest, to testify by their experience that no class of Englishmen reciprocates the ill-feeling of the mob of New York. Such events as these are of too much importance in the history of nations. Were the Oregon or Maine Boundary now in dispute, or were there really a question of Canadian annexation, a riot like this, and the feeling that engendered it, might be in the highest degree prejudicial and dangerous. It is likely, however, that the bad blood caused by this event will cool down; and the Americans in London may, we think, do much towards the desirable consummation, by testifying to the ungrudging and generous hospitality of England to talent, whatever may be its country. Perhaps Englishmen carry this feeling to excess; and, to be a clever foreigner, is but too often to have a better chance of encouragement than to be a clever Englishman.

THE CONVICT JOHN MITCHELL.—The Neptune convict-ship, in charge of Mr Deas, as superintendent, landed 82 of her cargo of convicts at Bermuda, and having filled up from that place her number to 300—among whom was the political convict John Mitchell—sailed for the Cape of Good Hope from Bermuda, April 22. Instructions were given to keep Mitchell apart from the other prisoners, partly on account of the shattered state of his health, as he suffered severely from asthma, and also for political reasons. To carry out these orders, the stern cabin pantry had been converted into a cell fitted up as a berth for the convict, and a separate entrance had been made to it, so that he was entirely cut off from contact with the other prisoners. All the convicts on board the Neptune on their passage to the Cape were "ticket-of-leave men," their position in the colony dependung upon their conduct on board.

FREDERICTON CATHEDRAL.—It has been, at length, resolved to build this cathedral with a central tower, instead of two triangular towers, as in the original design. The Bishop of the colony (the poorest in the British dependencies) labours indefatigably in the good cause, and has expended on it a sum nearly equal to the whole income of the see for the three years during which he has presided over it. His Lordship collected last year, in England, £2000; since his return to his diocese, the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge have made, at his request, a second grant of £500, and a contract has been taken for building the chancel and tower as high as the base of the spire. A considerable sum is, however, required to complete the internal fittings: and we hope that the consummation of the scheme may depend on the advancement those who "enjoy the luxury of doing good." Much has been already done, and what remains can scarcely be accomplished without aid from home resources. Donations are received at the office of the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, 79, Pall-mall. The sum still required is not less than £ 0; for labour is very dear in New Brunswick; common masons earning 10s. a day, and the contract price for the walls being 30s. per perch.

HYDE-PARK GALLERY OF MODERN ART.—We learn with much satisfaction that the committee of the Hyde-park Gallery have granted free admission to their exhibition to the studio of the Government School of Design, Somerset House. This is an example we hope to find followed by other exhibitions in the metropolis, as it is calculated to improve the taste of our designers.

A Parliamentary return, presented on Tuesday last, shows the number of officers employed under the Poor-law Board in England and Wales, together with the amount of their salaries during the past year. It appears that there are nearly 8000 of them, whose salaries amount to nearly £400,000 per annum. The return is given as follows:

Officers not paid by fixed salaries are not included in this return, nor are those collectors of poor-rates who are paid by a commission on their receipts. The expense of the Poor-law Commission itself is this year £35,136. Parliament also votes £.60,000 a year for schoolmasters and medical relief. The total charge for working the Poor-law in England alone is, therefore, more than £555,000 a year.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE

The demise of the National Constituent Assembly, and the inauguration of the new Legislative Assembly of the Republic, have both taken place in the most perfect quiet, notwithstanding the predictions of Government coups d'état, Socialist insurrections, and all those other spectral creations of Parisian imagination with which our lively neighbours love to frighten themselves. The last moments of the National Assembly, on Saturday evening, were occupied with a proposition of M. Piscon to discuss the question of the instruments of June, with reference to an amnesty. A division took place, when there appeared for M. Piscon's proposition, 281; against it, 285; majority, 5. On the proposition of M. Baze, the Assembly agreed to a vote of thanks to the National Guard and the Army for the eminent services they had rendered to the defence of public order and the protection of liberty during the existence of the Assembly. The President, M. Marrast, consulted the Assembly relative to a motion of M. Degousée for a sitting of the House on Sunday, to regulate the mode of transferring their powers to the Legislative Assembly. M. Dupin opposed the motion as unconstitutional, and the subject dropped. The President then took leave of the Assembly in a pathetic and eloquent speech, in the course of which he enumerated events it had rendered to the nation. In conclusion, he proposed that the Assembly should separate with a cry of "Vive la République!" The proposal was carried unanimously, and the President rose from his chair at a quarter to seven o'clock.

On Sunday a preliminary private sitting of the members of the National Assembly took place in the Hall of Conferences, with the object of naming the provisional bureau.

M. Keratry, a senior member (he is eighty years of age), presided. The five junior members were appointed secretaries pro tem. Among them was a sergeant of the line, named Commissaire. He, as well as the other two non-commissioned officers who have been elected, wore the undress uniform of their respective regiments.

On Monday the Legislative Assembly was publicly opened. Crowds, of whom the great majority were workmen en blouse, thronged all the main streets and places leading to the Palais Bourbon, the building selected for their sittings. Troops and all passed off quietly. There was a considerable number of troops in attendance.

No change had been made in the interior of the hall, although the new Assembly only consists of 750 members instead of 900. The representatives of the Montagne arrived first, and filled the three upper lines of benel on the left. In the centre of them were seated, close to M. Ledru-Rollin and Lamennais, the two sergeants, Boichot and Rattier, both wearing their uniform. Boichot occupied the place which Louis Napoleon vacated when he was appointed President of the Republic. Under them sat Generals Cavaignac, Lamoricière, and Baraguay d'Hilliers, MM. Dufaure, and Coquerel. By degrees the members entered the hall. Marshal Bugeaud was greeted and complimented by his numerous friends, and paced himself close to the ministerial bench. General Changarnier was also warmly received. The operas was returned for Lyons and Strasbourg, who were expected to sit in their working clothes, appeared in the dress of gentlemen

At twelve o'clock M. Keratry, the senior member, and the six youngest representatives, amongst whom was Sergeant Commissaire, took their seats at the bureau. The representative was, who were formed in knots throughout the hall, hastened to their seats; and, when silence was restored, M. Keratry thus addressed the Assembly:—"Gentlemen Representatives of the First Legislative Assembly of the French Republic.—Heaven, by prolonging my existence beyond the ordinary limit assigned to human life, and the choice of my brave fellow countrymen of Finisterre, who, during upwards of 30 years, granted me their confidence, have called me to this chair. I am aware of all the obligations imposed upon me by that double choice, and I pay a just tribute of gratitude to the double source from which it emanates. I will try, and I hope to succeed, with your co-operation and kindness, to constitute this Assembly, to regularize it, and give it the officers necessary for the regular discharge of its functions. We must first proceed to form the bureaux and verify the qualifications of the members. I invite my colleagues to set aside those whose elections may give rise to objections, and reserve them for special reports. As to those which offered no difficulty, the Assembly, I am sure, will validate them without delay."

M. Odilon Barrot, President of the Council, next ascended the tribune, and said, "C itizen Representatives, I propose that the constituting of the Assembly be convoked de jure by the wish of the nation and the fundamental compact. The Executive Power must confine itself to establish ng the fact of your meeting, and concerning the hopes expressed by your President. The Government intends to present to you the general exposé of the situation of the country, and will hasten to accomplish that duty the moment the Assembly shall be constituted."

The rest of the sitting was taken up with the disposal of the preliminary business mentioned in M. Keratry's address

The nominations of the President and Secretaries in the Standing Committees showed a majority for the Monarchical party of 12 out of 15.

Towards the close of the sitting, M. Lagrange, at the head of a number of the representatives for Lyons, entered from the rear of the committee rooms, and demanded of the President if the troops that surrounded the Assembly were there by his order? He further observed, that, in his opinion, they were only summoned to intimidate the Assembly.

The President replied that the measures had been adopted by way of precaution, and with his consent; and he completely approved what was done.

The verification of the election returns occupied the Assembly the greater portion of the week. During Tuesday's sitting, the members of the Montagne wished to inaugurate the entrance of the Assembly by hailing La République Démocratique et Sociale, but the majority refused, and considered their loyalty to the Commonwealth was shown sufficiently by crying aloud "Vive la République." Much excitement, however, prevailed, and the sitting was one stormy scene.

Nothing definite has yet been done with respect to the re-construction of the Ministry

M. Keratry, the Provisional President of the Legislative Assembly, was born in 1769. Although belonging to a noble family of Brittany, he warmly embraced the cause of the Revolution. Elected deputy in 18 8, he ever since, both as member of the Chamber of Peers and of the Corps Législatif, energetically combated the Government of the Restoration. He was one of the small minority of which Casimir Perrier said, "We are only —— — — — — — — are 30,000,000 out of doors," a fact verified a few —— — — — — — —

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

EASTERN COUNTIES.—The adjourned meeting of this company, for the purpose of electing new directors, was held on Thursday, at the London Tavern. It had, however, been generally advertised that a further adjournment to the 15th of June would be proposed, in consequence of the committee to whom had been entrusted the duty of selecting, for the approbation of the shareholders at large, the eight directors to be appointed, not having completed their labours The meeting, therefore, did not excite the same interest as previous meetings of the same company have done. The chair was taken by Mr. George Mesh, one of the committee of investigation, and the adjournment to the day named was unanimously carried, after some desultory conversation having reference to the preliminary re-action and ultimate appointment of the new Board.

OXFORD, WORCESTER, AND WOLVERHAMPTON.—A meeting of the London shareholders of this company was held at the London Tavern last Thursday, for the purpose of considering their position, and the best course to be adopted at the general meeting to be held on the 8th of June next. James Capel, Esq., being voted to the chair, read a long report of the directors to the shareholders, which embraced all the details of the affairs of the company from 1844 to the present time, and certain steps which the directors deemed expedient for the shareholders to take at the ensuing meeting. After a great deal of very desultory conversation, a resolution was proposed, to the effect, "That all those gentlemen who wished for a committee of investigation should send in their proxies to Mr. Capel, who would go to Worcester and carry their intentions into effect." This was passed unanimously, and a vote of thanks given to the chairman.

LANCASTER AND PRESTON JUNCTION.—On the 24th, at the special meeting in Lancaster, Mr. J. Bushell in the chair, the proprietors, after a somewhat spirited opposition to the joint guarantee with the Scottish Central, confirmed the agreement submitted to them for vesting the line and works in the Lancaster and Carlisle. The net earnings of both companies are henceforth divisible in proportion of 7 to 16; 7 to the Lancaster and Preston, and 16 to the Lancaster and Carlisle. The Lancaster and Preston are to pay the annuity to the Canal Company, and the interest on their debt of £113,000; and the Lancaster and Carlisle to pay all their present liabilities, save that under arrangement with the Scottish Central.

LANCASTER AND CARLISLE.—On the same day and at the same place, the proprietors of this company confirmed their share of the agreement above mentioned with the Lancaster and Preston shareholders.

CALEDONIAN.—At the special meeting of the shareholders on the 29th ult., in Edinburgh, Mr. J. Hope Johnstone in the chair, sanction was given for leasing the Wishaw and Coltness line; and the directors were authorised to notify the forfeiture of their property to all holders of quarter-shares being more than three calls in arrear; also, to all holders of original shares in arrear who could not give security for future payment. The forfeited amount to be forfeited, after the sale of certain shares, will be about £317,000. Power was sought for borrowing £300,000 for the completion of the company's works, but, as a scrutiny of the voting was necessary, the determination of the proposal (which was expected to be favourable to the proposal) was not definitively made known.

FLEETWOOD, PRESTON, AND WEST RIDING.—At the special meeting of proprietors on the 30th, in Preston, Mr. T. B. Addison in the chair, the directors assented without hesitation to a committee of inquiry; and Messrs. Grey, Cowther, S. Riley, R. Gardner, W. Pearce, and J. Atherton were accordingly appointed members of the same.

WISHAW AND COLTNESS.—At the special meeting on the 29th, in Glasgow, W. A. Glasgow in the chair, the agreement with the Caledonian for the lease of the line was confirmed. The Wishaw and Coltness are by this guaranteed ten-and-a-half per cent.

DUBLIN, DUNDRUM, AND RATHFARNHAM.—At the meeting of certain shareholders in Dublin, dissatisfied with part of the present direction, Sir J. Dombrain in the chair, it was resolved to petition the removal of those directors to whom the shareholders objected, and to convene a special meeting for such a purpose on the 25th inst. The proprietors present repudiated all share in the present agency of the directors BELFAST AND BALLYCLARE.—At the half-yearly meeting of shareholders on the 28th, in Belfast, the Hon. G. Handcock in the chair, the report presented declared no dividend, but affirmed a falling off in the passenger receipts and an increase in the goods' traffic, which last, it was hoped from a reduction of fares, and from the easy terms on which loan capital can now, comparatively, be obtained.

YORK, NEWCASTLE, AND BERWICK.—The committee of investigation have issued their first report, which was presented at the special meeting of proprietors on the 1st instant

Orders, according the dissolution and winding-up of the respective companies, under the Joint-Stock Companies' Winding up Act of 1848, have been, within the last week, obtained in the Vice-Chancellor's Court for the following companies:—Direct London and Manchester; Wisbeach, Peterborough, Birmingham, and Midland Union; Lynn, Norwich, and Yarmouth; Eastern Counties Extension, &c.; Cambridge and Colchester; Northampton, Lincoln, and Hull; Rugby, Warwick, and Worcester; Warwick and Worcester; London and Birmingham Extension.

The line of the MANCHESTER, BUXTON, MATLOCK, and MIDLAND JUNCTION (which pierces the renowned Matlock scenery), has been satisfactorily tested by the engineers, directors, and friends of the company. The works have not been greatly interrupted, in the sections requiring excavation and tunneling, by the incessant small water-courses which the contractors have had to contend with. We shall, on the present occasion, be readers with the shareholders of noteworthy localities of this line.

The return to the House of Lords (obtained by Lord Brougham), respecting the allotment of shares in the WATERFORD, WEXFORD, WICKLOW, and DUBLIN, declares that of 372 shares allotted to three members of the Upper House, 226 shares were taken up; and of 5489 shares allotted to 47 members of the Lower House, 4467 only were taken up.

By September the ABERDEEN line will be carried, it is expected, to within twelve miles of Aberdeen, and into the city itself before the end of the year.

The published terms of the Government loan to the MIDLAND GREAT WESTERN, for the construction of their line from Mullingar to Galway, were on Friday week finally agreed upon, and are as follows: The Government to advance by way of loan £500,000. The Company to be bound to proceed with the line from Mullingar to Galway as speedily as possible. The rate of interest on the entire loan to be 4½ per cent. No part of the principal to be repayable for ten years. At the expiration of ten years the principal to be repayable by ½ per cent. per annum, independently of the 3½ annual interest, which will liquidate the debt in about 30 years. When the railway from Athlone to Galway is constructed, should the nett profits not pay the interest to the Government, then, and in that case, the deficiency is to be made good by the county of Galway and by two baronies of Roscommon

The meeting of the proprietors of the SOUTH WALES, on the 30th ult., in London, with regard to the 5 per cent. guarantee from the Great Western, and other matters, was adjourned for a fortnight.

The anniversary of the foundation of the railway town at Wolverton, established for the accommodation of the servants of the LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY, and their families, on the 29th ult., by Mr. Cheshy, was duly celebrated on the 26th inst., by various officials of the company. The services were attended by the children of the engine-men and mechanics; and the inconvenient of the day was relished by several other clergymen, besides the usual formalities.

THE NEWPEY, WARRENPOINT, AND ROSSTREVOR was opened on the 28th for public traffic. Trains ran from twelve till eight without any accident occurring. The carriages, plant, and condition of the line are highly spoken of.

MR. BRASSEY, the contractor, has been running a locomotive with a train of materials, &c., over parts of the NORWICH line, which is opened from Haughley to Diss. Great activity has prevailed over the works, which will all be completed in two or three weeks.

The works in the vast tunnel of the LEEDS AND THIRSK, running under Brambope Ridge, have been rapidly urged on. The masonry, &c. of the arches and permanent shafts is nearly closed. Galvanized iron is to be employed in lieuting those parts where the water comes through to any extent, and the whole will be ready, it is thought, before the Leeds end of the line.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.—The adjourned meeting of this company was held at Derby on Thursday, when the committee of investigation not being ready, the meeting was further adjourned to the 4th of July.

ADMISSION OF SOLICITORS.—The list published by the Incorporated Law Society has just been issued, from which it appears that the number of gentlemen applying to be admitted to practise as attorneys in the Court of Queen's Bench is 196, and four have given notice to be added to the list, pursuant to the Judge's order. For the same purpose there have been six notices of admiss on for the last day of the deceased Pear was Hereditary Registrar of the Court of Chancery, and had two livings in his patronage. By his death the annuity left him by his first wife passes to Miss Burdett Coutts.

CANADA

In reply to Mr. CHRISTOPHER, who alluded to the publication of the Canadian papers in the Times newspaper before they were in the hands of the members,

Mr. HAWES stated that the papers were not delivered to members on account of the holidays. No favouritism was shown to any particular newspaper. In this case, applications had been made for early copies by the newspapers, which had been acceded to as soon as they were printed; and in many cases it was most important that the Government should avail themselves of the great publicity which the newspapers afforded for making the public acquainted with important public documents. (Cheers.)

SUPPLY.

On the motion for the consideration of the report of the Committee of Supply.

Sir H. WILLOUGHBY rose to move, pursuant to notice, a reduction of £50,000 in the navy estimates, with reference to wages and artificers. The vote of last year was £501,000; that was reduced to £451,000 in the estimates of the present year, being a reduction of £40,000; and what he now proposed was to reduce that amount by £50,000

Sir F. BARING declined the vote, on the ground that, if the naval establishment was to be sustained, the necessary expense must be incurred.

Ultimately the motion was withdrawn, the vote agreed to, and the report received

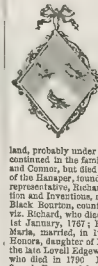
In committee on the Civil Contingencies, Mr. B. OSBORNE took occasion to censure several votes; which, however, after some discussion, were agreed to.

The following bills passed through committee:—The Passengers' Bill, the Registering of Births (Scotland) Bill, and the Clergy Relief Bill. The Police of Towns (Scotland) Bill was referred to a select committee.—Adjourned.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED

MARIA EDGEWORTH

It is somewhat strange that so little public notice has yet been taken of the demise of this lady, one of the greatest of our novelists.



The name of Maria Edgeworth will ever rank high in classic English literature. Her biography will scarcely lies important, both from the distinguished position she held for so long a time in the eminent and intellectual society of the country, and from her association with most of our great literati from the era of Johnson to that of Scott and Byron. Of her family and descent Miss Edgeworth might well be proud. The Edgeworths, originally, it is said, established at Edgeworth, now called Edgware, in Middlesex, settled in Ireland in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, about the year 1583

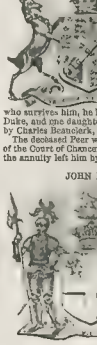
Roger Edgeworth, a monk, who wrote a sermon against the Reformers, being smitten, like his master, Henry VIII., with the bright eyes of beauty, like him, after having been a defender of the Catholic faith, renounced it, and married. His sons, Edward and Francis, went to Ireland, probably under the patronage of Essex and Cecil, as those names have since continued in the family. The elder brother, Edward, became Bishop of Down and Connor, but died without issue; and the younger branch, who was Clerk of the Hanaper, founded the house of Edgeworth of Edgeworth's Town. Its last representative, Richard Lovel. Edgeworth, Esq., the celebrated writer on Education and Inventions, married first, Anna Maria, daughter of Paul Elers, Esq., of Black Bourton, county Oxford, and had by her, one son and three daughters, viz. Richard, who died in 1795, aged 31; Maria, the distinguished novelist, born 1st January, 1767; Emmeline, married, in 1802, to John King, Esq., Anna Maria, married, in 1794, to Dr. Beddoes. Mr. Edgeworth married, secondly, Honora, daughter of Edward Sneyd, Esq., of Lichfield, and by her he had a son, the late Lovell Edgeworth, Esq., of Edgeworth's Town, and Francis, who died in 1799. His third wife was Elizabeth, another daughter of Edward Sneyd, Esq., and by her he had one father of Charles Sneyd Edgeworth, Esq., of Edgeworth's Town, and several other children, of whom the only survivor, Honora, is wife of Captain Beaufort, R.N. Mr. Edgeworth married fourthly, Frances Anne, daughter of the Rev. Daniel Beaufort, Rector of Collon, and by her two sons and four daughters, of whom the eldest, Frances Maria, married Lest ck P Wilson, Esq.; the second, Harriett, married the Very Rev. Richard Butler, Dean of Connemore, and the third, Sophia, married Henry Fox, Esq.

A distinguished scion of the race was the celebrated Abbé Edgeworth, who attended Louis XVI to the scaffold.

Miss Edgeworth was born in England in 1767, and, having been educated under the care of her excellent father, began to write more than fifty years ago. From that period her literary career is known to all: it displayed the most brilliant ability and the most unwearying usefulness. To enter into the details of it and of her domestic existence of perfect happiness and virtue would far exceed our limits. Hers was a life passed in her own home, among her kindred, or in visits to her friends. We refer the reader for particulars to her memoirs of her father, to the letters of Miss Seward, and especially to Lockhart's "Life of Scott." The author of "Waverley" received the author of "Castle Rackrent" at Abbotsford with all but Royal honours. He hailed her as the great genius of Ireland, and he acknowledged that it was the inspiration of her books which led him in the first attempt of his own immortal productions. Scott was not to what Miss Edgeworth has written at once proves that his estimation was not beyond the truth. The very enumeration of her works, all admirable in their way, would be too long for this notice. She addressed herself to every rank and age. Her "Frank" and her "Parent's Assistant" are unrivalled as books for children. It has in fact been truly remarked, that no child of any intellect at all can resist their charm. Among her novels, we would name "Vivian," "To-morrow," "Absentee," and "Patronage," her famous "Castle Rackrent," "Ennui," "Modern Grisselda," and last, not least, her "Helen." The "Treatise on Practical Education," and the "Essay on Irish Bulls," on which her father assisted, and her father's Memoirs, are also admired contributions to her pen. Miss Edgeworth lived to the great age of eighty-two; yet, to the last day of her life her faculties remained unimpaired, and the fascination of her society was as great as ever. Those even who met her in for a few mornings call, would remain for hours, loth to terminate her conversation. The latter years of Miss Edgeworth's life were passed between Edgeworth's Town and the rectory at Trim, the residence of her brother-in-law, the rector, the amiable and agreeable Dean Butler—himself a well-known scholar and antiquarian. Trim rectory is in the vicinage of Laricor, great in the recollections of Swift and Stella; and not far from it is the birthplace of Wellington: so great that this locality combines the memory of three of the greatest minds of Ireland.

Miss Edgeworth was expected at the rectory the very day on which the news of her death arrived. She died at Edgeworth's Town on the 21st instant: she had driven out in her carriage in her apparent usual health on that day, when she felt a sudden weakness, and returning home, she, in the course of a few hours, gradually and gently sank into death. An intimate and poetical, in announcing her demise to a friend, writes thus:—"I feel it difficult to express my deep regret for Miss Edgeworth's sudden and totally unexpected death. You cannot well imagine the charm of her society, the mingled simplicity and superior sense; she was never occupied by self; one was sure of pleasing her in whatever way one engaged in; she would laugh like an Irishwoman in exuberant enjoyment of any pleasant subject; her warm-hearted benevolence, aided by her warm-hearted love of country, was delightful. I never felt greater pride or gratitude in the affection of any one, male or female, than in her."

WILLIAM-AUBREY-DE-VERE BEAUCLERK, NINTH DUKE OF ST. ALBANS.



His GRACE died on the 26th ult. at his residence in Piccadilly, after a lengthened illness, arising from injuries received some months since by a fall from his horse, whilst hunting. He had completed his 68th year, having been born on the 24th March, 1781. He was twice married: his first wife was the well-known Mrs. Coutts, by whom he had without issue, 6th August, 1837, and bereavement to the Duke an annuity of £10,000, with the beautiful villa of Holly Lodge, Highgate. His Grace married, secondly, 20th May, 1839, Elizabeth Catherine, youngest daughter of the late General Joseph Gubbins, of Kilrush, co. Limerick, by whom, who survives him, he leaves a son, William Amelius Aubrey De Vere, present Duke, and one daughter, Diana De Vere. The house of Beauclerk was founded by Charles Beauclerk, son of King Charles II., by Eleanor Gwynn

His Grace was also Hereditary Registrar of the Court of Chancery, and had two livings in his patronage. By his death the annuity left him by his first wife passes to Miss Burdett Coutts.

JOHN BOURKE, FOURTH EARL OF MAYO.

This nobleman died, at Berated Lodge, Passage, on the 2nd of his afternoon, Mrs. Smith, on the 23rd ult., having attained to his 84th year.

His Lordship was a member of the same ancient family as that of the Marquis of Clanricarde, was son of Joseph Deane, 3rd Earl of Mayo, the distinguished churchman who became eventually Archbishop of Tuam. He married 24th May, 1792, Arabella, fourth daughter of William Mackworth Praed, Esq., of Bilton House, Devon, but by her (who died 19th November, 1844) he had no issue. The family honours devolve, consequently, on his nephew, Robert Bourke, esq., only son married to Anne Charlotte, only daughter of the Hon. John Jocelyn, and has several children, of whom the eldest, Richard-Southwell, Lord Naas, married, last October, the third daughter of Colonel George Wyndham, of Petworth.

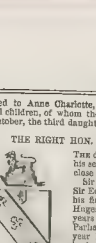
THE RIGHT HON. SIR EDWARD KNATCHBULL, BART.



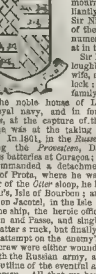
THE death of this Baronet occurred on the 24th ult., at his seat, Mersham Hatch, Kent, where he had resided in close retirement since his resignation of office.

Sir Edward was born 20th Dec., 1781, the only son of Sir Edward Knatchbull, the eighth Baronet, by Mary, his first wife, daughter and co-heir of William Wynne Hugessen, Esq., of Provenders, in Kent. For many years he took an active part in public life; he sat in Parliament as member for his native county from the year 18.9; and was regarded not only as one of the leaders of the Tory party, but as the strenuous advocate of the agricultural interest. From 1834 to 1835 he held office as Paymaster of the Forces, and was again appointed to the same important situation on the return of Sir Robert Peel to power, in 1841; but he retired altogether from political life in 1845, on the announcement being made that Sir Robert had resolved on a Repeal of the Corn Laws.

The family of Knatchbull is one of great antiquity in Kent, and has possessed Mersham Hatch, in that county, since the reign of Henry II.

Sir Edward was twice married: by his first wife, Annabella Christiana, daughter of Sir John Hobywood, Bart., he had, with other issue, a son and heir, now Sir Norton Joseph Knatchbull, Bart.; and by his second, Fanny Catherine, eldest daughter of Edward Knight, Esq., of Godmersham Park, Kent, he has left a large family

REAR-ADMIRAL SIR NISBET JOSIAH WILLOUGHBY, C.B., K.C.H.

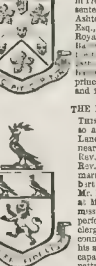


IT has been our melancholy duty of late to have to record the deaths of some of our most eminent commanders. A fortnight since, Sir Robert Wilson and Sir Edward Paget, who both achieved high reputation in the hard-fought fields of the Peninsula, were placed on the mournful category; and now we have to add a brilliantly distinguished member of the sister profession, Sir Nisbet Willoughby, who rose to fame by a series of the most enterprising and gallant services, far too numerous and too important to be more than glanced at in this brief memorial

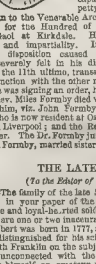
Sir Nisbet was born in 1777, the son of Robert Willoughby, Esq., of Asply House, Notts, by his second wife, a daughter of James Bruce, Esq., of Wester Kinlock; being thus descended, paternally, from the same family as that of Lord Middleton, and maternally, from the noble house of Lauderdale. At the age of thirteen he entered the Royal Navy, and in four years after was a midshipman of the Orpheus, at the capture of the French frigate, Duguay Trouin. In the year 1795 he was at the taking of Malacca, and in 1796 fought at Amboyna and Banda. In 1801, in the Russell, at Copenhagen, he distinguished himself by boarding the Provsteen, Danish block ship; in 1804 he stormed the enemy's batteries at Curaçoa; in 1807 served at the passage of the Dardanelles, and commanded a detachment of seamen and marines at the attack on the Island of Proto, where he was severely wounded. Subsequently, when commander of the Slaney sloop, he headed the seamen and marines at the capture of St. Paul's, Isle of Bourbon; and while commanding the Nereide, made a gallant attack on Lancel, in the Isle of France, for which he received promotion. In the same ship, the heroic officer participated in the conquest of the Isles of Bourbon and Passe, and singly engaged two French frigates and a corvette, which latter a ruck, but finally escaped. Not long after, in a daring but unsuccessful attempt on the enemy's squadron in Port Sud Est, Sir Nisbet had nearly all his crew were either wounded or killed. Subsequently he served as a volunteer with the Russian army, and was taken prisoner. The foregoing is but a slight outline of the eventful and brilliant career of one of England's most gallant seamen. All that we have space to add is, that Sir Nisbet received the honour of knighthood in 1837, was appointed Naval Aide-de-Camp to the Queen in 1841, and became Rear-Admiral in 1847, and that he was on the "good service pension" list, as well as in the receipt of a pension for wounds.

His death occurred on the 10th ultimo, at Montagu-street, Portman-square, after a fortnight's suffering. The gallant officer was never married.

SIR JOHN SMYTH, BART., OF LONG ASHTON, COUNTY SOMERSET.



THIS opulent Baronet, whose decease was recently announced, was son of the late Thomas Smyth, Esq., of Scapleton, by Jane his wife, only daughter of Joseph Whitchurch, Esq.; and grandson of Sir John Smyth, elected M.P. for Bristol in 1754, and created a Baronet in 1763. The family name is one, Sir John Smyth represented the old Barouetical family of Smyth of Long Ashton, and was lineally descended from Thos Smyth, Esq., M.P. for Somersetshire, a zealous supporter of the Royal cause during the great Civil War



THE REV. MILES FORMBY.

THIS gentleman, whose death occurred in a manner so awfully sudden, was a well-known clergyman in Lancashire, of much worth and private worth, and a near connexion, by marriage, of Sir Robert Peel. The Rev. Miles Formby was the fourth son of the late Rev. Mr. Formby, of Formby Hall, Lancashire, and married Caroline, third daughter of the late Sir Robert Peel's brother, Lawrence Peel, Esq., of Ardwick. Mr. Miles Formby held the incumbency of the church at Melling, near Liverpool, and was also in the commission of the peace for the county of Lancaster. He performed his duties most efficiently, both as a clergyman and a magistrate. He founded a school in connexion with his church, and he was unremitting in his attentions to the sick and poor. In his magisterial capacity, besides being continually actively engaged at petty sessions, Mr. Formby usually sat as assistant-chairman to the Venerable Archdeacon Brooks, in presiding over the quarter sessions for the Hundred of West Derby, held in the Court-houses of the great Gaol at Kirkdale. He administered justice with invariable intelligence and impartiality. In private life, his agreeable manners and amiable disposition caused him to be generally beloved, and his loss will be severely felt in his district. Mr. Formby's death occurred thus: he was, on the 11th ultimo, transacting business at the Sessions-room, Ormskirk, in conjunction with the other magistrates, apparently in perfect health, when, while he was signing an order, he fell forward and instantaneously expired.

The Rev. Miles Formby died without issue. He had six brothers, three of whom survive him, viz. John Formby, Esq., the eldest, also a magistrate for Lancashire, now a resident at Ostend, in Belgium; Dr. Formby, an eminent physician in Liverpool; and the Rev. James Formby, Rector of Frindsbury, near Rochester. The Dr. Formby just mentioned, and his brother, the late Rev. R. Hesketh Formby, married sisters of the Rev. Miles Formby's wife.

THE LATE SIR ROBERT WILSON.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

SIR,—The family of the late Sir Robert Wilson are indebted to you for the account, in your paper of the 19th inst., of the career and brilliant services of the brave and loyal-hearted soldier whom they mourn.

There are one or two inaccuracies, however, which they desire to see corrected.

Sir Robert was born in 1777, and was the second son of Benjamin Wilson, Esq., F.R.S., distinguished for his scientific attainments, who maintained a controversy with Franklin on the subject of "Heat and Cold," which was entirely unconnected with the eminent landscape-painter of the same name, although himself an amateur painter of great merit, as his imitations of Rembrandt testify. In illustration of this fact, I will mention that, on one occasion, he imitated the style of Rembrandt so closely in a small etching, that all the great connoisseurs of the day were deceived, and gave large sums for an impression. Having set up and published a print, he invited them all to dinner. When the guests were seated, and the covers removed, they observed, to their astonishment, all the dishes garnished with the same etchings which they had valued so highly as originals, and from which the dinner returned in the disguise of a meal. All took the joke in good part but one individual, who rose from table, and never forgave Mr. Wilson for having thus overreached his judgment. The 15th are Nisbet's and Dragoons. I am, Sir, Editor, your very obedient servant,

Abbotsley, May 30, 1849. HERBERT RANDOLPH.

NEW DISSENTING COLLEGE.—The Independents have for many years past supported, in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, three separate institutions for the education especially of theological students, namely, Homerton, Highbury, and Coward College, the committees of which, at a meeting held on Tuesday, resolved to unite, so as to form one really efficient college, with a larger staff of professors, and with a more extended course of study in the various branches of theology, literature, and science. An eligible piece of ground has been purchased for the site of the new college, in St. John's-wood, at the junction of the Avenue and Finchley-road, and it is expected that the building will be completed by the autumn of next year

FOREIGN CATTLE.—A communication has been made to the Secretary of the Customs Department by Sir Denis Le Marchant, stating that he has received the directions of the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade to acquaint him, for the information of the Commissioners of the Customs, that Dr. Lordships are of opinion that horses and goats need not be examined by the veterinary surgeon appointed by the Crown, but that the custom should be continued for cattle, sheep, and pigs. The necessary orders have accordingly been issued.

FATAL RIOTS IN NEW YORK.

THE ATTACK UPON THE ASTOR-PLACE OPERA-HOUSE.

CARRYING THE WOUNDED TO THE HOSPITAL.

We have advices from New York this week to the 16th ult., from which we learn that a serious riot took place on the 10th ult. at the Astor-place Opera, in that city, originating in a dispute between Mr. Macready, the English, and Mr. Forrest, the American, tragedian. So alarming did the riot become, that the militia eventually fired upon the people, twenty of whom were killed and many others severely wounded. The mob had fired the theatre, but were prevented by the soldiers and police from destroying the building. Mr. Macready subsequently took his departure for Boston.

It is necessary to explain that the American tragedian, Mr. Forrest, succeeded in persuading himself, and many of his friends, who are for the most part in the lower walks of life, that he had been ill-treated in England through the influence of Mr. Macready, who was supposed to be jealous of his fame. Mr. Forrest attempted to fasten this ill-treatment upon his English rival; and, notwithstanding the denials which have appeared from that gentleman, has succeeded in making his admirers believe there was some truth in his charge. This led to a mob demonstration against Mr. Macready on a former occasion in New York; and, in consequence, it was announced that he would not again appear on the boards of that city. Whereupon a number of influential persons addressed him a card, calling on him to reappear, assuring him of their determination to stand by him, and support him in his attempt. This roused the angry feelings of that portion of the public who were opposed to him, and believed they had succeeded in driving him from the American stage; and another demonstration was organised for the evening of the 10th, when he was to appear in "Macbeth." A large crowd accordingly collected outside the theatre from an early hour of the afternoon, and when the doors were opened a strong detachment of the police was found to be in possession of a good point in every quarter of the house, above and below. There were just seven ladies present, two of whom were in a private box in the second tier

The overture was played without any demonstrations of disorder. The witch scene was got through without interruption. On Mr. Macready's first entrance he was greeted with tremendous applause. The house, it was apparent, was in his favour, hundreds to one. But there were groaning and hissing, and the party in the parquette directly down to the orchestra was tremendously uproarious, doubling their fists at Macready as he came forward, and bidding him "Be off! be off!" &c. The first act was nearly all dumb show

At length, the uproar became perfectly frantic, and the friends of order were requested from the stage to keep quiet. This gave an opportunity of estimating the numbers of the rioters, and they appeared to be not more than a dozen in the parquette, and some forty to fifty in the amphitheatre. They were removed, and the performance proceeded. Meanwhile the crowd outside increased. Stones were thrown against the windows (which were carefully barricaded inside), and there was one hour of uninterrupted smashing of glass, accompanied by the most frantic yells of the mob. Some of the stones (and, at times, a volley of them appeared to be thrown together) broke down the barricades in places, and came in among the audience. One stone hit the great glass chandelier.

But through all this the play went on. Nobody on the stage appeared alarmed, though many of the missiles were falling on the stage. Mr. Macready, particularly, preserved his equanimity admirably; and the spectators say that they had never before seen the fifth act of "Macbeth" so splendidly and perfectly performed

From time to time there were pauses in the uproar from outside, and intermissions in the assault of stones; and about nine o'clock the rioters were so far checked by the militia and police, that the closing scenes in the tragedy were distinctly heard and appreciated. Mr. Macready was called out, and bowed his acknowledgments of the warm plaudits which greeted him on his appearance. About this time there was a renewal of the din outside; and, just as the curtain rose for the farce, two members of the national guard were brought into the house, badly hurt by stones from the mob.

At this instant the report of a volley of musketry was heard, and almost instantly another, and another. A pause ensued: several of the rioters were dragged into the box entrance below, and put among the rest, under a strong guard.

The prisoners taken from the inside of the theatre during the play, and who were under guard of the police in the bar-room below, in their rage set fire to the place, which blazed up alarmingly, but was extinguished by the officers This was directly under the parquette. Some of the killed and wounded rioters having been carried into the theatre, the curtain fell upon the half-finished farce. Just at this moment (some quarter of an hour after the first round of vollies) a second was commenced, and proved fatal to several.

The first round had been fired at the command of the sheriff, after proclamation to the crowd to disperse. The mayor ordered the second discharge, the mob having pressed upon the military dangerously after the first volley. The first volley was fired in Astor-place, the infantry having their rear to the theatre, a little on the left oblique. The second was fired directly down the same street. This discharge proved fatal to a man who was in the act of getting into the car on the railroad, and who was shot dead by a chance bullet that struck him in the breast. Amongst the mob fifteen fell dead upon the spot. Several were wounded; of whom some died subsequently; making the number of killed twenty-two, up to the 10th ult., and of thirty badly wounded several of whom, it was said, were not expected to live.

Mr. Macready left the theatre and reached his hotel, nearly opposite, in perfect safety, accompanied by two or three of his friends The next morning after the affray, at an early hour, he left the city in disguise, and proceeded to Boston, where, at the last accounts, he was at the house of a friend, waiting for the next steamer to England

Some hundred or more rioters were taken and confined in the lobby below; some others were carried to station-houses. Among the captures was that of Judson, editor of Ned Buntline's Own, who was found giving the word to a portion of the mob to fire (stone) when he should say the word

The mob, having been broken up, retired sullenly, threatening to arm and return. General Sandford, the commander of the 1st Artillery division, therefore, sent to the arsenal for a detachment of artillery, which promptly arrived, under Colonel Yates; and the field-pieces, loaded with canister and grape, were placed on each side of the theatre. A strong guard was kept on duty at the theatre all night.

During the riot outside, the principal persons busy in staving in the panels of the theatre doors were thoughtless youngsters of about eighteen; but in the background were men applauding, crying, "Go it," occasionally cheering, and swearing at John Bull, &c.

The Theatre itself was in imminent dangor, there being furious cries of "Tear it down!" "Fire it; burn the damned den of the aristocracy," &c.; "Groans for Macready!" "Cheers for Edwin Forrest," &c. One orator cried out—"You can't go in there without a ticket—I paid for a ticket, and they would not let me in, because I hadn't kid gloves and a white vest"

Brickbats and stones began to be fired freely at a body of infantry stationed at the door, some with an intention to strike fire from their bayonets. The soldiery endured it with commendable patience before they fired in self-defence.

The military force consisted of a troop of horse and a body of 210 infantry, all belonging to the volunteer militia of the city. The horsemen were first tried, but, failing to disperse the mob, the foot came upon the ground; the crowd was so great that a charge of bayonets was impossible. On the two nights following apprehensions were entertained of a renewal of the riot, for the purpose of destroying the Opera House; but, as a strong force was on the spot, no attempts were made.

An inquest was held on the bodies of fifteen persons killed, and the Jury returned a verdict—"That they came to their deaths by gun-shot wounds from balls fired by the military by order of the civil authorities of the city; and that the circumstances existing at the time justified the authorities in giving such order to fire."

CAMBRIDGE.

Sir William Browne's medals have been thus adjudged:—Greek Ode—J. D. Williams, Trinity College. Latin Ode—D'Arcy W. Thompson, Pembroke College. Epigrams—J. D. Williams, Trinity College.

DOWNING PROFESSORSHIP OF THE LAWS OF ENGLAND.—Andrew Amos, Esq., M.A., formerly Fellow of Trinity College, has been unanimously selected as the successor in the Professorship of the late Professor Starkie, by the electors, the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the Masters of St. John's, Clare Hall, and Downing.

TYRWHITT'S HEBREW SCHOLARSHIP.—The following gentlemen have been elected to the above scholarships: F. B. D. Barnadge, B.A., Caius College, First Class; C. E. Stuart, B.A., St. John's College, Second Class.

OXFORD.

At a Convocation held on Wednesday last, the following gentlemen were nominated Masters of the Schools:—Rev. James F. Tweed, M.A., Fellow of Exeter College; Rev. Thomas Henry Sheppard, M.A., Oriel College; and Rev. Henry R. Cornish, M.A., Magdalen Hall.

Fifty pounds are to be granted out of the University chest to Dr. Ogle, Clinical Professor, for the purpose of forming a small collection of such books, plates, and materials of medicine as may efficiently elucidate its modern practice.

THE NEW BISHOPS OF VICTORIA AND PRINCE RUPERT'S LAND.—His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury having appointed Tuesday last for the consecration of the Bishops designate of Victoria and Prince Rupert's Land, a large number of prelates and other dignitaries of the Church assembled in Canterbury Cathedral shortly after ten o'clock, whilst the Cathedral close was crowded with visitors anxious to be present at the solemn and interesting ceremony. Many years have elapsed since a Bishop was consecrated in the metropolitical church at Canterbury, although, in earlier times, the ceremony was rarely performed elsewhere. On the present occasion, the ceremony of consecration took place at Canterbury Cathedral in consequence of the recent establishment of St. Augustine's Missionary College in that city. It was thought appropriate that the two new Bishops being, strictly speaking, missionary Bishops, the setting apart of them to their high office should be performed near to the college founded for the express purpose of raising up a body of efficient missionary clergy. Full choral service having been performed, at its close the Archbishop took his seat within the rails of the communion table, when the Right Rev George Smith, D.D., of St. Mary Hall, Oxford, Bishop elect of Victoria (Hong Kong), and the Right Rev. David Anderson, D.D., of Exeter College, Oxford, Bishop elect of Prince Rupert's Land, were then introduced to the Archbishop, and the usual preliminary formalities having been proceeded with, the two bishops designate retired. Up to this time they were vested in their rochets—the episcopal habit, without the lawn sleeves, &c. After the lapse of a few minutes, during which some perfect silence reigned throughout the sacred edifice, the Bishops designate returned habited in full episcopal robes. The remaining portion of the consecration service, as set out in the Book of Common Prayer, was proceeded with, and the Archbishop, by the imposition of hands, admitted Dr. Smith and Dr. Anderson to the office of Bishops in connexion with the English Church. Dr. Smith and Dr. Anderson purpose starting for their distant dioceses in the course of a few weeks. Both the right rev. prelates will be accompanied by clergymen, schoolmasters, and catechists.

CHARITY SCHOOLS OF LONDON.—The anniversary meeting of the charity schools of London will be held in St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday next. There will be no previous rehearsal on the Tuesday, the committee wishing to save the expense which has been always incurred, and which was defrayed out of the funds of the society.

BISHOP IN AFRICA.—At the late Church Missionary Meeting, the Rev. Hugh Stowell threw out a hint that a fund might and ought to be raised for the purpose of founding a bishopric in Africa, either at Sierra Leone or Abeokuta; and that the first Bishop to preside over the interesting see should be a native of Africa, a second Cyprian.

NATIONAL SOCIETY.—At the annual meeting of the National Society, which will take place on the 6th instant, Mr. George Anthony Denison intends to move the following resolution:—"That it is the opinion of this meeting, that no arrangement which shall involve the compulsory imposition of any management-clause whatever, as a condition of State assistance, or of any condition whatsoever, except the legal tenure of the site, and the right of inspection, as defined and ascertained in 1840, can be satisfactory to, or ought to be, accepted by the church." A similar resolution was moved and withdrawn at the annual meeting of last year.

SAINT MARGARET'S CHURCH, WHALLEY RANGE.

THIS new structure, a highly creditable specimen of church architecture, was consecrated by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Manchester on the 26th ult., and opened for public worship on the following Sunday. It is situated at Whalley Range, Moss Side, in the parish of Manchester.

The style of the Church is Decorated. The plan consists of a nave, 64 feet by 19 feet 10 inches (to the centre of the pillars); north and south aisles, 45 feet by 11 feet 11 inches; chancel, 33 feet by 18 feet; chancel north aisle, 24 feet by 10 feet; north porch, 11 feet by 10 feet 8 inches; and tower, 19 feet square. The spire is a stone broach, with an ogtasie, and has two tiers of spire lights; its height is 72 feet 6 inches. The whole height of tower and spire, from the ground to the top of the cross, is 172 feet. The whole length of the interior, from the west door to the east wall, is 116 feet. The height of the nave, 33 feet 6 inches; of the chancel, 31 feet 6 inches. The walls are faced externally with Southcram stone, with worked quoins, parapets, and dressings. All the pillars and arches, as well as the internal quoins and jambs of the doors and windows, are of Leeds stone. The windows at west end of aisles and of tower are pointed, of two lights; that at east of south aisle is of three lights. The side windows of the aisle are of three lights, under pointed segmental arches, as are also the two-light windows of the clerestory, those on the south side of the chancel are of two lights, with a four-de-lis pattern of tracery; and the east window is an admirable composition of three lights. The windows of the aisles are filled with stamped glass, and the tower window and the chancel east window contain painted glass. The chancel steps are of stone, incised with texts; the pavement is tiled in pattern; and the passages of the naves and aisles are paved with stone, in which are inserted, alternately, hot-air grates and tiles, a border of red and blue tiles running on each side of the stone. The altar table is of cedar. The east wall of the chancel is draped with crimson cloth. The prayer desk and the choristers' benches are of carved oak, and are arranged north and south in the chancel. The eagle lectern, of carved oak, is at entrance of chancel; the pulpit, of walnut wood, is at north-east angle of the nave; and the font, of Caen stone, stands at north-west side of the cross passage. The roofs are open; that of the clerestory has moulded principals, king-posts, and cambered tie-beams, the spandrils are filled with tracery. The chancel roof is canted. There are no arches between the chancel and its aisle, the east end of which is walled off as a vestry; and the remainder is occupied by the organ, in front of which is an unglazed window of stone looking into the chancel. Messrs. Locke and Newsham are the builders; Mr. T. F. Harrison is the architect. The laying of its foundation stone was the first act of the first Bishop of Manchester, and it has been completed within a year, at a cost of £6000. There are also endowments in the Consols to the amount of £2000. There is accommodation for 500 worshippers, one-third of the seats being free.

CURIOSITIES.—III.

WHITSUN ALE JUG.

THIS representation of a Whitsun Ale Jug is taken from an excellent specimen in the interesting Museum collected by T. Crofton Croker, Esq. The jug is of white earthenware, and the word WHIT, and the date 1649, and the characteristic flourish underneath it, are painted blue.

Whitsun Ales were festivals formerly common at Whitsuntide, in which ale formed the predominant liquor, and hence arose the metonymy; although there has been a vast amount of pains employed to trace the name to other sources. As the money requisite for the feasts was collected by the church-wardens of the parish, Whitsun Ales have also been called Church Ales. They were kept on Sundays, notwithstanding their low and profane revelry; and entries often occur in church-books of disbursements in these unholy pastimes; with which, however, are oddly mixed up charges for repairs of the church, maintaining of orphans, &c.

WHITSUN ALE JUG.

Mr. Dunce has left us the following details of the Whitsun Ale:—"Two persons are chosen, previously to the meeting, to be lord and lady of the ale, who dress as suitably as they can to the characters they assume. A large empty barn, or some such building, is provided for the lord's hall, and fitted up with seats to accommodate the company. Here they assemble to dance and regale in the best manner their circumstances and the place will afford; and each young fellow treats his girl with a ribbon or favour. The lord and lady honour the hall with their presence, attended by the steward, sword-bearer, purse bearer, and mace-bearer, with their several badges or ensigns of office. They have likewise a train-bearer or page, and a fool or jester, drest in a party-coloured jacket, whose ribaldry and gesticulation contribute not a little to the entertainment of some part of the company. The lord's music, consisting of a pipe and tabor, is employed to conduct the dance. Some people think this custom is a commemoration of the ancient Drink-laus, a day of festivity formerly observed by the tenants and vassals of the lord of the fee within his manor; the memory of which, on account of the jollity of those meetings, the people have thus preserved ever since. The glossaries inform us that this Drink-lean was a contribution of tenants towards a potation or Ale provided to entertain the lord or his steward."

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JUNE.

FROSTS and politics no longer stay the flight of Fashion, which has resumed her empire, and now appears to us under the most light and refreshing toilettes. Barèges are very much in request; decidedly, this fine tissue, so soft and silky, quisite elegance: to show them to the greatest advantage, the under skirt is worn of watered gros de Naples. Wreaths of light flowers are worn, starting from the shoulders, re-attaching themselves by a bouquet in the centre of the bodice, from whence escape two garlands ornamenting the skirt, and looping it up as high as the knee by a tuft of mixed flowers. The wreaths à la Marie Stuart are in vogue: they are very becoming to some faces, but less so than flowers at the side to many.

In bonnets, some attempts have been made to adopt the Marie Stuart form, but this eccentric fashion has failed. Bonnets of an open and circular form, closing under the chin, are the prettiest wear. The ornaments of flowers, ribbons, or feathers are placed very low at the side. The Veilleuses, in black or white lace, are very graceful. Coloured blonds, which last year were so récherché, are this summer little worn.

Mantles differ little in form; those of taffetas glacé are most generally adopted: they are trimmed with frills of the silk pinked. The darkest shades are most worn. The long square shawls of white cashemere barège are very becoming to young people, and China crapes very récherché for ladies. Pelerins of net or embroidered muslin, are rather en vogue; but, to make amends, the double Spanish mantilla, which so gracefully envelopes the wearer in rich lace, denotes exquisite taste.

W. C. MACREADY, ESQ.—FROM THE MINIATURE, BY THORBURN.

transparent and cool, unites all the qualities for pretty summer dresses: it is at once simple or elegant, according to the purposes to which it is applied, or to the colours which are chosen. Dark shades make charming walking dresses, while paler tints form transparent and light costumes for summer soirées. The great advantage of woollen barège over muslin is that it does not "tumble." Striped taffetas, with variegated grounds, are still much in favour. The nuits of dresses differs very little from that of the spring; always very high for the morning, very low for the evening. Net dresses, spangled with gold or silver, are of extreme elegance.

People already direct their attention to country and sea-side toilettes, which are simple and elegant.

Morning Dressing-gowns of muslin, trimmed with lace and over white silk; robes of book muslin, over slips of coloured glacé silk; natural flowers in the hair and at the waist; will certainly be preferred for their becoming simplicity.

It is whispered the straws of Italy, with broad waving brims, trimmed with a little tuft of simple feathers placed en chenue at the side, will at length resume their vogue. Does there really exist a head-dress more suitable to guard against the rays of the sun, encircling and protecting better a pretty face, than these magnificent straws?

MR. MACREADY.

THE escape of this distinguished English tragedian from the rabid fury of a New York mob will be found prominently noticed upon the opposite page. We have here a far more pleasant duty in presenting to our readers—a portrait of this estimable gentleman, from a print engraved by Posselwhite, from a miniature by Thorburn, the transfer of which to our columns has been obligingly permitted by the publisher, Mr. Holloway, of Bedford-street, Covent-garden. The print is very nicely executed, and is dedicated, by permission, to the Marquis of Lansdowne.

William Charles Macready was born in London, March, 1793; his father was a native of Dublin, wrote the farces of "The Irishman in London" and "The Village Lawyer," and other dramatic pieces, and was proprietor of several provincial theatres. He intended his son for the legal profession; but the youth's own views are said to have been directed towards the pulpit. He was educated at Rugby, where he enjoyed high reputation.

Mr. Macready's earliest performances were at Birmingham, Sheffield, and Newcastle, where he was an especial favourite; he next appeared at Dublin, Bristol, and Bath in leading tragic characters. His success soon reached the metropolis; he was offered an engagement by the managers of Covent-garden Theatre, where, Sept. 16, 1816, he appeared, for the first time, before a London audience, as Orestes, in the "Distressed Mother." He passed the high ordeal with great éclat; considering that John Kemble was then performing the whole range of his characters previous to his retirement, Kean was playing with effect, and Charles Young and Miss O'Neil were in high repute.

We shall not be expected to detail our tragedian's three-and-twenty years' career. The retirement of Mr. Young may be said to have left Mr. M. nearly at the [illegible] rank; remarking us, by the way, of an excellent remark in the Times, that, whatever his opponents might say, it was an indisputable fact that he never Mr. Mac only was absent the poetic drama languished in the shade, and was led into immediate life when he returned to breathe over it."

Neither will space allow us to do more than advert, in general terms, to Mr. Macready's noble efforts to revive the national drama at our patent theatres. His reform at Covent Garden Theatre will long be recollected, with gratitude, by all lovers of the drama; called into existence in accordance with the second season; yet, in two little years, he did more for the dramatic art than his predecessors had accomplished in many seasons. The regret of the public was most eloquently expressed at a valedictory entertainment given to our tragedian in Freemasons' Hall, at which his royal highness the Duke of Sussex presided. Mr. Macready was, however, subsequently induced to open Drury-Lane Theatre with a series of Shakspearian revivals, as well as restorations of the classic drama, the completeness of which has never been questioned. The reproduction of "Ariane and Gabrina," another sinful and sensational drama, may be referred to as the most picturesque and poetic subject of its class; Mr. Stanfield painted some of the scenery; the costumes were a paragon of classicality and chastness of colour, and the entire performance was of a character unusually good and completely characteristic. Yet the labour was not commercially successful; and in June, 1843, Mr. Macready retired from the management. He was shortly after presented with a magnificent piece of plate, by his friends in the United America, and was successful throughout the United States. On his return to Europe he went to Paris, and there played with success; and he next reappeared in London, after an absence of about three years and three years. During the last seven years, his most successful performances have been, from time to time, illustrated in this Journal. The object of his recent visit to the United States was a series of farewell performances.

Mr. Macready is a firm supporter of every branch of the fine arts, and is liberal to his less fortunate brethren. In all the relations of private life he is endeared to a very large circle of friends by his integrity and exemplary character.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT-GARDEN.—Third Night of the season. ON TUESDAY NEXT JUNE 5th will be performed, for the [illegible] time, Donizetti's celebrated Opera, LUCREZIA BORGIA, adapted by Felice Romani, Mdme. Doria Grisi, Mdlle Angri (her first appearance in that character), Mdlle Marini, Mdlle Dorus Gras the recorded experience of eminent medical men, who have visited the sick in the dense and unwholesome districts of such cities as London, Manchester, Glasgow, and elsewhere; and conclude their quotations by a striking one from Dr. Rush, a well known philosopher and physician of the last century. "To all natural events," says that gentleman, "the author of nature has kindly prepared an antidote. Pestilential fevers furnish no exception to the remark. The means of preventing them are as much under the power of human reason and industry as the means of preventing the evils of lightning and common fire. I am so satisfied of the truth of this opinion, that I look for the time when our courts of law shall punish cities and villages for permitting any of the sources of malignant fevers to exist within their jurisdiction."

The British Parliament has already legislated on this conclusion, as regards the "Health of Towns." The Board are of opinion that another step should be taken in the same direction, and recommend the immediate abolition of Quarantine, and the substitution of general sanitary regulations upon all ships in port. They are persuaded that these would far more effectually extinguish epidemic disease, and afford better protection to the uninfected on ship-board; whilst it would relieve passengers and crews from grievous inconvenience, abate the motives for concealment of sickness and for false representations as to its nature, greatly lessen commercial expenses, and remove obstructions to the free transit of goods and uninfected persons which the existing system of Quarantine occasions.

The report, from first to last, is an admirable document; and the Board deserve the thanks of the public for the pains they have taken to elucidate the truth on a most important subject, and to provide effectively for the public health, by enlightening it upon the true causes, and the true means of prevention or alleviation of epidemic diseases. We trust it will be attentively studied, not only in Great Britain, but throughout the civilised world; in order that we, and other nations linked to us by commerce, amity, and intercommunication, may act in concert on the matter, for the advantage of each, and of humanity in general.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT OSBORNE.

The Queen and the Prince Consort, with the youthful members of the Royal family, enjoyed uninterrupted retirement at their marine palace in the Isle of Wight until Wednesday last, on which day the Court returned to Buckingham Palace.

The Duchess of Kent and Prince Ernest of Leiningen were the only visitors during the stay of the Court at Osborne. The former returned to town on Saturday, and Prince Ernest took leave on Tuesday.

THE COURT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE

Her Majesty and the Prince Consort, with the Royal children and suite, arrived at Buckingham Palace at ten minutes past six on Wednesday evening. The illustrious party were received at the Palace by the Lord Chamberlain, the Master of the Horse, and the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Household. On the evening her Majesty honoured the performance of the French Plays with her presence. The Prince Consort attended a meeting of the Geological Society at Somerset House after his return to town.

Last evening (Friday) the Queen gave a grand concert of vocal and instrumental music at Buckingham Palace, to which a distinguished circle of the nobility were invited.

This day the Court leave town for Windsor Castle, where it will sojourn during the ensuing Ascot Races.

HER MAJESTY'S DRAWING-ROOM.

The Queen held a drawing-room on Thursday afternoon in St. James's Palace Her Majesty and the Prince Consort, attended by the Royal suite, arrived from Buckingham Palace shortly before two o'clock, escorted by a detachment of the Royal Regiment of Horse Guards. The Duchess of Cambridge, accompanied by the Hereditary Grand Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, had attended the Hereditary Princess Cadogan, Mr. Edmond Mildmay, and Major Stephens, had previously arrived at the Palace to attend the Court. His Royal Highness Prince George, and his Royal Highness Prince Henry of the Netherlands, were also present. The Royal visitors had an interview with the Queen in the Royal closet before the general company were introduced.

Her Majesty wore a white satin, trimmed with bouquets of corn-flowers and tulle, and ornamented with diamonds. The petticoat was of white satin, trimmed in the same way. Her Majesty's head-dress was formed of feathers and a wreath of corn-flowers and diamonds. The white satin was of Spitalfields manufacture.

The Duchess of Cambridge wore a petticoat of white plaid, trimmed with Brussels lace the stomacher of emeralds of the largest size and diamonds. The train was of the richest white satin, trimmed to correspond. Her Royal Highness wore a splendid tiara of diamonds, necklace and lace lappets. The necklace and earrings were brilliants and emeralds.

The Hereditary Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz wore a train of light blue satin, richly embroidered and bordered with silver, and trimmed with a roulleau of silver bullion; the stomacher adorned with large pearls and brilliants. The petticoat was of lace over white satin. Her Royal Highness wore a magnificent garland of diamonds and pearls, and a pearl necklace.

The drawing-room was very fully attended, and in the diplomatic circle several distinguished foreigners were presented to the Queen

Among others remarkable costumes worn by ladies of distinction attending the Court, we may instance those of

The Duchess of Beaufort, who wore a costume de cour, composed of a train of rich silver grey and white brocaded silk lined with white satin, and very elegantly trimmed with costly point d'Alencon and pearls; corsage and sleeves to correspond, with trimmings of the same lace; skirts of white taffetas d'Italie glacé, trimmed with point d'Alencon, bows of ribbon, and agraffes of diamonds. Head-dress of ostrich feathers, point d'Alençon, lappets, and a profusion of diamonds.

The Countess of Kinnoull, who wore a train of apricot glacé, covered with silver lama tulle, and trimmed with rich silver blonde, berths and corsage to correspond; dress of handsome Brussels lace, with slip of peach blossom gros de Naples, and bows of silver ribbon, and diamonds. Head-dress, ostrich feathers, handsome silver blonde lappets, diamonds, and pearls.

The Viscountess Sidmouth, who wore a white glacé silk jupon, elegantly festooned with tulle, intermixed with pink roses; manteau of white silk, lined with pink glacé, and trimmed with a roulleau; bodice to correspond, enriched with tulle and bouquets of roses. Head-dress, feathers and Brussels lace lappets; ornaments, diamonds.

The Queen Dowager.—The Queen Dowager accompanied by her Serene Highness Prince Ernest-Leiningen, and attended by a numerous suite, left Marlborough House on Monday for the Les House Hotel, Worthing, where her Majesty contemplates sojourning for a week or ten days. The inhabitants of this favourite watering-place welcomed the arrival of her Majesty by the presentation of a loyal address, agreed to at a public meeting held in the Town Hall. The Royal party take frequent carriage airings in the neighbourhood of the town, and her Majesty appears to enjoy the sea breezes exceedingly.

The Conde de Montemolin, eldest son of Don Carlos, and claimant of the Crown of Spain, is (it is rumoured) about to marry Miss De Horsey, daughter of Mr. Spenser De Horsey and the late Lady Louisa De Horsey, sister of the present Earl of Strafdroke. There is some mystery about the affair; and the Conde, it is said, is at variance with his brother on the subject.

The Lord Chamberlain has issued invitations for a grand ball at Buckingham Palace on Wednesday, the 13th inst.

The Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary, and the Hereditary Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg Strelitz, arrived at Cambridge House on Monday, for the season, from their cottage at Kew. His Royal Highness dined with the members of the Nulli Secundus Club on Tuesday evening, at the Clarendon.

The Cabinet Ministers and many members of the aristocracy left town on Saturday last for the holidays; most of them returned on Wednesday, to attend the Queen's Drawing-room on the following day.

On Wednesday last, his Excellency the Turkish Ambassador again displayed his magnificent hospitality at the residence of the Embassy, in Bryanston-square.

Ball at the Turkish Embassy.—We are requested to state that the [illegible] and other [illegible] Ills fête were executed by Messrs. Batsam and Crooke, of Oxford street.

Almack's.—The first ball of the second subscription is fixed to take place on Thursday next.

Marriage in High Life.—On Wednesday, at St. George's Church, Mayfair, Miss Meyrick, eldest daughter of Colonel and Lady Laura Meyrick, and niece of the Duke and Duchess of Cleveland, was led to the hymeneal altar by Mr. Chevries Hoare, of the 5th Dragoon Guards. The bride, who was very beautifully attired, was attended by a train of eleven bridesmaids, four of whom were her own sisters; the Lady Rachel Russell, Lady Louisa Eliot, Lady Margaret Butler, the Hon. Miss Cotton, Miss Philpotts, Miss Augusta Somerset, and Miss Gertrude Vane making up the number. Several of these young ladies were attired in pink satin costumes, and the remainder in blue dresses of a similar material. The Bishop of Exeter performed the ceremony, which was attended by a large circle of the friends of both parties. The bride's presents were of the most superb description. The Duke and Duchess of Cleveland, with characteristic munificence, presented their fair niece with a purse of £10,000, and other relatives made valuable additions to the fiancé's jewel-case.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

Royal Maternity Charity.—On Tuesday, about forty of the warmest friends of this institution sat down to dinner at the Lord's Tavern, given for the commemorate its anniversary. Lord Robert Grosvenor presided, and in a very feelin manner advocated the claims of the charity, which, he said had now been in existence for nearly 100 years, and had, during that period, administered relief to more than 400,000 poor married women. The past year presented an increase of 231 cases. A number of appropriate toasts were proposed and duly responded to during the evening. The amount of subscriptions announced was about £250.

Society of Friends of Foreigners in Distress.—The annual dinner in aid of the funds of the society took place on Saturday evening, in the London Tavern. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge presided. The company, amounting to about 200 gentlemen, included his Excellency Count [illegible] Bunsen, Baron Rehmann, Count Hardenberg, Baron Rosenkrantz, and from the report, it appeared that the receipts during the past year amounted to £6634 6s 4d, and the expenditure to £3146 4s, leaving a balance in the treasurer's hands of £668 2s 4d. The number of individuals relieved since the establishment of the society, independently of their wives and children, amounts to 11,160, but these persons received relief in 76,271 instances. Amongst the objects are persons from Africa, North and South America, West Indies, Asia, Australasia, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Holland, Ionian Islands, Italy, Portugal, Russia, Spain, Sweden, Norway, Switzerland, and Turkey. In the past year 726 persons were assisted in returning to their own countries. The objects of the institution are to grant relief to indigent foreigners here, without distinction of country or religion, especially to those who are not entitled to parochial aid; and to furnish the means to such as are desirous to return to their own countries. The subscriptions received during the evening amounted to upwards of £300, including £50 from her Majesty.

Hungerford Market Company.—The half-yearly general meeting of the proprietors was held on Wednesday. The report of the directors stated, among other matters, that the new fish-market was completed and occupied, presenting a most attractive appearance, and by the accommodation afforded to the public calculated to improve the trade of the market. The report was received and adopted, and the retiring directors re-elected.

Solicitors' and General Life Assurance Society.—On Wednesday, the third annual meeting of this society was held at the Gray's Inn Coffee House, Holborn. From the report it appeared that during the past year the society had received 335 proposals for assurances to the extent of £118,514 0s. 8d., and had issued 214 policies, covering assurances to the amount of £89,069 18s., producing an annual premium of £2797 18s. 10d. The number of existing policies was 586, and the amount £959,449 9s. 8d.; and the annual premiums payable in respect to such was £8343 0s. 6d. No more than two deaths had happened in the year, involving a loss of £800 only. The premiums received on the lapsed and expired policies amounted to £1052 16s 9d, whilst the total claims since the establishment of the society had only amounted to £1398. The report was deemed satisfactory, and adopted unanimously.

Abney Park Cemetery Company.—On Tuesday, the annual meeting of this company was held at the London Tavern, for the purpose of receiving the report, and electing two directors. The report stated that the company received on account of funerals, in the past year, was £2214; and that the payments were £1760. The balance at the bankers' was £1100. After some discussion the report was agreed to, and a dividend of 5s. per share was declared.

British and Foreign Unitarian Association.—On Wednesday the twenty-third annual meeting of this association was held at the Chapel, Essex-street, Strand, immediately after a very eloquent sermon on behalf of the society had been preached by the Rev. John Scott Porter, of Belfast. The meeting was very numerously attended. The chair was occupied by James Heywood, Esq., M.P. The Chairman, in his opening address, explained that the principal objects of the society were to afford pecuniary relief and assistance to congregations in different parts of the country; to extend its views by the publication and distribution of books and tracts; and to promote in every legitimate way the great principles of civil and religious liberty. It appeared from the treasurer's report that the income of the society for the past year had been £1030, and the expenditure £1040. The receipts were of an average amount, upon the whole, but there had been a falling off to the extent of £120 in the annual subscriptions

Surrey Dispensary.—The anniversary festival of this valuable institution, established in 1777, was celebrated on Wednesday evening, at the Bridge House Hotel, Southwark; Mr. Freshfield, in the unavoidable absence of the High Sheriff of the county, in the chair. From the report it appeared that [illegible] number of patients admitted during the last few years has been from [illegible] 00; that the subscriptions are not now sufficient to supply the increasing wants and applications for relief, and was chiefly owing to which account up to Midsummer, 1848, which showed that £200 stock belonging to the charity was sold to reimburse the balance due to the bank on the 24th June, 1847. The property belonging to the charity consists of £6967 19s. 3d. Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, the dividends on which amount to £202 4s 2d per annum, and the house and premises in Great Dover-street, in the Borough, purchased in 1811. The entire increase cost to the charity of each patient cured is about [illegible] so that for the insignificant sum of three farthings per day one annual subscription may, in the course of the year, provide the means of restoring no less than five or six poor persons to health.

League of Universal Brotherhood.—The second annual meeting of this body was held on Wednesday evening, at the Crown and Anchor, in the chair. The report stated that at the last meeting two resolutions were adopted, one having reference to the holding of a peace convention in Paris in August last, the other to the putting forth of efforts on the part of the association to secure an extension of the penny postage system to the world. In accordance with the first resolution, a deputation proceeded to Paris in July last year, but the steps of the deputation were barricaded by obstacles which proved insurmountable. A peace congress was, however, held in Brussels in September, and it was resolved that it should be the first of a series of such congresses to be held in the different capitals of Europe. Numerous branches of the association had been held in this country, and 1000 petitions had been sent to Parliament in favour of the set ement of international disputes by arbitration instead of war. Alliance was then made to prepare for a peace congress in Paris in August next, to which M. Lamartine and other eminent political men in France had expressed adhesion. A ship was about to be launched in America, to be called The Pacific, for the purpose of conveying to France those who were desirous of taking part in the approaching congress. With regard to what was termed "ocean penny postage," it was observed that envelopes had been prepared, and extensively disposed of, having on them a device conveying the idea of a universal penny postage system. The importance of the object to the Colonies was then pointed out. To show the progress of the movement, it was stated that the League's publication, The Band of Brotherhood, had now reached [illegible] ion of 7000 copies. The protests of the friends of peace had of late been received with increased respect; and it was hoped that the appeal made by them would eventually be responded to by the convulsed nations of the earth. Resolutions in accordance with the objects of the society were agreed to.

Berth-in Philanthropic Profession.—[illegible]—The anniversary evening the eleventh annual meeting of the members and supporters of this benevolent association was held at Mr. Titchener's, No. 145, Fenchurch-street. The report stated that the society was established during the past year, principally for our less fortunate fellow creatures, in age, sickness, and distress, by allowing them 5s. per week in their hour of need and during their life. The society's operations do not appear to be of a very extensive character, although the benevolence of its purpose would appear to entitle it to a larger support than it enjoys. The amount of donations and subscriptions since the foundation is £1238 5s. 6d., which sum has been distributed amongst the pensioners, £1093 18s.; salary to secretary, £60 10s.; printing, stationery, &c., £81 18s. 6d.; balance at banker's, £94 4s. The report concluded by an appeal to the benevolent for increased support, and after its adoption, the meeting separated.

Royal Naval School.—The eleventh anniversary festival of this institution was held on Wednesday, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street. The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor presided on the occasion. Among the company present were the Earl Waldegrave, the Marquis of Thomond, Lord Byron, Admiral Sir J. Ommanney, &c. From the report it appeared that the council had been enabled to carry on the school during the past year without encroaching upon the invested capital, and that, by the observance of the strictest economy in the expenditure it had been brought within the receipts. The expenditure had been considerably diminished, but, on the other hand, the receipts had also proportionately decreased, the balance at the end of the last year being £1795 7s. 7d. In the course of the evening, contributions to a considerable amount were announced by the secretary.

Artists' Annuable Fund.—On Tuesday, a dinner of the members and friends of this excellent institution took place at Anderton's Hotel, Fleet-street; Mr. E. Landells in the chair. The object of this society is to raise a provident fund for the aid of artists of the higher class, who may from old age [illegible] to learn from the speeches of the chairman and the secretary, Mr. [illegible] that the above object has been effectively carried out, yet so as to leave a considerable sum in the hands of the treasurer. The guests were very numerous on Tuesday; and during the evening, in addition to the usual loyal toasts, the interests of art and artists and literature were propitiated in some graceful speeches. The health of Mr. Macready, the friend of artists, was drunk in the course of the evening, contributions to a considerable amount were announced by the secretary.

Artists' Amicable Fund.—On Tuesday, a dinner of the members and friends of this excellent institution took place at Anderton's Hotel, Fleet-street; Mr. E. Landells in the chair. The object of this society is to raise a provident fund for the aid of artists of the higher class, who may from old age [illegible] to learn from the speeches of the chairman and the secretary, Mr. [illegible] that the above object has been effectively carried out, yet so as to leave a considerable sum in the hands of the treasurer. The guests were very numerous on Tuesday; and during the evening, in addition to the usual loyal toasts, the interests of art and artists and literature were propitiated in some graceful speeches. The health of Mr. Macready, the friend of artists, was drunk in the course of the evening, contributions to a considerable amount were announced by the secretary.

Journeymen Bakers' Short-time Movement.—A public meeting of the Operative Bakers' Society was held at Zion Chapel, Union-street, adjoining Whitechapel Church, on Wednesday evening, for the purpose of taking into the present degraded state of the journeymen bakers, and to petition Parliament to pass the bill about to be introduced to the House of Commons by Lord Robert Grosvenor for the abolition of night-work in the baking trade. The meeting was taken by Mr. G. Thompson, who explained that the object of the proposed bill was to confine the labour done in bakehouses between the hours of four o'clock in the morning and six o'clock in the evening, with the exception of certain articles which were essential to the proper conduct of such establishments. Mr. Webbe, a master baker, moved a resolution declaring that the meeting deplored the existence of the present system of night-work, of unlimited hours of labour, carried on in the baking trade, which was proved to be productive of a great amount of demoralisation, misery, degradation, and premature bodily decay to a large and important class of the community, and inflicted a flagrant wrong on those employed in the baking business, by depriving them of the necessary time for mental, moral, or religious improvement, or even rational enjoyment or recreation, and that it was the duty of all persons to assist in eradicating the evil. He contended that this was a master's question, as well as a journeyman's, and that as there was no chance of coming to any satisfactory arrangement, it was necessary to apply to Parliament. The motion was unanimously agreed to, as also a second, pledging the meeting to petition Parliament to pass the bill introduced by Lord Robert Grosvenor, and requesting the metropolitan members to support it.

Improvements in the City.—The alterations which have been [illegible] for the new street, commencing at Cannon-street, are rapidly advancing. Within the last few days nearly the whole of the immense mass of [illegible] has been removed, so as to afford a large clear space between Dowgate Hill and Watling-street. The old burial-ground of St. John the Baptist and St. John Zachary is covered with vast piles of rubbish, and will, when cleared, form a portion of the new street. Immediately the materials of the houses already down shall have been removed, the workmen will proceed with the new thoroughfare in its advance towards St. Paul's.

Opening of a New Roman Catholic Chapel.—A new Roman Catholic Chapel, to be called the Oratory of St. Philip, was opened on Thursday, in King William-street, Strand, in the premises lately used as a store-room for Messrs. Kinahan, the distillers. High mass was celebrated, and a sermon was preached by the Right Rev. Dr. Wiseman. Another service was performed in the afternoon, at five, when the Rev Mr Newman preached.

Extensive Fire.—Discovery of Dead Bodies.—On Monday night, shortly after nine o'clock, a fearful fire, which was not extinguished until nearly midnight, and not an il a serious quantity of property had been destroyed, broke out in Blenheim-street, Oxford-street. The premises were in the occupancy of Mr. George Truman (late Alderson and Co.), lead-merchant and [illegible] terer. The flames originated in the warehouse adjoining the Blenheim Dispensary; that building (the warehouse) containing a vast quantity of oil, turpentine, and other equally inflammable articles, caused the fire to progress with unusual swiftness, so that before an engine had time to reach the place, the warehouse and all it contained became wrapped in one immense sheet of flame. The fire at the same period was rising high into the air, and illuminating not merely the west end of London, but the reflection could be perceived from the various metropolitan bridges and other lofty eminences. The firemen did all that was possible to save the Dispensary from the ravages of the flames; but another warehouse, belonging to Messrs. Aldgrson, running under it, also became ignited, and all their efforts were thus frustrated. The flames were not subdued until twelve o'clock, and not until the extensive warehouse in which they originated was burned out and the valuable contents consumed, the building under the Dispensary seriously damaged by fire and water, and the lecture-room of the Dispensary injured by fire, &c. The whole damage, it is stated, will not be far short of £20,000. On the firemen entering a kind of lumber-room, parallel with the first floor leads, their attention was directed to the remains of two or three human beings, which were charred by the fire. The heads were off, and it is supposed that the bodies had been used for anatomical purposes (the premises formerly in the possession of a medical gentleman), from the fact of many of the bones having been sawed through. Although every inquiry has been made for the purpose of learning how the disaster occurred, nothing satisfactory could be gleaned. The greater portion of the property was insured in the Phœnix Fire-office[illegible]

A second very Extensive Fire took place on Tuesday morning at two o'clock in Willow Bank, Bermondsey, which was attended with a large loss [illegible] The flames commenced in the premises belonging to Mr Clapham, [illegible] and leather-dresser, whose property covered an immense area of ground, the tanning and drying-houses being on one side, whilst the lofty stores and warehouses stood on the opposite side. Before any assistance could arrive the greater portion of the works were enveloped in flames; and so great was the heat, that the houses in Crimscroe-street were obliged to have torrents of water scattered over them to prevent their ignition. In spite of the endeavours of the firemen the flames crossed the carriage road, and fired almost simultaneously the extensive works of Mr Hugman, in the same line of business. These latter buildings were equally capacious as the former, and when the two were fully alight the scene was terrific. The flames were not entirely extinguished until near six o'clock. The official report returns the greater parts of Mr. Clapham's property as being destroyed, and the fireman's house adjoining considerably damaged by fire. The goods, chattels, and contents were insured in the Sun. The bark-houses, mills, and leather houses of Mr. Hugman are also returned as being "all but destroyed;" and the Fellmongers Arms Tavern, on the opposite side of the road, the property of Mr. C. Head, as damaged by fire. Mr. Hugman was insured in the Sun office.

Births and Deaths.—For the week ending May 26th, the return of the Registrar-General gives the following results:—Deaths, 897; births, 1311. The public health, as shown by this present return, exhibits a decided improvement. The 897 deaths are fewer than in the corresponding week of any former year since 1846. The number, which had suddenly increased by 200 deaths above the average in the preceding week, has now fallen as much below it. As compared with that week, the decrease is most apparent in the deaths arising from consumption and inflammation of the lungs. From the former diseases there died in the last week 103 persons (the average being 145), while in the previous week the number was 133. From the latter disease (or pneumonia) 61 died, being exactly the average of the last week, while two weeks before the number completed their second year, while in the previous week the deaths which occurred at the same age were 57. In this return, the mortality from bronchitis still exceeds the average by 18 deaths. The only disease which has increased by a marked extent is hooping-cough, from which the deaths were 60, or 24 more than the average; but diarrhœa appears to be on the increase. Cholera was fatal in two cases; but in two of the cases returned to inflict the disease is returned as "diarrhœa cholerica." Mr. Butterfield, the registrar of Islington East, reports that the deaths of a two young children at Abbey-place, Cloudroad, showed purple and cachexia in one case, and fever in the other, were accelerated by the defective sewerage and damp state of the house. The deaths of a man of 43 years, and a woman of 30, were hastened by intemperance. According to the return of a coroner's jury, a girl of 15 months died from "swallowing forty-four percussion gun-caps containing poison." Her illness lasted only an hour, and examination showed post mortem.

Meteorological Observations.—The mean height of the barometer in the week was 29.815 in. On Thursday it was 30.014. The temperature of the week was 54.3 deg. On Thursday it was 62 deg, and on Friday the highest reading in the shade was 70 deg 6 min. The mean of the week was 56 deg. 9 min., showing an increase of 11 deg. on that of the week ending May 12.

FRENCH INTERVENTION IN THE ROMAN STATES.

In the succeeding page, we have Engraved from an original sketch, the picturesque old fortress of Palo, at which a portion of the French troops landed, while in the offing is shown the Bulldog steamer, frequently mentioned in the accounts lately received from Palo.

The Times correspondent, writing from Palo, gives this lively picture of the Head-Quarters there

"The French camp now formed here is very interesting. It is established in a square of immense area, on downs that overlook the sea, and from a little distance, it presents one of the most picturesque objects that can be imagined. The artillery and waggons are drawn up in the square, and the other three the infantry are provided for. In all the greatest order and regularity prevails, and, as the weather is very fine, the men evidently enjoy their rural luxuries. I have walked through the camp to-day, and though I must admit that the picturesque object of the distance loses much of its effect when examined closely, yet there is much to admire and to be pleased with. The tents are all extended to cover the men as they sleep from the dews of the night, or the sun of the noonday, and in reality have more of a gipsy than a military character; but the contrast of the white canvas and the green field, and—oh the sweet smell of the red pimpernel! that the eye is delighted, that the ear is pleased by the variety, and if a regiment be drawn up for parade, and a brass band playing, the general effect is not to be despised

BULL AND TIGER FIGHT, AT MADRID.

This spectacle was given at Madrid, on the 17th ultimo, and appears to have afforded unbounded gratification to many thousand spectators. The scene was the Plaza de Toros, where the great national bull-fights are given from time to time.

On the 17th ult., long before the hour appointed for the commencement of the entertainment, seat and standing-place at the Plaza de Toros was occupied. The circular barrier, or cage, constructed for this occasion (16 feet high, of woodwork, and iron bars 6 inches apart), being about one hundred and twenty feet in circumference, the space behind the latter was opened to the public, as standing-places, the evening before, at 30 reals (6s) each, and every ticket issued was disposed of in an hour. Twenty men, armed Roman fashion, with helmets and pikes, were placed at intervals round the raising or cage, to assist in preventing the escape of the tiger, should he attempt it. At a quarter-past four o'clock the sudden crashing up of the Royal march announced the arrival of her Majesty from Aranjuez, and she shortly after entered the Royal box, where General Narvaez and other Ministers were in attendance, with the Political Chief, and various members of the household. The first part of the performance was stated to be intended to show a regular stag-hunt to the curious Meridenes, as the Queen had given a deer from one of the Royal parks; but the latter was dispatched by about a dozen dogs in two minutes. Next, Mr. Charles, the animal-trainer, and proprietor of the tiger, entered the arena with his two hyenas, over which he proved himself to possess complete control.

The tiger was announced as from the Red Sea, was then brought in, and his chain being fastened to a ring, six large Spanish dogs were brought in, and very soon mastered him!

The bull-fight was now fixed upon the last and chief part of the performance—the combat between the bull and the tiger. The former, a noble animal, and with formidable horns, was introduced into the arena at one side, a moment or two before the tiger, which was let in on the opposite side—making a bound from his cage, when the door was opened, towards the gate opened in the iron railing for the purpose. On seeing the bull, he moved slowly towards him, crouching down as if seeking an opportunity for a spring. The bull did not see the tiger at first, but when he did, he made straight towards him; but they were still a pretty good distance apart, when the tiger suddenly turned, and made off amidst the derisive shouts of the spectators, and cries of "Bravo, toro!" The latter, finding no enemy to attack, remained staring about, while the tiger ran slowly round the arena close to the railing, as if looking for a point to escape at, as no doubt he was. The bull was, however, roused from his immobility by assistants, who went round waving coloured handkerchiefs outside the barrier and in this way was got near to the tiger, whom, seeing in motion, he again ran at; and this time the tiger, as the bull neared him, tried to spring upon him at close quarters; but the bull received him on one of his horns, and threw him over his head, inflicting a severe wound under the lower jaw, which rendered him helpless. The tiger, on getting up, made off to the farther side of the arena, and stretched himself out by the barrier, and nothing could induce him to combat again. After a short time, he got up; and, having recognised his cage, he went to that part of the barrier, trying to get out; but, not being able to do so, he stretched himself out, and lay quite still. The bull was drawn towards him several times, but appeared to disdain to touch him. Cries were now raised for dogs to set at the tiger, and, after a long delay, this was conceded. To get the bull out, however, occupied half an hour, and was effected by means of oxen with halters and bells. The Queen had left in the meantime, returning direct to Aranjuez with her suite. Eight or ten "perros de presa" soon overpowered the tiger, who made a very poor fight, and then did not leave him till they had killed him after which, everybody that chose it was admitted into the arena, and many carried off pieces of the skin, claws, teeth, &c., as relics, so that as the Espana says, between them all the body of the poor beast was soon divided and disappeared.

It is calculated that not less than [illegible] persons were present, and that the gatherings of the spectacle would have from 8000 to 10,000 dollars after paying all expenses, of which profits, however, they must pay ten per cent. towards the dotation of the new "Teatro Espanol."

All Madrid rushed with burning curiosity to the amphitheatre, great bets depending upon the result; the Spaniards really seeming to look on the affair as a national concern, in which their own reputation for courage and warlike skill was in some measure bound up with the prowess of the bull. He was a fine black animal, eight years of age, and was selected by the toreros for his symmetry of form and fierceness of disposition. The Bengal tiger was a noble beast, stated to have been between five and six feet long from nose to croup, in good condition, and certainly fierce; but having been confined for three years in a cage little more than his own length, his power of springing had become materially impaired, and he had evidently lost the faculty of clinging with his claws to his prey. It is also probable that long captivity may have deprived him of the instinct which, in a state of nature, would have taught him the danger of the bull's horns and the means of avoiding them. Added to this, the fortune of the fight was altogether in favour of the bull, inasmuch as the first touch of the horns inflicted a severe wound, whilst, in the ordinary bull fights, the horses are generally wounded more or less dangerously, but very seldom killed by one stab

As a reward for his prowess (Spanish gratitude!) the conqueror was slaughtered by Cuchares, the matador, and his head sent as a present to the Queen, who seems to have taken great interest in the combat.

EXHIBITION OF THE NEW SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

We have already noticed this Exhibition in our Journal for April 28. We now engrave two of its pictures.

The first is selected from the contributions of Mr. Harrison Weir, a newly-elected member of the society. It is one of a pair of small circular pictures, No. 306, "Cart Lodge, Sussex." This is a pleasant scene of rustic life: the sunlight glinting through the tall trees upon the run-worn road is very effective; and the horses bring out the artist's cleverness as an animal painter. The whole is nicely executed, and with its companion, No. 299, "Cow Yard, Kent," carries us among the rural life of two of England's most picturesque counties.

The larger picture here engraved, the "Veteran's Story," painted by Mr. Haghe, Vice-President of the Society, is one of the finest gems of the gallery. In the catalogue it bears the epigraph:

Though my arm be weaken'd, and though my hair be grey,
The hard-won praise of other days cannot be swept away.

This is "a kind of conversation piece," highly dramatic in composition, and beautifully painted: it is "sold." The Veteran, a noble specimen of the cavalier, is reciting to the family some stirring scene of his patriotic career. The parties are listening, according to the phases of their existence—from the gravity of the old lady to the childish wonder of the little boy. The expression is throughout admirable. The accessories, too, are capital: the costume is pleasing, and the colours are skilfully chosen; the carved furniture and mantel head, the richly-worked table cover, the gold-figured wall, and the chimney ornaments, are all in excellent keeping with the date of the incident of the picture, which is, certainly, one of the most successful works in the Exhibition.

"CART LODGE, SUSSEX."—PAINTED BY HARRISON WEIR.—EXHIBITION OF THE NEW SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

DECORATIVE DESIGN, AT THE PICTURE EXHIBITIONS

The two Societies of Water-Colour Painting afford us some interesting subjects. In the New Water-Colour Society, No. 35 represents an interior at Fontainebleau, by J. Chase: this palace is the best specimen of French renaissance, date 1529. In the drawing the whole of the details of the architecture, which is richly ornamented, are so accurately made out, that it is a perfect study for any student who wishes to make himself master of this style. No. 38 affords a good example in mediæval style for the painted decoration of a groined ceiling. Mr. Corbould has given an artist-like, rather than a designer's, idea of a Gothic tankard; some Scriptural subject is sculptured round the bowl, the handle is formed by an angel with extended wings, and the knob at top is a bishop's mitre. In No. 277, a beautiful drawing by Mary Margetts, we have a representation of one of those richly silver-gilt mounted ivory cups, which are usually known as Cellini cups, or at least called so by every fortunate possessor of one. The subject is a lady's toilette of the time of Cellini, but without examining this too closely, it is an extremely fine one, the figures at the top and the details of the ornaments being well deserving study. In No. 279, another drawing by the same lady, we have a portion of a silver-gilt mounted tankard. [illegible] Kearney, gives us a representation of the studio of Benvenuto Cellini at Florence, in which we see several cups, dishes, tankards, &c., all of elegant forms, but the details are not sufficiently made out to be of much use to the designer. The architecture of the room, which is good, is in the style of the French renaissance, and not Florentine.

On visiting the Old Society of Painters in Water-Colours, we find an interior by Joseph Nash (No. 32), "Levens Hall, Westmoreland." This affords the student in Elizabethan architecture a capital example of the style; when fully made out, he will see that the fireplace, though extremely rich, the ceiling, the doorway, and the lining of the room, have none of that exuberant tasteless ornament which is so generally supposed to belong to this style. In No. 82, a drawing by Mr. Lake Price of the High Altar of the Cathedral of Toledo, we have one of those richly decorated metal altar-screens so common throughout Continental Europe, and which afford the best examples that can be found of iron and brass-work. Although the drawing of Mr. Price is very sketchy, the screen is done with such truth and skill that the draughtsman, on close inspection, could make out the whole of its details. There is another drawing by the same artist (No. 182), which gives some more iron-work, but it is placed so high that it cannot well be seen. No. 324, a skilful drawing by the veteran Mackenzie, gives a good example of mediæval decoration for a tomb; it is done with taste, and it will be seen that the colours and gilding are not quite so full as they are generally made by the decorators at present.—Journal of Design, No. 4.

MUSIC.

CONCERTS.

The Sixth Concert of the Philharmonic Society, on Monday, was admirable as regards instrumental selections. Beethoven's first Symphony in C, in which the Haydn and Mozart forms are so remarkable, was finely played; the fanciful minuette, in which Beethoven's originality is sufficiently conspicuous, was encored. The Mendelssohn Symphony in A minor, No 3, known as the Scotch Symphony, being an animated picture of the composer's impressions during a visit to the land of the mountain and flood, created a great sensation. Its beauties were developed under Costa's direction with [illegible] feeling, and the animated scherzo was rapturously encored. The "Leonora" overture, one of the four works composed by Beethoven for his only opera, "Fidelio," elicited an [illegible] demand for repetition. Its [illegible] descriptive phrases, so indicative of the story, were delicately [illegible] the trumpet solo in the [illegible] by Mr. [illegible] Harper, jun., was nicely done, and the crescendo passage of the first violins in unison, towards the close, was marvellously developed. Miss Kate Loder, a young pianiste and composer, who has already gained much fame at the Philharmonic concerts, performed Mendelssohn's "Serenade" and "Allegro Giojoso," with much feeling in the andante in B minor, and great brilliancy in the allegro in D major: but the work is somewhat over-scored, and is not calculated to develop the fair executante's powers to the best advantage. Cherubini's spirited overture to "Les Deux Journées" terminated the unexceptionable orchestral programme. Mdlle. Jetty de Treffz sang Mozart's "Deh! vieni non tardar," from the "Nozze di Figaro," and the "Ebbert, to our Palace" (in German), from Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable," artistically, albeit the German method is too apparent. M. Wartel had the misfortune to select Beethoven's "Penitence" and Schuber's "Ave Maria," both compositions intended only for the voice with pianoforte accompaniments; but, as the Philharmonic regulations exact orchestration with the single exception of two works we scored, and the effect was dull and monotonous. At the Seventh Concert, on the 11th of June, Beethoven's Choral Symphony No. 9 will be performed.

At Mdlle Puzzi's Annual Morning Concert, on Monday last, at the Great Concert Room of Her Majesty's Theatre, the instrumental select committee consisted of a portion of Beethoven's Septuor in E flat, well executed by Cooper (violin) Tolbecque (alto), Piatti (violoncello), Anglois (contra-basso), Belle (clarionet), Tampini (bassoon), and Puzzi (horn); and Horn and violoncello solos by Signor Puzzi and Signor Piatti. Thalberg performed his "Tarantella" in C minor, and "Home sweet Home," fantasia. The latter was encored, when the gentleman substituted the "Don Pasquale" serenade. The vocalists were Mdlle Alboni, Mdlle Parodi, Mdlle. Cassolani, Madame Gaetani, Madame Sapior Labbache, F. Labbache, Coletti, Belletti, Calzolari, Gardoni, and ——.

At the Musical Union, on Tuesday afternoon, in presence of the Duke of Cambridge and a numerous and admirable assemblage of amateurs, there was a superb performance of Haydn's Quartet in G, No. 81, and Beethoven's in C, No. 1 Op. 59, by Ernst, Deloffre, Hill, and Piatti. Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, Op. 49, was also magnificently rendered by Ernst (violin), Piatti (violoncello), and Charles Hall (the pianist). The Hungarian vocalists sang Bunn's "Solitude" with exquisite effect. The next meeting will be on the 19th inst.

Herr Schulhoff (a pianist of the Liszt-Thalberg school) gave an evening concert on Tuesday at the Hanover-square Rooms. He performed his own works exclusively, appearing four times, and was much applauded for his astonishing executive feats. He has a light and elegant touch. Herr Henry de Ahna, a violinist, made a successful début. The vocalists were Mdlle. Nissen, Mdlle. Williams, Mr. G. Barker, Herr Sidgalli, and Herr Schönhoff; with Herr Kuhn as conductor.

Mdlle. Coulon, a pupil of Thalberg, had her annual morning concert on Wednesday, at the Hanover Rooms. She was greatly applauded in a new and clever quintett, by Rosellen, in which the pianist played the violoncello part, Diechmann the violin, Lazarus the clarionet, and Baumann the bassoon. Mdlle. Coulon also executed Beethoven's Sonata in C minor with M. Deichmann, and Thalberg's "Masaniello" fantasia. The vocalists were Mdlle. Nissen, Mdlle. Graumann, Mdlle. Nau, Mrs. Mansford, Herr Dansby, Signor Tabilini, and Herr Brandt. There was a full attendance.

The second of the new series of Exeter Hall concerts took place on Wednesday, when there was, as usual, an overflowing audience. Mdlle. Jetty de Treffz was encored in Balfe's ballad, "I'm a merry Pagan." A long disturbance followed Mr. Sims Reeves's singing of "My pretty Jane," as from hoarseness he was not able to obey the call for an encore. Thalberg was encored in a pianoforte fantasia, and Mr. Sedgwick was compelled to repeat his concertina solo. Herr Reichardt and Herr Pischek sang the duo "All's well" effectively; Miss Dolby gave the page's first song, from Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," charmingly; Miss Lucombe and Miss A. Williams distinguished themselves in the two vocal quartets from the "Somnambula;" Mr. T. Harper's trumpet solo, "Should he upbraid," was finely executed; Mrs. Poole's song Lavenu's ballad, "The Harvest Queen," delightfully. Reeves and Pischek were both encored in their respective airs from the "Somnambula," and the latter in "The Standard Bearer." The ballad of Terrence's Farewell," sung by Miss Dolby, was also demanded twice. The 26th concert will be on June 13th

Madame Goffrie (pianiste) and Herr Geffrie (violinist) gave their annual concert, on Wednesday evening, at Willis's Rooms, and afforded specimens of their accomplishments, to the gratification of a numerous assemblage. Herr Hausmann, Mr. Hill, M. Zerlini, Ernst, and Jarrett were the other instrumentalists; and Miss Bassano, the Misses Pyne, Miss Messent, Mdlle. Graumann, Miss Wallace, Mr. Bodda, and Herr Schönhoff, vocalists.

Miss Messent, the accomplished vocalist, gave a morning Concert on Thursday, at the Hanover Rooms; and Mr. R. Blagrove, at the Mortimer-street Rooms, had his first Concert on Concert.

At Mrs. Anderson's annual Concert, which was fashionably attended, she played Hummel's concerto in A minor, and Ries's fantasia on Swedish airs, with the effect. Sainton and Piatti performed Mozart's duo concertante, and Bottesini his marvellous contra-basso solo, the "Carnival de Venise." Mdlle. Agnes Bury, a German vocalist, made a very favourable impression. Mdlle. de Treffz, Doras Grau, Angri, M. Wartel, and Pischek, were the other vocalists. Cows conducted an effective

The Second Grand Morning Concert on Wednesday, at the Royal Italian Opera, was most fashionably attended, and the performers were unable to obtain seats, such was the rush. The band, conducted by Costa, played Rossini's "Semiramide" overture, which was encored, and Hérold's "Zampa," besides the overture and Weber's "Invitation à la Valse" arranged by Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." Grisi and Mario were encored in the duo from Donizetti's "Don Pasquale," "Tornami a dir" and the latter was rapturously encored in the "Addio" after quitting the stage. She is a very charming Don Ottavio's "Prendi per me" with wondrous brilliancy. Angri and Tamburini gave the "La ci darem" duo from Mozart's "Don Giovanni" effectively. Madame Macfarren, Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss Dolby, Miss Poole, Miss Lucombe, Mdlle. Marai, and Mr. Sims Reeves (the latter singing the "Ernani" scena admirably), Signori Lavia, Tagliafico, and Polonini, contributed their aid in the scheme. Most marvellous exhibitions of execution on the piano and contrabasso were those of Dreyschock and Bottesini. It was the first appearance of the former this season; and he rends with enthusiasm, accompaniments, and a fantasia, "Hommage à Loudres," the latter being our National Anthem, executed with the left hand. Bottesini, inconceivable as it may appear, performed Paganini's "Carnival de Venise" on his big instrument, playing harmonic arpegrios, and staccato passages like violin. He was much cheered encored. The chorus sang the "Masaniello" market prayer; and the Hungarian vocalists two of their national airs. This was the finest concert of the season

Musical Events.—A morning concert was given on Friday, at the Hanover Rooms, in aid of the Metropolitan Convalescent Institution. In the evening, the annual concert on behalf of the Choral Fund, at excellent institution, took place at the same rooms ——Our not a of M. Julien's first Concert, at Exeter Hall, must be deferred until our next Number. ——Madame de Lozano, the Spanish vocalist, gives a matinée musicale this day (Saturday), at Strauss's concerts at the Hanover Rooms this morning another series of concerts.——On Monday evening, Ernst, the celebrated violinist, will give his concert.——Mr. G. Genge has his concert at the Horns Tavern; and the London Sacred Harmonic Society will perform Haydn's "Creation," with Mr. Hullmandel as conductor. Miss Catherine Hayes singing the soprano part for the first time.——Next Friday, the Sacred Harmonic Society will repeat the "Creation," conducted by Costa.——On Saturday, Herr Bohner, the violoncellist, will have a matinée at Willis's Rooms.——On Wednesday, Mr. Lee has announced a concert at Exeter Hall. ——The Paris Journal des Débats announces that the marriage of Mdlle. Lind is definitively broken off, and that she is on the point of leaving Paris for Sweden.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S

A second performance of the "Gazza Ladra" on Tuesday evening, displayed a far greater manifestation of talent than even the first. This opera had been got up with much speed, that the first performance was only a full band rehearsal; the second was a most perfect exhibition of vocal and dramatic resources. It excitement produced was immense, the approbation being expressed repeatedly by those symptoms of hearty delight that characterise the impression of a British audience when suddenly and deeply roused. Never did we witness the least astonishing; for every artist in that opera is fully equal to the greatest principal parts; and those will perform the secondary characters—such as Calcolari, the new and admirable choir, Arnoldi, &c.—are far above the average.

The brilliancy of the performance consisted not alone in the perfection of the ensemble, but there was a struggle for supremacy of dramatic and vocal talent between those incomparable artists, Albert, Labbache, and Coletti; they seized their energies to the utmost dramatic effect, whilst in the trios and quartetts, each distinguished himself in succession, the one vying with and out-doing the other in vocal research. On the other hand, the new débutante, Mdlle. Cassolani, experienced a reception she had not had on the first night, and the grand duet "Ebben per la mia memoria," was interrupted by the loudest encore of the first passage she sings

Thursday night was signalised by the performance of "Don Giovanni," with totally novel features—new dresses, new decorations, new scenery. The production of "Don Giovanni," with totally novel features—new dresses, new decorations, new scenery. The production of Mozart's immortal work is a task of no ordinary kind, and of his pièce de résistance Zuccarello, "by those flow of Italian artists, Marie Taglioni and Rosati, who have paid due homage to Italian vocal composer, instead of leaving this duty to inferior artists. "Don Giovanni" is so sublime a work to be considered in relation with a new cast, without devoting to it time and space as well as reflection; we will, therefore, put off until next week our full criticism of Thursday's performance. The great superiority of its production on the present occasion was, that every artist is in the full maturity of his powers—vocal as well as intellectual Labbache (the oldest of the performers) displayed his fine voice and acting to the utmost advantage; never for power of voice, as he has ever been for genius. The deep dramatic feeling of Paradisi, the noble flow of Albert, the noble conceptions of Coletti, &c., each found in "Don Giovanni" a theme appropriate and most effective employment. The new singer was worthy of the pencil of Marshall. By intermixture of the mimic and choreographic members of the troupe with the choruses, the dramatic situations and the concerted finales obtained superior power of illusion while the exquisite dancing, transient as it was, imparted a new zest into the performance, of which the choral and instrumental portions were as scientifically managed.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Owing to the indisposition of Mario, the second performance of Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" was postponed from last Saturday to this evening (June 2), when her Majesty will honour the theatre with her presence. "Lucrezia Borgia," with Grisi, Mario, and Tamburini, and the last act of the "Somnambula," with Madame Persiani and Sims Reeves, were given last Saturday; and, on Tuesday, "Lucia," with Miss Catherine Hayes and Mario. The singing and acting of the great tenor in "Lucrezia" and "Lucia" was, beyond all question, the finest exhibition of his vocal and histrionic capabilities ever yet heard, and created an overwhelming sensation on both occasions.

FRENCH PLAYS

On Wednesday night, her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the Duchess of Kent, honoured the first performance of Anber's charming opera, "La Part du Diable," with their presence. It was for the benefit of the admirable actor, M. Coudere, who played Gérard. Mdlle. Charbert's Carlo was not so much to be considered effective, the choral portion being very limited. The earnestness and zeal of the German executants were evident, but it was, altogether, a very mediocre performance. The new tenor, Karl Formes, has a fine voice, but his intonation was defective. He obtained an encore in the well-known "Qui oserra" (In diese heilige Hallen). Mdlle. Von Romani was also encored in the difficult song of the "Queen of Night." The Tamino was Mdme. Marini; the Papageno, Herr Bruner; and the Tamina, Herr Bahrdt.

PRINCESS.

The operas of the brothers Ricci ought to be more introduced in this country, and we are surprised that at the Italian opera-houses the works of these composers have been so utterly neglected, for, as composers they are infinitely to be preferred to the ordinary run of Italian school. The two brothers, Frederick and Louis, born in Naples, have composed together "Il Sonnambulo," "L'Assedia del Messico, ossia il Fernando Cortez," "Il Nuovo Figaro," "Le Nozze di Figaro," "Il Colonello," "Crispino e la Comare," and "Una Follia di Roisemberg" (the libretto of which Balfe borrowed for his "Siege of Rochelle"). Frederick's comic opera of "Un' Avventura di Scaramuccia," and his "Prigioni d'Edimburgo," are both much under consideration with The English version of Luigi Ricci's "Deserter," produced last Monday night, will be an interesting add ition to the Princess' répertoire. The story is dramatic. A soldier, who is about to visit his native village, is made the victim of a frolic. He is told that his lady-love is about to be the wife of another, and, in despair, rushes into the mountains, is about to commit suicide, but is rescued by a military party, and then accuses himself of being a deserter. He is condemned to death, and then is told in prison of the cruel joke that has been perpetrated, and that his fiancée is faithful to him. She obtains a pardon from the King, but from overanxiety is almost too late to save him. Of course, all ends happily. The music is very pretty, graceful, and effective. Mdlle. Nau was the heroine, and Miss Poole and Mr. Dillon sustained the parts. Weiss was the Governor. The opera, which is well mounted, bids fair to be popular; and the management deserves praise for making Ricci's music known in this country.

Whit-Monday did not bring with it the customary dramatic novelties this year by which it is usually distinguished. All the houses were, however, well filled, the pitiless weather driving in everybody from al fresco amusements; so that those determined upon, somehow or another, keeping the conventional holiday, had nowhere else to go. The river steam-boats had as much water over the heads of their passengers as under their feet; the open cars of the railways were all turned into portable cold baths; all the energies in the world could not storm Badajos satisfactorily, when so much cold water was thrown upon them; and what Gomorrah must have looked like, about one o'clock, with its orchestra turned into a species of waterwork, is painful to imagine. Therefore, the theatres were the only houses of refuge; and the managers at least found that the wind which had brought the change of weather was not an ill one.

Astley's was the only theatre that produced any novelty of importance; and here a new grand equestrian military spectacle which we might call "Moplan and Goujerat; or, the Conquest of the Sikhs," which achieved a great success, being splendidly put upon the stage, very well constructed, and running over with those peculiarities and beauties of the kind which, in late seasons in the East pulled up our hopes a little, we began to fear were confined only to the direction of Mr. W. West as regarded our army, and Mr. T. P. Cooke on the navy. In the present spectacle all the resources of the theatre are brought into play, and put to very good account. We lost, now and then, the picturesque groupings and general artistic effect which characterised pieces of the class in the time of Dermoyer; but plenty of the bustle and action, boldly conceived patriotic sentiments, and a most liberal consumption of gunpowder and red fire, events the most startling and the highest pitch of enthusiasm, and make them overlook many discrepancies and anachronisms of which the night present themselves to the calm observation of analysing minds. There could not have been more cheering, and rightly cheering, a finale than when the curtain went down on the triumph of the dramatis. The scenes in the circle are to serve to introduce Mdlle. Marie Mecarro to the inauspicious. We have before spoken of this lady, who is a very clever equestrian. She is a very daring rider, and, at the same time, a certain one. The troupe altogether is far superior to the ordinary run of equestrian companies. Mr. Fitzhall's drama of the "White Maiden of Cullenstein" is a very pretty and romantic piece, and sent the holiday folks home to dream of gold and horses of the ocean

On the same evening Mrs. Nisbett and Miss Mordaunt made their first appearance at the Olympic, in Mr. Planché's new extravaganza, "The Love Chase" the former lady resuming her original character of Constance. Her reception was very great; and, although the refined wit of the piece is not altogether adapted to the taste of the Olympic audience, it was clear on Whit-Monday, yet Mrs Nisbett' bonyant spirits and ringing laugh carried them all entirely with he A spectacle followed, called "The Lily of the Desert," in which Miss Mordaunt played and sang very effectively, assisted by the clever Misses Cushnie especially varied the entertainments. Mr Shepherd will, we think, find the engagement an advantageous one. Be this as it may, he is certainly entitled to commendation for rescuing the Surrey from the pitiable state into which it had fal en Sadler's Wells departed from its usual line, and produced "The Castle Spectre on Monday, very well cast. The season is announced to conclude this week.

The Lyceum has been fortunate in the production of a piece called "A Wonder in Women"—a translation, we have seen, very skilfully executed by Mr. Charles Dance. The play betrays all the ingenuity of the French school of construction, free from that elaboration of intrigue, which at times makes the plot so difficult to follow. Madame Celeste, Mr. Charles Mathews, Mr. Roxby, and Miss Howard have each good parts in the comedietta, and Mr. Frank Mathews deserves special mention for his admirable impersonation of the cobbler Orgon—one of the most truthful pieces of acting that we have for some time witnessed. The piece is playing every night, and to the great delight of the audience. The concerts are really exquisite, and a charming interior betrays all that taste for perfect mise en scène for which the Lyceum is so justly celebrated.

Mrs. Mowatt has been seriously indisposed during the past week, and her characters have been sustained, with good effect, by Miss Fanny Vining. In consequence of this, the production of Mr. Spicer's new five-act play, the "Witch Wife," has been postponed for a few days.

Emigrant Ships.—The first impression produced on getting on board an emigrant ship at Gravesend is that of confusion worse confounded. Fancy numbered with everything that can be conceived—boats, cables, spars, hencoops, deals, planks, boxes, chests, bedding, and children getting everywhere they should not, without end. Sailors are busy in the lower deck, in the interstices of which carpenters hammering away at partitions (it is very odd, but on emigrant ships the carpenters seem never to have finished until they are under weigh), and the men passengers are quarrelling for the best berths. Women look up their sins and losing their temper, while the women mope about on the poops, looking dirty, dowdy, and uncomfortable, like hens on a wet afternoon. Descending to the lower deck, the confusion is worse confounded. The space in which the swarming bees, no drones, are to dwell for a four months' voyage; to shore-going eyes, a long, low, narrow, rather dark gallery, the centre occupied by a table, and at either side the berths—that is, a series of shelves, in width after the rate of three feet to each passenger, closed in on the fil en side by battened doors, and open on the storage system. To describe them would be useless, if not impossible; but there was a capital picture of the interior of an emigrant ship in the Illustrated News a short time ago. The arrangements, and the accommodations, the space is ample compared with the herring-like packing on board the American timber ships—it is quite a drawing-room; while experience tells us that because of the space, the passengers are more healthy and happy, smoking and and books, and playing packages so as to be had at a moment's warning. The London merchants are quite correct in their notion that last at this work—active, concerned, and full of talk. Sidney's Emigrant's Journal.

Davies's Map of the British Metropolis.—This is a cleverly executed map, of large size: the boundaries of the boroughs, the County Courts Districts, and the Sewers Districts, together with the Railways and Stations, Cemeteries, and Landing Piers on the River, the New Roads, New Streets, and all the latest improvements, are given from authentic documents and actual survey. As the Map is coloured, the boundaries are very effectively shown, and the names of the districts are given in large distinctive red capitals across the localities. There are too many parishes for us to particularise; but, we may safely recommend the Map as the completest as well as the latest Map of the Metropolis.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Colliery Accident.—Seven Lives Lost.—On Saturday morning last, about eight o'clock, a dreadful accident happened at the colliery of Thomas Powell, Esq., at Llantwit Vardi, near Pontypridd, in Glamorganshire. On that morning eighteen persons thrust themselves into the basket to descend the pit to their daily labour; but scarcely had the ever-crowded number descended ten yards after setting forward that there were too many in the carriage, before, from its oscillation and unequal movements, the machinery became disarranged, the engine incapable of drawing the men to the surface again, and the chain breaking, that large crowd of terror-stricken beings were precipitated to the depth of ninety-six yards in a moment. Nearly the whole mass of chain, one hundred and forty-five yards in length, fell upon the unfortunate creatures in the shattered carriage at the bottom of the shaft. Seven were killed on the spot, and all the rest more or less frightfully injured

Edinburgh High Court of Justiciary.—Lord Ivory has been appointed one of the Lords of Justiciary, in room of Lord Medwyn, who has resigned, though still retaining his office of Lord of Session. Formerly the Lords of Justiciary received £600 a year, in addition to their salary of £4,000 as Lords of Session; but, since the Act which increased the salaries of the Judges, those who act as Lords of Justiciary receive nothing in addition to the £3000 as Judges of the Court of Session. Some of the Scotch papers suggest that there ought to be no separate appointments of criminal judges; but that all the supreme judges of Scotland should be eligible to sit in both courts, like the fifteen judges in England.

Herring Fishery.—Accounts from the north of Scotland represent the fishing as very successful, scarcely one day passing without the boats averaging about five or six crans each, and some boats as high as forty crans. Cargoes are exported almost daily.

Capture of Depredators.—So frequent have been of late the depredations committed at various farms in the immediate neighbourhood of Dover, that an especial vigilance on the part of the police has been directed to the capture of the perpetrators. The measures adopted proved successful, as between three and four o'clock on Tuesday morning, some police, in ambush, effected the capture of suspected robbers haunting Lowe's Castle-hill laden with spoil, consisting of two sacks, partially filled with cabbages, beans, &c. The parties proved to be Henry Ryas and a person named Whitewell, both labourers, who have been committed to St. Augustine's Gaol for the ensuing East Kent session.

State of the Crops in Mid Kent.—Hops: The hop-bines is growing fast and looking well, but there is a gradual increase of fly. Corn: The wheat plant is looking well, and the same remark may be happy to say, applies to barley, oats, and beans. Peas have suffered much from the effect of the slug, the ravages of which have exceeded anything almost ever before known, leaving this plant very thin on the ground. Turnips: The prospects are very much blighted, but there will be some black-hearts and Kentish reds. The gooseberries are entirely destroyed. Currants and apples promise a good crop. There is every appearance of an abundant crop of grass. Clover and seeds generally look well. —Maidstone Journal.

Upon Persons Drowned whilst Boating.—On Sunday last, six persons were amusing themselves in a boat on the river running through Norwich. They went up to the head of the river, to the mill-pool, and rowed the boat, in sport, into one of the flashes, then running very strong. They tried this a second time, when one of the party (Thomas Lane) was jerked overboard; another of the men in the boat leaned over to endeavour to catch hold of his companion, and the other parties likewise leaned over the same side, with the same intention, when the flash filled the boat, and she immediately sank. Four of the parties sank and were drowned: their names—Thomas Lane, 16; Robert Browne, aged 28; Henry Lane, 23; and Frances Breese, a very fine young woman, aged 19. The two latter were about to have been married on the following day. It was a most dangerous place for such sport, the flashes running very rapidly, and the water being from fourteen to sixteen feet deep.

Death of a Jockey from "Sweating."—An inquest was held on Thursday week, at Horndean, Hants, on the body of George Davis, aged 21, a groom in the employ of J. Burrill, jun., Esq., who died that morning ——— Davis was in the habit of training for horse races, which was to run at the ensuing races on Portsdown-hill; deceased was to have been the jockey, and being desirous to decrease his weight, resorted to a practice, we believe not uncommon in such cases, of putting on a great quantity of unnecessary additional apparel, and then taking walking exercise; thus attired, and in perfect good health, he set out on Wednesday morning, at a quick pace, and returned in two hours, but so completely exhausted as to render it necessary that he should be placed in bed, he did not rally, however, but soon after was a corpse. Verdict, "Died from exhaustion."

Testimony to the Memory of Captain Cook.—The great circumnavigator was born in the parish of Marton in Cleveland, in the North Riding of Yorkshire. That parish, at present containing upwards of four hundred inhabitants, is now, and has been for some years, without such a Sunday and day-school as the necessities of the large and fast agricultural population require; and it is, therefore, proposed to erect a building which will, afford to the rising generation, and all ages desirous of instruction in accordance with the principles of the Church of England, and at the same time commemorate in his native village the memory of the great circumnavigator of the globe, in honour of whom no public monument has ever been erected in the north of England as far as can be ascertained, within the kingdom. Miss Atherton, of Kerval Cot, has generously sent a donation of £50 towards this object Execution at Perth.—The execution of John Kellocher, who was convicted at last circuit court of the murder of Janet Anderson, an old woman residing at Buttergask, near Blackford, took place at Perth on Tuesday morning, at eight o'clock. On the previous day Kellocher made an ample confession of his guilt, exonerating the witnesses in reference to all that they had said on his trial, acknowledging the justice of his sentence, and expressing contrition for his crime.

The Cholera at Keynsham.—Asiatic cholera is progressing at Keynsham, Somerset, a village standing in a favourable position on the summit of a hill, and which has been considered as a healthy residence. In addition to a number of deaths in the union workhouse, and of some previous deaths in the village, which have been already noticed, five more deaths occurred between Saturday and Wednesday. The deaths are generally remarkably sudden, having in four out of the five fatal cases ensued within four and twenty hours of the seizure. There were under treatment on Tuesday eleven cases, all of which are considered to be Asiatic cholera, and four of which are of a very severe character. The inhabitants of the place are taking all the means in their power to prevent the spread of the epidemic. A sanitary committee has been formed, the members of which have in particular the duty of visiting the cottages, and every possible precaution is being taken with a view to limit the ravages of the scourge as far as possible. The union workhouse, where the disease at first broke out, is now entirely free from it.

Wreck of an Emigrant Ship, and Loss of Life.—Intelligence of the total wreck of the Hannah, freighted with nearly two hundred emigrants, bound to Quebec from Newry, was received during the week at Lloyd's, the particulars having been received by the American mail-steamer America, at Liverpool. The Hannah was a brig of between 150 and 200 tons burden, belonging to Maryport, and manned by a crew of 11 seamen, under the command of Mr. Shaw, the master. On the 3rd of April last she sailed from Newry with the above number of emigrants on board, having been previously overhauled and examined by her Majesty's emigration agent at that port. The emigrants chiefly consisted of agricultural labourers, and their wives and children. The passage up to the 27th, considering the season of the year, was favourable. The vessel then encountered heavy winds and a quantity of floating ice. On the morning of the 28th the unfortunate ship struck on a reef of rocks: it was about four o'clock when she struck. A cheer was brought against the master and first and second officers, of their having been guilty of the most revolting acts of inhumanity possible to be conceived. They had got the life-boat out, and the moment they had got clear of the vessel would inevitably go down they jumped into it, and abandoned the wreck with the emigrants on board. Their excuse for help rent the air, and it was with difficulty that the remainder of the crew could induce the fugitives to return to assist in the work of saving their lives. Fortunately, the ice was firm under the ship's bows, and the seamen convincing them as to its security, many got on it. Its solidity being then apparent, a desperate struggle took place between the parties to leave the wreck. Men, women, and children, with nothing on but their night attire, were scrambling over the mass of ice. Many of the poor creatures slipt between the huge masses, and were either crushed to death or perished by getting into the water. In the course of two hours he and his crew succeeded in getting hold of about fifty of the poor creatures, and placing them on board his vessel. The remainder were carried away by the current to another part of the ice some distance off, inaccessible from the position of the ship. Captain Marshal had all sails carried up, and got a rope fastened to a piece of ice, and with the long-boat pushed off with his assistance to the spot. After considerable difficulty succeeded in getting to the edge, where they remained huddled together. The whole were saved. The number got on board the Norwegian were 125 passengers and seamen, the greater part of whom were free-holders. The Norwegian herself could accommodate from the survivors, the number that perished by being crushed to death between the ice and frozen to death were between fifty and sixty. As soon as he had succeeded in getting all on board, the ship was got under weigh, and proceeded in the direction of Cape Ray. Every comfort that his means afforded was placed at the sufferers' disposal. The next day, meeting with the barque Brown, of Glasgow, twenty-seven of the poor creatures were transferred to that vessel; and in the course of the following day forty-nine of the survivors were placed on board three other vessels. The Norwegian reached Quebec on the 10th of last month. The fate of the master and the others who took to the life-boat and abandoned the emigrants is not known.

On Sunday morning, about eleven o'clock, an elderly gentleman of respectable appearance, crossing the fields from Bromley to Lewisham, fell dead—the effect of a sun-stroke.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Queen has been pleased to direct letters patent to be passed under the Great Seal, granting the office and place of Advocate-General, or Judge-Marshal of her Majesty's Forces, to Sir David Dundas, Knt.

The Limerick Examiner states that "Lord Stanley has paid the pass sage money of a great number of his poor tenantry, provided them with clothes, given a small sum of money to each, and sent them off to America.

Owing to the continuance of the Danish and German hostilities, fresh accessions to the foreign vessels which have sought refuge in Ramsgate and Dover have been made during the week.

Ramorino, the Piedmontese General, who had been found guilty by a court-martial of treachery in the late military operations between the Austrians and his countrymen, was shot at Turin, on the 22nd ult., at half-past six o'clock in the morning.

Garibaldi, the Roman General, whose portrait lately appeared in this paper, is described in a letter just received from Rome, as a most picturesque ruffian, the ideal of a brigand—eminently handsome, with a red blouse, broad belt full of pistols, dark wide-brimmed hat, and green feather.

On Saturday evening last, as Mr. Wm. Sproat, of Ambleside, was trolling for char, on Lake Windermere, he had the good luck to catch a fine salmon, which, on being weighed, exceeded upwards of 10lb. This, we believe, is the first salmon caught in that lake

A most distressing accident occurred on Saturday last, at Stratton-house, near Cirencester, by which the family of Sir Thomas Tancred, Bart., has been plunged in the deepest grief. During the absence of Sir Thomas and Lady Tancred, their youngest boy, Assheton, a beautiful child, about five years old, who had been playing in the garden, with his elder brother and sister, and who had been absent from them only a few minutes, was found by the servant in a tank, situated in a remote part of the premises. Life was extinct.

We are requested to state that the announcement of the death of General de Rumigny, aide-de-camp of the ex-King of the French, is not correct, the general being, we are assured, in a state of convalescence from his late serious attack of illness.

The Irish provincial journals give the most cheering accounts of the progress of the crops of all kinds. The potatoes, in all directions, present a healthy and luxuriant appearance, and these early planted are far advanced in growth.

The Hon. Newton Fellowes has given orders to have a great quantity of his coppices and brakes, in the neighborhood of Ingestre and Chartley, in Staffordshire, cleared and broken up for tillage, which is now affording a large amount of labour to the poor; immense trucks, which but a few years since were planted with furze, for the purpose of affording shelter for the foxes, are now undergoing that change which will soon, we hope, make the owner a better return.

We understand a memorial has been addressed to the Home-office by the County Court Judges, and that a deputation of them has waited upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, complaining of their salaries having been permanently fixed at £1000 a year—a sum, they say, quite incommensurate with the dignity, responsibility, labour, and usefulness of the office.

The Earl of Rosse, as President of the Royal Society, held his third levee on last Saturday evening, in the apartments of the University of London at Somerset House. The evening was honoured with the presence of a very large circle of the members and fellows of the society.

Major Hope is appointed Auditor-General at the Cape of Good Hope. Mr James Dunnett is to be the head of the Botanical Gardens at the Mauritius.

The patriarch of Icaria, M. Cabet, has lately purchased for 4000 dollars the Temple of Nauvoo, which formerly belonged to the Mormons, with 12 acres of land and all the buildings upon them.

Mr Holden, of Belfast, accompanied by Mr. Robert James Tennent, M.P., Mr. Sharman Crawford, M.P., Mr. Frankh, M.P., and Mr. Bryden, had an interview with Lord John Russell, at his residence in Chesham-place, on Saturday last, on the subject of examining to the south and west of Ireland the manufacture of "sewed muslins," by means of industrial schools.

A patented machine has been put in operation at Birmingham for the manufacture of letter envelopes, the number produced by which in a complete form is most astonishing. Supposing it to be turned by steam power, by a man, with the aid of three or four young girls or boys to gather the envelopes, would, it is calculated, by its means, be able to manufacture from 30,000 to 35,000 in an ordinary working day, the paper being cut beforehand.

Sir Thomas Winnington, Bart., of Stanford Court, Worcestershire, at his annual held on the 15th ult, liberally returned ten per cent. to his tenantry.

It is stated that Lord Duncannon and several active and influential men in London are endeavouring to raise a Joint-Stock Company for the purchase of the famous "Martin Estate" in Galway, of 200,000 acres, in order to carry out Sir R Peel's idea.

The restoration of Duke Robert's Tower, Cardiff Castle, in which Robert Duke of Normandy was imprisoned for twenty-eight years, has been commenced.

Last Sunday (Whit Sunday) was the 300th anniversary of the English Book of Common Prayer. King Edward, in the year 1548, opened a commission consisting of thirteen English divines, with Archbishop Cranmer at their head, for the purpose of preparing a book of common prayer. The commission met at Windsor, in May, 1548, and drew up a book of common prayer, which was approved by convocation and finally ratified by an act of Parliament in the January following. This book, which is substantially the same as the present common prayer book, was enjoined to be used for all divine offices from the feast of Whit Sunday, 1549.

On last Sunday afternoon, her Majesty's Judges, with the Lord Mayor, attended by the Rev. S. R. Catley, the aldermen, the recorder, the sheriffs, the under-sheriffs, and the city officers, joined in divine service in St. Paul's Cathedral; the sermon was preached by the Hon. and Rev. Montagu Villers.

The old colours of the 62nd, or Wiltshire Regiment, which were carried by the regiment in the Sutlej campaigns of 1845-46, are shortly to be placed in Salisbury Cathedral.

Late Mexican papers state that General Don P. Garcia Conde, appointed commissioner to run the boundary line on the part of Mexico, had left San Francisco, furnished with regions for one year, for the purpose of meeting a commissioner from the United States.

From California we have nothing new up to April 30th. Neither of the rival steamers which had come up to San Francisco had succeeded in getting back to Panama. The number of emigrants waiting at the Isthmus was much diminished, and nearly the whole of them would soon get off in sailing-vessels.

William H. Mitchel, brother of the Irish patriot and exile, John Mitchel, has been appointed by Secretary Ewing a clerk in the Home Department at Washington, and has left the city to enter upon the duties of his office.

In the west and south-west of the United States the cholera is gaining ground. At Cincinnati it is the fatal that a great public festival about to take place there has been postponed.

Twelve months since, the deposits in the Cork savings-banks amounted to £400,000. In consequence of the panic about the security of such establishments the deposits have declined to £264,000

A return obtained by Sir S. Ferguson shows that the gross total amount of county cess in Ireland, remaining unpaid at the spring assizes of 1849 was £164,324.

Notwithstanding the present depressed state of the country, it is not a little gratifying to learn that on the 1st ult. more than £10000 were deposited in the Lincoln Savings'-Bank, chiefly by farmers' servants. There were likewise £6560 drawn out on the same day; out of the latter sum no less than £400 were drawn out by parties on the point of emigrating.

Two splendid specimens, male and female, of the blue peregrine falcon, or hunting hawk, were killed a few days ago by Mr. Thomas Dickinson, of Eslington, and are now in possession of Mr. Snowdon, of Newcastle.

The post mortem examination of a young artist named A. F. West, who died lately, revealed enough to induce the jury to return a verdict "That the deceased died from the effects of carbonate of lead." It appeared that he was in the habit of drawing his pencils through his lips.

Mr. J. Henning, sculptor, in Belgrave-place, has just finished a series of models in plaster of Paris, selected from the restored frieze in the Parthenon. The works (which have been completed for the Prince Albert) consist of a variety of classical groups in relief, and are intended as ornamental panels for the corridor at Osborne House.

Emily Sandford, for whose aid a subscription has been collected, amounting to many hundred pounds, left Gravesend on Saturday last with her child, in the barque Gasper, for Port Adelaide, South Australia.

The Europa, Captain Cobb, sailed from Liverpool on Saturday for Halifax and Boston. She carried out no specie.

On Tuesday, seven miners left Hayle, Cornwall, in the Cornwall steamer, for Holland, to sail thence for Chili. Two of them had taken on leaving, and declared that they were literally starved out of Cornwall.

A very fine female specimen of the very rare fish, the Sea Lamprey (Petromyzon marinus) was caught in the Nene, near to the Long Bridge, in Cambridgeshire, on Monday last. It is supposed to have ascended the river for the purpose of spawning. It is thirty inches in length and six in diameter, and was purchased for the Museum.

The Mount Stuart Elphinstone, commanded by Captain Loney, and having 250 convicts on board under the charge of Dr Moxey, left her moorings opposite the royal Arsenal, Woolwich, on Saturday last, for Moreton Bay, New South Wales.

A return, obtained by Sir John Young, M.P., shows that, between the 6th of January, 1847, and the 5th of April, 1849, 1 ere were exported to Great Britain, from Ireland, 189,959 oxen, bulls, and cows; 9992 calves, 324,779 sheep and lambs, and 106,407 swine During the year ended the 5th of April, 1849, the number exported from Ireland was 27,965 oxen and bulls, 879 calves, 35,189 sheep and lambs, and 27,304 swine.

The ceremony of confirmation was administered at St. George's Roman Catholic Church, Southwark, on Sunday, immediately before High Mass, to between 500 and 700 persons, by Dr. Wiseman, Vicar Apostolic of the London District, assisted by his deacons, the Revs. J. Cotter and Dannell, and several of the Roman Catholic clergy.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The two great Epsom events came off most disastrously for the professional betters, both the favourites having, as it is termed, "pulled through," to the great enrichment of two Right Honourable Lords and of the "British public." It is many years since a similar turn of ill-luck befel the anti-favourite division; bad, however, as it was, they bore it stoutly—all, with two or three exceptions, coming to book like "good men and true." Had Hocopur and Lady Sapience "landed it," the bet would have been on the other leg; and Mesdames "the public," we s. rewdly suspect, would not have been so prompt to "tip" as they were to "draw."

The only race meeting this week of any note is the one held at Manchester. We hear that it has afforded capital sport; and, like all sporting affairs in that neighbourhood, has come off with admirable spirit; the attendance was immense. Next week will be devoted to Ascot, and a right royal meeting may be anticipated. The great events will be run for on Tuesday and Thursday, on which days our most gracious Queen and her illustrious Consort will be present. The list number for the four days is more than usually strong, and nearly all the best horses of the day are engaged.

RACING CUPS.—Three superb silver cups, modelled by Mr. Cotterill, are exhibited in the shop of Messrs. Garrard. The first is the Emperor of Russia's Cup, representing the fate of Hippolytus, in which the sea monsters are twined about the stem so as to produce a most ingenious variety of aspect, and the dropping of no water from the mouth of the cup is introduced so as to give a marine character to the whole. The second is the Queen's Ascot Cup, representing a spirited fight between a Spanish picador and a bull. The third is the Goodwood Cup, representing a chase of the bison by North American Indians The differences of these cups, both in subject and in style, and the animation which is common to all, prove great versatility in the modeller.

THE PUTTLERIAN LEGACY. By ALBERT SMITH.—This very entertaining farce, which coincides with the present number (10), and, in taking leave of his readers, the author announces his intention of indulging "a long-felt wish to visit the Mediterranean, the East, and the northern coast of Africa." Perhaps, "if we have fellow fellowship," it may be as well, for our future security, to state openly that we have no political objects in view. What Russia is doing to Turkey—how Austria means to set towards everywhere—how will eventually rule in Lucerne—and why Egypt objects to railways, we do not care one straw. They may all argue, arrange, or fight our their respective grievances from morning to night, for as long as they please, so that they permit us to come and go unmolested. To eat the real kabobs, and see the real Circassian slaves of the 'Arabian Nights Entertainments,' to hear a bulbul, to climb the Pyramids, and to ride upon a camel, are ends of greater interest to us than the accomplishment of the most strokes of policy ever effected." We cordially wish health and spirits to our traveller, who has himself so largely provided for the enjoyment of others.

THE NEW BILL FOR REGULATION OF EMIGRANT SHIPS.—The following is an abstract of the bill now in Parliament, as amended by the committee, for the regulation of emigrant ships:—The first four clauses are purely prefatory. Clause 5 vests the power of carrying the act into execution in the Colonial Land and Emigration Commissioners, who are author sed by the next clause to appoint emigration officers and assistants in the United Kingdom, governors having the like power of appointment in the colonies. It is afterwards provided that no passenger-ship shall be cleared without the emigration officer's certificate that the requirements of the act have been fulfilled. Clause 10 (the most important, perhaps, in the bill) limits the number of passengers to be carried both by tonnage and space. It enacts that no ship shall be allowed to proceed on her voyage with a greater number of passengers on board, including the crew, than in the proportion of one person to every two tons. Irrespective of tonnage, every deck passenger is to have twelve clear superficial feet; or, if the vessel have no main deck, and the voyage exceeds twelve weeks, fifteen feet. Two children, each under the age of fourteen years, are to reckon as one passenger, infants under twelve months not being counted. Various regulations follow as to light and ventilation. Clause nineteen prohibits articles injurious to health from being taken as cargo. Provisions for the passengers are to be shipped at the expense of the owner or charterer of the ship. The dietary scale, set forth in the 24th clause, is as follows. Each passenger is to have during the voyage at least three quarts of water daily, and of provisions after the rate per week of two-and-a-half pounds of bread or bisc uit, one pound of wheaten flour, five pounds of oatmeal, two pounds of rice, two ounces of tea, half-a-pound of sugar, and half-a-pound of molasses. Potatoes, when procurable, may be substituted for one-quarter or three-quarters of the proportion of five pounds of potatoes to one pound of oatmeal or rice. Each ship is to have a cook appointed to cook the passengers' food. Each ship having as many as one hundred passengers is bound by the 30th clause to have a surgeon on board; if the voyage is one that will exceed twelve weeks, a surgeon is also to be taken if the number of passengers be only fifty. Ships to North America are prevented from carrying a surgeon, provided that 14 instead of 12 superficial feet be allowed to each passenger. Clause 36 enacts that every passenger at the end of the voyage shall be entitled for at le ast 48 hours to sleep on board a ship, and may during that time claim maintenance the same as during the voyage. Clauses 44 to 49 relate to brokers' licenses, contract tickets, &c., for North American voyages; and the remainder of the bill consists of clauses relating to penalties and procedure, &c., a definition of the powers vested in governors in colonial voyages.

NEW STATION OF THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY, EUSTON-SQUARE.

ALTO-RELIEVO OVER THE ENTRANCE DOORWAY TO THE GENERAL MEETING-ROOM.

THE GREAT HALL, EUSTON-SQUARE STATION.

NEW STATION OF THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY, EUSTON-SQUARE.

BAS RELIEF OF MANCHESTER, IN THE GREAT HALL.

THE gigantic works which have been for some time past in the course of erection at the metropolitan terminus of the North-Western Railway being now completed, we have, this week, to chronicle their opening to the public, and to present our readers with some of the illustrations which we have prepared of the buildings. Our views comprise the great Hall, and one of the Pay-offices, and some of the bas-reliefs which decorate the great Hall.

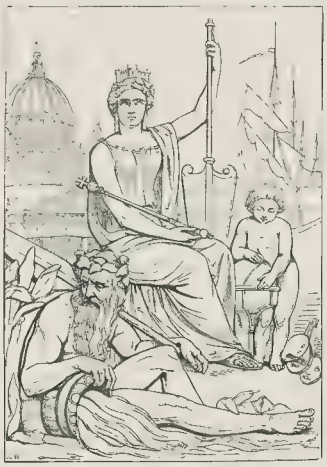
Passing under the magnificent Doric entrance, which has always formed so grand a feature to the entrance of this line of railway, the huge pile of building recently erected at once arrests the eye. This building, which has been designed by Philip Charles Hardwick, Esq., and erected by Messrs. William Cubitt and Co., at a cost of about £150,000, will now form the grand entrance to the London and North-Western Railway.

The structure, on the exterior, is of plain Roman style of architecture, and is 220 feet long by 168 feet in width. At the southern front there are five entrances, over which extends, for a considerable distance from the face of the building, a capacious awning, under which carriages may draw up and passengers alight without being exposed to wet or any other inclemency of the weather. The outer-doors just mentioned lead into what is called the "outer vestibule," which is 32 feet in depth and 64 feet in width, having a beautifully designed mosaic pavement, constructed of patent metallic lava, within a border of Craigleith stone. On the northern side of the "outer vestibule" are again five other entrances, leading into the Grand Hall, or Vestibule; and thus hall, for size and grandeur, is probably unique: its dimensions it is truly gigantic, being 125 feet 6 inches in length, 61 feet 4 inches in width, and 60 feet in height. At the northern end is a noble flight of steps, leading to a vestibule, in which are doors opening into the general meeting room, the board room, and the conference room, and the gallery which runs round the hall—thus giving facility of communication to an infinity of offices connected with the railway traffic, &c.

The style of architecture adopted is Roman Ionic, and it has been treated with the utmost skill. The ceiling is formed of panels, deeply coffered, the bands forming the panels being enriched with a double guilloche pattern on them. The hall is lighted by attic windows above the entablature, between which are massive consoles to support the ceiling; these consoles are as peculiarly effective and striking in character, as admirable in workmanship. The pillars at the head of the stairs, and corresponding ones at the southern end of the room, are painted in imitation of dark red granite, the capitals and bases to represent white marble. The vestibule at the head of the stairs is lighted from above; and, over the very handsome doorway leading to the general meeting-room, is a noble bas-relief, of which we have given an illustration, and shall presently describe, as we shall also do of the panels in the attic at the corners of the room, in which are bas-reliefs, some of which we have represented. The general meeting-room we shall describe and illustrate in a future Number; as also the directors' board-room, an exquisite apartment. The area of the hall and the staircase is formed of the best Craigleith stone. The walls, which are rendered with grey Martin's cement, are painted to simulate granite. The hall is warmed by hot water pipes, on Perkins's system; and, to promote ventilation, some of the panels in the ceiling are perforated, and behind them are coils of hot-water pipes; and in the general meeting-room a similar arrangement has been followed. At the southern end of the hall an illuminated clock is to be placed.

As this hall will, in fact, be a great ante-room to those departments in which the passenger traffic is carried on, the luggage will be brought here from the outer vestibule, and a large counter for refreshments will be one of the conveniences of the place.

The bas-reliefs which adorn the panels in the corners of the hall are eight in number, and typify the chief cities and boroughs with which the North-Western Railway communicates. They are London, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Carlisle, Chester, Lancaster, and Northampton. Of these, we have selected London, Liverpool, and Manchester, as affording good specimens of the general character of the bas-reliefs. London is typified by a female figure, murally crowned, and bearing in her hands the sceptre of Royalty, and the rudder, emblem of maritime power; below her sits an old man with a long beard, symbolical of Father Thames, and by her knees a genius, his arm resting on a globe; and at his feet emblems of music, painting, and the drama, indicate the universality of the art knowledge of the great metropolis of the world. The background is filled with St. Paul's and a group of shipping. Liverpool is a sitting female figure, resting on a rudder, with a genius by her side holding a quadrant. An aged man, having shells and corals in his hair, symbolises the Mersey in his right hand he holds a trident, and his left rests upon a well filled cornucopia. A portion of the Exchange, and a group of shipping, fills up this characteristic group. Manchester is individualized by a laurel-crowned female, sitting and holding a distaff, her hand resting on a bolt of cotton; a genius by her knees holding the shuttle, indicative of the cotton-spinning notoriety of Manchester. Mercury, emblem of commerce, sits in the foreground, busy drawing plans on a piece of paper; and the background is composed of piles of cotton goods, a huge factory, and the tower of the cathedral. Birmingham has the symbols of the iron trade—Vulcan, with his hammer and anvil, being in the foreground; a beautiful vase, showing the variety and perfection of the iron-works, and the portion of the new Town-Hall, fill up the group. Chester, with its far-famed dairy produce, its cheeses, its walls, and its venerable cathedral, is well characterised. Carlisle shows its cattle market, its manufactures, and its maritime symbols, with its cathedral tower; Lancaster its furniture and other manufactures; and Northampton has in its emblems the shoemaker, as well as its agricultural symbols, and a horse to typify its celebrated horse fair.



BAS-RELIEF OF LONDON, IN THE GREAT HALL.

BAS-RELIEF OF LIVERPOOL, IN THE GREAT HALL.

The large group in alto-relievo over the door leading into the general meeting-room, is an extremely picturesque and effective composition. We have accordingly selected it for illustration. It represents Britannia supported by Science and Industry. The whole of these bas-reliefs and the massive consoles reflect great credit on the gifted artist, Mr. John Thomas, whose talents have so often been noticed in our Journal, by whom they were designed and carried out, and through his courtesy we were enabled to make our drawings from the bas-reliefs when they were in his studio.

Leading from the grand hall on the basement, on the eastern and western sides, are several glass doors connecting it with the newly constructed booking-offices. That on the eastern side, through which the general passenger traffic of the line will pass, is the largest, being 60 feet by 40 feet; whilst that on the western side, which is to be appropriated to the London and York, the traffic of the branch lines, and special purposes, is 56 feet by 35 feet. The architecture of these booking-offices is in keeping with that of the main building. They have each light and elegant galleries passing round them on a level with the gallery of the great hall, and connected therewith, as well as with all the offices. The roof of each is a splendid cupola springing from the four corners, where it is apparently supported upon brackets resting upon lions' heads, the whole being surmounted by a stupendous and exceedingly light and elegant dome of glass. The arrangement of this department reflects the highest credit on those who have designed it.

Our Illustration is taken from the gallery, and shews the architectural features of the place.

We have mentioned that the whole is erected from the designs of Philip Hardwick, Esq.; and we must not forget to name his able Clerk of the Works, Mr. Bavin.

We have to tender our thanks to Mr. Hardwick for his ready acquiescence to our request to illustrate this noble building, and the facilities he has afforded our artist.

GALLERY OF THE BOOKING-OFFICE.

MR. VERNON.

THIS gentleman, known, for many years past, as a munificent patron of art, and more recently to the public by his princely gift to the nation of a collection of pictures by English artists, died, after a protracted illness, at his house in Pall Mall, on the 22nd ult., in the seventy-fifth year of his age.

Mr. Vernon, by a long course of activity and industry in the business to which he had applied himself—one which is at least honourable and interesting in a country which so much prides itself on its encouragement of the breed of horses—amassed a large fortune. His premises, it will be remembered by many of our readers, were situate in Cranson-street, May Fair. It is, however, the manner in which Mr. Vernon distributed this vast wealth that renders his character interesting to the public. He is understood to have expended in works of modern art at the very least £150,000. He did not purchase merely for the vanity of buying, but always had an eye to the interests of the artists. He always bought from the painters themselves, and not from dealers—thus securing to the former the full value of their work, and stimulating them by a higher, and at the same time a more direct motive to exertion. In order to carry out his grand idea of forming a gallery which should at all times and in all countries represent British art, it became necessary, as any of the painters advanced in their profession, that Mr. Vernon should secure their best productions, consequently, from time to time, and at an immense sacrifice of money, he, what is called, "weeded" his collection, never parting with any man's work whom he did not purpose (and for him to purpose was always to perform) commissioning to execute a more important subject in his improved style. In the national collection (that is, the Vernon Gallery part of it) there are a few pictures purchased at sales, or in such channels, but these are the productions of deceased artists.

Mr Vernon's liberality was not, however, confined to this mode of patronage of art and artists. He delighted to discover early genius, and foster it; and many are the instances which this well-timed benevolence has raised in proficient to professional eminence.

Nor was Mr. Vernon's munificence confined to the encouragement of the fine arts. He expended large sums in charity, public and private; and it was his pleasure to exercise that highest kind of charity which does not consist in the mere giving of money, but in the giving it under circumstances which make the gift of more value, by the virtues which accompany it. He was a man of an enlarged mind, with a taste for the society of men of talent—that he was profuse in his hospitality, and firm in his friendships—that by the force of his talent and character he was enabled to surround himself with some of the most distinguished talent of the period during which he lived.

There are certain circumstances connected with Mr. Vernon's munificent present of the collection now known as "the Vernon Gallery," which do not redound to the liberality of the Government, who are, in a sense, the public conservators of the treasure for the public. Its acceptance was in a cold, official spirit—certainly not redeemed by the present location of the pictures. However, we hope, ere long, to see them placed in a position worthy of so noble a gift.

The reader will recollect that we engraved the Gallery in a former Number of our Journal (No. 342). As a collection of first-rate specimens of the English school, it is invaluable; whilst its evidence relative to the progress of art in England no long but unjustly imputed neglect of native artists. The fact of so many fine pictures, painted within a period extending little more than a long lifetime, is most gratifying to every lover of English art.

REPORT OF THE BOARD OF HEALTH ON QUARANTINE.

A most important and valuable report on the subject of quarantine has just been presented by the General Board of Health to her Majesty. The object of the report chiefly is to show the greater security to the public health which would result from the establishment of sanitary for quarantine regulations. The purpose of quarantine being to prevent the introduction of any epidemic disease from one country into another, the inefficiency of this agency for the accomplishment of its purpose is argued, amongst others, on the following grounds:—

"One of the conditions essential to the existence of an epidemic disease is an epidemic atmosphere, over which quarantine can exercise no more control than it can over the temperature and electricity of the atmosphere or the direction and force of the wind. The extent of the range of great epidemic storms that they are beyond the control of quarantine. Influenza and cholera, which often follow each other, and which observe similar laws of diffusion, traverse the globe in zones generally from east to west. How it is asked, can a quarantine vessel placed at the entrance of one or two sea-port towns, or a line of soldiers guarding a few miles of frontier, protect one or an individual country, stay the progress of morbific agents which thus pursue their irresistible course over the greater part of the habitable globe? The steadiness of the progress of great epidemics proves that they are governed by laws over which quarantine has no control. In tracing the rise and progress of cholera, for instance, in British America, during the years 1832 and 1834, it is observed that this disease on both occasions advanced with post-like regularity in its same course, attacking the same places on nearly the same corresponding days. The rapidity of the course of great epidemics further shows how vain the attempt must be to stop their progress by such obstacles as that of quarantine. In 1847, influenza spread in one day over every part of the metropolis. "It met you everywhere," says the registrar-general; nearly the whole population were affected more or less, and without taking slight instances, not less than 500,000 persons in 2,100,000 suffered in London from the epidemic. In like manner, when cholera broke out in Cairo, in 1831, it spread—within the space of five days—over the whole valley of the Nile, reaching at the same time all the towns and villages of the Delta. In 1832 it leaped at one bound from London to Paris, and out of the forty-eight quarters of that city it spread in five days over thirty five. To conceive its influence, it is asked, can quarantine or sanitary cordons exert in checking the progress of persons possessed of diffusive powers? Besides, epidemics are generally present in a country, and disorder the health of the people, before they are manifested in their peculiar and recognised forms; the significant signs by which their presence is declared being, amongst other symptoms, nervous agitation which are more than warnings; they are indications of the actual presence of the disease; evidences that it has already commenced its work. Before the erection of quarantine as a barrier, there must be a conviction of the existence of infection, existing the blood of the most susceptible of the population, and preparing the way for its general outbreak.

Quarantine is based on the assumption that epidemic diseases depend upon a specific contagion, but the question of contagion has no necessary connexion with that of quarantine. The real question is, whether quarantine can prevent the extension of this class of diseases, whether by their nature, whether contagious or not. If it can, it is valuable beyond price; if it cannot, it is a barbarous incumbrance, impeding commerce, obstructing international intercourse, curbing life, and wasting large sums of the public money. There is no more reason why the controversy on contagion should complicate the question of quarantine, than why it should complicate the question of the special subject of the removable causes of disease: while fleets, armies, and cities are ravaged by fever, it is vain to occupy the attention of the public with speculations on contagion and infection, the important practical question being what are the true means of prevention? Still, however, as the question of contagion is intimately associated in the minds of many persons with that of quarantine, in this as well as in foreign countries, and as a popular belief in contagion, among other mischievous effects, increases the susceptibility to epidemic disease by the creation of panic, and involves moral and social consequences of great importance, the report exhibits a view of the general progress of medical and other opinions with reference to this question, details facts bearing on it, derived from the experience of the recent epidemic season; and brings together and condenses numerous facts recorded by eminent observers, both in Europe and India, with regard to the mode of propagation of cholera and plague.

Returning to the consideration of quarantine, it is argued in the report that if it be true, as ancient and modern authorities are agreed, that without the essential preliminary of an epidemic atmosphere on the spot foreign contagion is inert, and unless both conditions are present, quarantine, under any circumstances, must be useless; for, in the absence of an epidemic atmosphere, it must be useless, because then no disease will spread beyond the individual affected. And with the existence of an epidemic atmosphere quarantine is useless, because then the disease will spread wherever the infected atmosphere goes and finds favouring conditions; that, consequently, it must be futile to place vessels coming from infected countries in the position which they are capable of bringing with them an epidemic atmosphere, and unless quarantine can control such an atmosphere when imported. And, finally, that if—

"The great practical truth, taught by modern investigation and experience, be, that the only real security against any kind and degree of epidemic disease as an abundant and constant supply of pure air, the prevention of overcrowding, and the dispersion of the sick; and if, as is certainly agreed, confinement in a foul atmosphere can convert common fever into pestilence, and ventilation and dispersion can dissipate and extinguish, then quarantine must be not only useless but pernicious, since the invariable effect of quarantine as hitherto practised in all countries has been the congregation and confinement of the sick and those who, though not actually sick, are suspected to have in them the seeds of disease, requiring only a few days or hours for their development,—the congregation and confinement of such persons in a limited space, often in a filthy ship and an unhealthy locality, and under circumstances calculated to excite apprehension and alarm—conditions in the highest degree favourable to the generation and spread of disease: it follows that quarantine, instead of guarding against and preventing disease, is a contrivance for producing it, under conditions that can be devised for its general extension; and, therefore, must not only fail to accomplish its object, but to tend to produce the very calamity which it endeavours to prevent."

The report then proceeds to examine the manner in which quarantine deals with articles of commerce supposed to be capable of imbibing and transferring pestilential virus, the amount of security afforded by bills of health, the manner in which purification of infected articles, is performed at quarantine stations, the sufferings and cruelty inflicted on persons detained under quarantine regulations, the public inconveniences and losses occasioned by these regulations, and the modifications and relaxations proposed and partly carried out by Austria, France, and America. After entering into a minute investigation of the sanitary condition of the merchant ships of Great Britain, and the actual mortality among merchant seamen as presented by the marine register, and presenting an exposition of the principle of legislation recommended, namely, that of concentrating responsibility on those who have a direct interest in prevention, and who possess the best means of securing it, the report concludes as follow:

"Having carefully examined what appeared to be the best available evidence as to the facts on which the system of quarantine rests; having considered the report made by the Royal Academy of Medicine in France, and the written testimony of the most eminent professional and scientific observers and writers, as well in Austria and America as in England, we have now to report as our conclusions:

"That the chief pestilence in respect to which quarantine establishments have been kept up in this country, the Oriental plague, is, in its antecedent circumstances or causes, in the localities, causes, and conditions of the population attacked, and in its rise and progress, a disease of the same essential character as typhus, being, according to the most recent authorities who have had practical experience or the malady a form of that disease modified and rendered more intense by peculiarities of climate and of social condition.

That the notion of the propagation of the plague by means of goods appears from one uniform mass of evidence to be as entirely unfounded as the opinion which formerly prevailed in this country that typhus could be propagated in the same mode

"That the true danger of the propagation of plague is not by contact of the affected with the healthy, but by exposure on the part of susceptible subjects to an infected atmosphere, under the like conditions which are known to produce and propagate typhus fever in this country.

"That the quarantine establishments in this country and every other of which we have information, are wholly insufficient, even on the assumption on which they have hitherto been maintained, to prevent the introduction and spread of epidemic disease.

That these establishments are of a character to inflict on passengers extreme and unnecessary inconvenience, and to subject such of them as may be sick to increased suffering and danger, while they are productive of positive injury to the means of preventing the spread of disease

"That typhus and other dangerous epidemic diseases are frequent on board merchant seamen vessels at sea and in port, for which no effectual or suitable provision is at present made.

"That, as far as relates to the cases of epidemic diseases generated at sea, the principle of the concentrating of responsibility on the shippers, in making it their pecuniary interest to complete the voyage with healthy passengers, does more most effectually to the place where it has been applied, such as to emigrant transport, and convict ships, and should be extended to all such cases; and that, in respect to ships in port, the regulations applied to the prevention of the spread of epidemic diseases from houses in towns are applicable, and would practically be highly beneficial

"That the substitution of general sanitary regulations to ships in port, for the existing quarantine regulations, would be more effectually extinguish epidemic disease, and afford better protection to the uninfected on shipboard, whilst it would relieve passengers and crews from grievous inconvenience, abate the motives to concealment of sickness and to false representations as to its nature, greatly lessen commercial expenses, and remove obstructions to the free transit of goods and uninfected persons which the existing system of quarantine occasions

"It follows that we propose the entire discontinuance of the existing quarantine establishments in this country, and the substitution of sanitary regulations.

"By such substitution the most effectual security which the present state of knowledge affords would be taken against the importation of foreign contagion, the maintenance of infection, and the origin and spread of epidemic disease.

"The British Parliament has legislated on the conclusion, submitted with an accumulation of concurring evidence, that the causes of epidemic, endemic, and contagious diseases are removable, and that the neglect on the part of the constituted authorities to remove such causes, as far as they are obviously within their control, is a punishable offence. The foundation which the Legislature has thus laid for the physical, and consequently for the moral, improvement of the people, is recognised. Half a century ago it was said, by a great physician and philanthropist in terms already referred, that the time would come when the Legislature would punish communities for neglecting the known means of preserving the pub lic health, and that prediction the British Parliament has been the first to realise.

"To all natural evil," says Dr. Rush, 'the author of nature has kindly prepared an antidote. Intellectual fevers furnish no exception to this remark The means of preventing them are much within the power of human reason and industry as the means of preventing the evils of lightning and common fire. I am so satisfied of the truth of this opinion, that I look for the time when our courts of law shall punish cities and villages for permitting any of the sources of malignant fevers to exist within their jurisdiction.'

"We believe, from the information we have been able to obtain, that the immediate adoption of the changes which we now recommend would be attended with no diff culties or inconveniences commensurate with the advantages that would accrue from the removal of restrictions on the freedom of international communication, and the security of the public health.

"All which we humbly certify to your Majesty.

(Signed) "T. CARLISLE. EDWIN CHADWICK
ASHLEY. J. SOUTHWOOD SMITH."

REVIEW OF LOCAL PENSIONERS, AND DISTRIBUTION OF MEDALS.—The following corps of enrolled pensioners were reviewed in Hyde Park yesterday morning (Friday), at half-past ten o'clock A.M., by the Commander-in-Chief and staff, Major-General Sir Charles Dunbar Monpelier, Bart., K.C.B., Lieutenant-Colonel Tulloch, &c.:—1st Eastern London, commanded by Captain Holdron, above 3o strong; 2nd ditto, Capt. Wood, 1270; 1st Western division, Captain Orr, 960; 2nd ditto, Captain Campbell, 830; 1st Northern division, Captain Curtain, 1000; 2nd ditto, Captain Warde, 900; Southern division, Capt. Nott, 840; Woolwich division, Major Forbes, 960. The medals were distributed to the veterans accompanied by the Horse Guards.

MONEY ORDERS.—CAUTION.—Post-office money-orders issued during the month of March last, and not paid on or before this week, become lapsed orders, and cannot be paid without considerable trouble and expense.

THE ELECTRIC LIGHT.—On Wednesday evening last, Mr. Staite again exhibited to the public generally the unrivalled brilliance of the new light. His apparatus for this occasion was carried to the summit of one of the piers of Hungerford Suspension-bridge, that, consequently, the shore spectators could see the three the radiance of his magnificent discovery now along the bridge to the multitudes that assembled on the banks. The effects of the illumination, now upon the buildings which form Hungerford-market, and now upon the water from of Somerset-house, and upon Waterloo-bridge and the steamers passing up the river, had a most beautiful effect. The beam, it is said, could be beheld, RICH, for twelve miles distance. The apparatus was constructed by Messrs. Feuerstein, Yorkshire, sadlle.r. BELL, Worcester, draper. THE NEW REPTILE HOUSE

IN THE GARDENS OF THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY IN THE REGENT'S PARK

Will ultimately form one of the most instructive, as it is the most novel and original feature in this delightful institution. The collection already contained in it is so unexpectedly brilliant, considering the small number of reptiles previously exhibited in the Menagerie, that we cannot but anticipate the most important results in the study of this singularly interesting division of the animal kingdom. And it gives us sincere pleasure to observe that the numerous list of contributing correspondents in Africa, India, Singapore, Australia, South America, and the West Indies, recorded in the annual report of the Society, present the facilities for increasing this collection which it would be impossible to obtain by any other medium. Our Illustration will probably best convey to these gentlemen an idea of the place which the Society have ingeniously contrived to do honour to their donations, and reproduce, as far as can be done by artificial means, the natural conditions of reptilian existence.

The room itself is about 70 feet in length; and at the extremity, facing the entrance, is a structure, inclosed with plate-glass of great strength, in which are placed three enormous pythons, or boas, from Africa and Ceylon, the largest weighing, as we understand, about 70 lb. The height of this structure is not less than 11 feet from the ground, and therefore affords the most complete opportunity for considering a python in the peculiar beauty of its natural functions which has ever been presented in a state of captivity. On the left side of the spectator is a long range of similar houses, on a smaller scale, in which boas, serpents venomous and non-venomous, and lizards, appear in as healthy and vigorous a condition as if still inhabiting their native deserts and jungles; and with this difference, that, although a suitable temperature and situation have been prepared for them, they are almost entirely denied the means of concealment, which renders a true knowledge of their habits one of the most difficult attainments of the naturalist, who has had the rare advantage of penetrating into the solitudes which they almost exclusively select for their habitations.

There is no institution in the Metropolis so easily accessible, so instructive, and so productive of rational amusement as the menagerie of the Zoological Society; and it is particularly gratifying to reflect that this vast collection, stated in the annual report to amount to upwards of 1300 animals, has been amassed by a corporation of private individuals, without any assistance from the State, who, influenced solely by a desire to promote a taste for the beautiful and the good, have combined to explore the world for contributions to our knowledge of the most interesting works of the Creator.

One of the most gratifying features in the management of the Society's affairs is the increased facilities of access afforded to the public; and we regard it as most satisfactory ground of congratulation to the Fellows, that, notwithstanding the torrents of rain which fell on Monday last, nearly 3000 visitors were found among the holiday folks who availed themselves of the liberal terms on which the Gardens were opened on the first two days of the week.

STEAMERS' LIGHTS—TO PREVENT COLLISION.—ADMIRALTY, MAY 28.—By the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, &c. &c.—Whereas, under and by virtue of the Act of Parliament, passed in the tenth year of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled "An Act for the regulation of steam navigation, and for requiring sea-going vessels to carry boats," we hereby require, in pursuance of the said Act, that lights shall be exhibited by all steam-vessels, except in the river Thames, above Yantlett Creek, between sunset and sunrise, of such description and in such manner as hereinafter mentioned; that is to say: When under Weigh.—1. Bright white light at the foremast-head. 2. Green light on the starboard side. 3. Red light on the port side. When at anchor, a common bright light. The following conditions to be observed, viz.—1. The mast-head light to be visible at a distance of at least five miles in a clear dark night, and the lantern to be so constructed as to allow a uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of twenty points of the compass; viz. from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on each side of the ship.—2. The coloured side-lights to be visible at a distance of at least two miles in a clear dark night, and the lanterns to be so constructed as to show a uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass; viz. from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on their respective sides.—3. The side-lights to be, moreover, fitted with inboard screens, of at least three feet long, to prevent them from being seen across the bow. The screens to be placed in a fore and aft line with the inner edge of the side-lights.—4. The lantern used when at anchor to be so constructed as to show a good light all round the horizon.—Diagrams, illustrative of the above plan, and instructions as to the proper mode of fitting the lights on board steam-vessels, will be furnished to parties applying for them.—Gazette.

ARMY WAR MEDALS, AND RELATIVES OF CLAIMANTS.—By the general order issued from the Horse Guards, No. 689, it appears that, out of the 29,369 qualified claimants for war medals there are still many outstanding, which have not yet been sent forward. The time allowed for these claims to be made extends to the 1st of May, 1850, after which no application will be taken into consideration. A circular for regulating the distribution of medals awarded to out-pensioners now deceased, has been issued to all staff-officers of pensioners for their guidance, and is now being acted on. They are to be given to—1. the widow; 2, the eldest son living; 3, the eldest daughter living; 4, the father; 5, the mother; 6, the eldest brother living; 7, the eldest sister living—whenever the requisite relationship to the deceased has been established to their satisfaction; but in cases where that relationship may be doubtful, or where the degree of propinquity is beyond what has been provided for, it will be necessary for the parties to address their claims to the War Office.

MILITARY UNIFORM.—We understand that it is in contemplation to introduce a change in the summer trowsers, and that the shade of colour will be assimilated to the Oxford mixture of cloth trowsers. This has been rendered necessary by the difficulty in preserving uniformity in a regiment, but this alteration will be confined to the colour, and will not be extended to the material, which will, we believe, be adhered to. It is, however, not probable that any orders upon this subject will be issued during the present season.

CHOLERA IN DUBLIN GARRISON.—Cholera, though not to any great extent, has broken out among the troops stationed in Ship-street Barracks adjoining the Castle-yard. The situation of the buildings is close and unwholesome. The 2nd, the Queen's Regiment of Foot, which occupied the barracks when the disease appeared, were, on Tuesday last, placed under canvass, a camp having been formed in Phœnix Park.

RARE FISH EXHIBITED AT THE COSMORAMA, REGENT-STREET.

ANNEXED is the "presentment" of the rare fish caught off Cullercoats on March 26, and exhibited for a short time at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, previously to its being brought to our hive of wonders, the metropolis. It proves to be a fine specimen of the Regalecus Glesne, of the family of Taeniodæ, or Ribbon fishes, so named from their flat form. They are ground fish, and rarely rise to the surface of the sea; hence the infrequency of their capture, and the size to which they grow is a matter of conjecture. This has given rise to another conjecture that a large species of the genus is identical with the Sea Serpent; "particularly," say those who advance this idea, "as its crested head, sinuous movement, and long thin form, favour the supposition." The fish, when taken, was "as bright and shining as the newest silver;" but, after its death, the beautiful iridescence left it. It was taken on the following day to Newcastle, where it was purchased by its present proprietor, Mr. Edward Whitfield.

Shortly after the capture of the fish it was examined by Mr. Albany Hancock and Dr. Dennis Embleton, who communicated the result of their investigations in a paper read to the Tynside Naturalists' Field Club, on April 21, from which we select a few leading details.

"The colour was a uniform silvery gray, resembling bright tin-foil or white Dutch metal, except a few irregular dark spots and streaks towards the anterior part of the body. On a closer inspection, a bright iridescence was seen about the pectoral fin and head, the blue tint predominating. Its form presented somewhat the appearance of a two-edged sword-blade, being excessively compressed. Its greatest thickness is nearer the ventral than the dorsal border: from the flank part it slopes gradually to each border, the dorsal being the sharpest. The length of the fish is 12 feet 3 inches, the mouth not being projected forward. Immediately behind the gills it measures 8¾ inches in depth; from this point it gradually enlarges to a distance of upwards of 2 feet further back, where it attains its greatest depth, of 11¾ inches. This dimension remains mostly the same for 1¼ feet beyond; it then gradually, but perceptibly, diminishes to the end of the dorsal fin, where the depth is 3 inches. Its thickness through the head at the gill-covers is 3 inches, at the thickest part 3¾ inches, at the end of the dorsal fin ¾ of an inch.

"On the side of the body there are several narrow, blackish, slightly waved lines, considerably apart from each other. Interspersed along these lines are a few irregular spots of the same hue towards the head, which is small and short, measuring 9 inches from the snout to the posterior margin of the gill-cover. The dorsal fin extends the whole length of the back to within 3 inches of the end of the fish. The anterior part of this fin, more prominent than the rest, is composed of twelve rays, which were stated by the captors to have been 12 or 14 inches in length when the fish was taken, and each was furnished with a membranous expansion on its posterior edge, increasing in width upwards. There is no caudal fin. The pectoral fins are placed close behind the gill-covers; they are colourless, deficient, subtriangular, the longest rays measuring 2 inches. They are eleven in number, and much arched. The ventral fins are represented by a pair of very strong and straight spines, stated by the fishermen to have been 7 or 8 inches long, and as if broken at the end, having a delicate membrane about half an inch broad. These spines incline backwards, and are capable of a lateral and backward motion. A gentleman, who was present when the fish was landed, said that these spines were bright crimson, resembling the feelers of a boiled lobster. The whole fish is remarkably delicate and tender, and easily broken; the flesh is white and fine."

THE RARE FISH (REGALECUS GLESNE), AT THE COSMORAMA.

We quote these particulars from a very interesting account of the Fish, which is sold at the place of exhibition. It contains, also, a letter from Mr. Yarrell, describing a similar fish, which was cast ashore alive at the village of Crovie, near Macduff, in March, 1844. Added to this is a communication from Mr. J. E. Gray, of the British Museum, detailing the history of the former occurrence of the Regalecus in this country, with instances of which appear to have escaped the researches of British naturalists.

As we have mentioned the Sea Serpent, we may here notice that "an Essay on the credibility of the Kraken, Sea Serpent, and other Sea Monsters," has just been published by Messrs. Tegg and Co., of Cheapside; and a very attractive remand it proves of the whole question.

Our friends across the Atlantic are likewise again stirring in the matter; and a prospectus has been issued for publishing the "Sea Serpent Book," to give all the information, ancient and modern authority, important facts, history and testimony, on the subject of the Sea Serpent and the Kraken; also a story of a Sea Serpent in poetical prose, giving the most exact account of his life, habits, disposition, manners, together with amusing traditions, interesting anecdotes, &c., both entertaining and useful to those at sea or ashore.

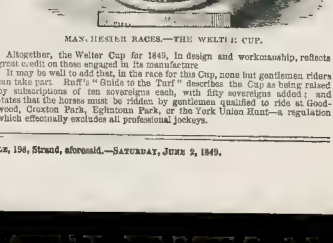
THE WELTER CUP.

THE Welter Cup, run for on the second day of the Manchester Whitsuntide Meeting (Thursday, the 31st ult.), has been designed and manufactured by Mr. H. Simmons, silversmith, St. Ann's-square. It is a noble silver vessel, moulded in the form of the Warwick Vase; is 15 inches high, and 14½ inches in diameter and of the value of one hundred sovereigns.

The pedestal of the Vase is of a conical shape, formed of dock leaves in burnished work, the stems being uppermost; and the lower and broader part of the leaves, which is gracefully curled upwards and inwards, resting on a foot composed of a moulding and plinth of burnished silver. The lower part of the bowl of the Cup is surmounted with a deep belt of the foliage of the vine, with clusters of grapes worked in frosted silver; from behind which rise eight heads of wild horses in full relief, in pairs, dos-à-dos. The border of the cup is covered with the leaves and blossoms of the orange and myrtle intertwined, in chased and burnished silver. The cover is a dome, with two ogee sweeps, the lower of which is ornamented with oak leaves and acorns in bold relief. The handles are tastefully formed of the stem of the vine; and the vase is surmounted by the figure of a wild horse, about four inches high, standing on a field of frosted silver, the figure appearing full of spirit and animation. Internally, the Cup is richly gilt; it weighs about 160 ounces, and will hold about six quarts. On its upper part is engraved, "Manchester Meeting, 1849. The Welter Cup; won by ——," blanks being left for the name of the winning horse and its fortunate owner.



MANCHESTER RACES.—THE WELTER CUP.

Altogether, the Welter Cup for 1849, in design and workmanship, reflects great credit on those engaged in its manufacture.

It may be well to add that, in the race for the Cup, none but gentlemen riders can take part. Ruff's "Guide to the Turf" describes the Cup as being raised by subscriptions of ten sovereigns each, with fifty sovereigns added; and states that the horses must be ridden by gentlemen qualified to ride at Goodwood, Croxton Park, Eglinton Park, or the York Union Hunt—a regulation which effectually excludes all professional jockeys.

CONTINENTAL ANTAGONISMS.

To form an accurate idea of the progress of events in Continental Europe, the student of contemporary history should look upon the various revolutions now operating—not as many but as one. The movement of our time, multiform as its manifestations may appear, s but the action of one internal force; and the results only differ in different countries because the resistance within them happens to be greater or less. It is a melancholy fact that constitutional freedom was never yet peaceably acquired in any country. All the nations that are in the enjoyment of free institutions have, at one time or another, gone through the fiery ordeal of violent revolution to acquire them; and all those nations that are yet in the throes of revolution have not only to blame the despotism and misgovernment of past ages, but their own ignorance of the liberty they desire, and of the true bases on which it should be founded, for the evils and the sufferings which they at present endure. The only states of Europe which are at this moment undisturbed are such free states as have gone through the probationary period, and have the good sense not to risk the real and tangible benefits which they have thereby acquired in search of impossible perfection; and those ultra-despotic states in which the time is not ripe for the effort.

In the first class are Great Britain, Belgium, Holland, and Sweden; in the second is Russia. Revolution has been rendered unnecessary in the first-mentioned by their past sacrifices, and by the timely concession of their rulers to all the reasonable and just demands of the intelligent people; while, in the case of the second, the masses are in the very infancy of their political education, and have neither the strength nor the knowledge for any vigorous or wise effort to procure for themselves the privileges of responsible government. The first have passed through the troublous period of their history; the second has that period yet before it. All the rest of Europe is involved more or less actively in the struggle of principles, represented by constitutionalism on the one side, and by despotism on the other. We see, wherever we turn, that these are the great, if not the only, combatants. In Italy the conflict is between the many, who desire—though they scarcely understand—true liberty; and the governing few, who deny it. In France the conflict is in reality between those who enjoy as much liberty as their own national character will allow either to themselves or to others; and the tyranny of a mob which is either ignorant or half-informed, and which in both cases is unruly and unreasonable, and seeks to establish a despotism more horrible than that which any autocrat would dare to practise. In Hungary the struggle is one of races as well as of principles; more aristocratic, in its outward form, than that which is taking place elsewhere; but, in its inner spirit, identical with it. In Germany we see the same battle, though the circumstances differ. Many of the smaller German States were in the enjoyment of as much true liberty as could be desired by any people, however sober and intelligent; but they rushed into the hot career of revolution at the command of that spirit of nationality which it has hitherto been the policy of the despotic States to destroy, and which the Prussian Monarch—not for love of the cause, but with designs of self-aggrandisement—undertook to foster. Germany, existing as an aggregate of two large, powerful, and despotic States, and several weak, small, and free Governments, was, in reality, "a thing of shreds and patches," at war with itself, and in antagonism no less with the generous aspirations of its young blood, than with the cooler judgment of its more experienced and sagacious citizens. Whatever might be the individual liberty of the smaller States, Germany, as a whole, existed in Europe as an absolutist Power. If it were not absolutist, it was nothing in the European Commonwealth; so that, free as portions of it might be considered in their internal relations, it existed, externally, in a form that was obnoxious to the best among its own people, and to the other States of Europe which took the lead in material, as well as in moral and intellectual progress.

The present position of affairs in all these countries is anything but encouraging to the hope that the great upheaving of the social elements that has occurred will speedily or peaceably subside. The passions excited are so fierce that we can scarcely expect a disentanglement of the European knot until the various parties to the quarrel have learned, by a new and more bitter experience than they have yet acquired, how impotent is physical violence to settle any questions that have been raised by the intellect. On the one hand is France, pursuing a policy, of which the end, if not the object, is a European war; and on the other is Russia, who, having committed a grievous wrong in the partition of Poland, dares not keep herself to herself lest her ill-gotten possessions should slip from her grasp. Germany, Hungary, and Italy, if left to themselves, might severally find the means of arranging their affairs, and of establishing themselves as constitutional states; but neither revolutionized France nor unrevolutionized Russia can keep out of the quarrel. France, in pursuance of a policy of which one of the objects is "influence" in Italy, and in obedience to an abominable thirst for military supremacy and renown, which Napoleon made a passion with a vain and excitable people, among whom, generally, the men are idle and the women industrious, must needs thrust herself into the Italian difficulty. The result in that portion of Europe is "confusion worse confounded." Russia, that cannot afford to be honest in the matter of Poland, has been but too happy to aid the tottering empire of Austria in the subjugation of the Hungarians, whose independence must lead, as a necessary consequence, to that of the Poles. Hence, also, have occurred complication upon complication, and evil upon evil. The defeat of the Hungarians will be not merely the conquest of that people, and the postponement to a future day of a consummation that must eventually be brought about, but the restoration for a time (though for a time only) of the now all but defunct absolutism of Germany and Italy.

The accredited representatives of the warring principles of modern Europe are thus seen to be Russia and France. Russia, in the important movement which she has made to the assistance of Austria, has acted in strict conformity with her history, her present condition, and her principles. France, on the contrary, in the movement she has made in Italy, has departed from every principle which should have inspired and guided her. Her true policy was non-interference; and, if she determined to depart from it, the least hazardous departure would have been to support the Italian Republicans. From that false position France must by some means or other extricate herself. The most honourable way would be to order the French army at Paolo and Civita Vecchia back again to Toulon: the next most honourable would be to confess tacitly the error that has been committed, and to place the services of Marshal Oudinot at the command of the Italian Constitutionalists. This, it is true, would amount to a declaration of war against Austria; but, if France finds fighting a social as well as a political necessity, she must either fight upon the side of which her name is the synonym, or pay the penalty of a new revolution or a civil war. This is a fact which M. Odilion Barrot and Louis Napoleon should have known, and the knowledge of which should have kept them out of Italy. Look where we will, the political clouds are thunder-charged. Capacity combined with honesty does not seem to be found in the councils of any of the great powers of Continental Europe that are involved, directly or indirectly, in the struggle. Russia and Austria, it is true, pursue a straightforward and intelligible course. They wish to preserve what they have got. But, if the capacity of Russia be granted, it must be at the expense of her honesty; and if the honesty of Austria be conceded, it must be admitted that capacity is singularly wanting in her councils. But France and Prussia pursue a tortuous policy, and are governed by motives of ambition which do not sway the other two powers. They do not simply wish to retain what they have got, but to grasp what they have not got; and their selfishness is, to our thinking, far more atrocious than any that has been exhibited or betrayed by Russia. Had Austria not been weakened and deprived of support by the selfish intrigues and personal ambition of the King of Prussia, the aid of Russia might not have been necessary to save her from disruption; and, had France left the Romans to imitate a French example, and choose freely their own form of Government, the Italian difficulty would not have been exasperated to such a degree as to force Austria, threatened on all sides, into the dangerous embraces of her too-powerful ally at St. Petersburgh. Austria is indeed in a hapless condition. She seems destined to bear the brunt of all the battles of our time. If she be not blotted out of the map of Europe, it will be solely owing to the intervention of the Emperor Nicholas. Menaced by the King of Prussia, by the party of United Germany, and by the Republicans, on one side; by the Hungarians on another; and by the Italians, on a third, the Emperor is surrounded with enemies, and is reduced to the luckless extremity of relying upon a friend, whose friendship may be ultimately as fatal as his worst malice of his enemies.

But whatever may be the fate of the Austrian Empire, and whatever may be the result of the partial war—too likely to become general—that is now devastating the fairest portions of Europe, we cannot believe that the ultimate issue will be the re-establishment of Absolutism in any country where it has been challenged or combated by recent events. Governments like those which existed in Prussia and Austria before the Revolutions of 1848, and as that which exists in Russia at the present moment, are not compatible with the civilization to which Europe has attained. It may be long before the right system be established, safe from the tyranny of Kings, and from the worse tyranny of ignorant mobs; but we will not permit ourselves to doubt, that, sooner or later, through all the price of tears and blood, continental Europe will attain the rational freedom which makes nations great, and which, combined with virtue and religion, can alone make them happy.

SURRENDER OF THE SIKHS.

We have been favoured by Ensign Byers, of the 70th Regiment of Native Infantry, with Gen Sir R. W. Gilbert, beyond the Jhelum, with the accompanying Sketch of one of the most interesting scenes of which he has been a witness during the recent campaign. It represents the Goorgharahs (Avitable's Dragoons) delivering up their arms to Gen. Sir W. R. Gilbert, on the 14th of March, at Rawul Pindee. It appears that Rejah Shere Sing made over his guns to the British on the 11th, and on the two subsequent days large bodies of his infantry came in, and laid down their arms; but the 14th was the day agreed on for the Goorgharahs to come in and make their submission; and, accordingly, the British troops moved up to Rawul Pindee on the above morning.

A deep nullah separated the two forces, and this place was selected as the spot on which the surrender should be made; the 70th Regiment, Native Infantry, being ordered down to the banks of the nullah to receive charge of the arms. Shere Singh rode at the head of his men, and took up his position close to Captain Nicolson, where he remained during the greater part of the day.

In the Sketch are represented the Sikh cavalry pouring down through the narrow road, and throwing down their arms, as they successively pass the heap in the foreground. On the opposite bank, General Sir R. W. Gilbert, mounted on an orderly trooper of irregular cavalry, is watching the Sikhs as they pass. In the left-hand corner of the Sketch is Captain Nicolson, with Shere Singh, one of his followers, and an officer of the 14th Dragoons. The right-hand ground shows an officer of Irregular Cavalry, one of the 60th Rifles, and three of our Infantry officers. The sentries are sepoys of the 70th Regiment, Native Infantry.

The whole was a very impressive scene, relieved by the variety of the uniforms: the Goorgharahs in their red coats, with yellow facings, white turbans, and trousers; the enveloping waite silk costume of Shere Singh; the green and silver, and silver helmets with cat jaguar plumes, of the Irregular Cavalry; the red and blue, and the white wadded helmets, of the other infantry officers; the red and blue of the Sepoys; and the green of the Rifles officer—formed an imposing picture of this formal step to the annexation of the Punjaub to the British dominions in India.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

REVIEW OF THE SECOND LIFE GUARDS IN WINDSOR PARK.—The Marquis of Londonderry, K.G., Colonel of the Second Life Guards, reviewed that fine troop in Windsor Park on Monday, in the presence of a very numerous staff of officers, and many other personages of distinction. The troop of Marquis of Londonderry came on to the ground in an open carriage, drawn by four grey horses, and preceded by outriders. Among the leading personages present were the Marquis of Stafford, Viscount and Viscountess Seaham, Viscount and Viscountess Nevill, Lord Adolphus Vane, Lord John Manners, Sir Watkyn Williams Wynn, &c. After the review the officers of the regiment gave a grand banquet, at which the Marchioness of Londonderry and a circle of about fifty ladies and gentlemen sat a superb déjeûner, which was served in the Cavalry Barracks at Spitis. Among the [illegible] and place with which the table was decorated was a superb temporal in every elegant design, presented to the corps by Captain Blane on his retirement, a short time since. In the evening, after the Eton regatta, a ball took place in the barracks, which was honoured with the presence of Lady Londonderry and several other distinguished personages.

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN'S EXPEDITION.—The United States government are taking steps to equip an expedition in search of Sir John Franklin. Captain Wilkes, who is to have the command of one of the ships, [illegible] would sail from this winter, to make any effort in the Arctic Ocean in search of Sir John Franklin, and that for the Navy Department to lend one steamer vessel from the western coast of America to notify to the whale ships that they would be on the look-out. He adds, that "what is now required is a speedy exploration of the Wellington Channel. The distance from our (the American) shores is not greater than that to Europe, and the voyage may be readily performed in forty-five days. If vessels were now fitted, they would be in time for the season, which opens about the middle of July, and would be able to explore this channel thoroughly in its furthest extent or navigable point, and, if not to succour, they will ascertain whether Sir John Franklin had taken that route, and return safely back before winter with tidings."

At the festival of the United Law Clerks' Society, to be held at the Freemasons' Tavern, on Tuesday, the 19th instant, the Lord Chief Baron has consented to preside.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The new Legislative Assembly assumed its complete organization on Saturday last, when M. Dupin, sen. (the friend of the ex-King Louis Philippe), who has been elected to the office of the Assembly, entered for the first time on his duties as President; and the secretaries and other officers of the Chamber also replaced those who had discharged their functions provisionally. In the course of the sitting, on the same day, M. O. Barrot read the following as the list of the reconstructed ministry:

M. Odillon Barrot. Justice and President of the Council.
M. Passy—Finances.
M. de Falloux—Public Instruction.
[illegible]
M. [illegible] Marine.
M. [illegible] Public Works.

The above, it will be seen, were all members of the late Cabinet. The new Ministers are—

M. Dufaure—Interior (in the place of M. Léon Faucher).
M. de Tocqueville—Foreign Affairs (in the place of M. Drouyn le Phuys).
M. Lanjuinais—Agriculture and Commerce (in place of M. [illegible]fet).

The political alteration thus effected is inconsiderable.

In the early part of the week it was expected that the message of the President of the Republic to the new Legislative Chamber would be delivered on Wednesday at the farthest, and much disappointment was generally expressed, both in and out of the Chamber, at the delay. The necessity, however, of carefully weighing every sentence in the important state paper, which rivals in [illegible] of the Presidents of the United States to Congress, and [illegible] Napoleon, whose own production it is generally understood to be, naturally felt to deliver on this important occasion, so novel and unprecedented, both for himself and for France, as statesmanlike a document as possible, these two causes combined to retard its publication until Thursday. The message is a resumé of the past, present, and future administration of the French Republic. Its general tone and character is pacific and re-assuring, but its extreme length precludes our giving more than an extract respecting the all-absorbing question of the moment—Rome.

"For two years we had been accustomed to see the Holy See occupied by a Pontiff who took the lead in useful reforms, and whose name reached, in hymns of gratitude, from one end of Italy to the other, was the very symbol of liberty, and the guerdon of Italian aspirations. All at once we learnt with amazement that the Sovereign in question, but yesterday the idol of his people, had been compelled to fly in disguise from his capital.

"Accordingly, the act of aggression which forced Pius IX. to quit Rome, seemed, in the eyes of Europe, to be rather the work of a conspiracy than the spontaneous movement of his subjects, who could not surely have passed in a moment from sentiments of the exalted order to deeds of the basest ingratitude. The Catholic Powers sent Ministers to Gaëta to watch over the grave interests of the Papacy. It was necessary that France, too, should be represented there. She listened to all that was said, without, however, fettering her ultimate actions; but, after the defeat of Novara, the negotiations assumed a more definite aspect. Austria, in concert with Naples, and at the invitation of his Holiness, notified to the French Government that it must choose its course, for that the Powers had resolved to march on Rome, for the purpose of re-establishing, purely and simply, the authority of the Pope.

"Forced to an explanation, there are but three courses to choose from. First, to resist by force of arms all attempts at intervention by others, but that course would have involved a rupture with all Catholic Europe—a course merely for the sake of the Roman Republic, which, by the way, we had never recognised.

"Second, to allow the three coalesced Powers to restore the Papal authority without any restriction, and according to their good notion or good pleasure. Or, lastly, to exercise for ourselves a direct and independent action.

"The Government of the Republic preferred the last course."

The service for the repose of the soul of the Empress Josephine, in the Church of Rueil, was celebrated on Monday, as in former years. The village was filled at an early hour by people flowing in every minute from Paris and all the surrounding country. The church was soon completely crowded. In the nave were ranged the National Guard of Rueil, and a battalion of the 2d Regiment of the Line; and in the two side aisles the bands of the two corps played alternately pieces of sacred music appropriate to the occasion. In the choir and the chapels at each side of it were a number of persons known for their attachment to the deceased, the Emperor Napoleon, and their families. Among them were the Orderly Officers of the President of the Republic; the son of General Lepic, of the Old Guard; M. Lailly, author of the pamphlet condemned by the Chamber of Peers; Dr. Conneau, the friend of Louis Napoleon; the Prefect of the Seine-et-Oise; many old soldiers of the Empire, and persons who had been in the household of the Emperor and Empress, and Queen Hortense. With them, Archbishop, who received the last sigh of the Empress Josephine. The President of the Republic was expected, but was prevented from attending by affairs of state; but he sent several of his carriages. He, however, had gone on the preceding evening to pray at the tomb of the Empress.

The great heat of the weather at the close of the last and the commencement of the present week occasioned a considerable increase of mortality among the cholera patients in Paris. The number of deaths recorded rather exceeds that to a greater amount than on the same hour since the commencement of the malady. On that day there were 208 new cases in the hospitals, and 119 deaths. The Hôtel Dieu alone received 94 on that and the two preceding days, and the Salpetrière 44; and in the neighbourhood of Paris, and particularly at the Batignolles, the malady was very severe. In the military hospitals also an augmentation was perceptible, but not in the same proportion as in the civil ones. The whole number of patients in the various hospitals since the commencement of the epidemic exceed 7000.

M. Proudhon was arrested in Paris on Tuesday evening, at eight o'clock, by a police agent, immediately on his alighting at the station by the Northern Railway from Belgium.

M. Lesseps, who had been sent to Rome to negotiate a peaceable solution of the difficult question of the French intervention in the affairs of the Romans, returned to Paris on Saturday last. He was received in audience by M. Odillon Barrot, his having become deranged while in the Eternal City, but it has proved to be totally unfounded. When he left, on the 1st inst., the French troops had not recommenced hostilities.

The great national expedition of the products of French manufacture was opened on Monday.

ITALIAN STATES.

PIEDMONT.—A Royal decree was published on the 2d instant, granting a full and entire amnesty for all political offences committed in the island of Sardinia up to that day.

VENICE.—The Austrians press their siege of Venice closer and closer every day, and keep up a ceaseless bombardment. It is feared it cannot hold out. Accounts through the operations to person.

ROME. Up to the 1st inst. matters remained in statu quo. The French troops, now amounting to 30,000 men of all arms, have removed to a higher and healthier locality. Facilities were to be recommenced by General Oudinot, of the second French negotiator, who had arrived, should prove as unsuccessful as M. Lesseps.

DENMARK AND THE DUCHIES

Hostilities have been for the last ten or twelve days suspended, but the fortress of Frederica continues to be still invested by the Holstein troops, who pour in shot and shell from their batteries to the great destruction of life and property.

The latest accounts, old Hamburgh, state that the Danish blockade is now rigidly enforced. Negotiations were evidently proceeding, but nothing was known as to the terms intended to be proposed. In the meantime the hostile armies were actively engaged in obtaining reinforcements, and so disposing their troops as to be prepared for immediate battle.

GERMAN STATES.

FRANKFORT. The President and officials of the National Assembly of Frankfort have published an invitation to the members of the Assembly to meet at Stuttgardt on the 6th.

BADEN AND BAVARIA.—Within the last week engagements have taken place at Fürth, Hambrech, and other places, between the troops of the Central Government and those of the Provisional Government of Baden. In all these affairs the former were successful.

The insurrectionary Governments of the Palatinate of Bavaria and Baden have nominated a central committee, consisting of three persons, for the direction of the military, financial, and political affairs of the two countries.

PRUSSIA.

The Plenipotentiaries of Prussia, Hanover, and Saxony, who have for some time past been engaged at Berlin in framing a Constitution for the German Empire, to supersede that which had been brought into the Frankfort Constituent Assembly, have published the draft of the Constitution upon which they have agreed.

The document is of great length. It is merely styled "Project of a Constitution," as drawn up by the Governments of Prussia, Saxony, and Hanover, and is offered to the people for the purpose of being examined and adopted (subject to alterations) by the new National Assembly, which is to be convoked at the [illegible] of August. Neither Austria nor Bavaria have as yet given in their adhesion; but hopes are entertained that Bavaria will join Prussia, and the position which that kingdom will occupy as the leading power in the projected Constitution, is accordingly reserved. The following are some of the most important paragraphs of the new Constitution:—

"The relative position of Austria and the new German Empire are to be subsequently arranged.

"At the head of the new Empire shall be a Curator, or Lieutenant of the Empire, assisted by a College of Princes. The dignity of Reichsverweser is inseparable from the house of Hohenzollern (Prussia).

"A College of Princes, Prussia included, is composed of six votes, of which Prussia and Bavaria each form one, while the other four are divided among the collective votes.

"In case the Reichsverweser is unable to act his part, the King of Bavaria shall take his place.

"The College of Princes passes its decrees by absolute majority. The Reichsverweser has [illegible] votes. Every German is responsible [illegible] spend [illegible] tor at the age of twenty-five [illegible] elected [illegible] These [illegible] in the order of the communal section of the Rhenish province.

In many respects the constitution is similar to that of Frankfort.

The King of Saxony has announced his acceptance of this Federal Constitution, reserving to the Chambers the right of confirming it; his Majesty having, it was understood, been induced to join the Confederation on condition of receiving active aid from Prussia in suppressing the rebellion in the Palatinate, as it did in Dresden.

The Governments of Prussia, Saxony, and Hanover have also established a Provisional Court of the Confederation for the judicial decision of all questions that may arise before the final settlement of the Constitution between the Powers who are parties to it. This High Court of Arbitration is to consist of Imperial Judges, of whom Prussia appoints three, Saxony two, and Hanover two. The Court is to hold its sittings at Erfurt, and the Presidency is to be filled by the oldest of the members appointed by Prussia.

AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY.

In the Hungarian Republican Parliament at Debreczen, on the 14th of May, the Speaker intimated to the house that M. Ludvig Kossuth, having been appointed to the office of the First Magistrate of Hungary, was ready to take the necessary oaths. Ludvig Kossuth, then, as Governor of Hungary, was sworn to maintain the independence of the nation, and to enforce obedience to the laws. The several Ministers afterwards took the oaths of allegiance. Every preparation that action can suggest is being made to resist the Russian invasion.

In the Imperial Army Baron Welden is replaced as commander-in-chief of the Austrian army in Hungary by Gen. Haynau. Baron Welden returns to Vienna as Governor.

The Magyar army is very effective one. According to a report of Mr. Mészaros (late Minister of War), it amounts, including the five corps, to [illegible] garded troops. To these will be added the 10,000 fresh levies which the Debreczen Parliament lately voted. These troops are divided in 11 corps, and commanded by the following Generals:—Bem, a Pole; Gorgey, a Hungarian; Damianich, a Croat; Perczel, a Hungarian; Guyon, an Irishman; Klapka, a Hazi; Dandenbach, an Hungarian from St. Miklos; Ga-par, a Szekale; Vetter, an Hungarian; and Aulich, a German. Their cavalry consists of 27 regiments of regulars, each of 2000 to 2400 men, and of 40,000 irregulars. They have 400 pieces of artillery, most of which are 12 and 18-pounders.

Serious engagements of a minor character had taken place with the Russians and Austrians, in which the Hungarians are reported to have had the advantage.

UNITED STATES.

Accounts to the 22nd ult. from New York have been received during the week. They contain no further intelligence of any interest relative to the late disastrous riot at the Astor-place Opera House. Mr. Macready has arrived by the steamer Hibernia, which brought the mails. Previously to his departure from Boston he gave 1000 dollars to be distributed amongst the families whose members fell in the affray.

The fine commercial city of New Orleans is threatened with almost entire destruction by the overflowing of the river. When the last despatches left (on the 3rd ult.) the water was rising at the rate of 2½ inches per hour, which protects it from the inundations of the Mississippi, the inhabitants were fast leaving, and the greater part of the city was submerged.

In the part of Saint Louis, the capital of the south-west, has fared almost, if not altogether, as disastrously, but from a different element. On the 18th ult. a fire broke out, which consumed its ravages until 20 steamers and 418 houses were burned, and property destroyed to the amount of 6,000,000 dollars.

The steamer Empire was sunk by collision, on the Hudson river, about 80 miles above New York, on the 17th ult. Twenty lives were lost.

Other accidents still rages in different parts of the Union. General Worth has fallen a victim to its ravages.

CANADA.

Tranquillity is undisturbed in Canada: the different parties seem determined to let matters remain as they are at present. Further advices are received from the mother country.

WEST INDIES.

Intelligence to the 8th of May has reached us from Jamaica. Political affairs remained unaltered, and trade was exceedingly dull.

The weather at Antigua had been very dry, and the agriculture, in consequence, was suffering severely. The crops were not to some extent in danger. There had, however, been a favourable change during the preceding ten days.

Colonial affairs at Demerara continued in abeyance. The Combined Court had been again adjourned sine die, by Mr. Barkly, after another warm contest. The weather was favourable, and the markets were all more or less du.)

At St. Vincent rain had in some districts retarded the sugar-making; but generally the weather was very favourable, the canes yielding well both in quality and quantity.

At St. Vincent and Dominica retrenchment in the local expenditure was to be effected by a reduction of as arres.

The advices from Port-au-Prince represent affairs in the island of Hayti to be very bad. Former reports as to the feeling of Soulouque towards the white population are confirmed, and the prospect of His overthrow was looked forward to with great anxiety.

The Royal Gazette of Demerara states, on the authority of the Governor of Venezuela, that an important discovery of mines of gold had been made in the district of Upata, on the river Caroni, in the province of Guiana. The exact spot is said to be in the mountains near to the Cayenne river, which intersects a portion of British Guiana.

Accounts from the West India islands, the sugar crops showed an increase of production over that of last year.

INDIA.

Advices anticipatory of the Overland Mail were received in London on Monday. The dates are, Bombay, May 1; Calcutta, April 16. The intelligence thus brought is not of any particular interest.

Her Highness Ranee Chunda, mother of Dhuleep Singh, ex-Maharajah of Lahore, had received her escape from the fortress of Chunar. By the last accounts a court of inquiry was sitting at Benares to investigate the affair, and it was hoped some clue would be found to the Ranee's place of retreat.

Sir C. Napier sailed from Simla for Calcutta on the 12th of April—the news of the pacification of the Punjaub, which reached him on his way, having determined him to proceed amongst military men to the Supreme Government, instead of visiting Bombay, and moving thence upwards to the frontier. The appointment of the "Hero of Meanee" as Commander-in-Chief in India has proved extremely popular amongst military men; it is felt that he will not introduce reforms, and that he comes out under circumstances which afford him abundant power to effect them.

As to the arrangements for the future Government of the Punjaub, it was generally understood that there was to be no increase of the regular army, but that ten regiments of Irregulars, half cavalry and half infantry, were to be raised—a part of the men were to be Sikhs who had never borne arms against us, and the remainder Mussulmans and Poorbees.

The civil administration of the country is to be entrusted to a Board of Administration, consisting of a President, two members, and a secretary, five commissioners, together with several deputy and assistant commissioners. The total cost for salaries of the Board, the "Commissioners," their "Deputies" and "Assistants," is estimated at between £9000 and £7000 per month.

Major-General Gilbert was at Attock on the 8th of April, and arrived at Rawul Pindee, with Brigadier Campbell, on the 10th. This latter place, it is said, promises to be "one of the finest stations in India. It is 2000 feet above the level of the sea, and everything is abundant and cheap. The General resumed his march for Lahore on the 11th, and was expected at Jhelum on the 16th, the Brigadier remaining to assume command of the new district committed to his charge.

The force at Peshawur had moved to the Sikh cantonments on the west side of the city.

It is stated that the guns taken from the Sikhs during the recent campaigns are to be conveyed in triumph from Peshawur to Calcutta, and that, notwithstanding the list of the season, a whole regiment of native infantry will accompany these trophies on their progress.

Both the Governor-General and the Commander-in-Chief are at Simla.

THE CHOLERA AT PLYMOUTH.—This dreadful malady has made its appearance in the vicinity of Plymouth. On Tuesday last the American packet-ship American Eagle, from London and Portsmouth, arrived at Plymouth with several cases of cholera on board, and the cholera made its appearance the same evening. Nineteen deaths are reported to have taken place. The disease is also reported to have made its appearance at the little fishing town of Newton Ferrers, about [illegible] miles from Plymouth. Every measure or precaution has been taken by the proper authorities.

SHORT PARLIAMENTS.—The following is a copy of Mr. D'Eyncourt's bill for shortening the duration of Parliaments:—"Whereas it is expedient to shorten the term during which Parliaments may now by law have continuance: Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that an act passed in the first year of the reign of King George the First, intituled 'An Act for enlarging the time of continuance of Parliaments,' supported by an Act made in the sixth year of the reign of King William and Queen Mary, intituled 'An Act for the more frequent meeting and calling of Parliaments,' be, and the same is hereby repealed. And be it enacted, that this present Parliament, and all Parliaments, that shall at any time hereafter be called, assembled, or held, shall and may respectively have continuance for [illegible] years, and no longer, to be accounted from the day on which, by the writ of summons, this present Parliament hath been, or any future Parliament shall be, appointed to meet, unless this present or any such Parliament hereafter to be summoned shall be sooner dissolved by her Majesty, her heirs or successors."

ASCOT RACES.—FRAUDS ON THE REVENUE.—The Commissioners of Inland Revenue adopted the most efficient means for the prevention of frauds by the proprietors of vans and other vehicles attending races. Bars were erected by order of the Commissioners on all the roads leading to Ascot, in the vicinity of the heath, where tickets for horses let for hire were collected, and the [illegible] were removed, or "specially authorised," on the payment of a horse duty of [illegible] shillings each. Orders had likewise been issued to the Local Assessors of the several districts to [illegible] there will not [illegible] being removed, or "specially authorised," on the payment of a horse duty of [illegible] shillings each. The [illegible] carriages so employed. The [illegible] of this plan will be an effectual means of putting a stop to the [illegible] of "the gentlemen," and of preventing the honest and [illegible] tradesman.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The HOUSE OF PEERS re-assembled after the Whitsun recess, the Earl of Shaftesbury, in the absence of the Lord Chancellor, who is slightly indisposed, presiding.

On the motion of the Earl GRANVILLE, the Accounts of Turnpike Trusts (Scotland) Bill passed through committee.

On the motion of Lord EDDISBURY, the Apprehension of Deserters (Portugal) Bill was committed.

THE NAVIGATION BILL.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE postponed to Tuesday next the third reading of the Navigation Bill, in consequence of the inability of the Bishop of Oxford to be present on an earlier day

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

In reply to a question from Lord STANLEY,

The noble Marquis stated that the correspondence between the committee of Privy Council and the committee of the National Society, on the subject of the conditions and regulations under which grants could be made for purposes of education, was progressing in a satisfactory manner. Arrangements had been proposed by the Privy Council, that were satisfactory to many heads of the Church. The correspondence and rules would be laid before Parliament, and both Houses would have full opportunity of considering any new arrangement before it would be carried into effect.

The BISHOP OF LONDON disclaimed, on the part of the Church, all responsibility for the acts of the committee of the National Society. That committee should not be regarded as the rulers or heads of the Church.

LEASEHOLD TENURE OF LAND (IRELAND).

Lord CAMPBELL moved the reception of the report, with amendments, of the Leasehold Tenure of Lands (Ireland) Bill

Lord STANLEY, Lord BEAUMONT, the Earl of LUCAN, and other noble Lords, objected to the motion, on the ground that the bill had been altered in some of its provisions, but salutary in others. He therefore could not agree to its rejection, as it might be so amended in committee as to render it a useful measure.

The Earl of WICKLOW also supported the second reading.

Their Lordships then divided.

For the second reading of the bill—Contents, 9; non-contents, 5: majority, 4. The bill was read a second time.

[During the recess the gallery assigned to the reporters has been removed, and a temporary gallery erected in its place. It is brought forward six feet and lowered three feet. As to the acoustic properties of this new gallery, it is some improvement on its predecessor, though far from satisfactory. There is one part of the new arrangement which is obviously liable to great objection, and which must be altered. The back seats in the gallery are apparently devoted to members of the House of Commons; but should these very talkative gentlemen be admitted there, the reporters will have little chances of hearing their Lordships' proceedings.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

CANADA

Mr. GLADSTONE gave notice that he would take an opportunity, on the House going into Committee of Supply, to draw attention to the subject of the Canada Indemnity Bill.

ENCUMBERED ESTATES (IRELAND) BILL.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL then moved the third reading of the Encumbered Estates (Ireland) Bill.

Sir LUCIUS O'BRIEN moved, as an amendment, that the bill be read a third time that day six months.

Colonel DUNNE seconded the amendment; and was followed in his objections by Mr. GROGAN, Mr. NAPIER, and Mr. HENLEY.

Mr. SADLEIR supported the bill.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL briefly defended the bill.

The House then divided, and the numbers were—For the amendment, 12; against it, 117: majority against, 105.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

The House then went into Committee of Supply, and the remainder of the civil service (miscellaneous) estimates was agreed to.

The House having resumed, the report from Committee of Supply on Friday night was brought up, and agreed to.

The Pigeon Protection (Scotland) Bill was read a second time.

The Sheep Stealing (Ireland) Bill was also read a second time.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT OF THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES.

Mr. HAWES then moved for leave to bring in a Bill for the better Government of the Australian Colonies. The bill was framed with a view to meet the wishes of the colonists, and was so framed as to conform, as far as possible, to the constitution of New South Wales. One of the main objects of the bill was to carry that constitution into practical effect, so far as all the colonies were concerned. It created a new and distinct colony at Port Philip, this colony to be henceforth called Victoria; and conferred upon this colony, upon Western Australia conditionally, and upon Van Diemen's Land, constitutions similar to that of New South Wales. But the great feature of the bill was, that it provided for the federation of all the Australian colonies. The colonies, having each an independent Legislature for the management of local affairs, were to be empowered to send delegates to a General Legislature, which would have the exclusive power of legislating in all matters of imperial interest, so far as all the colonies were concerned. The bill also provided for the creation of Municipal Bodies. It likewise contained a provision empowering the colonists to change their constitution, by bill, having the direct assent of the Crown to its introduction. At present the constitution of New South Wales, which was to be the model, consisted of a governor and one chamber, one-third of which is nominated by the Crown, and the remaining two-thirds elected by the people. What the bill proposed was, to allow the colonists, when they saw fit, to adopt two chambers instead of one, or to make such other changes in their constitution as might not be incompatible with the general arrangement. The bill further provided for putting the trade of their colonies on such a footing that the intercourse between them would be as free as between county and county in England. There were other and minor provisions in the bill, but the foregoing constituted its main features. He concluded by moving for leave to bring in the bill

Mr. GLADSTONE was friendly to the general purposes of the bill, on which he wished to make a few remarks, lest it should progress through the House without exciting attention. He thought it important that the bill should deal properly with the important and somewhat difficult question of the franchise in the colonies. He was favourable to the principle of district or municipal councils, but feared that some of the colonies were not yet fitted to receive them. As to the constitution of the proposed legislative bodies, he thought that the Government, without bringing itself into collision with public sentiment in the colonies, should go as far as possible towards recommending a bodies instead of a single Chamber. He was inclined to believe that public sentiment in the colonies was not inimical to a second Chamber. They would have the greatest difficulty in working a federal system on any other basis than that of the double Chamber. He approved of the proposal to empower the colonies to modify their own constitutions, and their own civil lists. He was anxious to ascertain the views of the Government with respect to transportation, in connexion with this measure. He saw considerable danger in Parliament taking the subject of colonial tariffs into its hands, with a view to secure uniformity of commercial legislation amongst the colonists; and thought that this was a matter which the colonists should be allowed to manage for themselves. With these views, he would leave the matter for the present in the hands of the House, holding himself at liberty to take what course he pleased on the future stages of the bill.

Mr. V. SMITH saw considerable difficulty in the way of a federation between colonies situated like those in Australia. He thought that the wiser course would be to postpone the matter for another year, until the sentiments of the colonists were properly known upon the subject. To press the measure before their sentiments were known, would only be to commit the fault which was attributed to Mr. Hastings's scheme by Mr. Burke.

Mr. MACGREGOR regarded this as the most liberal measure that had yet been introduced with regard to our colonies, and he trusted that it would be readily accepted by the House.

Mr. E. DENISON wished to know whether the price of land was to be regulated by the local Legislatures or the Imperial Parliament?

Lord J. RUSSELL observed that, at present, the price of land was regulated by an Imperial Act, which it was not competent for the local Legislatures to contravene. Whether such a power should or should not be conferred upon them was a question which could more properly be discussed on the future stages of the bill.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill

Adjourned at a quarter to twelve o'clock

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

LAW OF BANKRUPTCY.

Lord BROUGHAM moved the committal of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Bill. The noble and learned Lord gave the history and outline of the bill, and described the various amendments that had been made in it, in accordance with the suggestions of the most eminent commercial authorities, and to suit the advice of the Lord Chancellor and other legal functionaries. The noble and learned Lord, in the course of his remarks, stated the startling fact that not less than £50,000,000 per annum was lost in this country by bankruptcies and insolvencies. He urged upon their Lordships the necessity of expediting so important a measure as much as possible, so as to allow of its becoming law during the present session. In illustration of the advantages which might be anticipated from the alterations contemplated to be effected by the present measure, he mentioned two especially, which were the greatest in his opinion. The first was, that he who must give credit would be disposed to limit it, and be more cautious as to whom he trusted; and, secondly, that when a debtor found he could no longer elude the operations of our creditors, owing to the stringency of the bill he would feel bound to act with greater honesty and care, and would be induced to square his expenses more nearly with his means. By the existing law the commissioner had the power of awarding imprisonment for a year, if a bankrupt did not answer. This power was, however, now overruled, and the bill provided that the punishment in this respect should be the refusal of protection, and of the certificate, instead of imprisonment, and the period of withholding which to be definitely limited

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE felt that the bill was one of the first importance to the commercial interests of the country, and agreed in the opinion that it should be forwarded through Parliament with the least possible delay.

Lord CAMPBELL considered the bill a great improvement on the existing Bankrupt Law.

After a few observations from Lord WHARNCLIFFE, the bill passed through committee, and was ordered to be read a third time

On the motion of Lord CAMPBELL, the Encumbered Estates (Ireland) Bill, brought up from the Commons, was read a first time, and the second reading was fixed for Monday.

SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

To a question from Lord BROUGHAM,

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE replied, that the hopes of the termination of the hostility between Denmark and Prussia were increased by the dissolution of the Frankfort Assembly.

Lord CAMPBELL moved the reception of the report of the Leasehold Tenure of Lands (Ireland) Bill.

The Earl of LUCAN opposed the bill, and moved, as an amendment, that it be re-committed, and referred to a select committee.

Lord CAMPBELL defended the principle and details of the bill.

Lord MONTEAGLE did not wish to do anything that would defeat the bill, to the principle of which he was favourable; but he thought it would be advisable to refer it to a select committee.

The Earl of DEVON objected to the principle of the bill. If it were a permissive measure, it might effect some good; but it was a compulsory measure, and to such he had great objection

Lord RADNORDALE and the Earl of GLENGALL supported the amendment

The Earl of WICKLOW spoke in favour of the bill.

The Earl of LUCAN withdrew his amendment, and the report of the bill was received.

On the motion of Lord EDDISBURY, the Apprehension of Deserters (Portugal) Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL assigned Thursday week for the discussion on the Rebellion Losses (Canada) Bill.

Mr. GLADSTONE agreed to that arrangement, on the understanding that no steps should be, in the meantime, taken by the Government that would prejudice the question.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL said that all he could promise was, that the Government would not, in the meantime, declare their confirmation of the bill; but he could not promise that they would not decide on the course they would pursue in regard to it.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

Mr. HUME moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the national representation, by extending the elective franchise so as to include all householders, by enacting that votes shall be taken by ballot, that the duration of Parliaments shall not exceed three years, and that the apportionment of representatives be rendered more equal to the population. The hon. member, in resuming his argument in favour of parliamentary reform, referred to the effects of the last great political power on the Continent as proof of the advisability of granting to Englishmen similar franchises to those conceded to Austrians, Prussians, Frenchmen, &c. The exercise of universal suffrage in France had shown that no danger to established institutions could arise from it, because it had in that country ranged itself on the side of Conservatism. Retrenchments were absolutely necessary for the safety of Great Britain, but without further political reforms large retrenchments were hopeless. Whether the population or property were taken as the basis, the national representation was most unequal.

Mr. H. BARKLEY seconded the motion.

Mr. G. GREY opposed it. The right hon. gentleman drew a contrast of the condition, political and material, of this country with the distracted state of continental nations, to demonstrate the value of the constitution under which we enjoyed freedom and tranquillity, but which the hon. member would treat so lightly. There was little in the circumstances of continental Europe at this time England could wish to imitate. If France had universal suffrage, she had also likewise in her capital 100,000 armed men, in whom and on the fickleness of the Government the people of France depend for the tranquillity of the country, and loved the present House of Commons represented the property, the intelligence, and the industry of the country

Mr. FRANCIS O'CONNOR and Colonel THOMPSON followed in favour of the motion

Mr. W. J. CAMPBELL, in a lengthy discursive discourse, stuffed with Latin quotations, gave his decided and indignant negative to the motion.

Mr. LOCKE KING supported the motion.

Mr. NEWDEGATE, in opposing the motion, commented severely upon the schemes by which the Manchester League created a fictitious excitement throughout the country, and which were manufactured by this faction.

Mr. BRIGHT denied that the new plan of meeting votes originated in Manchester. It was invented in Birmingham. He rejoiced, however, that some way had been found whereby the working classes might be enabled to express their views gradually within the pale of the constitution. The hon. member proceeded, at considerable length, to argue—from the difficulties and dangers inside, which the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, the Reform Bill, the Corn-law Repeal Bill, and the measures for the improvement of Ireland were carried—that the constitution of Parliament was not in a proper working condition, and that the representative system was defective. As Parliament was at present constituted, it required either great danger or great calamity, or, as in the case of Ireland, the disastrous loss of near a million of subjects, before the changes desired by the people could be effected.

Lord J. RUSSELL said, that whatever might be the intention or the wish of Mr Hume, it was clear, from those who aided him—and, in aiding, overpowered him, that the question before the House went to the full length of admitting every adult male to the elective franchise—in effect, of carrying the six points of the Charter. Such was evident from the speech of Mr. Bright, who admitted that he had no respect for the Constitution, and who was prepared not to stop short of the Charter. The noble Lord explained the nature of the franchises established by the Reform Act, and declared that, in his opinion, those who supported that measure did not consistently vote for the motion before the House. But it was a different question whether or not it would be well to admit a greater number of working men to the franchise—whether, in the counties and in the boroughs, some other species of franchises than those existing ought to be created. His opinion was, as he stated last year, in favour of such an extension; and he should be happy to assist in admitting more of the working classes to the elective franchise, but not in the way advocated by Mr. Bright, and which had been explained by Mr Newdegate. The noble Lord, in reply to Mr. Bright's charges that the Parliament and the Government were too aristocratic, and wanted the popular and democratic principle, asserted that the people of England were attached to the aristocracy, and reminded the honourable member that the aristocracy of to-day were from time to time the democracy of a few years ago. Mr. Bright and his associates were, on their own principles, sufficiently enough, but in questions of national and general policy their intellects and their understandings were bound up in a narrow round, beyond which it appeared they could not see. The noble Lord referred to the distractions, confusion, and discontent in Europe to prove that there was nothing in the changes there going on that we should imitate. Amidst all the convulsions of the last year he was sure they were standing firm: one, the United States of America, a democratic monarchy; the second, an absolute despotic Monarchy, the empire of Russia; and the third, the constitutional Monarchy of Great Britain.

Mr. A. OSBORNE was astonished at finding the quarters from which the opposition to Mr. Hume's motion proceeded. It did not come from the Tory benches, but from those who got into power on the shoulders of Mr. Hume and his friends, and who then turned round and called them narrow-minded traders.

Mr. P. WOOD supported the motion

The House divided—For the motion, 82; against it, 268 majority against the motion, 186.

Adjourned at half-past twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House sat from noon to six o'clock

Mr. MOWATT moved the second reading of the Bankrupt and Insolvent Members Bill. This was the new bill introduced after the former one was withdrawn, with a view to obviate the objections which had been offered to its predecessor.

Sir W. CLAY had objections to the measure, which had not been removed, and he consequently moved, as an amendment, that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

After some observations from Captain Harris, Mr. Mackinnon, Mr. Bernal, Mr. Mullings, Sir E. Colebrooke, and Mr. J. Stuart, the House divided, and the numbers were—For the amendment, 46; against it, 80: majority against, 34.

The amendment having been thus rejected, the bill was read a second time, whereupon it was ordered to be committed on Wednesday next.

The Bribery at Elections Bill then went through committee.

The adjourned debate on further proceedings on the third reading of the Affirmation Bill was resumed by

Mr. LAW, who was of opinion that our courts of justice might as well be closed, should a dangerous loss into a law

The House then divided, and the numbers were—For the third reading, 73; against it, 81: majority for, 8.

The bill was thus read a third time.

On the motion that the bill do pass,

Mr. LAW persisted in again dividing the House. The numbers were—For the motion, 77; against it, 73: majority for, 4.

The remaining formalities were then gone through, and the bill was ordered to be sent to the House of Lords, a brief conversation having previously taken place as to whether the usual and formal question, "That this be the title of the bill," was or was not put

Mr. ADLINGTON moved the second reading of the Copyholds Enfranchisement Bill.

After some observations from Mr. HEATHCOTE in opposition to the bill

Mr. TURNER moved, as an amendment, that it be read a second time that day six months.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL explained in a few brief sentences the reasons which induced him to vote for the second reading, reserving to himself the right to take whatever course he might think fit on the future stages of the bill.

The House divided, and the numbers were—For the amendment, 55; against it, 80: majority against, 25.

The bill was then read a second time.

Mr. MACKINNON moved the second reading of the Smoke Prohibition Bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS regarded the bill as unnecessary, mischievous, and partial, and moved as an amendment, that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

A brief conversation ensued, after which the House divided, and the numbers were—For the amendment, 87; against it, 72: majority against, 36.

The bill was then read a second time.

The other business was then disposed of, and the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

DEFECTS IN LEASES BILL.

On the motion of Lord CAMPBELL, this bill was read a second time.

BANKRUPTCY LAWS CONSOLIDATION BILL.

Lord BROUGHAM moved the third reading of this bill, and in doing so expressed his objection to any proposal that might be made to the diminution of the salary of the Chief Commissioner. He thought that nothing could tend more to create a zeal in the execution of their duty on the part of officers than the prospect of promotion, and he should be sorry to see this stimulus taken away from the junior Commissioners in Bankruptcy.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

CLONMEL SCHOOL.

On the motion of the Lord Bishop of DUBLIN, the special report of the Education Commissioners relative to the endowed school of Clonmel, was ordered to be laid on the table, after Lord Monteagle had explained that the Education Commissioners and the Commission for National Education were two distinct bodies. The report was an answer to some charge which had been brought against the Commissioners.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

At four o'clock, when the Speaker took the chair, there being but 34 members present, an adjournment took place, 40 members being requisite to constitute "a House."

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD.

A Convocation will be holden on Tuesday, the 12th of June, at two o'clock, for the purpose of electing a Professor of Anglo-Saxon, on the resignation of Dr. Rawlinson, in the room of Mr. Buckley, Fellow of Brasenose College, whose period of office has now expired.

The Professor of Modern European Languages, Sir Robert Taylor's foundation, began his course of lectures in the Taylor Institution, on Tuesday last.

TRINITY COLLEGE.—Robert Edward Bartlett, of Balliol College and Rugby School, and Lewis Campbell, of the High School, Edinburgh, and University of Glasgow, have been elected Scholars of Trinity College.

A Convocation will be holden on Thursday, June 14th, at one o'clock, for the purpose of electing a Professor of Logic, in the room of Mr. Mitchell, Vice-Principal of Magdalen Hall, whose period of office has expired. The gentlemen whose names are mentioned as candidates are, Mr. Chevallier, Fellow and Tutor of Oriel; Mr. Mansel, Fellow of St. John's; and Mr. Wall, Fellow of Balol, and Vice-Principal and Tutor of St. Alban Hall.

Mr. Portal, of Christ Church, has been elected chairman of the Heraldic Section of the Architectural Society. At the meeting on Wednesday, the 30th ult., Mr. Norris Deck read a paper on Legendary Coat Armour.

ELDON LAW SCHOLARSHIP.—John Conington, Esq., B.A., Fellow of University College, has been elected by the trustees to the Eldon Law Scholarship. Mr. Conington was in the first class in Lit. Human., Michaelmas Term 1845; Ireland Scholar and Ireland Scholar, 1844; and gained the prize for Latin verse in 1847, and for the English Essay in 1848.

BISHOPRIC OF LICHFIELD.—The Rev. William Higgin, Dean of Lismore, Ardfert, and Aghadoe, has appointed to the bishopric of the united dioceses, vacant by the death of the Hon. and Right Rev. Edward Knox, D.D.

ORDINATION.—The Bishop of Oxford held an Ordination on Sunday week, in the Church of Cuddesdon parish, when twenty-four deacons and eleven priests were admitted into their respective orders.

NATIONAL SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE EDUCATION OF THE POOR.—The annual general meeting of this society took place on Wednesday last, at twelve o'clock, at the central rooms of the society, Westminster, the Archbishop of Canterbury in the chair. The meeting was very numerously attended, nearly half the bench of Bishops being present, besides archdeacons, and many of the nobility. The great source of discussion was the resolution of Mr. Denison, of which we gave a copy in our last week's paper. It was seconded in a speech of great length by the Rev. Dr. Wordsworth, and supported by the mover of the resolution, expressing his full confidence in the committee. Archdeacon Allen also condemned Mr. Denison's resolution, and proposed an amendment, this was seconded by Mr Dalton, but was ultimately rejected by an overwhelming majority. Archdeacon Manning, after coinciding with the views taken by Archdeacon Wilberforce and the Earl of Harrowby, proposed the following amendment:—"That this meeting acknowledges with satisfaction the assistance afforded in conducting the correspondence still pending with the Committee of Privy Council, and they regret to find that a satisfactory conclusion has not yet been attained. That, while this meeting desires fully to co-operate with the state in promoting the education of the people, they are under the necessity of declaring that no terms of co-operation can be satisfactory which are not based on principles and models sanctioned and connected by the Church of England." A warm discussion followed, and ultimately, in order to meet the views of Mr. Denison, the following was added to the amendment:—"And in particular, when they shall so desire it, to put the management of their schools in the hands of the clergy and the bishop of their diocese." After some hesitation on the part of Mr. Denison, the latter was induced to withdraw his original resolution, and the amendment was carried almost unanimously. Mr. Denison then moved an adjournment, which the Archbishop refused to put, as he had no power, and in the midst of considerable confusion declared the meeting at an end.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT v. STRANGE, AND THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. STRANGE.

His Honor Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce gave judgment on Saturday last in these causes, which came before the Court on the hearing, and with the particulars of which the public are familiar. The principal points to be decided were as to the costs and the delivering up of the etchings.

The Chancellor Judge pronounced the following decree:—

His Honor said that, however the words of the injunction obtained against the defendant Judge might be amended, substantially he must remain permanently under the injunction which had been obtained, and, while so enjoined, and under that further prohibition under which his co-defendant, Mr. Strange, was. With regard to the catalogue, they must be either cancelled or destroyed, and, without characterising the conduct hardly be censured. With regard to the impressions, he could see no reason why the effectual destruction of them should not be directed; in doing which his Honor would abstain from giving any opinion as to the particular mode which the Court ought to adopt in a case similar in all parts except as to the intrinsic value of the materials. On the question of costs, he believed the custom of the Court, where the merits appeared to rest upon such a nature, was to arrest the proper to pay the costs up to the time when it became a proper. If the course of the Court did not allow it, when it came to the ultimate decision of the Court would determine, costs would not be given; but if it was according to the course of the Court, it could not refuse to give to plaintiff his costs, the defendant's case failing in law, equity, truth, and common honesty.

THE ROYAL ETCHINGS.—Mr. Judge, acting upon the advice of his friends, contemplates appealing to the Lord Chancellor against the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce (given above). The preliminary proceeding was taken by Mr. Judge on Saturday, immediately after judgment had been given, by his entering a caveat against enrolling the decree (in such suit) made by his Honor the Vice-Chancellor. It appears that, according to the practice of the Court of Chancery, this prompt mode of proceeding was necessary to be adopted; for, after a decree has once been enrolled, no suitor—whether plaintiff or defendant—is deprived of the privilege of appealing to a higher jurisdiction. Mr. Judge, by pursuing this course, stays this proceeding for twenty-eight days; and is object being to obtain an order for an issue to be tried at common law, so that a jury may decide in whom the proper title in the Royal Etchings is vested.

DUBLIN IMPROVEMENT BILL.—After the successive failures of a number of measures promoted by corporate bodies and individuals in Dublin for the improvement of that city, the Government have at length prepared a measure directed to that object. The bill contains no less than 98 clauses. It proposes to regulate the paving, lighting, cleansing, watering, and street improving acts now in force, and to vest the control in the Lord Mayor and Town Council. A great number of the clauses relate to sanitary regulations and the control of the markets. Powers are also given to establish a fire brigade, as in London; and dealers in marine stores are to be licensed; public clocks to be erected; baths and other conveniences to be established. The bill is in all the Health of Towns Bill

CANE-HOLEING.

THE great interest attached to the West India interests, at the present moment, has suggested the illustration of the culture and manufacture of one of the staple articles of the produce of the Islands—Sugar, from Sketches by an Artist long resident in the country, who has likewise furnished the accompanying descriptive details of the principal stages.

CANE HOLEING.

The first Illustration represents a gang or number of Negroes, male and female, in the act of preparing the ground for the planting of the sugar-cane, which operation is commonly known by the term of Cane Holeing, and consists in making deep holes of about two feet square, in the centre of which the canes are planted.

The hoe is the most general implement employed for the purpose, as with its all-round qualities of the land can be put into cultivation; for as the volcanic origin of the whole chain of West Indian Islands has given to most of them a mountainous character, and in many instances strewed large tracts of land with detached masses of rock, called by geologists boulders, the plough cannot generally be used; besides which (like many other old notions) it is very difficult to convince a Negro that he can work better with any other implement. This prejudice is, however, fast giving way under the perseverance of present landholders, and the plough is now being introduced wherever its services can be made available.

It is rather an amusing thing for a stranger to observe from a distance a gang of labourers employed as represented in the picture, particularly if they are many in number; as the regularity with which they all move, lifting their hoes all simultaneously above their heads, and then striking them into the ground, accommodating their movements to the monotonous tone of some [illegible] conveys the idea of a piece of mechanism, rather than the motions of human beings.

The labourers are generally superintended by a superior Negro, called the Driver, or by the overseer of the estate. By these the ground to be hoed is marked out, by placing small pieces of stick [illegible] intervals, which serve as tallies for the quantity done, as also to regulate the size of the holes.

As the overseer has frequently to traverse large tracts of land in the course of his inspection, he is usually provided with a mule; and the most important part of his equipment appears to be one spur, fastened to his right or left heel by a strap, without which spur an overseer would scarcely be recognised: but why one spur and not a pair should be the favourite fashion, is a mystery.

The labourers are usually expected to turn out to work at daybreak, which varies from four o'clock to five in the morning during the year; but in many instances it is six o'clock before a gang are in the field.

In Grenada, and one or two other islands visited by the writer, the common signal for summoning the people to their work is the blowing of a [illegible] this is done by the overseer or manager, and the sound can be heard for a very long distance.

The time represented in the Sketch is morning: in the distance are seen the sugar-works of the estate, and a herd of cattle are being driven to the pasture. A young mountain cabbage tree forms the boundary of the picture.

The Cutting and Carrying of the Canes constitutes the actual commencement of crop time or harvest, and is a period of bustle and excitement throughout all the West Indian colonies. Nothing is heard but shouting of labourers, cracking of whips, neighing of mules, lowing of cattle, and rumbling of mill machinery; amidst all this are seen the labourers, armed with their cutlasses and cane bills (the implements used for cutting the canes), hurrying to the field, the women, with their petticoats tucked up to the knees so as not to impede their movements, carrying their little tin cans of provisions, and laughing, singing, talking, and showing their rows of white teeth. Mules and donkeys, harnessed and hampered with crooks for carrying the canes, are driven to the field by the "Cattle Boys." Then comes a waggon rumbling slowly along to the measured step of heavy oxen accompanied by their drivers, whose exertions to urge on their team are vented in screams, yells, and hootings. The appearance of a fine field, when the canes are ripe for cutting, waving their lofty and delicate reds of blossom (call'd from their shape arrows) in the mildest motion of the breeze, forms a picture equally interesting and beautiful. The flower, which is of the lightest delicate lilac colour, hangs down round the upper extremity of the stem-like [illegible] fine in its fibres that on its becoming dry, all attempts to preserve it in its original form are unavailing.

A SUGAR-MILL AT WORK.

This represents the most common apparatus to be met with; viz. a vertical mill of three rollers: the centre one being turned by machinery, either worked by steam, wind, or water, sometimes by cattle, propels the other two. The surfaces of these rollers are of iron, slightly grooved, so as to more firmly hold the cane; while the compressed liquor or juice of the cane runs down the grooves into the cistern or strainer, from whence it is led by a pipe into the boiling-house.

Two Negroes, either male or female, usually called feeders, supply the rollers with the canes as they are brought in by the others, and, holding the cane by one end, place the other between the outer rollers and the centre one, when, the cane being drawn through, is completely crushed, and the refuse or vegetable skin passes to the back, from whence it is continually cleared away by other labourers, and removed to the yard.

This refuse is called megass, and is stacked in large buildings termed megass-houses, generally supported on pillars, and open on all sides, with a tiled roof over it. The megass here remains to dry, to be used as fuel for supplying the furnaces of the boiling-house and still. The destruction of one of these megass-houses by fire, which, through carelessness and its inflammable nature, is unfortunately of frequent occurrence, is a most serious loss; as, in most of the islands, although wood is extremely abundant and readily procured, the people seem to depend entirely on the megass for fuel.

In this place it may not be amiss to draw the attention of the reader to the utility of the sugar-cane, from its growth to its being reduced to ashes, and in how many ways it is made subservient to the cultivator.

The cane is cut down, and the trash or dotons left on the field remains to rot, and forms a most splendid manure for the ensuing crop. The fresh green tops and leaves being collected, serve as fodder for the cattle. The cane is crushed, its juice extracted, and converted into sugar; the refuse and drainage, called molasses, is fermented, distilled, and becomes rum. The remains of the cane, called the megass, becomes fuel to supply the furnaces; and, lastly, the ashes of the burnt megass, when mixed with lime, forms the finest cement for coating the interior of cisterns, tanks, or reservoirs, so necessary to all sugar-works.

The figures in the Sketch need no description beyond that already given. The mill exceeds in noise every other portion of the works during crop; as, to the rumbling, crushing, squeaking sound of its machinery, are added the vociferous clamour of the Negroes, whose incessant calling to each other for canes to supply the rollers constitutes a din almost insupportable.

INTERIOR OF A BOILING-HOUSE.

This Sketch has been chosen from many others, on account of a view of the mill and rollers being obtained through an open arch at the extremity of the long chamber constituting the Boiling-House, which assists in illustrating the manufacture more readily. On the right-hand side of the picture are seen the row of boilers, which are large cast-iron cauldrons firmly set into masonry, and heated by fires underneath, supplied by a furnace for furnaces, whose fuel chambers open on the exterior of the building. The boilers are set into a platform raised a few feet from the floor; the top of which is inclined inwards, on all sides, round the mouth of each boiler, and is paved with smooth tiles, neatly set so as to prevent all waste in passing the boiling liquor from one to the other. As the juice is pressed from the canes, it flows through a strainer by a pipe into the first boiler next the mill; where having boiled a proper time, it is passed from that to another; and so on, till it has arrived at the sufficient state of refinement to admit of crystallization, when it is poured off, generally by means of a long wooden trough, into shallow vessels for that purpose. During the period of boiling, the contents of each boiler are continually skimmed by men provided with skimmers and strainers attached to very long handles. The boiling liquor is called sling. It is a very agreeable drink, and is much liked by the Negroes.

CARTING SUGAR FOR SHIPMENT.

This process is seen to the best advantage at Barbadoes, where the Sketch was taken, and where, during the shipping season, the wharves in the vicinity of the Carenage, from the News or Commercial-rooms to Trafalgar-square, present a scene of bustle and confusion which may be compared with that of Smithfield-market. Oxen were never very attractive to the writer, beyond their appearance in the shape of beef, or as picturesque auxiliaries to a landscape, and if any other point could obtain in their favour, the employment of them as mediums of locomotion does away with all. The enormous weight of the bar of wood pressing on their necks, by which they are yoked together, and their dull, heavy look and pace create an idea of suffering which cannot be compensated for, more particularly when to this is added, in too many instances, great brutality on the part of the drivers. The teams of oxen generally consist of five pair to convey two hogsheads of sugar.

The excellent roads in Barbadoes afford great facilities for carting the sugar; but, in the mountainous, rugged roads of Grenada, and in the low, swampy tracts of a great portion of Trinidad, the labour is most severe, and the loss of cattle very great.

CARTING SUGAR FOR SHIPMENT.

Of interest akin to the above is the accompanying letter, which we have just received, on

JAMAICA IN ITS PRESENT STATE.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

SIR,—In order to give your readers on the other side of the Atlantic a correct idea of the state of things, and as a favour to your Subscribers in this island, I must beg your insertion of this letter in your paper. To make my subject clear, I will divide the inhabitants of Jamaica into two classes, viz. the West Indians and the Peasantry. By West Indians I mean Europeans and their descendants residing here; and by the peasantry I mean the African labourers and their descendants. Political, religious, anti-slavery, and other writers have, at various times, and "to make out a case," sadly misrepresented the West Indies in public print and elsewhere; but in one particular they all appear to have become unanimous—one thing has not been misrepresented, and that is the tale of the cruel destitution to which they have been reduced by an unequal competition with the slave-holder. I write not to please a party, but to tell the truth. Were I an enemy to the peasantry of this country, I would not be spending my time and my life, as I am doing, for their moral and religious improvement; and I do not believe that there is an individual in this country who wishes to see slavery [illegible] on the contrary, could we really believe that the measures of our parent Government relative to slavery have, in any degree, bettered the condition of the emancipated, or at all diminished the slave-trade, we would, as a body, "take joyfully the spoiling of our goods" for the consummation of so desirable an object. The pious desire of every individual in this land, and the humble effort of this letter, is to convince our readers that those measures have wrought fearful distress upon the W[illegible] ians, and have in no case bettered the condition of their peasantry. It has [illegible]ore the world already as a solemn fact, that they have diminished the slave-trade, but rather increased it. In the first place, I will show that the system of the West Indies [illegible]nd, in doing so, I must enter a little into their manner of living, and also into that of the peasantry. The calling of my profession having brought me into personal intercourse with each class, the following remarks may be depended on. The dwellings of ninety-nine out of a hundred of our peasantry are composed of stick (varying from one to four inches in diameter, interlaced with wattles of small sticks, plastered with mud (sometimes mixed with lime), and covered with [illegible]atch; all which material is procured on the spot or a little way off. One of these dwellings may be erected by an industrious man, and his wife and children, in two or three weeks, with little extra assistance, and will answer that family the various purposes of kitchen, parlour, bed-room, &c. It is quite certain that a West Indian must have a more costly and congenial dwelling to shelter him from the effects of a change in the climate to which he is exposed by nature and by custom. In the [illegible]icle of dress, also, the same difference is necessary, and although it may sound strange in the ears of those who have never yet "crossed the water," that at this advanced era in British colonial civilization, Negro children, up to the years of five or six, are to be seen running about their premises in bare nakedness, yet it is a fact; and I ask what West Indian could allow his children to do so; or, rather, could their constitutions bear it? With the exception of one best suit of light clothes, which they procure on such occasions as weddings, &c., and which they keep for high days and holidays, the general dress of our peasants, of either sex, is composed of some coarse union or cotton stuff, which does not cost them more than four or five shillings, and will serve them as an every-day suit for at least six months; together with a cap, hat, or handkerchief, of about eighteenpence value. They may, if they please, have a great addition to the stock, but I am speaking of what suffices the generality of them (excepting a few wealthy ones), and I ask what West Indian could afford to [illegible] and tailors, washerwomen and cooks, tradesmen, labourers, and servants, it must at once be seen that their circumstances are very unlike ours. Articles, which to us are necessaries, are to them superfluities, and superfluities, hence you will see them carrying their shoes to and from church, and only wearing them when there. I have also remarked sometimes shut their parasols when the sun shone brightest, and open them when clapsed by a cloud. In the same way do they make use of gloves, &c.; while (I speak from experience) we should have our faces of a mahogany hoard for lack of these accessories.

Again, I have known a Negro walk fifty or sixty miles a day with a heavy load, and labour hard in all weathers, without any personal injury. Which of us could do this without the aid of a horse? I have been told by a white west from a walk of six miles under a tropical sun. A horse or beast of burden is to us a necessary, to them a luxury. The universal food of the peasantry here consists of ground provisions, and a little salted fish—or fish occasionally pickled in salt alone. The former can be obtained by the slight labour of one day per week, and will, grow spontaneously; and I do not really believe that the cost of the latter is, for each individual, one shilling a month. As drink they have been, till very recently, a remarkably abstemious race, hardly ever exceeding anything but water; and, upon this simple diet, it is astonishing how they will preserve their health, their appearance, and their strength. An European, on the contrary, who has been accustomed to generous fare and animal food, cannot exist upon this, especially in a climate like ours, where the body is so much wasted by incessant perspiration, and a little salted [illegible]ish cannot be expected to [illegible]ment of the [illegible]

[illegible]ers are concerned, they go to no expense. They come "without money without price" to the Fountain of Salvation afforded through the Established Church; and, as a proof that it is humanized to them to what body of Christians they belong, I may add that all those denominations in Jamaica which are supported by voluntary contributions are failing to the ground. Education, too, costs them nothing; and there are very few children in the country that are being properly educated. It is not so with the West Indian. He will, upon many occasions, sacrifices to maintain his religious and political opinions, and to hand down to his children the blessings of education. The West Indians are in that station or class in society in which this is their duty; and their industry had placed them in a position to fulfil that duty till the measures of the parent state relative to "Free Trade" had deprived them of that power. Again, our peasantry spend but little in the medical department, and hardly ever employ a doctor: they can make use of barberous remedies, to which West Indians are unaccustomed. The arts and sciences and literary pursuits are valueless to, and find no advocates in, the peasantry. Their public and parochial taxes for their houses and lands vary from one to twenty shill ngs per annum. They have no artificial wants. There are no strict laws, or, rather, no laws are not observed as strictly as in England, to protect individual property from trespass; but fish, [illegible]game, fruit, are all to be had by them everywhere at the cost of a little labour, which is nothing to them, but which, in a climate like this, will injure the constitution of a West Indian.

But we come now to their respective sources of income. The usual wages of labourers and tradesmen here range from 8d. to 3s. a day. Double this amount could be made by job work, and employment was always to be procured before cultivation was as much abandoned as it is; still, although they cannot now make much money, they can easily make a living. Let us suppose a family in a semi-savage, but not to a West Indian. On the other hand, from the owner of a few acres to the more extensive sugar-maker, we all have to depend on hired labour for the production of the produce which constitutes our revenue. We find, however, from facts, that, in consequence of an allowed competition with the slaveholder, we cannot get sale for our produce at a remunerative price—that we are driven out of the field by those who are allowed to do so by cheap goods [illegible] and our only alternative is to abandon cultivation. But suppose [illegible] abandon the cultivation of saleable produce, and turns his attention to those articles only which he requires for the use of his family, here also another dilemma presents itself to him. We have above shown, that, owing to natural and physical causes, the peasant labour himself he must employ the peasantry; that, unlike those he employs, he must wear shoes and better clothing—must live in a better house, and use more nutritious diet—must pay for the intellectual improvement of his offspring, and altogether subjected to greater expenses than they are. This requires some considerable annual outlay; and whence, I would ask, is the wherewith to be obtained? With a continual demand for the means of paying those whom he employs, and to pay for those things which by birth and natural circumstances he is incapable of doing for himself, and without any available source of income, how is he to continue living? Even were his land of money, his resources must soon be exhausted at this rate. Such, however, is the dilemma in which the West Indians are now placed. I am personally intimate with persons who, though possessed of property, the produce of which, were it not for slave competition, would yield them comfortable incomes, are nevertheless living in a state of destitution, and without the means of procuring the menial services of others, without which life in this country is a burthen, too, with many [illegible]ons, who formerly lived in affluence.

Such, then, is the distress [illegible]ensed to us West Indians by the measures of the British Governme[illegible] relative to her colonies and free trade. But [illegible]ns reduced the West Indians to this state, let me ask if those measures have benefitted even to benefit the peasantry? In the first working of a free system in this country, when the peasantry could get wages from the planter, there were some incentives held out to them to better their condition in the scale of human beings. Knowing that they must educate their children, and being in a position to do so, were gradually listening to our arguments in favour of this great duty; they were getting more ambitious of, at least in part, contributing to the further spread of religion. This latter fact I should seem in the once flourishing but now reduced family of a society called the "Jamaica Diocesan Church Society for the Propagation of the Gospel," lately established by our present esteemed Bishop. Now, however, by the abandonment of agriculture, all these incentives are taken from them, and these improvements have ceased. Being able to drag on the miserable existence I have pointed out above, and having no inducements to strive for anything better, they are getting backwards in the march of improvement. Nothing but an unequal competition with the slave-holder has done this. Without education, or any reliable or [illegible]means to pay for it—without parental or corporate control—and nothing to guide them but the varied passions of a fallen nature with abundant of opportunities, time, and ability for doing wrong—with no necessity for much labour and in a climate which of itself induces idleness—with no formed religious principles, but rather abounding in superstition, is this state of b[illegible]d treaded likely to benefit the peasantry of this country? Has it benefitted it? Ask the honest Christian ministers of all denominations here, and when they have answered, let the increase of crime—which is loudly proclaimed from the assize churches, police reports, and parliamentary documents—speak the rest. This, then, is the state of the West India Colonies. One class reduced from affluence to want and privation—the other placed in the broad road to barbarism. One class deprived of temporal and intellectual necessities; and the other subjected to the control of depraved reason, and given over to the blind passions of fallen nature, which the best of us are unable to subdue without the strictest discipline and Divine grace.

Think of this, ye far-famed Christians of Great Britain, and remember that these are your fellow-subjects, for whom this curse is allen, but upon far distant members of your own household.

I am sorry to have occupied your time so long; but, to show the world it is [illegible]an appeal [illegible]ases of [illegible]ra, I have to direct attention to these facts—and do forth on m[illegible] and now subscribe myself your constant reader

SKETCH FROM THE ROYAL BOTANIC SOCIETY'S GARDENS, REGENT'S-PARK, ON SATURDAY LAST.

THE ROYAL BOTANIC SOCIETY'S GARDENS,

REGENT'S-PARK.

On Saturday, the exhibition of American plants in full bloom, which forms the grand attraction of this season, was visited by her Majesty. The Queen arrived at the gardens at a quarter to ten, and was accompanied by H.R.H. the Prince Albert, H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, H.R.H. the Princess Royal, and H.R.H. the Prince Alfred, and attended by Colonel Phipps and Colonel Bouverie, the Equerries in Waiting, and was received at the great gate by his Grace the Duke of Norfolk, K.G., President; the Marquis of Alleabury, V.P.; the Baron de Goldsmid, V.P.; Colonel Hammer, C.B.; Mr. Deane, Mr. Jardine, Mr. Hyde Clark, Mr. Bishop, Mr Prior, Members of the Council, and the officers of the society, Mr. Sowerby, Mr. Marnock, and Mr. Barnes, and attended by them through the gardens.

Her Majesty first proceeded by the main walk to visit the progress of the Winter Garden or Conservatory.

The Queen then proceeded to the American Exhibition, and minutely inspected the many fine specimens of rhododendrons and azaleas; this display being the only example of an exhibition on so large a scale where the plants have been sunk in the ground. Here the Secretary submitted to her Majesty the new workon the "Himmaleh Rhododendrons," by Dr. Hooker, son of Sir W. J. Hooker.

On leaving the American Exhibition, the Royal party proceeded towards the east side of the grounds On retiring, her Majesty and the Royal party were presented, as usual, with bouquets by his Grace the President, and was graciously pleased to accept specimens of rhododendrons from the several exhibitors. Her Majesty was further pleased to express her satisfaction with the exhibition and her approval of the artistic arrangements adopted for its display.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester and suite arrived soon after and the rest of the Royal family likewise attended.

Since the last Exhibition, many fine plants have come into flower. In the collection of Mr. Baker, of Bagshot, were R. Catawbiense, a beautiful rose colour; elegans, Cancasum, and Leveseianum, the latter with green spots. The azaleas most remarkable were amœna, very bright; pontica grandiflora, and coccinea, a bright scarlet. In Mr. Hoses Waterer's collection were, among numerous others, a plant of R. Wateriana, forty years old, and thirty feet in diameter, with thousands of flowers; this particularly attracted the attention of her Majesty. Messrs. Standish and Noble had on this occasion, in bloom, N. [illegible], a new scarlet hybrid, like a geranium, and grown to flower late, so as to escape the spring frost; R. Queen Victoria, a very dark bloom; Gulnare, a beautifully-shaped tree; and Alexandrina, a mass of white bloom. The collection of Mr. John Waterer and Mr. Lee were likewise remarkable for many well-grown and beautiful plants. The admirable manner in which the gardens were laid out by Mr. Marnock was universally commended.

The remaining General Exhibitions of the Society this season will be on June 20 and July 4.

ASCOT RACES.—THE ROAD.

ASCOT RACE PRIZE PLATE—1849.

THE three superb Prizes for this year's Ascot Meeting maintain, respectively, the advance which has been made of late years in this branch of the goldsmith's art, both in design and workmanship.

"THE QUEEN'S CUP"—the gift of her Majesty—represents a Spanish bull-fight, and is a very fine group, modelled by Mr. Cotterill, showing a very striking point of the Moorish spectacle. The fierceness and activity of the bull are admirably delineated; and the rider who is attacking him is a successful impersonation of spirit and caution. This group is from the establishment of Messrs. Garrard; as is, likewise,

"THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA'S VASE," also modelled by Mr. Cotterill. The subject is the story of Hippolytus, of which the following is the argument:—"Theseus, having become weak and credulous in his old age, believed too readily a false accusation against his son, Hippolytus, made by his wife Phædra. Hippolytus, in order to escape from his father's rage, fled in his chariot when his horses, becoming terrified at the sight of sea monsters, ran wildly along the shore, broke the chariot, dragged Hippolytus among the rocks, and so caused his death." The sculptor has produced a very rich and elegant model of this classical incident. The sea monsters are represented entwined round a rock, at the base of which Hippolytus is stretched, surrounded by the fragments of his chariot. The spirit and originality of the design are remarkable, and the sculptor has evinced great art in giving to his model a great variety of texture—a point of the highest importance in groups composed of the precious metals. On the pedestal is engraved the following inscription: "Ludovvm Augustissimvm memor quibus ipse interviset Regius Victorum hospes mens. Jvn 1844. Solenne certamina Equestria Præmivm instivit Nicolavs totius Russiæ Imperator." The form of the Vase has the purity of the Etruscan, blended with the elegance of the Venetian, taste. The entire work stands about 36 inches in height. In the group, the figure of the unfortunate victim of Phædra is admirably modelled, the anatomical proportions being very finely developed, and the complete prostration of strength, both moral and physical, in the falling figure, happily described. The horses are, as this artist's horses invariably are, true to nature, yet sufficiently idealised to be classic, without being sublimated into mere fabulous extravagance. The whole composition is masterly, and worthy of high praise.

"THE ROYAL HUNT CUP" is of novel design: it is a vase, supported on a foot, on which are represented in relief devices emblematical of field sports. There are the heads of stags, and dogs and the mark of buckhounds, and on the summit of the cover of the cup is a very spirited group of dogs mastering a stag. The workmanship is very elaborate, and the design elegant. The style partakes of the Italian and Elizabethan characteristics. It has been modelled at the establishment of Messrs. Hunt and Roskell, of Bond-street, under the direction of Mr. Bailey, R.A., and is one of the best specimens of this species of art hitherto produced. It was last week submitted to the inspection of the Queen and Prince Albert, who expressed their approbation of it.

THE QUEEN'S CUP.—SPANISH BULL FIGHT.

His Royal Highness Prince Henry of the Netherlands honoured Messrs. Hunt and Roskell's establishment with a visit on Saturday last, and inspected the magnificent service of plate, valued at £5000, recently completed by that firm for the Earl of Ellenborough, to whom it has been presented by the officers of the Indian army. His Royal Highness also inspected the service of plate just completed for Sir John Littler, G.C.B., to whom it has been presented by the inhabitants of Calcutta; the Loo Remembrance Cup, presented by his Majesty, the King of the Netherlands; the Royal Hunt Cup; the Testimonial to Sir Moses Montefiore, and the magnificent stock of choice plate and fashionable articles of bijouterie contained in the spacious showrooms of this eminent firm: with the whole of which his Royal Highness expressed himself highly satisfied.

We may here mention that the subject of the Goodwood Cup, for the forthcoming meeting, is a representation of Sioux Indians hunting the bison in the prairies of North America. It offers a good example of Mr. Cotterill's skill of arrangement in composition the human figure with those of the horse and other animals

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

LONDON DIOCESAN BOARD OF EDUCATION.—The annual general meeting was held on Monday at the offices, Pall Mall, the Lord Bishop of London, President, in the chair, supported by Lord Ashtrook, and a numerous attendance of clergymen. The Right Rev. Prelate, in his address, alluded to the convulsions now existing as many of the continental countries, which he attributed not to any want of education among the people, in the common acception of the word, but to a neglect of the principles of Christian instruction. The annual report (the tenth) stated that 37 young persons, 21 boys and 16 girls, had been carried through their probationary period in order to qualify them for situations as pupil teachers. A number of schools are in connexion with the board in 352. The subscriptions, &c. on account of the general fund amounted to £261, and there remained in hand £78. On account of the Metropolis Schools Fund, £2421 had been received since the commencement; £50 had been received from her Majesty the Queen Dowager for Ragged Schools, and the grants made by the board had reached the sum of £1895.

THE JEWS' HOSPITAL.—The anniversary of this institution was celebrated on Monday evening, by a public dinner, given at the London Tavern, which was attended by about a hundred of the friends and supporters of this charity. The institution affords an asylum to the aged, and a place of refuge for the youthful, some of whom are there taught such trades as will render them useful members of society. According to the annual report, only 26 persons—15 aged and 18 young—were provided for at its commencement, in 1807; but, by the liberal support of a benevolent public, the institution, at this time, is dispensing its benefits to 87 inmates—23 aged persons, 36 boys, and twenty girls. Of the aged hitherto admitted, 64 have died, four have been dismissed, and one has retired, in consequence of having become possessed of means to support herself. Of the boys, three have died; 18 have completed their apprenticeships; 19 have been apprenticed out of the house; nine have been placed in advantageous situations, their indentures having been cancelled on the application of their friends; three have been withdrawn by their parents; and 42 dismissed. One girl has died; six have been dismissed; nine withdrawn by their friends; 24 articled as servants, and 23 apprenticed to trades out of the house. The total number of inmates who have been received into the house is 66. During the evening the treasurer acknowledged various contributions in aid of the institution, which amounted, in the course of the evening, to about £800.

THE COAL TRADE.—A few days since, a deputation from the body of the registered coal-whippers of the port of London had an interview with Messrs. Hugh Taylor and Bell, who represent the trade generally, for the purpose of stating that, in consequence of the reduction in the labour market, they had of their own accord come to the determination of lowering their charge for whipping from 9d. to 6d. per ton. They said that, during themselves and their families so improved, both physically and morally, under the operation of the act passed in their favour, they were most desirous of making its provisions as agreeable as possible to all persons engaged in the coal trade. Mr. Taylor replied that the manner in which they came voluntarily forward to make a concession required by the times exhibited both good sense and just feeling. It would tend to disarm opposition, and he was sure those engaged in the trade would meet the concession in a similar feeling by adhering to the provisions of the act.

BANK OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA.—On Tuesday the proprietors of this Bank held their annual meeting, at the offices in St. Helen's-place, Bishopsgate-street. The report stated that the depressed state of trade in British North America had imposed on the directors the necessity of a restrictive rule. In spite of many difficulties, the commercial community of the North American colonies had generally maintained its credit in a manner highly honourable to the character of British merchants. The directors were determined to adhere only to the principles of legitimate banking, by which they could give more effectual support to the regular trade of the mercantile community. By reference to the accounts submitted to the meeting, it appeared that, notwithstanding the restricted state of the business of the past year, the directors had been enabled to make a small addition to the rest, after providing for the year's dividend at the rate of five per cent., besides setting aside a considerable sum sufficient to cover the estimate of probable loss. From the balance-sheet it appeared that the nett profit for the year 1848, after declaring all current interest and providing for all bad and doubtful debts, was £51,800 7s. 1d.; the total of assets and liabilities was £1,907,051 2s. 4d.; the undivided nett profit to the 30th December, 1848, was £7,202 18s. 7d. The report was adopted, and the ordinary business was re-elected.

BRITISH COMMERCIAL LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.—The annual meeting of this Company was held on Wednesday, at the offices in Cornhill, John Cuttley, Esq., in the chair; when a report was read by Mr. Farnie, the managing director, which stated that, although the new business had diminished during the year 1848, the premium income was increased. The claims under the insurances effected in the present year exceeded those of several years preceding with the same period. There had been a considerable gain upon the whole of the policies closed in 1848, and the number of policies issued had not been fewer in number and smaller in amount than for several years past. A dividend at the rate of 7½ per cent. per annum was declared at the last meeting. In answer to question as to the amount of the gain, Mr. Farnie replied that it was £6390. Messrs. Thomas Benson and D. J. Thompson were re-elected directors, and the report was adopted.

GRAND JUNCTION CANAL.—The half-yearly meeting of the Grand Junction Canal Company was held on Tuesday, at which a dividend was declared at the rate of five per cent. per annum, leaving a surplus of £2330 to be carried to the reserve fund. The report stated that the operations carried on by the company in becoming canals, continued to yield satisfactory results. In July last they carried 2196 tons, the receipts in connexion with which were £2698, whilst in March the number of tons had risen to 9284, and the receipts to £11,087. It was also added that the competition between the North-Western Railway Company and the Canal had, "by recent arrangement, been confined within definite bounds."

ST. MARY'S HOSPITAL.—The anniversary festival of this excellent institution was held on Thursday evening, at the London Tavern, where about 200 noblemen and gentlemen assembled for the purpose of contributing towards the fund for the completion of the Hospital, a view of which appeared in No 249 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. The Right Hon. Earl Mauvers took the chair, in place of His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, who, in a letter to the noble chairman, expressed his regret at being unable to attend, and inclosed a contribution of £20. The Bishop of London, who, in the discharge of his duties, evinced considerable interest in the institution, was supported by the Chevalier Bunsen, the Earl of Waldegrave, Lord Sayo and Sele, Lord Sir D Dundas, General Sir J. Macdonald, R Welby, Esq., and other distinguished gentlemen. During the evening, the secretary acknowledged subscriptions in aid of the charity to the large amount of £2600, and a legacy of £350 from the late Mr. King, of Great St. Mary's-lane-street.

ANNIVERSARY MEETING OF THE CHARITY CHILDREN AT ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL. This great meeting was held on Thursday, when every seat in the Cathedral was occupied. The arrangement differed somewhat from that in preceding years, the seats in the nave being raised above each other, instead of placed upon the floor, as heretofore. Divine service commenced at twelve o'clock, instead of three in the afternoon, as formerly. The prayers were read by the Reverend Mr. Hall; and the sermon, a very excellent discourse, was preached by the Lord Bishop of London. The musical performances were very effective; the choir consisting of the gentlemen of St Paul's, Westminster Abbey, the Chapel Royal, St. James's, and St. George's Chapel, Windsor. Messrs. Goss and Cooper presided at the organ; Grnns, Cuthy, and trumpets, Harpers. The principal vocalists were Messrs. Lockey, Machin, and Horsley. Among the visitors we observed the Marquis of Westminster, President, and party; the Earl of Westmoreland; Lord and Lady Rathven; Sir David Dundas; Lord Mayoress, &c.

ASYLUM FOR AGED GOVERNESSES.—The Committee of Management of this excellent branch of the Governesses' Benevolent Society will hold a FANCY SALE in the Grounds of the Asylum, at Reuish-town, on the 26th instant, at the Institution being opened by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, on Tuesday next. Many leading members of the aristocracy have consented to hold stalls, so from all that we have heard on the subject there is no doubt but that the building and endowment fund of the Institution will derive great benefit from the Sale. The terms of admission have been fixed at a moderate sum.

THE NATIONAL VACCINE ESTABLISHMENT.—The annual report published to the Secretary of the Home Department by the physicians and surgeons to this establishment states that during the past year 174,951 charges of lymph have been distributed, and 11,790 children have been successfully vaccinated by the surgeons appointed in the London districts The board have likewise received returns of 88,469 cases vaccinated with lymph sent from the office of the National Vacci e Establishment. The board have furnished large supplies of lymph for the use of the army and navy, and they regret that this falls in the course of their duty to transmit the genuine lymph to a large body of men amongst whom it is almost impossible to keep up a self-supply. In consequence of an alarming prevalence of small pox in several of the Ne ed Irish Islands, orders have been received from the Home Office and the State for the Colonies that lymph should be forwarded by ex ; packet in addition to the usual periodical supplies. The board have complied with these directions, and intelligence has already been received that the influence of the genuine efficacy of the lymph so sent. A large supply of lymph has been forwarded to Aden and to Sennde. The board have thus the satisfaction of returning the real boon of protection to that portion of the globe where the publication and spread of inoculation was first introduced into Europe. Possessing that valuable boon, the board regret that, according to accounts they have lately received, the practice of inoculation should, partially prevail to the extent it does, in Ireland. On the other hand it is encouraging to them to recur to the enlightened expressions used by the Lord Chief Justice of England on the liberality of the practice in this country, and they trust that the influence of so sound a judgment may be extended throughout her Majesty's dominions." The report is dated the 25th of May

THE LAW OF BANKRUPTCY.—A deputation of merchants and trade of London, headed by Mr. William Hawes, and accompanied by a deputation from Manchester, waited on Tuesday morning upon the Marquis of Lansdowne, at Lansdowne House, for the purpose of bringing under his notice the bill which is now before the House of Lords, on the subject of the amendment of the bankruptcy laws. Mr. W. Hawes explained that under the present system little or no protection was given to the trader against fraudulent debtors; and he pointed out the fact to his Lordship that not less than £50,000,000 annually were lost through debt fraudulently contracted. The object of the bill before the House of Lords was to remedy that frightful state of things; and the deputation had waited upon his Lordship to request that he would take the bill into his most careful consideration, the object of the bill was not to benefit a class, but to confer a national benefit, inasmuch as by creating commercial confidence, and preventing the recurrence of panics, a stimulus would be given to trade, and consequently to the employment of labour. He reminded his Lordship that the £50,000,000 of which he had spoken were not a loss to the trading community inasmuch as the merchants and traders charged it to the public in an increase on the price of their goods, and therefore it fell in the shape of a tax on the general public. The Marquis of Lansdowne said he was fully alive to the importance of the subject; and he quite agreed with Mr. Hawes that it was highly desirable that such a measure as the Bill had in view should be carried out. He had already been in communication with the Lord Chancellor and Lord Brougham on the subject, and he promised to give the bill his most earnest consideration.

—The deputation, on leaving Lansdowne House, proceeded to the residence of Lord Brougham, where they were received by his Lordship, who gave them a most favourable account as to the prospects of success for the bill. He expressed his determination of using every means in his power to secure its passing this session, and pointed out the probability of its being, and the reason why it should be, made a Government measure.

CURIOUS RELIC.—Mr. Haywood, the Surveyor of the City Sewers' Commission, laid before the members, on Tuesday, the jaw-bone of an animal, which was found in excavating for a sewer in Primrose-hill, Salsbury-[illegible] Mr. [illegible] ble anatomy, who pronounced it to be the lower jaw-bone of an extinct species of rhinoceros, and that the animal did not appear to have been full grown, as the back teeth had not reached the edge of the jaw-bone, but lie in the cell. The specimen is said to be exceedingly rare and valuable, not more than six others being known in the kingdom. The species was pronounced by the professor to have been in existence many ages before the creation of Adam. The jaw-bone was found fourteen feet six inches beneath the surface, upon the top of the blue clay, and 200 feet from the present river wall, just above the level of high water mark. It is to be added to the antiquities in the City Museum, by order of the Court

MANSION-HOUSE.—On Wednesday the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress had the honour of entertaining at dinner, in the Egyptian-hall, Alderman Sir C. Hunter, Bart., M. Gibbs, Sir G. Carroll, Hooper, and Farncomb, M.P., Sheriff Gordon, Mr. Under-Sheriff Shearman, Mr. Under-Sheriff Smith, and their respective ladies, the deputies of several wards, and about one hundred members of the Court of Common Council, with their ladies. Covers were laid for two hundred

STEAM-BOAT EXPLOSION AT LONDON-BRIDGE.—On Wednesday forenoon, shortly after ten o'clock, the numerous persons who were on board the Watermen steam-boat No. 8, were thrown into a state of alarm by the occurrence of a body of steam and fire being seen to issue from the engine-room; and, at the same time, two men, the engineer and stoker, making their appearance at the [illegible] stairs, terribly scalded, and crying for assistance, as the engine being no one to [illegible] engine-room to stop the machinery, it was found impossible to enter the steam-boat, and she continued her course down the river as far as Custom House Quay, where the captain ran her into the mud. A great number of watermen put off in their wherries, and succeeded in taking the whole of the passengers out of the steamer. The two men who were thus scalded were taken to St. Thomas's Hospital, when it was ascertained that the heads, faces, arms, and others par s of both parties were dreadfully injured From examination, it was [illegible] ed that one of the supply tubes had exploded, and the steam escaping therefrom had entered the furnace, and blown the hot cinders about. A similar explosion, by which two other men were scalded, took place on board the [illegible] vessel a short time since. The vessel was towed away to the company's wharf to be repaired.

FIRES AND LOSS OF LIFE.—On Thursday morning, between 12 and 1 o'clock, two fires occurred in the metropolis, which, in the course of a few minutes, laid in ruins property of considerable value, besides being attended with a loss of life. The first happened at No. 7, St. James's-place, Pentonville, in the occupation of Mr. Daniels, a solicitor. The fire continued its ravages unchecked until every room in the house was burned, and the furniture and apparel of the owners and servants reduced to ashes. A child of Mr. Dunn can be perished in the flames.— About the same time another fire broke out near the Britannia Saloon, Hoxton Old Town, on the premises of Mr. S [illegible] boot-manufacturer, in the High-street. Notwithstanding the exertions of the firemen, it was not until nearly every part of the building was destroyed, [illegible] stock in trade reduced to ruins, and the furniture of the various occupiers burned, that the conflagration could be extinguished.

FIRE AND FRIGHTFUL ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday morning a fire which, it is feared, will be attended with fatal consequences, broke out on the premises belonging to Mr. Claggett, an oil and Italian warehouseman, carrying on business at 182, Bermondsey-street, nearly opposite Bermondsey Old Church. The flames were first discovered by Miss Claggett, who aroused the other inmates, consisting of Mr. Charles Claggett, his brother, and the shop-boy. They all succeeded in reaching the second-floor front, and the alarm was then called to the conductor of the fire-escape stationed at the corner of the churchyard. The machine was immediately raised to the second floor, and Mr. Charles Claggett placed Miss Claggett in the canvas bagging, when all of a sudden the carriage in the escape shot outwards, and struck the front wall with such force as to throw the machine, when the bagging carried over, and the unfortunate girl fell upon the stone flags beneath, a distance of nearly thirty feet. The poor creature fell upon her head with such violence as to fracture her skull. Tanner, the escape man, to save his own life, was also compelled to jump from the second floor, and in so doing he was severally hurt. Mr. Thomas Claggett succeeded in getting out of one of the back windows, and forcing his body through a glass skylight, but in so doing he was frightfully cut over the body, and when he reached the street his night clothes we e covered with blood. The conductor again raised his escape in front of the house, and, having ascended the same, he succeeded in saving the lives of the other two persons, viz. Mr. Charles Claggett and the shop-boy. The engines of the parish, London Brigade, and West of England Company quickly attended, but the parish engineer had barely entered the shop when the breaking of the floor

THE LATE COUNTESS OF BLESSINGTON.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

MARGUERITE, COUNTESS OF BLESSINGTON.

We announce, with regret, the death of this eminent literary personage. The following details of her Ladyship's biography were communicated by herself a year or two before her death, and are here given in the very words the Countess used:—"Lady Blessington, the second daughter of Edmund Power, Esq., of Curraheen, and Clonea, in the county of Waterford, a Magistrate for the counties of Tipperary and Waterford, who rendered great service to the Government during the Rebellion, descended, by the paternal as well as maternal side, from two very ancient families: the Powers were of French origin, the name, when they settled in Ireland, having been De la Poer; and the Sheehys are of the old Milesian stock, originally possessed of large estates, and very highly connected.

"By Ellen Sheehy, his wife, Edmund Power, Esq., of Curraheen, had seven children, three sons and four daughters: the former were Michael Power, a Captain in the army, who died in the West Indies in 1809; 2 Edmund, who died in childhood; and 3 Robert, late a Captain in the 20th Regiment. The daughters were, 1, Anne, who died in her infancy. 2 MARGARITE, Countess of Blessington; 3 Ellen, married, first in 1810, to John Home Purvis, Esq., son of Sir Alexander Purvis, Bart.; and, secondly, in 1838, to the Right Hon. C. Manners Sutton, afterwards Viscount Canterbury; she and her husband both died in 1845, and 4th, Mary Anne, married in 1832 to the Count de St. Marsault."

Marguerite, Countess of Blessington, born 1st September, 1789, married, first, 8th March, 1804, Maurice Baggenal Farmer, Esq., of Poplar Hall and Laurel Grove, co. Kildare, then a Captain in the 47th Regiment; and secondly in February, 1818, Charles 4 Jhn Earl of Blessington, who died at Paris, 21st May, 1829. The following is a list of Lady Blessington's principal works, but she wrote besides several illustrated books of poetry, which are not included:—"The Magic Lantern," "Sketches and Fragments," "Tour in the Netherlands," "Conversations with Lord Byron," "The Idler at Jerusalem," "The Two Friends," "The Victims of Society." "The Idler in France." "The Idler in Italy." "The Governess." "Confessions of an Elderly Lady." "Confessions of an Elderly Gentleman." "Desultory Thoughts," "The Belle of a Season," "Lottery of Life," "Meredith," "Strathern." "Memoirs of a Femme de Chambre."

Lady Blessington's husband, Charles John Gardiner, second Viscount Mountjoy, and first Earl of Blessington, in the peerage of Ireland, was born on the 19th July, 1782, and died the 25th May, 1829, without male issue, when his honours became extinct. His union with the late Lady Blessington was his second marriage. His first wife was Mary Campbell, widow of Major William Browne, by whom her Lordship left issue a daughter, the Lady Harriet Anne Frances, who was married, on the 4th Dec., 1827, to Count Alfred D'Orsay, of fashionable and artistic celebrity.

The Countess of Blessington has been for years so prominent in the circles of fashion and literature, that her biography is familiar to all. She has had great and continued popularity as a poet, a novelist, and an essayist. Her life has passed in the society of the most eminent in intellect and rank; her beauty, her taste, and her fascinating manners have been the theme of a hundred writers, and the talk of Europe. After a sojourn of many years in London the Countess lately retired to the Continent. The sale of the furniture and property in her splendid residence in Kensington-Gore is but just concluded, and is, of course, in the knowledge of every one. Her Ladyship had fixed her new abode in Paris, and had taken a house there in the Rue du Cercle. Her rank, the literary fame, and her friendship with the President of the Republic gave the promise of much flattering distinction and social pleasure in the Parisian world of fashion, when the hand of death fell with awful suddenness upon her. She was seized with apoplexy on the morning of the 4th instant, and expired in the afternoon of the same day, in the arms of M. Simon, her homœopathic medical attendant.

* Lady Blessington's mother was Ellen, daughter of Edmund Sheehy, Esq

SIR EDWARD THOMASON.

SIR EDWARD died on the 29th ult., at his residence in Warwick, in the 80th year of his age, deservedly and deeply lamented. He was an eminent medallist and manufacturer of bronzes at Birmingham, and received the honour of knighthood, 27th June, 1839, for being instrumental in improving the Arts and Manufactures of England. He was likewise a knight of the Red Eagle of Prussia, of Francis I. of Merit, of the Order of the Lion of the Netherlands, of Isabel the Catholic of Spain, of the Sun and Lion of Persia, &c., and acted for upwards of 20 years as Vice-Consul for seven of the Continental powers. His name is known in literature by his "Autobiography during half a century."

Sir Edward was married to a daughter of Samuel Glover, Esq., of Abercarne.

JOHN FIELDEN, ESQ.

THIS eminent manufacturer made his own way to wealth and fame. He began his career of success by working at the loom with his own hands: his intelligence, industry, and perseverance soon made him a master and a man of fortune. He also became, in 1832, member for Oldham, and advocated the cause of ultra-reform in Parliament. He, however, particularly distinguished himself in his support of measures leading to ameliorate the condition of the manufacturing districts. His assertions were unceasing in regard to the memorable Ten Hours Bill, and he had the gratification of seeing, long before his death, the realisation of much that he sought for. In private life, as in public, Mr. Fielden was an amiable and benevolent man; and his loss is generally deplored. His death occurred at Todmorden, on the 28th ultimo. Mr. Fielden was member for Oldham for several years, until his recent retirement from Parliamentary life. It is, we hear, the intention of his friends and admirers to raise a monument to him in Westminster Abbey.

JOSEPH HENRY BLAKE, THIRD LORD WALLSCOURT.

At the period of his decease his Lordship had nearly completed his 52d year, having been born 2d June, 1797. He succeeded to the title as third baron at the decease of his cousin, in 1816; and married, in 1822, Elizabeth, only daughter of William Lock, Esq., of Norbury Park, Surrey, by whom he leaves issue a son—Erroll Augustus, the present Peer, born in August, 1841—and two daughters.

The late Lord Wallscourt entered the army at a very early age, and was present at the battle of New Orleans; he also served a short time in the Peninsula. Although somewhat peculiar in his habits and appearance, his Lordship was an accomplished gentleman, gifted with great acuteness of intellect and fine feelings of philanthropy. Lord Wallscourt died at Paris, after only a few hours' illness, of Asiatic cholera, on the 27th ult.

The founder of the family of Blake, in Ireland, was Richard Blake, a soldier of fortune, who accompanied Prince John to that kingdom in 1185; and, having obtained considerable grants of land in the county of Galway, settled there. Among the more immediate ancestors of the Lords Wallscourt, the most distinguished was the Right Hon. Sir Richard Blake, of Ardfry, one of the Privy Council in the reign of Charles I., Knight of the Shire for Galway in 1639, and Speaker of the Supreme Council of Kilkenny in 1648. The ladies of the Ardfry family were long celebrated for their beauty; and, in our own times, the hereditary loveliness of the race was remarkably seen in the late Countesses of Erroll and Cadogan—both aunts of the nobleman whose death we record.

GENERAL CHARLETON.

THIS gallant General was one of the oldest officers in our army: he entered the service as far back as 1772, and for the first forty years of his career he was very actively employed in the Artillery. The name of Thomas Charleton appears gazetted through every grade up to that of General, which this veteran leader attained the 10th January, 1837. General Charleton died on the 2nd instant, at his residence in Bath, in the 94th year of his age.

MADAME DORVAL.

THIS lady was the Mrs. Siddons of the modern French stage. While Mdlle. Rachel distinguished herself in the impersonation of classic heroines, Madame Dorval embodied with brilliant effect the female creations of Victor Hugo, A. Dumas, and Alfred de Vigny. Her most famous character was Marie Jeanne. Madame Dorval died a few days ago in Paris, aged 51. She never performed in England.

THE JEPHSON STATUE AND TEMPLE, AT LEAMINGTON.

THE prominent association of Dr. Henry Jephson with the prosperity of Leamington, is familiar to every frequenter of the Spa and its picturesque locality. Some time since it was resolved to commemorate this individual contribution to the success of the town by some public testimonial; and the erection of a statue of Dr. Jephson, to be placed in a temple of suitable design, was accordingly selected as the most appropriate tribute—the cost to be defrayed by public subscription.

STATUE OF DR. JEPHSON, BY H. HOLLINS.

TEMPLE ERECTED IN HONOUR OF DR. JEPHSON, AT LEAMINGTON.

The statue has been executed by Mr. Peter Hollins, and was exhibited, in an unfinished state, last year, at the Royal Academy. The model was taken about three years since; and the likeness of the worthy physician is considered to be very truthful. Its location was decided to be in a temple of classic design, erected in the Jephson Gardens, at Leamington; and Monday the 28th ult., was appointed for the inauguration—which took place on that day with great éclat, to the heightening of which the fine weather largely contributed.

At noon the covering of the statue was formally removed in the temple, and it was exhibited throughout the day to great numbers of persons, in whose minds the result of the artist's labours appeared to excite unqualified admiration. At three o'clock Mr. Sergeant Adams, from the steps of the temple, delivered an address to a considerable concourse of persons, whom he congratulated upon the issue of the movement, which originated in the desire to do honour to Dr. Jephson. At six o'clock in the evening a party of about one hundred noblemen and gentlemen celebrated the event by dining together at the Regent Hotel. The chair was very ably filled by Mr. Sergeant Adams, supported by Lord Somerville and Lord Guernsey. A band of music was in attendance, and the proceedings of the evening were enlivened by the amateur vocal efforts of several gentlemen of the party. After the usual loyal and general toasts had been fittingly given and heartily received, the health of Dr. Jephson was drunk with great enthusiasm, and the company received with evident pleasure an announcement made by the chairman, that the Doctor's London medical adviser regarded as probable such an improvement of the general health of his eminent patient as would lead to a partial restoration of sight.

Independently of the large influx of visitors attracted to the Spa by the splendid public amusements already announced for the summer season, consisting of horticultural exhibitions, archery fêtes, cricket matches, musical entertainments, &c., the above ceremony drew together a large concourse of Dr. Jephson's admirers from various parts of the kingdom.

COAL-MINE ON FIRE AT ASTLEY, NEAR MANCHESTER.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE

It is not often that one who has passed his early manhood amid the aristocratic influences which encompass a military officer's life in the British army, is subsequently found in the arena of politics, eagerly combatting in favour of the most advanced ideas of democratic Liberalism. Exceptions of the kind, however, do present themselves at times; and without staying to inquire whether the anomaly springs from any peculiarly full development in the temperament of the man, of the "spirit of contradiction," or from the overpowering force of strong convictions, suffice it to indicate the course of the hon. and gallant member for Middlesex as presenting a most distinguished instance of political independence of that rare character.

MR. B. OSBORNE, M.P. FOR MIDDLESEX.

The hon. gentleman is the son of Mr. Ralph Bernal, M.P. for Rochester, who has for so many years past, whenever the Whigs have been in office, discharged the important functions in the House of Commons of Chairman of Committees of the whole House on Government measures. He assumed the name of Osborne on his marriage, in 1844, with Catherine Isabella, only child and heiress of Sir Thomas Osborne, Bart., a large landed proprietor in the counties of Waterford and Tipperary, in Ireland. Previously, he was known in the House as Captain Bernal. He sat for the borough of Wycombe at that period, and was by no means a frequent speaker in debate; but, whenever he did address the House, it was always to the purpose, in a strain of common-sense, and with a felicitous earnestness of manner that commanded attention—his language being at times animated by a spirit of biting sarcasm against his opponents, and always evincing an increasing penchant towards ultra-Liberalism; until at length the ex-devant Aide-de-Camp of the Marquis of Normanby stood forth one of the most prominent in the ranks of the Radical members of the House. Accordingly, at the general elections in 1847, when the Middlesex Reformers resolved on having their county represented by two liberals, Mr. Osborne appeared in them the fittest man to represent their views, in conjunction with Lord Robert Grosvenor; and, after a smart contest, they succeeded in returning their man, and ousting the Conservative candidate, Colonel Thomas Wood, by a considerable majority.

Since then Mr. Osborne has advanced rapidly on the path upon which he had already entered, being a constant speaker on the leading topics of the day. When the House resolves itself into Committee of Supply, there are few items among the estimates for the public expenditure in which an abuse can be detected, that escape his carding attention. In general debates, it is not his usage to "come out" with a set prepared speech, so much as to rise with all the impromptu of a practised debater, and boldly attack the positions of some one or two of the leading previous speakers on the other side, while, at the same time, he urges his own views with forcible argument, with apt, and often quaint, illustration, and with a readiness of manner and matter which tells effectively against his opponents. His speech on Tuesday night in support of Mr. Hume's motion for Parliamentary Reform was an instance of that mode of address, though by no means so clever as many previous efforts of the same kind. Following Sir George Grey and Lord John Russell, he assailed what he regarded as their abandonment of their former liberal principles. He said, "It could not have escaped the observation of the House, and would not of the people, that the opposition to the motion had come, with one exception, not from the hereditary enemies of reform on the other side, but from the gentlemen who now occupied the Treasury bench. They had climbed into power on the credit of what had been done by the hon. member for Montrose and those who had been stigmatised as men of narrow and confined minds. With respect to the speech of the Secretary for the Home Department, there had, since the days of Julian the Apostate been no such conversion recorded in history. The right hon. gentleman voted for the ballot in 1842, but in 1849, when he was reminded of his vote, he said he was so convinced by the arguments against that measure that he voted against it. Thus history told them that Julian put on the garb of a monk whilst he practised paganism, but when he arrived at the supreme power he laughed at and persecuted Christianity. The last speech they had heard was a melancholy exhibition. What were the arguments of the noble Lord? He merely appealed to the conservative fears of the old women of this country. He said that the National Debt was to be attacked. What did the noble Lord say himself respecting the National Debt in his famous work on the Constitution. In that book he said that the Constitution was never fixed; but now he said it was a fixed and venerable Constitution. He stated that the National Debt had been the great cause of the taxation of the country; and, therefore, that if despotism were to be established in England it must begin by destroying the National Debt, the people, possibly, being willing to part with their liberties in exchange for a diminished pressure of taxation. How did such views tally with those now expressed by the noble Lord? The attempt to terrify those sensitive persons the fundholders was a 'weak invention of the enemy.' The Whig party were notoriously more aristocratic at all times, more anti-liberal in reality than those who avowedly opposed liberal principles. They might, for a purpose, have given station and power to those who rose from the people; but those whom they so patronised, in the words of Swift,

> Forget the dunghill where they grew,
> And think themselves the Lord knows who.

If he might offer any advice to those men of narrow and contracted minds, the free-traders, it would be that they should make a stand, separate themselves from that party which had proved itself an incubus on the country, and take the position which their talents would command. The noble lord would be left to declaim to empty benches, while they were carried into power on the shoulders of the people."

Mr. Osborne, besides acting in concert with the Free-Traders and political and financial reformers, has also taken up, on his own account, the vexed question of the Temporalities of the Irish Church, which for so many years was made the subject of an annual motion by the late Secretary to the Admiralty, Mr. Ward, then the independent member for Sheffield. He has on the paper at present a notice of motion for a Committee of the whole House on the question whether his efforts to obtain a different settlement of the matter from that now existing will be more successful than those of his predecessor, it would be useless to speculate. The subject is a good one for a "Tribune of the People," but the difficulties to be encountered are gigantic.

A COAL-MINE ON FIRE.

ABOUT five weeks since Mr John Darlington, of the Astley and Tyldesley Collieries, near Manchester, addressed to the Times journal a letter, detailing the successful result of an experiment made to put out a coal-mine on fire. The importance and interest of the result has induced us to illustrate its stages with the accompanying Engravings, which represent instantly to the eye the most prominent features of the letter.

Mr. Darlington states that on Monday morning, April 2[illegible] of the coal-mines at Astley was discovered to be on fire, and had spread to such an alarming extent as to prevent all access by the usual shafts. Mr. Darlington continues: "We immediately put out all the fires about the works, and requested the cottagers in the neighbourhood to do the same, for fear of an explosion. The plan of procedure in such cases (which happen more frequently than those unacquainted with collieries suppose) is, first, to stop down all openings into the mine, so as to prevent any access of the atmosphere. If, after some time, the fire is found not extinguished, the only alternative is to fill the mine with water from some source in the neighbourhood. In the absence of a sufficient reservoir of water, the pumps are stopped, and the water allowed to accumulate from the natural drainings, generally an unsatisfactory and slow process. In the former plan, notwithstanding every precaution is taken in sealing the shafts, it is found by experience that air in small quantities will be drawn through the stoppings and fissures of the earth, sufficient to keep up a slow state of combustion for a very long period. We have proof of this in many cases occurring in this neighbourhood. In the extensive collieries worked by Lord Bradford, at Bolton, the mine has been on fire nearly two years. When the fire happened, it was sealed up for some months; but on opening it, the fire was still found burning. The pits were again immediately sealed up, and left to remain for twice the former period. On opening the mine at this time, the fire burst out as before. It was again closed, and so remains to this day. At the collieries of the Earl of Ellesmere, at Worsley, one of the mines took fire about the same time; it was treated in the same way; it is still burning; and, at this moment, his Lordship is about to turn in the Bridgewater Canal. In the Patricroft Colliery, the deepest mine in this county, a fire broke out in the upper part of the workings, which baffled every attempt to extinguish it, and it is now stopped up and abandoned. At Mr. Blundell's colliery, at Blackrod, in this district, the pits were opened after being closed some time, on account of fire, when a fearful explosion took place, and did considerable mischief to the workings. The fire burned with greater intensity than ever; the flames rose out of the mines and set fire to the head-gear, and burned so fiercely within the pit that it actually melted the iron tram-wheels. In this case the river Douglas was eventually turned into the workings.

In the above case, Mr. Darlington instantly sealed up the mine; yet fire-damp issued from every crevice about the stoppings, and through orifices in the earth, in such quantities that the safety-lamps took fire at a considerable distance. "In this state of things (continues Mr. Darlington) I wrote to Mr. Goldsworthy Gurney, whose application of high-pressure steam to the ventilation of coal-mines is exciting so much interest, stating the case, and asking if he thought he could point out any plan by high-pressure steam exhaustion, or otherwise, likely to be of service. Mr. Gurney immediately came down: and, after well investigating the conditions, in consultation with us, proposed to fill the mine with carbonic acid, azote, or some other extinguishing and incombustible gas. This, at first, appeared to us impracticable, and the immense quantities required to fill the galleries and lateral workings, together above three miles in length, too expensive, if it were possible to obtain it, to warrant the proposition. He, however, soon set us right. His said azote, or nitrogen, might be obtained from the winds of heaven; and carbonic acid from the coals lying waste about the pit, assisted by a little charcoal and lime; air would be deprived of its oxygen by being passed through burning charcoal, coke, and small coal, and the azote set free. In short, the product of this combustion would be the choke, or black-damp, known in mines.

"We immediately built a furnace of brickwork four feet square, at a safe distance from the downcast shaft. To the ashpit, in every other respect made tight, an iron cylinder 13 inches in diameter was connected, and made to terminate at an elbow under water in a close tank partly filled. With the upper part of this tank, above water, another pipe was connected and carried through the stopping of the downcast pit. A powerful steam jet was made to work between the furnace and the tank, which drew the air down through the fire, and forced it through the water. A second jet was placed in the cylinder at the top of the downcast shaft, and made to draw the choke-damp from the tank, and force it into the pit. At the other or upcast shaft we placed a jet in a cylinder connected through the stopping, and made to exhaust from the shaft beneath, so as to assist the compressing jets, and draw the choke-damp through the galleries between them. The apparatus thus fitted, as soon as the fire had burnt up, was set in action. In order to test the effect of the choke-damp, we placed some burning tow, moistened with spirits of turpentine, into it. The flame was instantly extinguished as if placed in water. It was thus tested in the cylinder, as it passed from the ash-pit, before coming to the jet; also in the tank and second cylinder, with similar results. This was satisfactory evidence of the per-

h. Jet made to exhaust from the pit at the bottom of the upcast shaft, and assist in drawing the choke-damp through the galleries and fect formation of the choke-damp. In about two hours after the fats were set in action fire-damp disappeared from the shafts, and we observed a slight cloudy appearance in the escapage from the upcast shaft. It had the sulphurous smell of choke-damp, which pervaded the air to a considerable distance. A safety-lamp was now brought and placed in the up-cast cylinder; it became instantly extinguished as if put in water. For this purpose the draughts were momentarily shut off. A bright burning fire of charcoal, in a chafing-dish, was placed in the escapage at the cylinder, and was also immediately extinguished. These facts were conclusive evidences that the choke-damp had passed through the mine. The period of its appearance agreed with our calculations. The quantity of choke-damp forced through the mine was about 6000 cubic feet per minute, and this would fill the galleries in about that time. The choke-damp was a lowed to remain for several hours, at the termination of which we went in. The effects of the all fire, however intense, must be extinguished in the mine. The connection with the furnace was now broken, and fresh air driven through by the same fans. In about two hours the choke-damp disappeared; this was shown by a safety-lamp burning clearly in the escapage, in the cylinder at the up-cast shaft.

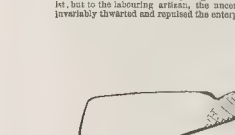
"We regarded the mine now as perfectly safe. With several men I descended the downcast shaft, 320 feet deep, to the tunnel leading to the workings. We found all clear. The exhausting fan was kept up, drawing fresh air through the mine all night. The next day, several workmen went down and passed through the workings, and found all clear and safe. The entire repair was particularly creditable. In no part of the mine could they perceive any fire, and the action of the steeple fan in the upcast is described by them as passing a current with greater speed than the furnace (which is pronounced to be the most effectual one in the county) had ever before done in this or any of the oil er mines of which I am the proprietor. The result has excited the greatest interest in our neighbourhood. Never was an experiment more successful. A gigantic power under such complete control, fighting with the elements, and, as it were, compelling them to destroy each other. The application of high-pressure steam to the ventilation of coal-mi as may effect a greater protection to life and property; but we regard this applicat on as little inferior to the coal trade, and a triumph of science equal to any of the present day. The steam jet is now used to ventilate the mine; the galleries are perfectly clear, and the men are working with naked candles. In all the progressive stages of coal mining, but more particularly of the present time, when we find that, by the introduction of machinery, the expenditure of capital has become one of the most prodigal sources of wealth, not only to the capitalist, but to the labouring artisan, the uncertain value of mineral property has invariably thwarted and repulsed the enterprise of the nation. To-day we may have a remunerative adventure, watched over by the genius of revealed theory and practice; while to-morrow may discover it has become the element of wholesale destruction to life, or a wreck of private hazard and national wealth. This experiment goes far to remove the impending danger, and render those difficulties which hitherto have been insuperable easy to be overcome, and at so trifling a cost, as to be within reach of the smallest capitalist.

"The simplicity of the experiment is only surpassed by its novelty; and the success is unquestionably the most perfect that any single demonstration could possibly have produced. The advantages are more numerous than we can here detail. Supposing an ordinary fire requires the shafts to be sealed for two months, what is the proprietor to do in the meantime, if he cannot reduce the fire to a given space in the mine? His connexions in trade, if not entirely lost, are restricted and broken; the mine injured and ransacked; and the working colliers left to starve out the interim. His annual rents, interest of capita., and the more serious disbursements of incidental expenses, fall heavily upon him; whereas by immediately making use of our experiment would put the mine in a working condition with a delay of not more than two days. These facts are brought before the public for the benefit of all classes, being a public remedy for a national loss. To the mercantile community of Mr. Gurney we are indebted for them. He voluntarily tendered his services; and, owing to his ability, the mineral property of this kingdom has been insured against the destructive element of fire, and consequently made more convenient for capital. I may add, the expense of this experiment was trifling compared to the inconvenience, delay, and cost of letting in water to fill the mine and pumping it out again, being not more than as many pence as the other would have been pounds."

We have much pleasure in acknowledging our obligation to Mr. Gurney, for the readiness with which he has enabled our artist to illustrate the experiment, by furnishing us with the requisite sketches—one showing a sectional view of the mine, and the other the extinguishing apparatus. It is hoped that this illustration of the means may lead to its general adoption. Its necessity was accidentally proved by an occurrence immediately after the date of Mr. Darlington's letter, and which he thus notices in a postscript:—

"Since writing the above, the extensive mines worked by Messrs. Ackers, Whitley, and Co., near Leigh, have caught fire, owing to the carelessness of the man employed to keep up the furn.ce, and the shafts are at this moment sealed up. The fire was discovered after it had consumed the brattice from supporting the lower lift of pumps, which fell down the pit before the sealing was made. The proprietors have, at present, only resorted to the old plan of closing up the shafts."



THE STANFIELD HALL MURDERS.

In our Journal for May 26 we briefly recorded the finding of "the only link wanting to complete the chain of evidence" against Rush—a bell-mounted double-barrelled blunderbuss, to which fits exactly the ramrod found at Stanfield Hall on the night of the murder of Messrs. Jermy.

Upon readon this statement in the Times, it occurred to Mr John W. P. Field, of the firm of Parker, Field, and Sons, gun-makers, 233, High Holborn, that a man exactly answering Rush's description bought such a gun of him on the 13th of July last; and feeling quite convinced that the gun found was that which he had sold, and feeling, further, that it was Rush who bought it, Mr. Field immediately wrote to Sir J. Bolleau on the subject, and described the gun exactly and on the following day Colonel Oakes brought the gun found at Potash for Mr. Field to see, and it proved to be that which he sold. The person who bought it had a stick made for making cartridges, was shown the manner of making them, and was also supplied with slugs, flints, &c. The gun is a flint double-barrelled bayonet blunderbuss, of which an outline is annexed.

IRELAND.

THE CHOLERA.—At a meeting of the Sanatory Association, held on Monday last, Sir E. Borough, the chairman, made the following report on the subject of cholera in Dublin:—"In the Kilmainham Hospital, up to the 28th of May (the souh), there were admitted of cases 1 of these, there had been 37 deaths, 40 recovered, and there remained in hospital 29 on that day, 4th of June. In the Brunswick-street Hospital, there were in hospital on the 28th of May 10 patients, admitted since, 26; of these, 9 died, 12 recovered, and 14 still remained in hospital. In the North Union he was glad to say that the absurd disinclination to afford reports to the public of the state and progress of the disease no longer existed. It was most honourable why the North Union guardians should have so long continued to countenance so mischievous a line of conduct; but now he was happy to say that the board at length regarded the desirability of furnishing to the Association correct reports of the aspect and character of the epidemic in the North Union. In the Green-street Hospital there were remaining, on the 26th of May, 71 cases; admitted since, 6 cases; deaths, 30; remaining in hospital, 35. The entire number of cases admitted into Greenstreet Hospital since its opening was 183; of these, there had been 80 deaths, 77 recovered, and remaining were in hospital 26." The chairman observed that the cholera, he regretted to say, was on the increase in the city. In the 3d or Queen's Regiment of Foot there had been 31 cases, and of these 27 ended fatally. The disease broke out on board the ship-of-war Barrosa, and had followed them to their quarters in the Park. The deaths occurred amongst young and able men, with but two exceptions.

DUBLIN GARRISON.—The forces now stationed in Dublin consists of one troop of Royal Horse Artillery, six companies of Royal Artillery, three cavalry regiments, six regiments of infantry, 800 enrolled pensioners, and the staff of the Dublin City Militia; making an effective force of 6700 men.

COUNTY OF LIMERICK ELECTION.—The election for a representative, in the room of Mr. Smith O'Brien, took place on Friday week, in the Court-house of Limerick. In consequence of the retirement of Mr T. Fitzgerald, Mr. Samuel Dickson was returned without opposition. His policy is, "measures, not men."

THE MEMORIAL ON BEHALF OF THE STATE PRISONERS.—The deputation appointed to present the National Memorial (signed by 150,000 persons) in favour of the State prisoners, proceeded to the Viceregal Lodge, on Tuesday afternoon, to the Vice-Regal Lodge, in the Park, when the Lord Mayor read and presented the document; to which his Excellency returned the following reply:—"My Lord Mayor and Gentlemen,—From the moment that the sentences of the law was pronounced upon the prisoners, on whose behalf you have addressed me, I have felt bound to give the most anxious consideration to the unhappy condition in which they were placed, so far as I could pay regard to their condition, consistently with the obligations imposed on me in the exercise of those powers and prerogatives of the Crown with which I am invested. I have felt deeply concerned for the unfortunate situation of men whose lives are forfeited to the offended laws of their country; but an imperative duty compels me to look to the nature and character of the crime of which they have been convicted—to the circumstances preceding and attending it—and, above all, to the consequences which might have resulted from its temporary success. I cannot disregard matters unfortunately too notorious: the disturbance of the public peace, the dislocation of society for many weeks throughout an extensive district, the armed opposition to the constituted authorities of the realm, the serious loss of life, and the public alarm and insecurity which pervaded the utter havoc which seemed, for a brief time, impending over many parts of the country from their wild and desperate proceedings—all must avowed rebellion and treason against her Majesty, and her rights to the Crown and Sovereignty of Ireland. I fully appreciate the motives of humanity which have prompted this appeal, but in reply to it I am at present only to assure you that the Government, in the performance of its duty, can have no other desire than that justice should be administered without any severity beyond that which the interests of society demand." Among the gentlemen composing the deputation were the Lord Mayor of Dublin, the Mayors of Cork, Waterford, and Limerick, Sir Colman O'Loghlen, Bart., and J. Butt, Esq., Q.C. It was officially notified on the same day to Mr Margetts, the Governor of the Richmond Bridewell, that the sentence of death passed upon Messrs. O'Brien, Meagher, M'Manus, and O'Donoghue, had been commuted to transportation for life. It is understood that the State Prisoners will leave this country for their destination in the course of the present week.

THE STATE PRISONERS.—DECISION OF THE GOVERNMENT.—A letter was, on Saturday last, received in Dublin from Sir J. G. S. O'Brien, now in London, announcing that the decision of the Cabinet on the case of the State prisoners has been officially communicated to him. The sentence pronounced at Clonmel, on Messrs. Smith O'Brien, Meagher, M'Manus, and O'Donoghue, has been commuted to transportation for life, and Van Diemen's Land will be their destination.

Mr. Thomas D. Reilly, in his paper, the New York People, of the 12th May, avows himself the author of the article in the United Irishman, written after the French revolution, about erecting barricades, ripping up streets, &c., and which was principally relied on by the Crown for the conviction of John Mitchell for felony.

FOREIGN PLAYING-CARDS.—An importation having recently taken place from France of a quantity of playing-cards, which were imported into this country for the express purpose of being sent immediately to San Francisco, California, and for that purpose were cleared for exportation only, they were seized by the officers of the revenue, on account of not having printed or marked on each card as required by law. The law requires that foreign playing-cards shall have the name and place of residence of the maker printed or marked on one card of every pack, by virtue of the 5 & 6 Geo. IV., cap. 12, sec. 33, which is still in force. The parties have subsequently applied to the Lords of the Treasury for the release of the cards, as the importation had arisen from ignorance of the British law on the part of the shipper abroad, and that at least the cards should not be altogether retained as a seizure by the Crown, and destroyed, but allowed to be returned to the place of original shipment. This application has been seconded to by their Lordships.

ON FRIDAY, the Queen and gentry of Bucks presented a handsome vase cup to W. Selby Lowndes, Esq., the master of the Windsor Hunt.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The effect of the abundance of unemployed money upon the price of Government securities is (Exchequer Bills and Indi.. Bonds excepted) neutralised by the increasing scarcity of bankers' balances and good bills. This fact displays itself very strongly every day. The purchases made in the English funds on behalf of the public are on the most limited scale, arising from an indisposition to invest at the present prices, under existing circumstances. During the past week, quotations have been nearly all dependent up on speculative operations. Consols on Monday opened with sma. finances, at 91¼ 92, and a push was made by the party for the rise, which advanced the price to 92¾, and again on Tuesday to 92⅞. This was not, however, supported; and the closing quotation was 92⅝, followed by a reaction of ⅛ per cent. on Wednesday, Consols marking 91⅞. The protracted difficulties arising from the French interference with Rome, coupled with the price of French rentes, coming worse from Paris, were the causes of the heavy depression which found the prices of those securities, and Exchequer Bills continue steady at previous rates. At the close of the week the market was dull, with Bank Stock, 196; Reduced, 90⅞; Consols, 91⅝; New 3½ per Cents, 92⅛; Long Annuities, 19 1-16; Exchequer Bills, January, 1850, 8s; Ditto, 30 years, October ., 0, 1859, 8 8-16; Ditto, 30 y..rs, January, 1, 1851, 8 13-16; India Bonds, under £1000, 71 p.; Consols for Account, 91⅛; Exchequer Bills, £1000 ditto, 68 p.; £500, ditto, 68 p.

The Portuguese Financial agency have advertised payment of the tenth half-yearly instalment of the Annuities, 1845, on and after Thursday, the 14th, also, the dividends for the second half-years, 1847; as well as the dividends of the December and January "ex scrios," of which 75 per cent. will be paid in cash, and the remainder in debentures, to create a Three per Cent. stock. In the Foreign Market business continues limited, Mexican being the only security in which any decided change has occurred. Alarm for future dividends has depressed the price about ½ per cent. since last week. The last quotations of actual bargains are For Buenos Ayres Bonds, 5 x per Cent., 36; Mexican, Five per Cent., 1845, 29; Ex Coupons, Account, 26½; Peruvian Bonds, Four per Cents, 53; Portuguese, Converted, five per Cent., 36; Ditto, Four per Cent., 25¼; Spanish, Five per Cent., Passive, 3⅞; Ditto, Three per Cent., 20½; Dutch, Two and-a-Half per Cent., 49; Ditto, Four per Cent. Certificates, 79⅞. The last quotations in the Share Market proving to have been a mere, prices made some slight advance previously to its final close. When, however, Consols receded on Wednesday, the Share Market also declined, and prices continue heavy, as the accompanying list will show:—Bank Shares, 194; Aberdeen, Monthly, 4½; Boston, and Eastern Junction, 1; Boston, Stamford, and Birmingham, 84; Bristol and Exeter, 69½; Buckinghamshire, 18 dis.; Caledonian, 20½; Chester and Holyhead, 14½; Eastern Counties, 11; Ditto Guaranteed 5 per Cent., 11½ x d; Eastern Union, Class A (late E. U. Shares), Scrip, Six per Cent., 19½; East Lancashire, Six per Cent., Preference Quarters, 74; Great Northern, 92; Ditto Extension, 5¼; Great Southern and Western (Ireland), 20⅛; Great Western, Quarter Shares, 164; Ditto, Fifths, 15; Ditto, New, £17, 10s; Hull and Selby, 97½; Leeds and Bradford, 80; Lancashire Union, 20; London and North Western, 125¾; Ditto, New, Quarters, 9⅞, Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, 87; Ditto, New, £10 Preference, 11½; Midland, 68½; North Staffordshire, 12½; Reading, Guildford, and Reigate, 5; Shropshire Union, 2½; Wilts, Somerset, and Weymouth, 30; York, Newcastle, and Berwick, 20½; York and North Midland, Preference, 5½; Boulogne and Amiens, 6½; Northern of France, 9½ Orleans and Rouennes, 3; Paris and Strasbourg, 4; Rouen and Havre, 9⅜.

NEW SILVER COINAGE.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer and Mr. Shaw Lefevre introduced a bill which extends the provisions of the 56th George III., cap. 68, relating to the silver coinage of the realm. The bill also provides that from and after the passing of the act, it may be lawful for her Majesty's Worker and Master of the Mint, at her Majesty's Mint in London, to coin any silver bullion which shall be delivered at his Mint, into silver coins of a standard fineness of 11 ounces 2 pennyweights of fine silver, and 18 pennyweights of alloy in the pound troy in weight after the rate of 66s. to every pound troy, whether the same be coined in crowns or in pieces of any other denomination.

ABOLITION OF SUNDAY TRADING.—The bill prepared and brought in by Mr. Henley and Mr. Brotherton, entitled "A Bill to prevent unnecessary Sunday Trading in the Metropolis," and to prevent all persons shall sell any market, or sell, or hawk, or cry, or offer or expose for sale, any goods on a Sunday, and that goods, if offered for sale on that day, may be seized by the police, and, if not claimed before twelve o'clock in the following day, and in case of a fine the same may be disposed of by the magistrates. The second clause enacts that nothing in the act contained shall prevent any person hawking or selling milk, or fruit, or pastry, or any beverage the sale of which does not require a beer, or newspapers or other periodicals, or any person selling or causing to be sold meat or fish before nine o'clock in the morning, or any person selling cooked meat, tea, or coffee, or other articles or goods required for immediate use or consumption within any coffee-shop, cook-shop, or eating-house, or other place, before ten o'clock in the morning, or after one o'clock in the afternoon, or to lodgers or other persons residing upon any such premises during any part of the day, or any chemist, druggist, or apothecary selling medicines, or drugs, or other articles for medicinal purposes, or any person selling articles required in case of sickness or sudden emergency. Nothing in the act contained is to prevent any person selling cooked meat, or other ready-dressed victuals or provisions, or making any steam-packet or other vessel, or within any tavern, hotel, club-house, public-house, or beer-shop, to be consumed in or upon the premises, except so far as the selling any such cooked meat, or ready-dressed victuals or provisions, is prohibited by law.

Mr. Timothy Tyrrell, the solicitor to the late City Sewers Commission has been elected to the office of solicitor under the new bill.

Sir Moses Montefiore embarked from Marseilles on Sunday, for Malta, in the steamer Medina, being upon a visit to the East by the humane of the quarter of the world. Sir Moses is accompanied by his wife, six domestic servants, and a rabbi.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—A very limited quantity of English wheat has been on offer during the present week, yet the demand, owing to the pressure of foreign qualities for sale, has ruled heavy, at 2s to some instances, a fully equal decline in the quotations. The imports of foreign wheat have been on a moderate scale, nevertheless the supply has exceeded the wants of the millers, and prices have receded 1s per quarter. Barley has ruled dull, and somewhat lower to go chase. In malt no alte hations was transacted that the quotations have been almost nominal. Oats have moved off slowly, at 6d to 1s per quarter less money. In beans, peas, and flour scarcely any business has been transacted.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 40s to 42s; ditto, white, 42s to 43s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 40s to 42s; ditto, white, 42s to 47s; rye, 28s to 30s, grinding barley, 20s to 22s, distilling ditto, 23s to 27s, malting ditto, 28s to 34s; Norfolk and Lincoln malt, 50s; brown ditto, 42s to 48s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 60s; Chevalier, 60s to 62s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 14s to 17s; potato ditto, 16s to 20s, Youghal and Cork, black 13s to 15s; ditto, white, 15s to 18s; Limerick, Sligo, and Londonderry, 14s to 15s; Dublin and Belfast, 15s to 17s; Scotch ditto, 16s to 18s; grey peas, 30s to 32s, maple, 34s to 36s; white, 36s to 37s, beans, 28s to 30s; Lincoln and Essex, 30s to 32s; Scotch and Suffolk, 31s to 33s; tick beans, 32s to 34s per 8 bs.—Foreign. Dantzig red wheat, —s to —s; white, —s to —s; Baltic, —s to —s; Marianopoli, —s to —s; grain, —s to —s; peas, —s to —s per quarter. Flour, American, 22s to 24s per barrel; Baltic, 19s to 21s per cental.

The Seed Market.—Canary seed is sold at very high prices. In other articles exceedingly little business is doing.

Liverpool, English, grey. 34s to 38s; Baltic, crushing, 32s to 36s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 28s to 34s. Hempseed, 32s to 36s per quarter Coriander, 16s to 22s per cwt. Brown Mustard seed, 6s to 10s; white ditto, 8s to 12s. Tares, 9s 6d to 9s 6d per bushel. English Rapeseed, new, £22 to £26 per last; per quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £9 10s to £10 0s, foreign, £8 0s to £8 10s per 1000. Rapeseed cakes, £5 10s to £6 0s per ton. Canary, 12s; to 16s per quarter. English Clover-seed, red, 40s to 48s; white, 40s to 48s, Cheveller, 50s to 60s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire ditto, 44s to 48s; extra, —s to —s; white, —s to —s; extra, —s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 7d to 7½d: of household do. 5d to 6½d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 44s 4d; barley, 27s 10d; oats, 17s 7d; rye, 30s 6d; beans, 34s 7d; peas, 32s 4d

The Weekly Average.—Wheat, 42s 4d; barley, 28s 8d; oats, 17s 6d; rye, 32s 10d; beans, 30s 8d; peas, 31s 1d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 1s 0d; barley, 1s 0d; oats, 1s 0d; rye, 1s 0d; beans, 1s 0d; peas, 1s 0d.

Tea.—Our market is very flat for nearly all kinds of tea, yet prices generally are well supported.

Sugar.—A fair average business has been transacted in raw sugar this week, at full rates of currency. Refined goods have ruled heavy, 58s to 62s per cwt; English crushed, 56s.

Coffee.—We have rather more inquiry for this article; but we have no improvement to notice in its value.

Rice.—All descriptions move off slowly at barely stationary prices.

Provisions.—Owing to the continued warm weather, the demand for all kinds of foreign butter is heavy, at a decline in value of from 2s to 4s per cwt. Fine Irish is selling at 60s to 64s; fine Kiel and Holland, 62s to 64s; and inferior kinds, 48s per cwt. In Irish bacon very little is doing, at late rates. In foreign, 52s to 54s per cwt. Hams, 52s to 56s. Lard, 52s to 54s. The imports of butter into London for the last twelve months amount to 20,000 tons. The imports of cheese last month were upwards of 7,000 tons.

Spirits.—Rum is in fair request, at stationary prices. Brandy moves off slowly, at late rates. Corn spirits dull, at 2s 9d per gallon, net cash.

Coals.—New Tanfield, 13s 6d; Tanfield Moor, 12s; Wylam, 13s 6d; Bewicks and Co., 14s 6d; Hetton, 15s 3d; Stewart's, 15s 6d; and Tees, 15s 3d per ton.

Seeds.—Linseed Cake.—Yesterday, £8 to £8 5s per ton; English, crushed, 54l, at 55s to 56s.

Hops.—The plantation accounts not being considered favourable, holders refuse to sell, except at an advance of 5s per cwt

Wool.—As imports have been very moderate since our last. Privately, the demand is in a sluggish state, at almost stationary prices.

Potatoes.—Scarce y any home-grown potatoes are on offer; but the supplies of foreign continue extensive. All kinds are heavy, and slow to purchase.

Provisions.—Beef, Pork, Mutton, Veal, and Lambs have commanded a steady sale, at full prices. In our kinds of fat stock only a limited business has been transacted.—

Beef, from 2s 4d to 3s 8d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s 2d; lamb, 4s 10d to 6s 8d; veal, 3s 4d to 4s 6d; and pork, 3s 2d to 4s 2d per 8lbs, to sink the offals.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—The markets have been tolerably firm since our last report, at our quotations.—

Beef, from 2s 8d to 3s 8d; mutton, 3s 4d to 3s 10d; lamb, 4s 8d to 5s 10d; veal, 3s 4d to 3s 10d; and pork, 3s 2d to 4s 0d per 8lbs, by the carcase.

THE STORM AT KENTISH-TOWN, ON TUESDAY.

VIOLENT THUNDER-STORM ON TUESDAY.

ON Tuesday afternoon the metropolis and suburbs were visited by a terrific storm, which was very severely felt in Kentish-Town, the locality of the accompanying Illustration. Here the lightning struck a remarkably fine old elm, which had long sheltered the tavern known as "the Assembly Rooms." Some of the larger limbs of the tree were struck to the ground, and nearly fell upon a man who was passing.

The meteorological report of Tuesday is briefly as follows:—The temperature was exceedingly oppressive, the thermometer rising to above 80 degrees in the shade. The sun during the former part of the day shone forth brilliantly, and the sky was clear. About 2 P.M., however, a slight breeze sprang up, and shortly after heavy lead-coloured clouds came from the south-west, and the parts of London over which they passed were visited by a mingled shower of hail and rain of a very violent character. The hailstones, or rather cubes of ice, were occasionally as large as walnuts.

Much damage was done by the violence of the storm. Baron Rothschild, of Gunnersbury House, Acton, had 2940 squares of glass broken by the hailstones. Two market-gardeners, living at Starch Green, had more than 1000 panes broken. Mr. Day, of Hammersmith, had many smashed; and a great number of private dwellings around Turnham Green, Acton, &c., had the windows broken. Some of the hailstones were nearly two inches long, and of an uneven oblong shape.

THAMES REGATTA.—The days originally fixed by the committee of management were the 26th and 27th of June; but, in consequence of the want of funds, the 10th and 11th July were afterwards substituted. This arrangement, however, being very inconvenient to the members of the Oxford University Boat Club, who were anxious to row at this regatta, that at Henley being held during the Oxford Term, the committee have determined that the days originally fixed shall be adhered to, and in doing so they have trusted to the liberality of the public to place the necessary funds at their disposal.

OPENING OF VAUXHALL GARDENS.

M. ALBERT'S BOTTLE FEAT, AT VAUXHALL GARDENS.

ON Monday night, this resort, of olden celebrity—which rumour has so often disturbed, and even built upon—was opened for the season, with the unusual auspices of fine weather. The "Royal property" has passed to a new management, who have shown great taste in various improvements throughout the grounds. Indeed, so numerous are the changes, that Vauxhall appears in a sort of rejuvenescence, or réjouissance: its charms reminding one of Walpole's huckaback beauties, that never wear out. Thus, we have the extension of the Italian Walk, with its sculptures—a beautiful addition, of which we said something last week. The "60,000 additional lamps" is no longer speaking by the bill: the fireworks are unusually brilliant: in short, the fairy place is fresh and sparkling with novelty at every turn.

The entertainments on Monday commenced with a vocal and instrumental concert, conducted by Mr. A. Lee: the National Anthem followed the opening portion, and was loudly applauded. The singing of Lindpaintner's "Standard-bearer" by Mr. G. A. Irving, a youthful vocalist, was very favourably received; and Mr Rose's comic songs were much enjoyed: for Vauxhall must have its drolleries as well as its elegance.

At the termination of the first part of the concert, the equestrian performances commenced in the Rotunda. Theatre, where young Hernandez electrified the spectators with his somersaults, flying leaps, and elegant evolutions. M. Auriol, the "Prince of Clowns," also went through certain "impossible" performances; one of which—the Bottle Feat—we have illustrated. First, our Parisian drôle places about a dozen wineberries upon a table in the centre of the arena, and then commences a march upon the said bottles, balancing himself, and walking easily—a result rarely secured by converse with the "boule." Auriol, then, with the same unsure footing, goes through the exercise of the fusee, and concludes by firing off the piece, as shown in the ENGRAVING.

The entertainments wound up with fireworks, which were excellent.

There are too many changes in the Gardens for us to chronicle. The sculpture has a very light and cool effect: the pictures—as Moulian by Moonlight—are exhibitions in little; the music is spirited and abundant; and the thousands of lamps are almost thrown into shade by the electric light, which sheds its supernatural halo round the whole place, and even shoots its rays across the river. The refection business has, also, been much improved: though we dare say the ham is still cut by the acre, and the punch maintains its pristine standard.

We are happy to add that the Gardens were crowded throughout the evening; and in the principal walks promenaded a large proportion of elegantly dressed company.

CHESS TOURNAMENT AT PARIS.

A contest of some interest to the amateurs of Chess has lately come off in the French metropolis, between eight frequenters of the celebrated Café de la Régence, and eight players of the Cercle des Echecs. The combatants selected for the occasion were:—

CAFÉ.	CERCLE.	CAFÉ.	CERCLE.
1. M. Saborio	opposed to M. Lemaître	5. M. Preti	opposed to M. Devinck
2. — Christoph	— Guibert	6. — Garcin	— Crampel
3. — Warnet	— Marguerite	7. — Des Guis	— Pujol
4. — Vaucorot	— Laroche	8. — Seguin	— Delannoy

We are precluded, by the limits of our allotted space, from detailing the particulars of the struggle. It must suffice to say that the well-practised habitués of the Café had the advantage, six out of their eight competitors—viz. MM. Seguin, Warnet, Saborio, Christoph, Preti, and Des Guis—being proclaimed victorious, and entitled to the prizes.

The two following are among the best of the games with which we have been favoured, up to this time; in a few days, when the remainder reaches us, we trust to select some of greater interest, and a higher order of play:—

ALLGAIER GAMBIT.

(Played between M. Saborio and M. le Dr. Laroche.)

WHITE (M. S.)	BLACK (M. le Dr. L.)	WHITE. (M. S.)	BLACK (M. le Dr. L.)

12. Q B to K 3d	P to Q R 3d (a)	24. R takes Kt	Kt to Q 7th (ch)

And White surrendered.

(a) This is feeble play. Black should rather have brought a leading piece into action.

(b) K to B 2d appears a preferable move.

(c) A serious oversight indeed. He ought to have played out his Q B, and then have Castled on the Q's side

(d) Subjecting himself to attack without any necessity whatever for doing so. Why not have played the Kt to Q 5th?

(e) Q to her 2d would obviously have cost White a piece; and if Q to her sq Black must always have gained a Pawn.

(f) This loses him the game.

CENTRE GAMBIT.

(Played between M. Warnet and M. le Dr. Laroche.)

WHITE (M. W.)	BLACK (M. le Dr. L.)	WHITE (M. W.)	BLACK (M. le Dr. L.)

6. K B to Q B 4th	P to Q B 3d	13. Kt to K Kt 6th—checkmate.
7. Castles	P to Q Kt 4th

(a) Badly played. From this point White obtains an overpowering attack.

(b) Making bad worse. In similar situations the best resource is throwing forward the Pawn to Q 4th.

THE ARBITRATION MOVEMENT.

The Society of Friends do not stand alone in their abhorrence of war. They have no monopoly in the love of peace. There is not a reasonable being in the world, whatever his clime, colour, or creed, who would not confess that war was an evil, and who would not denounce the man or the nation that would make war against neighbour man, or neighbouring nation, for purposes of robbery, aggrandisement, or revenge. But here the amiable Quakers of the Peace Society and the rest of the world part company. The Quakers profess to act upon the principle that both offensive and defensive wars are alike odious and unjustifiable. The world is of a different opinion, and holds the principle of self-defence against unjust aggression to be a sacred right and an imperative duty. To carry out the fancy of the Quakers is impossible in a world of men, whatever it might be in a world of angels. Were any nation, in the present state of human intelligence, to adhere religiously to such a principle, that nation would speedily cease to be. It would be overrun by the unscrupulous and the rapacious, who, unfortunately, form the majority; and its meek citizens would become the Pariahs of their more vigorous and more wicked masters. Such a principle, in fact—unless the stronger half of the world took it up—would cause the nations to relapse into the barbarism from which they are emerging, and would hand over society to robbers and murderers of small and high degree, to captains of roving banditti, or to such men as those larger leaders of banditti, the "Macedonian madman and the Swede," and their modern successor, Napoleon Bonaparte.

It is a mistake, too, to suppose that all great soldiers love their vocation. Such men as Napoleon, who, for selfish and ambitious objects, involve the world in the horrors and atrocities of war, naturally love the means whereby their ends are to be accomplished, just as we may suppose a burglar to have a fondness for his crowbar or his pistol. But the great soldiers who, in the interest of society, resist the aggressive ambition of the Alexanders, the Charles XII.'s, and the Napoleons, confess as freely and feel as sincerely as the most conscientious Quaker who ever breathed, that war is a nuisance, a barbarism, and a crime. When soldiers of this class fight battles it is in the name and for the sake of peace; and their victories, however splendid they may be, are only considered of value when they shorten the duration of war. The greatest of victories, and that which draws upon the head of the victorious General the most enthusiastic applause, and the most substantial gratitude of nations, is the victory which ends a war, and consolidates a peace. Such a victory was Waterloo; and all the preaching of all the Quakers, estimable, reasonable, just, and eloquent as such preaching might be, never did so much for the peace of world as the Duke of Wellington did on the memorable day which ended the mischievous career of the Emperor Napoleon. Men who, in their abhorrence of fighting, maintain both offensive and defensive warfare to be alike wicked, commit a moral injustice. With the best of motives and intentions, they confound the world's notions of right and wrong. They persist in seeing no difference between the ruffian who breaks the law and the police-constable who uses physical force to coerce the ruffian and prevent his ruffianism; or between the bloodthirsty conqueror, whose warfare is wholly aggressive, and the man whom the outraged and injured nations entrust with their defence. The true soldier, such as the Duke of Wellington, has none of that fabulous admiration for his vocation which the unthinking give him credit for. No man ever did more for peace than the Duke of Wellington, and no war-hater ever said a truer or finer thing in dispraise of war than he did. "What a glorious and a beautiful thing a victory must be," said an enthusiastic young lady to him. "Glorious and beautiful!" replied his Grace; "I know of nothing more dreadful and hideous—except a defeat."

Happily for the world, it is becoming wiser than it was in the matter of offensive war. The whole tendency of our civilization is eminently pacific. Ignorance is the great parent of the ferocity which tempts men into aggressions upon one another, and makes them the ready instruments of kingly or imperial potentates, as in Europe; or of a proud and grasping democracy, as in America. Wars of foreign conquest, at least in Europe, are becoming daily more impossible. Railroads, the printing-press, and all the wondrous and beneficient discoveries of modern science, by diminishing the ignorance which breeds war, diminish the chances of war; and the penalty which we and other nations are now paying, in the shape of an enormous debt, for wars into which we and they were dragged, or which we and they might have avoided, are aiding, through the irresistible logic of the pocket, the conviction that war is an unmitigated evil. Our political education in this matter may not yet be complete; but there is no denying that, within the last two-and-thirty years, we have made some progress towards a thorough comprehension of the fact, that, if we had been wiser, we should have had fewer wars upon our hands. This conviction is not likely to be lessened by any possible turn of events; and offensive warfare, with, of course, the defensive warfare which is its antagonist and its consequence, will diminish in the same proportion that our knowledge increases. Even although, as seems but too probable, a general war should be the result of the various revolutions that are now boiling and bubbling over the Continent, it will be a shorter and less disastrous war than it would have been at an earlier period of European civilisation. We are not yet in the millennium. Men are not angels; and people as well as Kings have still too much reliance upon brute force not to trust to that more than to reason for the solution of their differences: but, notwithstanding all their present faults and ignorance, a real progress has been made. Though Europe bristles with bayonets at this moment—though the thunder of cannon resounds over its fairest portions—and though the prospect is anything but favourable for the speedy discontinuance of these deplorable struggles, it is for the sake of happy peace that unhappy war is raging. The mutual ignorance of the ruled and the rulers has brought society to an issue, in which the only arbiter is the sword. That arbiter will be employed; and, after the necessary amount of suffering to all parties, peace will be established upon a basis as broad as, but no broader than, the wisdom of the nations that are interested in its maintenance.

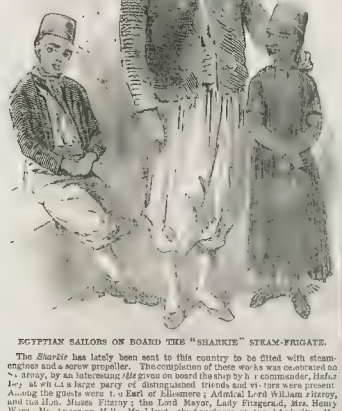
While we think this country and Europe at large are much indebted to Mr. Cobden, for bringing into prominent notice the desirableness and necessity of arbitration clauses in all future treaties between the various states of Europe; and though we look forward to the day when a war between England and France will seem as ridiculous as a war between Kent and Sussex, we are desirous of recording our opinion that arbitration clauses can of themselves do nothing, in our imperfect state of society, to prevent offensive, and consequently defensive, war. Unless these clauses are aided by popular intelligence and popular force—not only partial to one country in Europe, but universal to all—these clauses will be merely sentimental effusions and abstractions of no avail. If it were possible that Kent could have a pecuniary, territorial, or personal difference with Sussex, which it would persist in fighting out, and would not submit to arbitration, a power greater than Kent and Sussex combined would step into the field, and by physical force—i. e. war—compel them to keep the peace. But where is the power greater than France and England combined, and representing both France and England, as well as the general commonwealth of Europe, that could step in between two such mighty belligerents after their refusal of peaceful arbitration? Such a power does not exist, and cannot be constituted. Physical force will always remain the ultimate arbitrator amongst nations: either the physical force of the contending parties themselves, or the physical force of one greater than them both. Even our peaceful law is in itself an expression of war. Let ten men forcibly resist the law, and immediately a superior force of officers of the law—with the constable's truncheon or the soldier's musket, in blue coat or in red, as necessity or expediency may dictate—step in to the support of the law which is outraged, to capture the delinquents, or, if they resist to extremity, to kill them. We may call this what we please, but in principle it is defensive war. There is no escaping from this ultimatum: it always exists, though, fortunately, it is not always necessary to use it, or even to show it. The wealthy Quaker, who goes to bed at night, after shutting up his shop, reposes in security—not on a moral, but on a physical defence of his goods and his chattels, his limbs and his life. Arms and truncheons—ready in case of need—are his defence; and were these not available, he would become the prey of the spoiler, and the victim of the murderer; just as Europe would become, if there were no high police in the shape of armies, to keep the rapacious and the ignorant within the bounds of the law.

Thus, while we approve of the spirit of Mr. Cobden's motion, and think the mere exhibition of the question from time to time calculated to do good and to set men thinking, we quite concur in the sentiments of Lord Palmerston and some others, who, upon the introduction of his long-promised motion on Tuesday night, met it with as courteous a negative as the forms of the House would allow. "I can conceive," said his Lordship, "nothing that would bring more into jeopardy the peaceful relations of this country than that an idea should prevail among foreign nations that we are so attached to peace that we dare not make war; and that, therefore, any aggression or any injury may be safely ventured against English subjects, because England has such a rooted aversion to war that she will not resent it." This is plain common sense, taking human nature as it exists, and not as it might exist, for the basis of its operations. We are anxious to do justice to the kindly intentions of the Society of Friends. We wish the whole world agreed in the beautiful and angelic maxim that they derive from the Gospel; but until at least the half of Europe be willing and ready with wisdom enough to practise it, and physical force sufficient, in case of need, to deter the wicked, who are of a contrary opinion, from making aggressions upon it—policemen and soldiers, with truncheons and muskets, must, we fear, be looked upon as a most imperative, though a very disagreeable, necessity.

THE EGYPTIAN SCREW STEAM-FRIGATE "SHARKIE."

This fine vessel was constructed in the Dockyard at Alexandria, by the Pacha's chief builder and commissioner of the yard, Mohamed Bey, who enjoyed the advantage of acquiring his practical knowledge of naval architecture under the able tuition of Mr. Fincham, of Portsmouth Dockyard.



EGYPTIAN SAILORS ON BOARD THE "SHARKIE" STEAM-FRIGATE.

The Sharkie has lately been sent to this country to be fitted with steam-engines and a screw propeller. The completion of these works was celebrated on Tuesday, by an interesting fête given on board the ship by her commander, Hafiz Bey, at which a large party of distinguished friends and visitors were present. Among the guests were the Earl of Ellesmere; Admiral Lord William Hervey, and the Hon. Misses Hervey; the Lord Mayor, Lady Fitzgerald, Mrs. Henry Ward, Mr. Anderson, M.P.; Mr. Lloyd, chief engineer at the Admiralty; Mr. Penrose, Mr. Cubitt, Mr. Wigram, Mr. Penn, Mr. Maudsley, Mr. Mare, Mr. Miller, Mr. Ravenhill, the Hon. H. E. Stanley, Mr. Ayrton, &c. The Lords of the Admiralty and the Turkish Ambassador were among the guests invited, but were not present. The Nile, it should be added, appears to have been an affair of hospitality, rather than a visit of professional interest in the inspection of the vessel.

The frigate was moored off Poplar stairs, and here, from eleven till one o'clock, the guests continued to arrive. The ladies, who came first, were presented with splendid bouquets of flowers, and all the guests were received at the top of the companion ladder by Mohamed Bey, Hafiz Bey, and the principal officers of the ship. At one o'clock, when the Sharkie had reached Blackwall, there were assembled upon her deck about 320 ladies and gentlemen, and scattered amongst them and varying the effect which their own gay dresses produced, were the dark blue uniforms and fez caps of the officers of the vessel, and of their attendants. Forward, the huge ship was occupied by the crew, many of whom are Arabs, and some Greeks, but the majority of them were from the valley of the Nile. They all wore the red fez, and the characteristic wide trousers, which costume, coupled with the dark hues of their complexions, presented a strikingly picturesque appearance. At the stern of the vessel waved the red banner with the crescent in the centre; while at the mainmast head floated the union jack. There was an excellent band of music on board, and while the vessel was steaming down the river, dancing was introduced, which seemed to give much delight to the crew. At four o'clock, the Sharkie, being within a few miles of Sheerness, was put round, and returned up the river, after a very delightful run.

At five o'clock the company sat down to a déjeûner. The heads of the different tables were occupied by Commodore Hafiz Bey, by Mohamed Bey, and the superintendent of the dockyard at Alexandria, and by M. Pasquali, commercial agent of his Highness Abbas Pacha. Amongst the toasts proposed during the evening were "The Queen," "Prince Albert and the Royal Family," "The Sultan," "Menemet Ali," "Abbas Pasha," and "The British Navy." Mr. Ayrton proposed the health of Captain Hafiz Bey. Pipes and coffee were subsequently handed round in the Eastern fashion

At Purfleet the frigate anchored for the night, and the guests took their departure for town in the Spider steamer.

The following are the principal dimensions, &c, of the Sharkie:—

Length from outside to outside	..	..	220 feet
Breadth			36 feet 6 inches.
Depth from the lower deck	..	..	22 ,,
Height between decks	..	..	7 ft 6 inches.
Water lines, aft	..	..	16 feet 6 inches.
Ditto, forward	..	..	15 feet 9 inches.
Armament, 26 guns	..	..	24-lb 70 hollow shot.
			12-lb 42 lb shot
Crew, 375, including officers
Rigged as second class frigate
Engines 220 horse power—By Messrs. Miller and Ravenhill
Speed attained in trial, 10½ knots per hour.

The engines have cylinders 74 inches in diameter, and a piston-stroke of 4 feet; they act admirably in connection with the screw propeller, 14 feet 6 inches in diameter.

The interior fittings of the vessel are very elegant; the panellings and furniture of the cabins being richly inlaid with ivory and mother-of-pearl

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE

Matters have again assumed a very threatening aspect at Paris this week. The dissatisfaction of the Red and Socialist Republicans with the present state of things is the result of the general elections, from which they had expected much for their party, having given the coup de grace to the hopes they founded on universal suffrage—has assumed the mask of sympathy for the Republicans at Rome: in last year the cloak was the cause of Poland.

Last day during the recess military have been stationed at and around the Chamber of Representatives, as a "demonstration" of the Ultras was apprehended

On Monday, in the Legislative Assembly, M. Ledru Rollin ascended the tribune, to put the questions of which he had given notice on the subject; he, however, declared that it was useless to demand explanations now, as all France was aware that the blood of her soldiers had been poured forth at Rome, and that the Romans had also been slaughtered by the French troops. He then read a letter from Rome, which stated that General Oudinot had sustained immense losses, and that the cavalry had suffered so severely, that he had been compelled to demand an armistice. "General Oudinot (said he) has gone to attack Rome—has been repulsed, and has sent for large reinforcements. The Government, being surrounded by the National Assembly, they were exceeding their duty, sent M. Lesseps. Suddenly M Lesseps was disavowed, and General Oudinot was ordered to renew the attack. Of what use, therefore, are interpellations? The Government was silent, and the Assembly another. Blood is now flowing poured forth at Rome. The question is one of vital importance; I demand that my proposal for impeachment may be at once referred to a committee." He then laid on the tribune an act for impeaching Louis Napoleon and his Ministers

M. Odillon Barrot replied that the letter read by M. Rollin was not authentic that no news had been received from Rome. The Government made a powerful speech of some length, and concluded by declaring that the Government assumed the entire responsibility of its acts, and added, that the honour of our troops had been engaged at Rome, and must not be abandoned.

M. Ledru Rollin, in reply, in derision of the proof that the Constitution had been violated, and mad himself that it was false that the Government Assembly had acted beyond the Constitution, or to the detriment of the Republic. The French were to remain mere spectators of passing events, and to prevent the Austrians entering the Roman States. The Constitution," exclaimed M. Ledru Rollin, "has been violated, and we will defend it by every possible means, even by arms."

M. Ledru Rollin descended from the tribune amidst the greatest uproar. Cries of "Vive la Republique!" from the left, and cries of "Order!" from the right

When silence was restored, M. Duplin, the President of the Chamber, said that it was impossible to violate the Constitution in a more scandalous manner, than by declaring in a Legislative Assembly that the Constitution was not to be defended by the laws, but by arms. (Loud murmurs on the Left, "Bravos" on the Right)

M. Ledru Rollin observed that the 110th Article confided the defence of the Constitution to the guardians of all the laws, and repeated that, if it was violated, he and his friends would defend it with arms. (Cries and murmurs.)

General Bedeau replied that everybody was bound to respect the decision of the majority, unless it was intended to give the minority the right of oppressing the country.

M. Thiers exclaimed that it was not the intention of the majority to prevent the discussion, but the cry "To arms!" having been raised, all discussion was impossible

M Emmanuel Arago contended that every representative was free to express his opinion from the tribune

Subsequently the interpellations of M. Ledru Rollin were rejected, by the adoption of the order of the day," or, as we would say, "the previous question," by 361 to 203, giving ministers a majority of 158.

Amongst those who voted against Ministers were Prince Napoleon Bonaparte and Gen Cavaignac.

On Tuesday Paris was tranquil in outward appearance. The more active spirits of the "Reds" were, however, understood to be sitting en permanence for some days past, maturing their schemes of insurrection.

Very few operatives "descended into the streets" in answer to the summons which those leaders were understood to have addressed to them for that purpose The Assembly met a little after three o'clock, when M. Lacrosse, the Minister of Public Works, at once ascended the tribune, and stated, on the part of the Government, that they were anxious not to throw any impediment in the way of the act of accusation presented by Ledru-Rollin, and signed by 145 members. He would move that the Assembly should resure at once to their bureaux, to appoint a committee for the sake of examining and reporting on the proposed impeachment, on which the Assembly rose and retired into their bureaux, and the President vacated the chair

There were five names to the document which could not be deciphered, the writers being evidently illiterate persons.

At a later period of the day the report of the committee was made to the Chamber. It rejected the demand for impeachment of the President and his Ministers.

The decision of the committee was then put to the vote of the whole House, when there appeared—For the decision, 377; against it, 8; majority for the rejection of the proposition of impeachment, 369. The Mountain abstained from voting. The Assembly adjourned in consideration of the state of Paris.

Large crowds were collected in the Place de la Concorde and Champs Elysées until the hour of adjournment, but every precaution had been taken to prevent a breach of the peace.

Le Peuple, La Révolution Democratique et Sociale, Le Journal de la Vraie République, and the Réforme were seized at the Post-office on Tuesday. These four journals are to be prosecuted for exciting the people to overthrow the Government of the Republic and for exciting civil war

On Wednesday Paris was the scene of great commotion. About twelve o'clock in the day some 10,000 or 15,000 men, several of whom were the uniform of the National Guard, and headed by M. Etienne Arago, assembled on the Boulevard des Italiens, with the object, it was said, of "making a demonstration," as it was termed, in presenting a petition to the Assembly against the war against Rome.

They proceeded by two routes, the Rue St. Honoré and the Boulevards, towards the Pres ident's palace, but were intercepted by squadrons of cavalry, who charged and dispersed them. The ground was afterwards occupied in every direction, in that quarter of the city with artillery, infantry, and cavalry, who, with sabres drawn and muskets loaded, were in readiness for immediate action; but the émeutiers showed no disposition to fight. There were 80,000 troops under arms, independently of a large body of National Guards. One or two persons were killed by some chance pistol shots from mon dressed as blouse. General Changarnier was on the alert all day with his staff, but all passed over quietly. In the afternoon the President of the Republic, accompanied by his staff, rode along the Boulevard, in the direction of the Porte St. Denis. He was well received

In the Legislative Assembly, on Wednesday, the following decree was submitted to the consideration of the House by the Government:—

"In the name of the French people, the President of the Republic charges the President of the Council to present to the Legislative Assembly the following project of law.—Considering that an armed insurrection, directed against the Constitutional power of the Republic, has taken place in Paris, and that it may extend to other cities of France; considering the importance of arming the Government with all the means necessary to insure the prompt and efficacious repression of that insurrection, to enforce respect for the laws, and maintain the Constitution:

"Article 1. The city of Paris and all the territory comprised within the first military division are declared in a state of siege

"Article 2. That measures may be executed to the cities in which similar insurrections might take place, and when the Prefects shall have established by a decree the fact of the revolt against the law

"Given at the Elysée Nationale, on the 13th of June, 1849

(Signed) "LOUIS NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

(Counter-signed) "ODILLON BARROT, Ministre et Justice."

This communie has was received with loud applause by the Assembly.

The deaths from cholera attained their greatest height on Friday week, the number on that day being 634: since then they have decreased. The epidemic has proved fatal to Marshal Bugeaud, who expired on Sunday morning, at half-past six o'clock. The Marsha breathed his last sigh in the midst of many of his numerous friends, who surrounded his bed. The body, after lying in state, was deposited on Tuesday at the Invalides

It is said that M. Etienne Arago has been arrested, as also Felix Pyat and Theodore Bac, two of the Red members

SPAIN

From Madrid, we learn that the Spanish Government has addressed to the Catholic Powers a note, in which it declares that the troops of Spain merely required to stay to remain near the Holy Father, and watch over his personal safety, but that the moment they should be called upon to perform any other service, the Spanish Government would desire to order them home.

GERMAN STATES

WURTEMBURG.—The "Rump" Parliament, which has hitherto sat at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, having declared themselves dissolved, have held sittings (for greater safety) to Stuttgard, one hundred and four members—just four more than the number required to form a House—accordingly met on the 6th inst. in Stuttgard, in the hall of the Second Chamber of Wurtemburg, by permission of the Government. Amongst the members were 3 from Austria, 19 from Prussia, 13 from Bavaria, 10 from Saxony, 2 from Wurtemburg, 7 from Baden, 4 from the electorate of Hesse, 4 from the grand duchy of Hesse, 2 from Schleswig Holstein, 2 from Mecklenburg Schwerin, 1 from Oldenburg, 1 from Saxe-Weimar, 1 from Saxe-Altenburg, 1 from Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, 1 from Reuss, and 1 from Nassau. Amongst the more distinguished members were Messrs. Gisbie, Hermann, Jacoby, Reuvenz, Count Reichenbach, Hund, Simon, Temme, Jaimer, Uhland, Fischer, Prince Hohenlohe-Langenburg-Zeil, Löwe, Hagen, Förster, and Schott.

The members were escorted to the Chamber from the Town-hall by the civic guard of Stuttgard; and, on their entrance, were vociferously cheered by the persons in the public gallery.

The Committee of Thirty moved that the new electoral law proclaimed by Prussia, Saxony, and Hanover be declared to be null and void, and that every attempt to enforce the application of the said law in Germany be regarded as an act of treason against the sovereign German nation. The first clause of this motion was carried unanimously, and the second obtained a large majority.

The Committee of Thirty then moved unanimously, that the National Assembly elect a regency of five persons, which regency should be responsible to the Assembly for the enforcement of the Imperial Constitution, and should be headed by a deputy from the re-distribution of the Assembly in general, according to the tenor of the law of the 28th of June, concerning the establishment of a Provisional Central Power. It should now be the primary object of this regency to raise an army of the empire, and organise the people's forces, with a view to the realisation of the constitution; to protect the interest of Germany in foreign affairs, more especially an energetic continuation of the war in Schleswig-Holstein; to institute the elections for the succeeding Parliament, and to summon the representatives of the individual States to the seat of the Assembly. This motion was also carried, with some slight modifications, in a series of divisions, by large majorities; the votes in respect of the main question, viz. the appointment of the regency of five, being 396, 93, none, 10. Raveaux, Vogt, Schiller, Heinrich, Simon of Breslau, and Beiser of Wurtemburg, were elected joint regents of the empire by large majorities

The President of the Assembly, Herr Löwe, then formally proclaimed this regency, and declared it in office. Power, of which the Archduke John is the head, has ceased to exist.

Schott, Uhland, Romer, and four others, took no part in the election.

From Frankfort we learn that the Provisional Central Power has given orders for the arrest of the members of the Regency of Stuttgardt.

The Chamber of the Deputies of Wurtemburg has referred to a committee a motion to the effect that it is necessary to recognise as legal the German National Assembly as at present constituted.

SAXONY AND BADEN.—The Prince of Prussia has left Berlin for the Rhine Provinces, to take the command of the Prussian army which is to operate against the insurrection in Baden. On the instant the Prussian army commenced its operations, by sending its advanced guard and train of powders against the frontier of the Bavarian Palatinate.

RUSSIA

The Emperor recently convoked the Bishops of the Empire (Russian and Polish) to a conference at St. Petersburgh, when he addressed them in the following strain:—

"I don't wish for a new religion. A new sort of Catholic creed has been invented abroad, and I desire that it may not be introduced into my empire, because these novelists are the greatest agitators, and without faith it is impossible that anything can subsist. The west at this moment offers a fair specimen of what men come to if they have no faith. How great are the follies and absurdities which they commit! Look at Rome. I predicted all that would happen there. Faith has entirely disappeared in the west. The manner in which the Pope has been treated is a plain proof of it. Rome, Rome, Rome, Rome, Rome! and I hope (making the sign of the cross) that this holy faith may be maintained here. I told the late Pope, Gregory XVI., things which he had never heard from anybody else. The present Pope is a good man, his intentions are excellent, but his principles savour too much of the spirit of the age. The King of Naples is a good Catholic; he had been calumniated to the Pope, and now the Pope is compelled to have recourse to him."

Bishop Holowinsk, replied, "Your Majesty, the Holy Father was obliged to yield to circumstances and the spirit of the age."

The Emperor: "Very possibly; but all these disorders arise from want of faith. I am not a fanatic, but I have firm faith. In the west they have run to two extremes, fanaticism and impiety." Address of the Polish Bishops, the Czar continued: "You are the nearest neighbours of these misguided men: let your example be their guide. If you encounter obstacles, address yourselves to me. I will employ all my power to stem the torrent of impiety and revolt, which is spreading more and more, and threatens even to penetrate into my dominions. A revolutionary spirit is the result of impiety. In the west there is no longer any respect for faith, and this evil will increase still more." Addressing himself to the metropolite Bishop, and kissing his hand, the Czar concluded by saying, "We have always understood each other, and I trust that it will always continue so."

DENMARK.

The following speech from the throne was made by the King of Denmark, on the occasion of the dissolution of the Diet, on the 5th instant:—

"Danes,—You have accomplished the mission imposed upon you. I have consented to the modifications which you have proposed in the project of the Constitution which I presented to you. I have this morning ratified and signed the Constitution of Denmark

"Has work, which will be the basis of the future development of our beloved country, is, therefore, happily terminated, by reason of the good understanding which subsists between the Government and the people of Denmark; but our country still groans beneath the oppressive thraldom of war—a war equally severe and unjust, imposed upon us by the immense superiority of the enemy. Under these circumstances, the necessity of the co-operations of the nation may render it advisable for the Diet to assemble sooner than the time fixed by the Constitution. I therefore reserve to myself, while dissolving the present Assembly, the power of convoking you again as the representatives of the people

"May Almighty God shed his blessing upon the work which we have just completed, in order that it may yield substantial benefit to Denmark!

"Gentlemen, I request you to proceed by nine rounds of cheers. His Majesty, in retiring, cheered us. Gentlemen, I thank you. The Lord be with you."

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Defects in Leases Bill was read a third time and passed.

Lord CAMPBELL postponed the third reading of the Leasehold Tenure of Lands (Ireland) Bill.

The Tramways Trusts Union Bill passed through committee.

Lord BROUGHAM delivered a characteristic castigation on the "other House" for not having found time to read his Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Bill a first time on Friday last, according to the usual courtesy, on its arrival there from their Lordships' House, by which four days were lost.

ACCIDENTS IN MINES.

The Earl of ST. GERMANS presented a petition from Mr. G. Gurney, on the subject of the invention for the ventilation of coal-mines, by which the lamentable explosions from fire damp could be effectually prevented. The noble Earl bore testimony to the efficacy of Mr. Gurney's invention, and urged on the House the necessity of taking steps to have it applied to all mines. (Two Engravings of this invention appeared in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of last week.)

Lord BROUGHAM thought it was of the highest importance that some inquiry should be instituted on this matter, and suggested to the noble Earl the advisability of moving for a committee of inquiry.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE considered the invention of Mr. Gurney a valuable one, to the application of which he did not think there could be any objection. He thought it desirable that every publicity should be given to this discovery.

Lord WHARNCLIFFE recommended the establishment by the Government of some system of inspection in mines. In Belgium a system of inspection had been put in practice, with the best results.

The petition was laid on the table.

ENCUMBERED ESTATES (IRELAND) BILL.

Lord CAMPBELL rose to move the second reading of the Encumbered Estates (Ireland) Bill.

Lord BROUGHAM, Lord STANLEY, and Lord MONTEAGLE urged on the public and learned Lord the propriety of postponing the second reading, on the grounds of the absence of some noble and learned Lords conversant with the laws of Ireland, and of the difficult and dangerous nature of the measure. Lord Stanley advised the referring of the bill to a Select Committee, by which course a discussion on the second reading would be avoided.

Lord CAMPBELL regretted to see such symptoms of strong hostility to the bill. He could not, however, consent to refer it to a Select Committee until after the House should have affirmed its principle. Should their Lordships express an opinion favourable to the principle of the bill, then he would not object to refer it to a Select Committee to consider some of its details. The noble and learned Lord then proceeded to explain the objects and provisions of the bill. He admitted that it was a measure of an arbitrary nature, which could only be justified by the lamentable state of property in Ireland. He announced the intention of the Government to reform the law of judgments in Ireland, and to prepare a measure for the proper and regular registry of deeds in that country.

Lord BROUGHAM rose, not to give an unconsidered opposition to the bill, but to point out some of the provisions which were liable to great objection. The three commissioners would, under the bill, at the desire of the owner or any incumbrancer, have the power of ordering the estate to be sold, and then, by the connivance of the owner and the first mortgagee, the estate might be sold at a greatly depreciated price, just enough to pay the first mortgagee, and give the estate to a friend of the owner at half its value, getting rid of the second mortgages a together, and depriving him of all benefit from the sale. The noble and learned Lord condemned the monstrous power proposed to be given to the commissioners. He suggested that no sale should be allowed to take place under a certain number of years' purchase. If he found the Irish proprietors and Irish lawyers desirous of having this unconstitutional measure, he would not insist in his opposition to it, but as an Englishman and an English lawyer he protested against it.

The Earl of GLENGALL objected altogether to the principle of the bill, which was nothing short of a plan for the downright confiscation of the great bulk of property in Ireland. It was a measure of Socialism and revolution, and he recommended MM. Louis Blanc, Proudhon, and Proudhon, as the three commissioners most fit to carry the bill into execution. The noble Earl described the evils connected with the system of receivership at present existing in Ireland, and contended that should the Master of the Rolls and the Master in Chancery be relieved by some commissioners in aid from the inquiries that clog their offices, and should some other cumbrous impediments be removed, there would be no necessity for this unconstitutional bill, or the numerous evils of which he pointed out.

The Earl of WICKLOW supported the bill, and could see no reason for sending it before a select committee. A committee of the House was quite competent to decide upon its provisions without consulting Irish lawyers. His own firm conviction was, that for two years at least the commissioners would merely receive their salaries for doing nothing, for he did not believe that any capitalist from this country would purchase a single estate.

The bill was read a second time without a division.

Lord CAMPBELL then agreed to refer the bill to a select committee, on the understanding that the principle of the bill should not be discussed—that principle being, that not only for the benefit of encumbered estates in Ireland should be adopted; but that those facilities should be given by the establishment of a commission to which the duties of the Court of Chancery shall be entrusted.

Lord STANLEY assented to that understanding. He would enter into an examination of the details of the bill with the view to the improvement of the measure, and not to its defeat. He would not, however, consider himself from taking any course he might think fit on the third reading

The bill was then referred to a select committee.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

FRENCH PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

To a question put by Mr. HUME,

Lord J. RUSSELL stated that he did not understand the message of the President of the French Republic to imply that England had agreed in the interference of the French in the affairs of Rome. All the speech of the President asserted was, that, generally, England and France had been on the best terms during the transactions of the past year. This country was, in fact, in no way involved in the expedition to Rome.

CONSOLIDATION AND AMENDMENT OF THE BANKRUPTCY LAWS.

In reply to Mr. J. STUART,

Lord J. RUSSELL expressed a hope that the Bankruptcy Bill, which had come down from the Lords, would be passed into a law during the present session; but added, that, though he approved of the general objects of the measure, he thought it was too complicated to pledge himself that the Government would take it up.

FRENCH EXPEDITION TO ROME

In answer to several questions,

Lord PALMERSTON stated that the Government of France had communicated to her Majesty's Government their intention to send an expedition to Civita Vecchia, but had not signified their intention to take possession of Rome, mentioned any ulterior proceedings. Her Majesty's Government had been called on to give an opinion on the differences between the Pope and his subjects. Her Majesty's Government expressed an opinion that these differences might be arranged by diplomatic intervention, having for its object the return of the Pope to Rome, on the terms of securing to the Roman people those constitutional institutions which had been granted to them last year, especially a real and practical separation between the temporal and spiritual authority. These sentiments of her Majesty's Government had been communicated, through Lord Normanby, to the Pope's Nuncio at Paris.

PARLIAMENTARY OATHS (THE JEWS) BILL.

On the motion for the third reading of the PARLIAMENTARY Oaths (the JEWS) Bill,

Mr. LAW opposed it, and moved as an amendment that the bill be read a third time that day six months.

Mr. RAPHAEL seconded the amendment.

Mr. KNOX supported the bill.

Mr. NEWDEGATE hoped that the House would, for the sake of real political liberty decide upon preserving its Christian character, and by carrying the amendment put an end to a measure miscalled a liberal one.

Mr. COWPER, Mr. SADLER, and Mr. SHEIL spoke in favour of, Mr. GORING and Mr. SPOONER against, the

Mr. GOULBURN could not be a party to the introduction to Parliament of persons who were deadly enemies to the Christian faith, because such persons could not be favourable to the connexion of the Christian religion with the State. He objected to the abolition of the oath of supremacy so far as it was referable to Protestants, and he called upon the House not to lessen its own influence with the country by admitting into an assembly of Christians those who held a belief in direct antagonism to Christianity. The feeling was gaining strength throughout the country that Parliament was not fit for the management of ecclesiastical affairs, and this feeling was attributed to the various elements of which Parliament was now composed, and many of which were hostile to the Established Church.

Mr. ROEBUCK argued that the present law excluded conscientious and honest Jews, while under it unprincipled Jews or infidels, who had no regard for an oath, were admissible.

Mr. MAHON objected to the bill because it frittered away all distinction between truth and falsehood. He would not consent to part with the last badge of Christianity at the dictation of a small sect of men who were the enemies of Christianity.

Mr. P. WOOD, Mr. PLUMPTRE, and Lord JOHN RUSSELL shortly addressed the HOUSE, and a division then took place:—For the third reading, 272; against it, 206: majority for the bill, 66

The bill was then read a third time and passed, amidst loud cheers from the Opposition at the small majority by which it left the House.

The Silver Coinage Bill was read a third time and passed.

The County Cess (Ireland) Bill passed through committee.

The Collection of Rates (Dublin) Bill, and the Newgate Gaol (Dublin) Bill, were read a second time

The Loan Societies Bill, and the Sites for Schools Bill, were also read a second time

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL obtained leave to bring in a bill to facilitate the abandonment of railways, and the dissolution of railway companies, in certain cases.

Lord D. STUART moved for leave to bring in a bill to give a pension used in the Palace Court, Westminster, the right of electing to be sued in the County Court within the jurisdiction of which he may reside.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would not object to the introduction of the bill.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

Adjourned at a quarter past twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

FRENCH INTERVENTION AT ROME.

Lord BEAUMONT, having given a narrative of the late transactions in Rome, and in reference to its affairs, inquired whether, prior to the landing of the French expedition at Civita Vecchia, any communication had been made to the Government here, by the French Government, of their objects and intentions? If they knew, whether any advice had been asked or given by this country to France, with respect to the ultimate object in view? also, whether the Government could state what were the ultimate objects the French aimed at?

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE replied that this country had been no party to the expedition to Civita Vecchia. Her Majesty's Government had received a communication from the French Government of their intention to send an expedition for the purpose of restoring tranquillity and order in Rome. To that expedition her Majesty's Government did not think themselves bound to offer any objection. But neither at the time of the communication, nor subsequently, had her Majesty's Government made themselves parties to the expedition, nor had they offered any advice on the subject. This country, certainly, was not indifferent to the events at Rome; but there was a material distinction, with respect to religion, in the interest which we had in the maintenance of the Papal power, as connected with the other great powers, who were Roman Catholic. However, her Majesty's Government had offered suggestions that, by negotiation, the restoration of the Pope might be accomplished on terms and conditions that might ensure its permanent authority, and be, at the same time, conformable with the wishes of the Roman people.

The Earl of ABERDEEN understood now, that the French Government had, in December or September last, made a written communication relative to the intended expedition; and he desired to know if that would be laid on the table. He thought it hardly conceivable that, considering the cordial understanding between the two Governments, no communication had since been made on so important a transaction, and that no questions had been asked.

The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH suggested the necessity of accompanying the French communication with the reply given by her Majesty's Government to it. He considered that, having eight millions of Roman Catholic subjects in Ireland, we had a deep interest in the maintenance of the independence of the Pope.

Lord BROUGHAM gathered from the message of the President that the French Government thought they had the approval of the British Government to the expedition.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE wished to have time to consider what paper in reference to these affairs he could produce.

REPEAL OF THE NAVIGATION LAWS.

On the motion for the third reading of the Navigation Bill,

The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH expressed his decided and unalterable objections to the bill, although he had no hope of being able to induce the House to reject it. The noble Earl impressed on the Government the necessity of remitting the duties on timber for ship-building, of providing for a new registration of vessels, and of preparing a measure for the regulation of the Merchant Seamen's Fund, as some palliation of the evils about to be inflicted. He also impressed upon shipowners the necessity of good manning, of good building, and of taking advantage of every improvement, in order to do everything in their power to maintain themselves in the struggle to whom they were to be subjected. The noble Earl concluded his remarks by saying that we inherited the supremacy of the sea from men who did not think a little additional freight too great a price to pay for that supremacy; but we were proud to set our birthright for a mess of pottage—on principles more suited to the "diggings" in California than to the empire of the seas. He dismissed the bill with disgust, but with the most painful apprehensions of its consequences—deprecated as he was that it would impair the mercantile marine, and, in so doing, injuriously affect the supremacy of the seas.

Earl GRANVILLE defended the bill.

The Duke of WELLINGTON did not see any reason to feel unwilling to the bill. He should, however, have preferred [illegible] which would have [illegible] and thought it might be a question whether that might be [illegible] to the [illegible] in their Lordship's House.

Lord STANLEY said that if he thought he had the slightest chance of inducing their Lordships to reconsider their former vote, or if he had any new argument to urge, he should not be deterred from some more addresses; and again calling for a division; but, while his convictions remained unaltered, and while the House remained undiminished, he admitted that he had no new argument to advance, and that he could not hope to prevail on many to vote contrary to their former votes, without hearing any argument, to reverse their decision. He would, therefore, withdraw his opposition to the bill, and exclusive responsibility of this fatal measure, and satisfy himself with answering "Non-content" to the question, ensure its safety. On the 4th ult., at 3 o'clock in the morning, the rioters had so far succeeded in re-organising their masses that they were able to attempt another attack upon the military. The combat recommenced in the streets leading to the Castle, where the crowd erected two barricades, which were attacked and taken by the soldiers, while the tocsin was ringing from all the church steeples of Dresden. Amidst the tumult of this civil war, the King of Saxony and his family quitted Dresden, escorted by a strong military force, and retired to the strong fortress of Königstein. Shortly after the King's departure, the garrison of Dresden was reinforced by some battalions of Prussian foot, which marched into the city, and at once proceeded to take possession of its leading streets and squares. The populace did not offer to impede their progress.

Owing to peculiar circumstances, which it may be interesting to explain, we have but just received the sketch of the above conflict. The artist at Dresden whom we had commissioned, it appears, had joined the fight himself, and actually commenced the defence of the barricade, the scene of which he has sketched. He was taken prisoner, but contrived to escape from the authorities, and was afterwards compelled to conceal himself by shaving his head, wearing wigs of various hues, with frequent changes of lodgings and names—stratagems which naturally tended to procure personal security, but made correspondence with him rather uncertain. This accounts for the delay; but, as the sketch is spirited and authentic, we have engraved it.

On the same day, the 4th, the King issued a proclamation, stating that the deplorable events which ended in attacks on the arsenal and his own palace, and where the Civic Guard neglected to maintain public order, had compelled him to leave Dresden and to retire to the Castle of Königstein, whence, on the 9th, his Majesty issued another proclamation.

KONIGSTEIN.

KÖNIGSTEIN lies on the Elbe, at a short distance from Dresden, opposite Lilienstein, the highest of the twelve isolated table mountains in Saxon Switzerland. The small town of Königstein contains about 1300 inhabitants: above it, at a height of 778 feet from the river, rises the virgin Fortress, almost the only one in Europe never yet taken. Viewed from a distance, it bears a strong resemblance to one of the "hill forts" of India. It is deemed impregnable, from its lofty situation, surrounded on all sides by perpendicular escarpments of several hundred feet, which have been improved by artificial cuttings and masonry; but more than all from its isolated position, so far removed from any other height—the Lilienstein and Pfaffenstein, on opposite sides, being each 3000 yards distant—that it cannot be commanded by artillery. Napoleon endeavoured to batter it from Lilienstein; but, after raising three pieces of cannon, with great difficulty, to the summit, he found that the balls fell short.

The approach to the Fortress is through a slanting way cut in the living rock, and partly by a sloping bridge, which, when removed in time of war, leaves the gateway unapproachable high up in the face of the cliff; besides which, it is defended by outworks and drawbridges.

The platform on which the Fortress is built is two miles in circumference: it is laid out in fields and gardens, and a wood of fine forest trees; it produces corn, &c., so as to support a garrison of 600 men. Here is a well, cut to the depth of 1800 feet in the solid rock; and enormous casemates, also excavated, serve as storehouses for provisions.

Königstein is distant only ten miles from the Austrian frontier, and is justly considered the key of the passage into Bohemia. In war time the treasures of the Saxon monarch have frequently been deposited here, to be out of harm's way; indeed, Augustus III. himself took refuge here during the Seven Years' War.

The Fortress served once as a state prison. In Murray's "Hand-book of Northern Germany," whence these notes are abridged, the tourist is strongly recommended to visit the place. "Independently of the Fortress itself, the view from its walls is most beautiful, being panoramic, and is, perhaps, the most striking in the Saxon Switzerland, next to that of the Bastei."

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

MINSTER LOVEL, OXON.

THE county of Oxford, and more especially the neighbourhood of the city, is rich in picturesque antiquities, an interesting specimen of which is shown in the accompanying view of the south-east portion of the ruins of Minster Lovel, ormerly the baronial residence of the noble family of Lovel, and situated in the village of the same name, on the river Windrush, three miles from Witney (celebrated for its blankets), fourteen miles from Oxford, and immediately on the right of the Cheltenham road, from whence a good view of these relics of antiquity is obtained. Next adjoining the ruins are the parish church and the ancient manor farm-house. On the northern side, distant about three miles, is the Royal forest of Wychwood, which, in all probability, in the days of the former Barons of Lovel, extended to, and a portion formed part of their demesne.

The church is vicarial in the Archdeaconry of Oxford, and in the patronage of Eton College. A handsome monument of one of the Lovels is shown in the south transept of the church. He is clad in complete armour of about the period of Edward IV.; and around the sides of the tomb are numerous figures supporting shields, on which the arms were formerly existing, but the heraldic decorations are effaced. In Anthony-à-Wood's time, the quarterings, &c. on the shields could be made out. The first person ennobled from Minster Lovel was John de Lovel, who, being then seated here, was in the 25 King Edward I. (1297) summoned to Parliament as Baron Lovel of Minster Lovel. He was a lineal descendant of Robert Lord Bretherval, &c., in Normandy, who came over with William the Conqueror. John, the second Lovel, was signed with the Cross, to go to the Holy Land; he died in the 15th of King Edward I., seised amongst other manors of Minster Lovel.

RUINS AT MINSTER LOVEL, OXON.

The peerage of Lovel, which originated in the 25th of King Edward I., became extinct in the 2nd of King Henry V. (1415), by the death of John Lovel; but was revived by King Henry VI., in the person of William Lovel. To William, Henry granted liberty to impark land called Mynstre Woods; and, in the 24th year, to disafforest a wood in Minstre Lovel, and make a park there. In 1482, Francis Lord Lovel was advanced to the dignity of Viscount. He sided with King Richard III., and fought at Bosworth, whence he escaped into Ireland: he afterwards returned to England, and was slain, as some writers assert, at Stoke, in the 3rd of Henry VII. In Francis ended the male branch of the Lovels of Minster Lovel and its dignities. The title lay dormant until the second year of the reign of George II., when Sir Thomas Coke, K.B., of Holkham, in Norfolk, who at that time was seised of the manor, was created Baron Lovel of Minster Lovel. In 1744 he was raised to the dignity of Viscount Coke and Earl of Leicester; and, dying without issue, the titles became extinct, and the manor was devised to his nephew, Wenman Roberts. In 1762 the title was, however, restored in the Perceval family, the Earl of Egmont having in that year been made an English peer, by the title of Baron Lovel and Holland.

The north portion of the ruins is very time-worn, and picturesque by being covered with ivy. There is much of interest in the architectural details of the place, which will amply repay the visit of a lover of antiquities. The principal features are the hall-entrance, the outer doorway of which is a fine specimen of the Gothic style, with deep mouldings: the interior of the passage or entrance has a groined roof, with well-carved foliaged and other bosses.

GOVERNESSES' BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.

OPENING OF THE ASYLUM, KENTISH-TOWN

ONE of the leading objects of this excellent institution is to provide for the aged governess an Asylum in her declining years, when she shall be incapacitated for her profession. With this view the Society purchased a plot of ground, about two acres in extent, in the healthful locality of Kentish-town, where they have erected a building for the above purpose, which has been opened to the public with a fancy sale held in the adjoining grounds. The preparations for the fête were judiciously made. On the east side of the building were raised tents, over each of which was inscribed the names of the fair marchandes. Among them we observed Lady Braybrooke, Lady Robert Grosvenor, Lady C. Egerton, Lady Guernsey, Lady Charlotte Guest, Lady C. Bathurst, Lady Dunallley, Lady Georgiana Fullarton, Viscountess Massareene, Countess Antrim, Mrs. J. Butler, Mrs. Coombes, the Hon. Mrs. Ashley, Mrs W. Kinsey, and other kind and strenuous patrons of the institution. The articles for sale were chiefly of drawingroom manufacture, elaborate feats of Berlin work preponderating among the prints, trinkets, and ornamental wares. There was likewise a large refreshment tent. The band of the Scots Fusiliers was in attendance, and played a variety of airs, a deal by the boys of the Scotch School, who marched round the place, and regaled the hearers with pungent tunes on the bagpipes.

The Asylum was to have been opened by the Duke of Cambridge; but his Royal Highness was unfortunately unable, through indisposition, to fulfil his promise. The ceremony, therefore, was performed by the committee, followed by a brief address by the honorary secretary, the Rev. D. Laing. The building was then thrown open, and the visitors were allowed to promenade through the rooms during the remainder of the day. The Asylum is a neat structure in the Tudor style, from a design by Messrs. Wyatt and Brandon; it comprises some eighteen or twenty bed-rooms, seven of which are furnished ready for occupation. There is a large dining-room and a drawingroom, and a convenient basement of household offices. The grounds are tastefully laid out, and are well stocked with flowers; while the Asylum commands a view over the fields that lie between Kentish-Town and Highgate. It is purposed, when the funds of the Asylum will allow it, to add a couple of wings. "It is calculated by the architect," says the printed statement of the committee, "that £200 will at any time secure the addition of rooms for two occupants more. The endowment required is £500, or £15 per annum, legally and permanently secured; and a definite object a thus offered to donors."

The sale on Tuesday and Wednesday was well attended, and we trust the proceeds will materially aid the society's funds. There were several contributions pour l'occasion; among them we noticed a piece of music, entitled "The Three Voices—the Past, the Present, and the Future."

This branch of the society's operations has received the patronage and support of her Majesty and Prince Albert, and of the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge.

The Asylum is of brick, with stone finishings; and its gabled and coated roofs, as well as the general character of the design, are associated with the comfort of an English home—such as the aged and destitute may enjoy in proportion to the benevolence of the public in encouraging this important provision for a great social wants.

This observation, however, does not apply with equal justice to the Irish members; it is, on the contrary, rather reversed in their case, those amongst them who attain to distinction in St. Stephen's being generally barristers. The names of O'Connell, Shiel, O'Loghlen (the late Master of the Rolls), Wrnifie (the late Chief Baron), may be mentioned as instances in point. The hon. and learned gentleman who represents the University of Dublin forms no exception to his countrymen in this respect—Mr. Napier being one of the ablest of the representatives whom the sister kingdom has sent to the present Parliament.

The hon. gentleman is a descendant of a race distinguished for varied ability in the history of the country; viz. the Merchistown branch of the Napier family, of which Admiral Sir Charles Napier is the present lineal head. His mother was a relative of the late Sir F. M'Naghten, Bart. He was born at Belfast in 1804, and was educated at the Academical Institution of his native town. He afterwards graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he gained several prizes in classics and science.

In 1831 he was called to the Irish bar, at which he rose rapidly in reputation and practice, and was named Queen's Counsel in 1844. He is a member of the Royal Irish Academy, and President of the Irish Bar Association. In politics he is a Conservative, and opposed to the Repeal of the Union. He is also averse to FESTIVITIES AT HOLDERNESSE HOUSE.

On Tuesday last a fête took place at Holderneesse House, which, for the eminence of the guests and the splendour that distinguished their reception, may fairly challenge comparison with any that we have [illegible] record, even in that splendid mansion. The festivities commenced with a grand banquet, which was graced with the presence of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, his Royal Highness Prince George, and upwards of a hundred and twenty ladies, noblemen and gentlemen, leaders of the day, without distinction of party. The Duchess of Gloucester arrived shortly after eight o'clock in a sedan chair, a mode of transit her Royal Highness invariably adopts when visiting within a certain [illegible] her own house. COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal of the Royal Family, returned to Buckingham Palace from Windsor Castle, on Saturday afternoon. In the evening the Queen visited the Royal Italian Opera.

On Monday, the Queen and Prince Albert paid an early visit to the Zoological Gardens, in the Regent's Park, for the purpose of viewing the new Reptile House, an engraving of which we gave in our Number for June 2nd. Her Majesty and the Prince were accompanied by the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, the Princess Alice, and the Princess Helena. In the evening the Prince Consort dined with the Company of the Merchant Tailors, at their hall, in Threadneedle-street, and subsequently joined the Queen at the French Plays.

On Tuesday the Prince Consort went to the Royal Institution, in Albemarle-street, to attend Professor Faraday's Lecture on Static Electricity. His Royal Highness subsequently, in company with her Majesty, visited the Duchess of Kent, at Clarence House. In the evening the Queen and the Prince went to the Haymarket Theatre.

On Wednesday, the Queen visited the Duchess of Kent at Clarence House. Her Majesty was honoured the Duchess of Sutherland with a visit at Stafford House.

On Thursday the Queen took a drive in an open carriage and four, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice. In the evening her Majesty had a dinner party, the company at which included the Duchess of Kent, the Belgian Minister, and Madame Vande Weyer. The Queen subsequently held a concert in the state rooms. Mille. Charton, Miss Kate Leder, Mrs. Anderson, Madame Nerucda, Herr Pischek, Signor Bottesini, and M. Demeur assist

THE QUEEN'S STATE BALL.

The Queen gave a grand ball on Wednesday night, at Buckingham Palace, on which occasion the suite of State Rooms were all opened. The White Drawing-room received the Royal guests. The Ball-room and the Throne-room were prepared for dancing, elevated semi-circular seats being placed at the sides of each, for accommodation of her Majesty and her illustrious visitors, and orchestras being erected in both for the quadrille bands. The Green Drawing-room was used as a refreshment room, and the Dining-room for the supper-room, the Picture Gallery serving as a reception room for the general company until the ball commenced. All the apartments, and the hall-rooms especially, were brilliantly lighted with handsome chandeliers and lustres, and the recesses were filled with rare and beautiful shrubs and plants.

The Guard of the Yeomen Guard lined the grand hall, under the command of Sir Seymour Sadler, the Queen's Watch; and the guard of honour of the Foot Guards was on duty at the garden entrance. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester arrived, attended by Lady Georgina Bathurst and Colonel the Hon. A. Liddell, half past nine o'clock. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge, and their Royal Highnesses the Hereditary Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz came attended by Lady Augusta Cadogan and Mr Edmond Milbanke. His Royal Highness Prince George was attended by Captain the Hon. J. Ma donald. His Royal Highness Prince Leopold (Count of Syracuse), was attended by his Excellency Prince Castelcicala and the Chevalier de Colnaire. His Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar was also present.

After the arrival of the Royal visitors, the Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Royal circle, entered the saloon, and afterwards proceeded into the Ball-room; the Lord Chamberlain, the Lord Steward, the Vice-Chamberlain, the Treasurer of the Household, and the Comptroller of the Household preceding her Majesty and the Prince; the Mistress of the Robes, the Lady in Waiting, and the Maids of Honour following in the Royal suite.

The Queen wore a blue silk dress, covered with tulle en ruche, and ornamented with bouquets of sweet peas and diamonds. Her Majesty's head-dress was composed of sweet peas and diamonds, corresponding with the dress.

The grand company followed the illustrious party into the Ball-room. The national anthem having been played, her Majesty opened the ball at ten o'clock, in a quadrille, others of the Royal circle dancing in the dance

At one o'clock a Scotch reel was danced, in which the Marquis of Breadalbane, the Marquis of Douglas, Clinny Macpherson, Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, Mr. Dundas, Miss Baillie, Hon. Lucy Kerr, Lady Rocnel Russell, Lady Caroline Elliott, and other ladies and gentlemen joined. Mr. Mackay, the Queen's piper, was in attendance

The bands of Herr Strauss and Coote and Tinney were both in attendance—the former at the Ball-room, and the latter in the Throne-room.

The invitations comprised the whole of the diplomatic corps, the ladies and gentlemen of the Royal household, and the principal nobility and gentry, the guests altogether numbering nearly 1900

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent was prevented from attending the ball by a slight indisposition, under which her Royal Highness has been suffering for some days.

THE ORDER OF THE BATH

The Queen held an investiture of the Order of the Bath on Monday, at Buckingham Palace. The Duke of Cambridge, K.G., K.T., K.P., K.H., the Earl of Ellesborough, and sixteen other Knights attended. Her Majesty, accompanied by the Prince Consort (each wearing the mantle and collar of the Bath), entered the Throne-room at half-past three o'clock. Her Majesty having taken her seat on the chair of state, the Knights Grand Crosses were ushered into the Royal presence. The ceremony of investiture was commenced by the Knight of the Bath, Right Hon Sir George Grey, Bart., Secretary of State for the Home Department, by the two Junior Knights of the Order. When near the Queen, Sir George knelt; and the sword of state having been delivered to her Majesty by the Lord Chamberlain, the Queen was pleased to confer the honour of Knighthood upon the Right Hon. Baronet therewith. Her Majesty, assisted by the Prince Consort, invested Sir George with the Ribband and Badge of a Civil Knight Grand Cross of the Order of the Bath. [illegible] kiss the Sovereign's hand, [illegible] the Order, received

Lieutenant-General Sir Edward Blakeney, C commander of her Majesty's forces in Ireland, and Captain Sir Charles Hotham, R N., were subsequently introduced, and the honour of Military Knighthood of the Bath having been conferred upon these gallant officers, the Knights Grand Crosses retired from the presence of the Sovereign

The Hon. Corps of Gentlemen-at-Arms lined the Throne-room during the investiture.

The Queen was attended by the Mistress of the Robes, and the Ladies attached to the Royal household, as well as by all the great Officers of State

ROYAL VISIT TO NORFOLK HOUSE.—We are enabled to announce that her Majesty and Prince Albert will honour the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk with their presence at Norfolk House, on Tuesday next. The noble Duke and Duchess will have the distinguished honour of entertaining the sovereign and the Prince Consort at dinner; after which a grand ball will be given, for which invitations have already been issued to the leading members of the aristocracy.

His Royal Highness Prince Henry of the Netherlands visited the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge on Sunday. His Royal Highness, accompanied by his Secretary Count Schimmelpenninck, and attended by Vice Admiral Lucas, Lieutenant-Colonel Rogue de Bagnon, Lieutenant Chevalier Van Rappard, and Baron Strackan, attended divine service in the morning at the Dutch Church, in Austin friars. The Rev. Dr. Gobin officiated. His Royal Highness left town on his return to the Hague, on Tuesday last.

THE CALEDONIAN BALL.—This annual grand fancy dress ball in aid of the funds of the Scottish Hospital and the Caledonian Asylum took place on Monday night at Willis's Rooms, under most distinguished patronage, and went off with an éclat altogether unequalled in former years.

THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.—A return obtained by Mr. Ewart, M.P., shows that in the new House of Commons there will be seats, 20 inches wide, for 462 members. There will be only one particular or clear between the seats. There will not be any shelves below the seats, as they would interfere with the ventilation; but presses, affording a convenient receptacle for each member, are proposed to be made in the private gallery, the refreshment-room and the library. Each lobby will afford accommodation, on divisions, for from 450 to 500 members. There will be seats for the public in the "Strangers' Gallery," 15 inches wide, for 96 persons, besides other accommodation for 54 persons, either standing or seated.

There will be seats 20 inches wide, in the Speaker's and Peers' galleries, and seats for 28 official persons attending the house, under the gallery, 18 inches wide. Lastly, there will be seats for 32 newspaper reporters in a gallery at the back of the speaker's chair.

POSTAL COMMUNICATION BETWEEN IRELAND AND SCOTLAND.—A meeting of noblemen and gentlemen, strongly opposed to the expressed intention of the Government to break up the lines of steam-packets between Donaghadee and Port Patrick, and thus put an end to the existing communication between Scotland and the north of Ireland, took place on Monday at Hope's Lead House. We believe one of the objects of the meeting was to call for a delay for a deputation, which the Marquis of Londonderry will head, to wait upon Lord John Russell on the subject; to decide upon the policy of moving for committees of inquiry in both Houses of Parliament; and to arrange for the presentation of a variety of petitions from various places affected by this proposed alteration.

DUTCH FRUITS AND VEGETABLES.—Arrivals are now regularly taking place from Holland of the various fruits [illegible] season. The steam-ship Argus, from Amsterdam, has brought 11 casks of gherkins, 22 tubs and 75 crates of gooseberries, 4 baskets of cucumbers, some packages of herbs, and 49 baskets of new potatoes. The steam-ship from Amsterdam, has brought 4 baskets of melons, 10 baskets of cucumbers, 100 baskets of gooseberries, and 21 baskets of new potatoes; and the steamer Batavier, from Rotterdam, has brought 82 sieves and 15 other packages of gooseberries, 13 baskets and 3 hampers of cucumbers, some baskets of melons, and 112 baskets of new potatoes, the whole the produce of Holland

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

GRAND BANQUET AT MERCHANT TAILORS' HALL.

According to ancient custom, Monday last being the anniversary of the Festival of St. Barnabas, the Master, Wardens, and Fraternity of the Guild of Merchant Tailors of the City of London, gave a magnificent banquet and entertainment, in their hall, in Threadneedle-street. From the period of the foundation of the society, or guild, the Feast of St. Barnabas has been charter day, and with it come annually the examination of the boys in course of education in the school, of whom the guild are the trustees, and the selection of those eligible by their scholastic attainments to succeed to any of the many scholarships to which the society have the presentation at St. John's College, Oxford. This anniversary, however, was rendered the more distinguished inasmuch as it was honoured by the august presence of his Royal Highness the Prince Consort, for the first time since his admission and inauguration into the art and mystery of a merchant tailor, and with it to the citizenship of the first city in the world. This circumstance invested the festivities of the day with unusual attractions, and accordingly the galleries presented an array of beauty and fashion. The spacious hall itself was arranged to the best advantage and with excellent taste.

The banquet was served at seven o'clock.

The Master of the Merchant Tailors' Company (W. Waugh, Esq.) occupied the chair, having on his right hand his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and upon his left his Royal Highness Prince George

On the right of the Prince Consort sat the Duke of Wellington (honorary member of the company), the Rev. Dr. Walker (President of St. John's College, Oxford), the two Senior Fellows of St. John's College, the Marquis of Abercorn, the Marquis of Salisbury, &c.

On the left of his Royal Highness Prince George sat his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, Viscount Hardinge (honorary member of the company), Sir George Pollock (honorary member of the company), the Marquis of Exeter, the Marquis of Londonderry, &c.

Covers were laid for 400.

At the conclusion of the banquet the loving cup was passed round.

The usual loyal toasts having been honoured, "The health of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, Colonel and Master Tailor," was given

His Royal Highness Prince Albert, on rising to acknowledge the compliment, was received with enthusiastic manifestations of welcome, to which also the present took a prominent part. His Royal Highness spoke in the following terms:—I thank you very sincerely for this expression of kindness and cordiality towards me. Although I have on former occasions had the happiness to meet you in this room, it has always been when it has been devoted to some charitable object. I have witnessed with delight the readiness with which this society, like the other great corporations of the City of London, has at all times responded to the call of charity. (Cheers.) To-day, however, I am for the first time among my brother freemen. (Loud cheers.) I am here fulfilling a promise I made at the time you first spoke of me to your court of Goldsmiths and the Fishmongers offered me their freedom; I felt compelled to decline those honours, in consequence of having been informed, as I was aware by hereditary traditions, that they represented the two opposite political parties. Under such circumstances I was only allowed the choice of one of those two companies. In consequence I looked to the Sovereign to whom I had become united, and to whom I had devoted my whole existence, and I felt that I belonged only to the nation at large. (Loud and long-continued cheering.) Free from the trammels of office, and the responsibilities of power, I remember I was much pleased I was when those two great companies, waving the provisions of some of their statutes, finally agreed to receive me as a member, and I am still more pleased to find myself, in addition to those honours, now associated with the company in which I now find myself (Great cheering.) Anybody may, indeed, be proud to find himself enrolled as a member of a corporation such as this, which has stood its universal beneficence and useful ness during a period of nearly four centuries—still holding the same honourable position in the estimation of the country that it held in the time of our gracious forefather. Although progress of civilisation and wealth has vastly raised the community, it has been examined how in this happy country it has been rendered possible to embrace the varied interests of wealth. With a reference to the funds and landed property bounded by the wisdom of their forefathers. (Hear.) Let them hope, therefore, that this company may continue its charitable functions, and remain equally the object of respect with our children as it has been with us. I cannot propose "Prosperity to the Merchant Tailors' Company." His Royal Highness resumed his seat amidst general and vehement cheers, and the Royal toast received with all its fulness.

The Master, in proposing the toast "Prosperity to St. John's College, Oxford, and the healths of the President and Senior be low mentioned," observed that what the College the Company of Merchant Tailors was closely connected, by the foundations therein established by Sir Thomas White, an ancient citizen and merchant tailor of the city of London. The benefactions which, from time to time, the President, and two of the Senior Fellows of St. John's had been engaged in the examination of the boys in the course of education in the Company's school, and it was with great gratification the Duke of Wellington stated that the examiners had reported the high satisfaction they had experienced from the progress made by the last time last year. Two vacancies in the scholarships at St. John's, Oxford, had to-day been filled up by the election of two boys, who would now proceed to pursue their scholastic course at the University.

At the close of the proceedings the Master conducted the Prince Consort and the other Royal and illustrious guests to the drawing-room, in which the ladies had already assembled. After a brief stay, the Prince, attended by the suite, left shortly before eleven o'clock, and soon afterwards the whole company separated.

PRINTERS' ALMSHOUSES

The foundation-stone of this institution was laid on Monday by Lord Mahon, at Woot-green, Tottenham

On the ground was a spacious marquée, in which a large number of persons could conveniently find accommodation.

An appropriate hymn (written by a member of the committee) having been sung by the Sunday-school children in attendance, and by the company,

Mr. Darkin (the secretary) read an address of the committee, in which the claims of those who may, by misfortune or old age, become fit objects for the almshouses, were set forth.

On the delivery of the address, Lord Mahon proceeded to lay the first stone, with the usual formalities. On the stone was the following inscription:—"Printers' Almshouses. This first stone was laid by Philip Henry Lord Viscount Mahon, M.P., on Monday, June 11, 1849." The names of the treasurer, trustees, the secretary, and the arch itect were inscribed upon the stone

In the evening "a friendly soirée" was held at the London Tavern. Between 300 and 400 ladies and gentlemen were present at it. Mr R. Taylor presided

A subscription amounting to between £300 and £400 was announced. In the list were 10 guineas from Lord Mahon and 40 guineas from Messrs. Cowes and Co. (making their donation £100).

DURHAM THEATRICAL FUND.—The anniversary festival in aid of this fund was held on Monday at the Freemasons' Tavern In the absence of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, who was unable to attend, the Duke of Beaufort took the chair. About 160 gentlemen sat down to dinner.

Mr. Stirling, secretary, read the report under the direction of Mr. Sterndale Bennett, assisted by a number of vocalists of reputation, among whom were Herr Hauser Meiser, Mr. Leffler, Mr. Charles Braham, Mr. T. G. Gengo, Miss Elina Nelson, &c.

—Mr. Harley, the treasurer, in making his annual report, stated that the annual income derived from the various property belonging to the "fund" amounts to £1353 10s., to which is to be added the sum of £135 10s. 9d. received from 36 subscribing members, making a sum total of £1549 0s. 9d. To 15 annuitants, varying in age from 56 to 90, the yearly sum of £974 9s. was paid, making their average income £65 : leaving an excess of £574 11s. 9d. to meet incidental charges, which, with the strictest economy, exceed £150 annually, and to relieve non-subscribers. Whatever balance remained after these deductions was added to the capital, in order to meet the claims which were constantly occurring, from subscribers being compelled to avail themselves of this fund. It was feared that shortly six more annuitants would require the aid of the fund. It was feared that shortly six more annuitants would require the aid of the fund. The total amount of subscriptions announced during the evening was about £600, including a donation from her Majesty of £50.

A public meeting was held on Monday evening, in Exeter Hall, in support of the motion to be brought forward on the following day, in the House of Commons, by Mr. Cobden, for the adoption of international arbitration as a substitute for war. There was a very crowded attendance, including a number of ladies, the great hall being completely filled. Amongst the gentlemen on the platform were Mr. Hindley, M.P.; Mr. Bright, M.P.; Mr. Horsfall, M.P.; Mr. Ellis, M.P., Mr. G. Thompson, M.P.; Mr. J [illegible], M.P.; J. Brotherton, Esq., M.P.; S. M. Peto, Esq., M.P.; W. Ewart, Esq., M.P.; Mr. Reynolds, M.P.; Mr. Williams, Esq., M.P.; Rev. Messrs. J. Dorney, Burns, Barlitt, Stokes, Richard, J. Ainsley, E. Burritt, &c. The secretary read the following report:—"The Peace Congress Committee in Paris met on the 28th ult., before this meeting the following brief summary of its proceedings. Acting upon the spirit of the resolutions adopted at the Brussels Congress, the committee have obtained a series of deputations to urge upon the notice of the people and Government of this country some practical substitute for the war system. The cordial support and sympathy of Mr. Cobden having been secured to this movement, he was requested to submit to Parliament a motion recommending the formation of international treaties of arbitration, by which disputed questions be tween Governments should be settled without any appeal to arms. The motion to be brought forward in the House of Commons to-morrow night. More than 150 public meetings have been held in various parts of the country, comprising nearly all the principal towns in England and Scotland, for the purpose of advocating Mr. Cobden, by a strong expression of public sentiment in favour of the contemplated measure, and upwards of one thousand petitions have been sent up to its support. At the following meetings the chair was taken by the respective mayors of the towns:—Leeds, Halifax, Huddersfield, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Worcester, Leicester, Nottingham, Wakefield, Bradford, Doncaster, Southampton, Bridport, and Falmouth. Petitions from the town-councils of Edinburgh, Liverpool, and Leeds have also been presented. A resolution was adopted at the conference of the friends of peace (held in the Hall of Commerce last October), to raise a special fund of £2000 to carry on the operations of the peace congress committee during the year. This resolution has been liberally met by contributions, amounting up to the present time to about £2000. Arrangements are now in progress for holding a congress of the friends of peace in Paris in the month of August. A committee of organisation, comprising several of the most eminent and influential men in France, will superintend the arrangements for this assembly, at which it is expected that numerous delegations will represent various European countries, and the United States of America." Several speeches, by Mr. Bright and others, were delivered in support of the movement, and resolutions in accordance with the object of the meeting having been passed, a petition to Parliament founded upon them was agreed to.

THE ETON FESTIVAL.—The anniversary festival of the noblemen and gentlemen educated at Eton College was held on Wednesday night at Willis's Rooms, King-street, St. James's. The Earl of Ellesborough filled the chair, and was supported right and left by the Provost of Eton and the Rev. Dr. Hawtrey, Head Master of the College. Among the other guests present were the Earl of Eldon, the Earl Nelson, Viscount Hardinge, the Vice-Chancellor of England, &c.

The Chairman, in giving the toast of the evening, said, "And now, gentlemen, ready do charge your glasses, for your next toast is your great toast; that is, 'Floreat Etona.' (Cheers.) I do not presume to say anything in favour of that toast—it appeals at once to your memories, your hearts and your feeling. (Cheers.) I trust that Eton will ever contribute, as hitherto she has contributed, to every profession in this country some of its most distinguished statesmen—men who have owed their distinction not so much to the literary advantages they have enjoyed there, as to that gentleman-like spirit, to those principles of honour, which still times govern Eton. (Cheers.) I give you, therefore, 'Floreat Etona.' The toast was drunk with the greatest enthusiasm. The festival passed off with great éclat

THE WESTMINSTER ANNIVERSARY.—The annual festival of the gentlemen educated at Westminster School took place on Wednesday evening at the Thatched House Tavern. The Right Honourable Sir George Rose, Master in Chancery, presided, and was supported, among others, by Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams, Sir R. C. Glynne, Col. Mure, M.P., Rev. Dr. Williamson, Rev. H. G. Liddell, head master of the school, &c. About sixty guests sat down. The usual loyal toasts were followed by "The Public Education," "Prosperity to Westminster School," &c. The meeting broke up early.

ST. BARNABAS COLLEGE, PIMLICO.—Monday last, being the anniversary of St. Barnabas, was selected for the dedication of this college, the foundation stone of which was laid by the Marquis of Westminster on the same day two years since. The college is to consist of a church, school, and real Gentary house for the clergy. The church is to be capable of containing about 1000 persons, the sittings entirely free; the schools are designed for 600 children—300 boys, 200 girls, and 100 infants. The residentiary house is to provide a home for four clergymen and twelve orphan children. The buildings of the two last have been for some time finished; the schools are in operation, and the clergy are in residence. The entire cost of the college will be about £18,000, of which £15,000 have been already raised and expended, leaving £3000 more to be provided for the completion of the church. The sermon on the occasion was preached at St. Mary's Pimlico, by Archdeacon Manning; and at the conclusion of the service the assembly proceeded thence to dicuss the ample provision made for the entertainment of the party After various toasts and speeches, the greater part proceeded to the evening service at St. Paul's. A numerous and happy party afterwards partook of tea. On the following day all the children of the schools had a feast, which afforded them great delight. And thus, says a correspondent, passed over an occasion which will long be remembered with pleasure by those who enjoyed it; and the beneficial effects of which, both religious and social, it is almost impossible to overestimate.

THE HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY'S FLOWER SHOW.—On Saturday last, the second of these brilliant réunions was held in the Gardens of the Society, at Chiswick. The extreme fineness of the weather attracted a more than ordinary gay and fashionable company. It was said that upwards of ten thousand persons visited the gardens during the day. In other respects the exhibition was an excellent one, and it went off with great éclat. The flowers seemed more plentiful than ever, and they certainly appeared more numerous. The bands of the Coldstream Guards, the Royal Horse Guards, and the Life Guards played during the day. Among the vast number of distinguished persons who visited the gardens were the Duke of Sutherland, the Earl of Zetland, the Earl of Carlisle, Earl Beauchamp, Earl of Orkney, Earl of Liverpool, Lord Wharncliffe, Lord Portman, Sir Philip Egerton, &c.

SOUTH LONDON HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.—On Tuesday, a "miscellaneous meeting" was called by the society at the Surrey Zoological Gardens The exhibition was upon a small scale, but the flowers were of the highest order of cultivation, and there were many specimens well worthy of being classed among those displayed in the Chiswick Gardens on Saturday. The heaths and pelargoniums were greatly admired, and the orchideous plants were a no complicuous both for elegance of form and beauty of colour. Amongst the Cape heaths was a magnificent specimen called by the "Erica Jasminiflora," grown by the Messrs. Fairbairns, at Clapham. This flower was one of the most beautiful productions in the exhibition, and it would be difficult to conceive the handsome manner in which cultivating the heath to great perfection. The floral display was, on the whole, of a very satisfactory character, and numerous prizes were awarded to the most successful exhibitors. The gardens were well attended, and the excellent performances of the band of the Coldstream Guards, the "Marseillaise" and the "Grand Duke" Galop, on the [illegible] Stanning of Badajos," must have been quite sufficient to satisfy the most greedy of the visitors.

LONDON AND POST-OFFICE, JUNE, 1849.—Arrangements have been made for forwarding between this country and Hamburg, in the closed mails transmitted daily (Sundays excepted) by way of Belgium and Prussia, newspapers, printed papers, current, and commercial letters, which are specially addressed to be sent by that route. Newspapers and stamped prices current and commercial lists, forwarded in these closed mails, will be charged only one charge in this country, on despatch, but those unstamped prices current and commercial lists which are allowed to circulate in the United Kingdom will be charged with a postage of one penny each, payable in advance when addressed to Hamburg, and paid on delivery when brought from Hamburg.

FIRE IN THE KINGSLAND-ROAD.—On Tuesday morning, shortly before two o'clock, a fire broke out on the premises belonging to Messrs. Longhurst, Lemprière, sheet zinc workers, Nos. 194, Kingsland-road. The premises were of great extent, and at the time of the disaster were stored with goods of considerable value. As soon as possible, the firemen set their engines to work, and continued until half-past four o'clock, when they at length got the fire under, but not until Messrs. Longhurst's premises and their valuable contents were destroyed. The roof of the Mail-Coach tavern adjoining was also damaged. The origin of the fire is not accounted for.

THE CHOLERA AT WOOLWICH.—We regret to state that the cholera has again broken out on board the convict hospital ship Unité at Woolwich On Wednesday after Mr. C. J. Carter held three inquests at the Salutation Tavern, Woolwich, on the bodies of John Fallows, John Williams, and James Rawlinson, three invalid prisoners confined in that vessel. The deceased were taken from the hospital for medical treatment. The evidence showed that death arose in one case from diarrhœa, in another from English cholera, and in the third from Asiatic cholera, and the jury returned a verdict accordingly

HEALTH OF LONDON DURING THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY LAST, JUNE 9. The present return of 971 deaths exhibits an increase of nearly 90 on each of the two preceding weeks, and also a small increase of 8 on the average of the corresponding springs. The mortality from diseases of the respiratory organs continues to decrease: for the numbers in this class, in the last three weeks, were successively 189, 177, and 162, while the average is 181. The mortality from cholera, usually the zymotic or epidemic class of diseases; for whereas the average is 198, the decline in this group, in the same three weeks, were successively 233, 209, and 201. The deaths in the last week from cutaneous and cerebral disease are 11 above the average, but are not more numerous than in the same week of 1848; those from cholera, in two preceding weeks, were respectively 3 and 9, but rose in the week ending the 2d to 98; though the weekly average is 74 was only one. Hooping-cough shows an increase on the average of 22, the number in this return being 58 The deaths from scarlatina were 40, or 8 more than the average. Those from typhus 36, or 4 less than the average. In the West London Workhouse, a man of 35 years died of "low fever, accompanied with diarrhœa, appa rently produced by extreme destitution." Another man, of the same age, died of "delirium tremens, brought on by over drinking." In University College Hospital, the death of a laguer, 22 years of age, occurred, according to the return, from "tremen lous pericarditis, caused by passing an iron sword down the œsophagus, and lance to the pericardium." Inquests were held on the above three cases. The births during the week numbered 1391

DISPUTES IN THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.—The Jersey authorities have enacted a new penal code; but it appears that the Home Secretary has refused to submit it to the Queen in Council, because it is based on the French law, and contains provisions which are inconsistent with the enactments respecting the dues charged on Jersey vessels entering the harbour of Guernsey. It appears that the authorities of the latter place charge enormous harbour dues on Jersey vessels, while Guernsey vessels pay nothing At Guernsey the war between the municipal authorities rages as fiercely as ever about raising the English residents. The corporation, or douzaine, are against taxing their whole fortunes, or annuities, insist on their being taxed. While this dispute continues, no municipal taxes are raised; and the poor, for want of rates, must starve, or get round the best way they can. The douzaine had possession of the corporation book, and the constables attended a municipal meeting armed with staves, and, while threatening personal violence, took the oaths from the douzaine. The matter is about to be submitted to the English courts of law.

Mr. Charles St. Clair Bedford, coroner-in-chief for the city and liberty of Westminster, has appointed Frederick Langham, jun., Esq., deputy-coroner for the district. The latter gentleman holds his first inquest on Saturday last, at the Millbank Prison, on a prisoner who died there on Thursday of Asiatic cholera.

ROME.

ALL hopes of accommodation between the Commander-in-Chief of the French troops, General Oudinot, and the Republican authorities in Rome, having been dissipated by the withdrawal of M. Lesseps, the French diplomatic agent, and the refusal of General Oudinot on the ground of its being contrary to his orders to ratify a convention which M. Lesseps had entered into with the Triumvirs, in which the protection of the Roman territory from foreign troops by the French was guaranteed, while the latter should, at the same time, be refused admittance within the walls of the "Eternal City," General Oudinot, on the morning of the 3rd inst., attacked all the positions outside the gates of San Pancrazio, Angelica, and Cavalleggeri, and carried them after an obstinate resistance. These positions were necessary for the protection of his trenches and regular approaches towards the city, and their capture was but the preliminary step to ulterior proceedings.

From the General's despatches to his Government we gather the details of the assault.

The attack commenced at three o'clock in the morning, when the Villa Pamfili, the church of San Pancrazia, the Villas Corsini and Valentini were successively taken. The Villa Pamfili was defended by numerous barricades and 2000 men. More than 200 prisoners, including 10 officers, were taken by the French before five o'clock the same morning: three standards and 200,000 cartridges were also captured. The church San Pancrazia was taken at seven o'clock A.M., and the Palace Corsini at 10 o'clock, and at the same hour the Villa Valentini. The Romans set fire to these positions with their mortars, and the French had to abandon them, but they were immediately retaken. Garibaldi tried to turn the left of the French position, but failed. On the night of the 3rd the Romans attempted a sortie, but were driven back. In the taking of these important positions the French had 180 men wounded, of whom seven were officers. The amount of killed is not stated.

The loss of the Romans is stated at 800 killed and wounded, and 300 prisoners.

The following proclamation was published at Rome on the 3d, by the Triumvirs:—

"Romans!—To the crime of attacking friendly Republic with troops led on under a Republican banner, General Oudinot adds the infamy of treachery. He violates the written promise we have in our hands, not to attack us before Monday. Arise, Romans! to the walls, to the gates, to the barricades! Let us prove to the enemy that Rome cannot be conquered even by treachery. Let the eternal city rise to a man with the energy of one common thought! Let every man fight! let every man have faith in victory! let every man remember our ancestors and be great! Let right triumph, and let eternal shame attend the ally of Austria!

Viva la Republica!

"Rome, from the residence of the Triumvirs, June 3."

The instructions given on the same day by the new Minister of the Interior were, that all the bells of the city were to be silent; but at the first stroke of the bell of the Capitol all the others were to respond to it by sounding the alarm. This would denote that the enemy was near at hand. Then the most Holy Sacrament was to be exposed in all the churches and monasteries, and the aid of the Redeemer was to be implored in favour of the holiest of causes, that which He himself had sanctified, and prayers to be addressed to Him, that He might enlighten those who were spreading discord among their brethren.

From a letter in the Débats we take the following details of what occurred during the combat. Immediately on the first occupation by the French of the Villa Pamfili, "the Romans had retired within the walls of the town; but from thence they began firing with red-hot balls upon the five companies that defended it. The Casino and surrounding edifices were soon on fire. Our soldiers, now completely exposed like so many targets to the shots of the enemy, were forced to retreat. At the first sign of the retrograde movement, the gate San Pancrazio opened, and the Romans advanced full speed. The villa fell again into their hands. They could not be left masters of it. This position was the last to be occupied before opening the fire upon the city itself: the 22d and 66th regiments of the line were marched against it. All the roads leading to it are flanked by two walls, and follow a strangely winding course. These walls had been pierced with loop-holes. The struggle was furious on either side; on ours it was brilliant and energetic. The 20th Light Infantry received orders to support the 66th. This regiment, which has been newly created, received its baptism. It could only advance in half sections; all the companies disputed the honour of marching first. Colonel Ripert drew his sword; Lieutenant-Colonel Caronde..et took the musket of a wounded man. The defile was passed in double quick time. The regiment reached the plateau, and took it at the point of the bayonet. This operation concluded the day, and restored this important position to us. During the night the siege batteries were placed."

"THE OLD WALLS OF ROME, SHOWING THE SQUARE TOWERS, FROM THE OUTSIDE, NEAR THE NEAPOLITAN GATE.

In the operations on the 4th, it is stated by the Genoese papers that the loss of the Romans amounted to 900 men hors de combat, while that of the French was greater. The loss of the Romans in officers was considerable: Garibaldi lost his Chief of the Staff, Daverio; Massina, Major of Cavalry; Major Ramorino, Captain Marochetti, and two officers more were killed. The legions Garibaldi and Manara had suffered most.

The latest authentic accounts from the scene of operations is conveyed in the following telegraphic despatches from General Oudinot to the French Government:—

"Head-quarters, Villa Santucci, June 5, 7 P.M.

"The opening of the trenches took place this evening at six o'clock. At five in the morning two besieging batteries opened their fire. The enemy occupied by a serious diversion which I had ordered on the side of the Villas Corsini and Valentini, did not fire a single shot on our workmen. During the day their fire on this side was well kept up, but without causing us any loss. The 33rd regiment of the line which landed three days since, arrived here yesterday, and immediately took part in the service. The Ponte Molle is entirely re-established, and carriages can pass over it. In the mines 300 lb. weight of gunpowder was found prepared to blow it up.

"June 6, 3 30 A.M.

"The night has passed tranquilly. The works at the trenches are carried on with activity. Last night new batteries were constructed. Unceasing exertions are being made to consolidate the defence of San Pancrazia and the Villas Corsini and Valentini."

General Oudinot could have taken the city by storm, but he shrinks from devastating the capital of the Christian world.

The advance of the Austrians within the Papal territory is slow. Ancona still holds out against them. The Austrian fleet that blockaded it has put to sea again. On the Tuscan side the Austrians have occupied Terni and Viterbo.

From the other parts of Italy there is no news of interest. Venice still holds out against the Austrians.

AUSTRIAN ESPIONAGE.—A Hungarian apothecary of Vienna was lately found guilty of concealing arms, and having in his possession a likeness of Kossuth, decorated with flowers; underneath or behind which Jellachich was represented hanging by a tricoloured rope. Such an accumulation of crime was judged treasonable, and the man was sentenced to share the fate he had desired for Jellachich; but, in consideration that he had been betrayed to the authorities by a friend, merely to satisfy an old grudge, the sentence of death is commuted to eight years' hard labour in irons. The man is father of four young children.

LAND WATER-SPOUTS.—During the late heavy weather, the neighbouring counties were visited by several of these phenomena, attended, in some instances, with very serious damages to property. One which visited the city of Wells, in Somersetshire, is thus described.—Between one and two o'clock, P.M., the people of Wells were not a little alarmed by a mass of water flowing through the streets, and insinuating itself into their dwellings. An immense body of water, fourteen or fifteen inches in depth, flowed down the lanes and avenues leading from Mendip and all this time without apparent cause for such a flood. There had, certainly, been a smart shower, but not at all sufficient to produce it. After the water had somewhat subsided, another body defaced the streets; but at length it became what injury had been done, and how the phenomenon was caused. On the road leading to Bristol the roadstones, sand, and rubbish were piled up knee-deep; immense ruts were ploughed, and it was with difficulty that horses and vehicles could pass. In the low lands several lambs were drowned; and at the sides of the hills whole gardens, with potatoes and other vegetables, were washed away. It appears that the overflow was caused by a water-spout, which was seen by some farm-labourers to descend first on Pewn-hill, and traverse the Mendip district for some miles. The appearance was a dense black cloud, which suddenly descended, and formed a circular column, whirling round with immense rapidity. The water had a disagreeable, brackish taste. About the same time a water-spout fell on Breedon-hill, Worcestershire, and rushed down upon Kemerton, destroying much property on its route. At Kemerton Priory, the residence of the Rev. Mr. Bellfare, the gardens were terribly damaged, flower-beds swept away, and even the soil removed. The furniture was washed out of the drawingroom windows. Half the houses in the village of Kemerton were flooded, and all the stone walls in its course from the hill were carried away. By marks on the trees it appears that the torrent must have been 16 feet deep. The railway in the neighbourhood was so deeply flooded as to delay the express train, by extinguishing the fire of the engine.—Cheltenham Express.

"ROMAN COUNTRY GIRL. FROM A PAINTING BY RIEDEL

Fair maid of Italia,
How lovely art thou!
Pride is thy bearing,
Serene is thy brow
Yet deep in thy bosom
A mystery glows,
And flashes of passion
Look forth at thine eyes.

We gaze on thy beauty,
And deem at its shrine
The soul of thy country
Is mirror'd in thine.
That such as thou standest,
The image might be
Of Rome in her beauty,
Sad, earnest, and free.

If such be thy peasants,
Oh, heart-stricken Rome,
From children unborn
Will deliverance come.
If such be thy maidens
Look up through thy tears,
And trust, O Italia,
The birth of the years.

Thy foes may oppress thee
Thy friends may betray,
And both may be banded
To spoil and to slay
And long thou may'st suffer
In darkness and doubt,
For errors committed
Within and without;

But sooner or later
The day-star will rise,
To shine through the tempests
That darkan thy skies.
The sons of these mothers
Shall struggle again:
Learn wisdom—Italia,
Nor struggle in vain. †††

ROYAL EAST INDIA COLLEGE, ADDISCOMBE.

A PUBLIC examination was held at the East India Company's Military Seminary on Friday, the 8th instant, in the presence of the Chairman, Major-General Sir Archibald Galloway, K.C.B.; the Deputy-Chairman, Mr. John Shepherd; several members of the Hon. Court of Directors, and a large number of distinguished visitors.

Prizes were distributed agreeably to the recommendations. To present prizes to Mr. T. G. Montgomery—Military Surveying, 1st Hindustani, 1st Conduct, and the Pollock Medal—the Chairman complimented him in the highest and introduced him to Sir George Pollock, in commemoration of whose the medal which he had first received had been struck were brought forward on this occasion, of whom six were selected for the engineers, seventeen for the artillery, and fifteen for infantry.

The proceedings in the fortification department commenced on the arrival of the chairman at the Co.dstream, after the Cadets had dined. Three light infantry bridges were already thrown across this piece of water, in addition to which a barrel bridge was formed; over this the bridge squad marched, two deep, afterwards the piece was passed over. The Cadets were then, in Indian file, over the light bridges. A submarine charge of 20 lbs of powder was next proceeded to, and explained the best method of fortifying a house and premises, of a sunken battery, a fortified tower, a double ca- re- From the redoubt the directors and visitors went Modelling-hall, where a beautiful model of the town, fort, and citadel of Moo together with the last and successful attack of this celebrated fortress, was exhibited, constructed on the scale of one-eighth of an inch to a foot. Cadets Hughes, Donaldson, Blagrave, Ryves, and Lucas were successively called upon to explain this extremely interesting model. After this the chairman repaired to the Examination-hall, where the rest of the Cadets of the 4th term were examined. The drawings in this department were of the usually good character.

Many excellent drawings of landscapes, &c., in water-colours, were shown, several of which, from their freshness of colour and precision in execution, reflect the highest credit on the Gentlemen Cadets whose names they bear. The most prominent were those by Gentlemen Cadets L. Donaldson (to whom the first prize was awarded), E. R. Blagrave, T. Montgomerie, T.E. Hughes, S. P. Graeme [illegible] belonging to the first class.

[illegible] specimens were, as usual, very satisfactory.

The prizes having been presented,

The Chairman rose, and addressed the Gentlemen Cadets, assuring them his high satisfaction with the reports of the Lieutenant-Governor and of the Public Examiner, on the Cadets' conduct throughout the term just closed.

The Chairman then, in a luminous address, strongly recommended those officers who had been selected as engineers to the close study of engineering. "This," said he, "will fit you for carrying out the designs which the Government of India entertain for the benefit of that country, by constructing works of public utility—as roads, bridges, canals, embankments, railways. The steamer by water, and the railway by land, complete within themselves almost the whole circle of civil engineering. But let me strongly recommend to you to pay attention to structures and machinery, not only as a whole, but to every individual part, and the material and mode of its formation, exercising your minds in overcoming by artificial means all manner of engineering difficulties; for, to me, to have gone to contrive, and to execute with the means at his command, would be the test of the accomplished engineer. I knew a man who, in one of the wildest spots of Central India built a bridge—an iron suspension-bridge—over a torrent, of 220 feet span, and 19 feet broad: a most beautiful structure, and the first suspension-bridge I think, ever seen in India. He had no iron but what he caught on the [illegible] to smelt but what he could draw and coaxed in [illegible] no workmen but those he found in that remote region, and no [illegible] but that beautiful structure. I mention this to you, gentlemen, to show you what energetic genius is capable of performing. For the honour of that distinguished corps to which you are about to belong, let me earnestly urge you to study your profession. Remember Mr Olan, and forget not that high effort of scientific and practical engineering which there enabled the engineers to render such service to their country. You, gentlemen, who have been selected for the artillery, think not that yours is a less important arm of the service. You must not only know artillery duties, but you cannot be good officers of artillery without being practically good artillery engineers. It is the chief object of the engineer to select and to prepare positions for your guns; but the chances of war may take them from you. Are you then to say, "I cannot construct a battery—I cannot make an approach—I cannot cross a ditch in the face of the enemy: this is the duty of the engineer, not mine"? Then you have to acquire a knowl[illegible] every branch of the Ordnance Department, and may, at the same time, [illegible] of the materials and machines which contain the moral force of [illegible] under officers of artillery. In India we cast all our field guns—a manufacture of our gunpowder, we construct all our carriages, and in that you [illegible] ambitious to make yourselves acquainted with this branch of your professional duties. For the great importance of your arm of the service, witness Multan a great fortress, one of the strongest of Indian cities, with a garrison of 20,000 men, formidable in its strength and its defenders; the next, its guns cowed, its defenders subdued, itself a mass of ruins. It was the artillery that did this. In the space of a few days almost 40,000 shot and shells from heavy ordnance were fired at this great siege. Witness, also, the field of Gujerat. That was mainly an artillery battle. Indeed, it was a battle which combined the use of every arm in the most beautiful order, and thus it has demonstrated, more than had ever been done before, the terrible efficiency of the Indian army. I know of no instance in modern war, even in the Indian army, in which 18-pounder guns were used as field-guns. You, gentlemen, who are to join the infantry branch of the service, do not imagine, because you have not been selected for the Engineers or the Artillery, that therefore you do not require to prosecute your studies; on the contrary, an accomplished infantry officer ought to possess a competent practical knowledge both of engineering and artillery."

The Chairman then stated, that, of the honoured list transmitted by Lord Gough for promotion or honours, and on whom her most gracious Majesty has bestowed, or intends bestowing, promotion or honours for their services during the late campaign, no less than 46 have been educated at this College. Such evidence of the discipline of the College was then enjoined; and the self-devotion, the untiring energy, the spotless honour, and daring courage of the British officers of the army of India, were held up for imitation. "It is by commanding the confidence, by when we the affections of their men, that they have secured from the [illegible] the noble and unbounded devotion, and, when occasion required, the [illegible] they have led them to incessant victory. The Indian army has been formed on the best model of the army of England. To that illustrious army the army of India is indebted, not only for an example of high military discipline, but for sharing with it the brunt of its greatest battles. With such an army as I have described, not far from 300,000 strong, and with boundless resources, where is there an enemy that can for a moment stand against us?"

The Chairman then enforced the necessity of the officers' acquaintance with the language of those they were to command; of being not only the officers but the friends of the men; of forbearance towards the native population; of economy. After a few words on the necessity of economy in expenditure, the Chairman added:—"Besides being good soldiers, you must be good men. The character of 'an officer and a gentleman' is by right the character of the British army. No man who cannot stand that test can remain in it. But you have a duty to perform first of all—your duty to your Creator. Let me beseech you, my young friends, do not neglect the Gospel yourselves habitually to his protection. He will strengthen your arm in the hour of danger, and shot of trouble overtake you He will be your Guide and Protector. Farewell, my young friends, may the Blessing of the Almighty rest upon you."

This admirable address was received with loud cheers.

The proceedings terminated with a handsome collation provided for the Directors and their friends in the house of the Lieutenant-Governor.

We have ingrained, as illustrative of these very interesting proceedings, a view of the College at Addiscombe place, which is situate about a mile from the town of Croydon, on the Surrey road. The mansion, which the East India Company purchased in 1809, is a brick edifice, said to have been built by Vanbrugh. It has a grand staircase and saloon, painted by Sir James Thornhill. The dining-hall is a grand room, forty-three feet square. The various out-buildings consist of the public lecture-hall and chapel, with arcade under, leading from the study room; the middle-ground is occupied by the professors' houses; and fore-ground by the [illegible] professors' rooms, Gentlemen Cadets' dormitories, and kitchen buildings. The whole of the buildings are considered ample and convenient.

The total amount expended on the new buildings and fittings of the British Museum, and for ornamental sculpture, from the commencement of the re-building in 1823, up to the 31st of March, 1849, amounts, as shown by a Parliamentary return, to £686,963. The total amount of expenditure that will be required for new buildings and fittings is estimated at £36,500.

MUSIC.

CONCERTS.

The great attraction of the seventh Philharmonic Concert was the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven. This work, if not "expressly composed for the Society," as announced in the programme, was sold by the composer to the institution. It was first played in Vienna in 1824, conducted by Beethoven. In 1830 it was essayed at the Philharmonic Concert, and proved a complete failure. The work, however, was subsequently executed by the Sacred Harmonic Society, and at the Royal Academy of Music; and it was performed on a grand scale at Drury-Lane Theatre, at the concert got up by the Earl of Westmoreland in aid of the funds for the erection of the Bonn monument to Beethoven. Still, this Symphony, together with the Mass in D, and the Pianoforte Quartets, have been considered, and are so still, by many eminent professors, critics, and amateurs, as out of the domain of legitimate art—wild and impracticable, as departing from the symphonic form, by the daring introduction of a choral movement. Our own opinion of this grand inspiration I is never been changed: we consider it as the most wonderful specimen of Beethoven's genius; massive in its melodies, and gorgeous in its harmonies; replete with all his peculiar characteristics, of which surprise is one of the greatest qualities. Nothing can exceed, as regards the three orchestral movements, was unexceptionable, the only the cuts of the "repeats" are not justifiable. The majestic tones of the double basses in the recitative were very fine—the violin obligato passages in the adagio were delicious. Genius is entitled to every praise for what she has achieved; he accomplished more than any other artistic could possibly have done with the materials at his command, and with such scanty preparation. Of the first part of the concert, we can only record that it opened with Haydn's Symphony in C, No. 1, and terminated with Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture; that Mme. Dulcken played her somewhat hackneyed chemal de bataille, Weber's Concert Stück; that the juvenile violinist, Miss Wilhelmina Neruda, astonished the amateurs by her execution of a concerto, by De Beriot; and that the soloists were Mr. H. Phillips, who had the good taste to select Handel's noble song, "Lascia mior," and Miss Andrews, a novice of promise, with the Misses A. and M. Williams, and Mr. Lockey. The eighth and last concert will be on the 25th of June.

The third grand morning concert at the Royal Italian Opera, on Wednesday, was fully and fashionably attended. Weber's "Der Freyschütz" overture, Rossini's "William Tell" (encored), and Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro" were superbly played by Costa's orchestra. [illegible] imaginative and fantastic "Derwishes Chorus," from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," and the Prayer, without accompaniment, from Auber's "Masaniello," were finely sung by the Chorus Grist and Persiani were encored in the "Sull' aria" duo from Mozart's "Nozze." Miss Catherine was compelled to sing the cabaletta from "Linda," "O luce di quest' anima," twice, so brilliant was her vocalization; and Mario was rapturously encored in the Pasquale Serenade, "Com'è gentil." Mdlle. Angri, Mdlle. Goldberg, Mdlle. Oras, Mdlle. Merlo (who gave a contralto air from Donizetti's "Maria di Rohan" exquisitely), and Signor Tamberlick, were the other vocal stars, apologies being made for the absence of Salvi and Rovere owing to indisposition, and Rondeni, as usual, being "rotten." &c. Charles Halle's magnificent rendering of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor was one of the great treats of this remarkably fine concert.

At the [illegible] Mr. Lucas, Mr. Turle, Mr. Hoyte, Mr. Hill, Mr. Bellamy, and Mr. Dale, and Pierce were the executants.

A pianist, Herr Kuhe, gave a morning concert on Monday, at the Hanover Rooms; but there was nothing in the playing to distinguish him from the herd of foreign musicians now in town. He was aided by Strauss's band, the Hungarian vocalists, Mdlle. Jetty de Treffz, Mdlle. Graumann, Miss Wallace, Miss Bassano, and Herr Pischek. Another was announced, but, being ill, Ernst played his "Elegie" and "Carnival of Venice." Sims Reeves and Schulhoff were also advertised, but were both hors de combat from illness.

The eighth and last concert of the Musical Amateur Society took place on Wednesday evening, com, letting a very brilliant season.

On Thursday morning, Mr. G. A. Osborne, the pianist and composer, gave a concert at the Hanover Rooms. The room was closely and judiciously selected. It was at any attempt at clap trap combinations or vulgar effects. The beneficiaire is a composer of elegant chamber music, and, as an executant, stands high in the rank of pianists. He played with Ernst, the queen of the violin, Beethoven's Sonata in G, and it was superbly rendered. A sestett, by Mr. Osborne for piano, oboe, flute, horn, violoncello, and double bass, executed by Osborne, Nicholson, Pratten, Carter, Lucas, and H. Wells; and a trio for piano, violin, and violoncello, by the same composer, were attractive instrumental items. The vocal portion of the programme was sustained by Miss Catherine Hayes, Mdlle. Goldberg, Herr Pischek, and Signor Sbriglia, with éclat.

Exeter Hall, on Wednesday night, was filled in every part for the twenty-sixth of the London Wednesday Concerts. An apology was made for the absence of Miss Dolby, who is indisposed. The selection from Mozart's "Don Giovanni" was well executed by Mdlle. Jetty Treffz, Miss Poole, Miss A. Williams, and Herr Pischek. The "La ci darem" duo, between Treffz and Pischek, was encored. It was the Viennese vocalist's pretty bird air ("Ich bin ja nur form," from the "Bondman," and in the Scotch air "Comin' thro' the rye." The solo pianoforte was by W. H. Palmer, pupil; Richardson, flute; and Viotti Collins, violin. Mendelssohn's "Athalie" will be given at the twenty-seventh concert, on the 27th inst.

Dr. Buxfield's performance on the new organ, built by Gray and Davison, on the German plan, for the parish church, Wandsworth, at that organ manufactory, exhibited the qualities of the instrument in the best light, and displayed Dr. Buxfield as an executant most advantageously for his fine-sounding reputation. The organ has 3 rows of keys, from CC to CCC in fact, and the pedals to CCC in fact. The swell, which is considered very effective, extends to tenor C. Dr. Buxfield is the organist of Merton, in Lincolnshire, and, although yet young, has gained ground rapidly in the profession, performed pieces by Handel and Bach, an extempore fugue, and a fantasia, besides a morceau descriptive of a storm.

MUSICAL EVENTS.—We shall notice, in our next publication, Madame Dulcken's evening concert, at Her Majesty's Theatre; and Dulcken's second concert monstre, at Exeter Hall.—Sims Reeves has at his own concerts this week, at the Hanover Rooms; and Mr. John Parry repeated his entertainment on Tuesday, at Willis's Rooms.—The same performance at Mr. Beadle's "Me-shah," in aid of the funds of the Royal Society of Musicians, will take place on Wednesday night and the public rehearsal on Monday morning.—Herr Bohrer, the violoncellist, will give a matinée musicale on Monday, at Willis's Rooms.—On Wednesday, Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be given at Exeter Hall, by the singing classes of Mr. John Hall, with Miss Lucombe, Mr. Machin, Mrs. Noble, Mrs. A. Shaw, Messrs. Lockey and Benson, and Herr Pischek, as principal singers.—On Friday, Jules Benedict, the composer and pianist, will give his annual concert.—In the evening, Mendelssohn's "Athaliah" will be performed at Exeter Hall, by the Sacred Harmonic Society, which will be honoured by the presence of her Majesty and Prince Albert.—Mr. Mitchell the lessee of the St. James's Theatre, will have his benefit on Wednesday next. Rossini's opera "Le Comte Ory" will be produced on this occasion. Mr. Mitchell has entitled himself to every support for his spirited management.—Mr. F. Chatterton, the harp performer, gives a morning concert in the day (Saturday) at Willis's Rooms.—It is regret to learn from Paris that Halévy, the pianist and composer, has died in that city, of the cholera. He was born, in 1784, at Cassel, in Germany. He was an ally of Logier in his system of tuition. He was the writer of several works.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

The great feature of this week's performance has been the revival of "Il Matrimonio" of Cimarosa, for the benefit of Labiache. The cast was most powerful, combining all the first talents of the theatre who could find employment in it. Although Madame Parodi's chiefest triumphs have been achieved in regal tragedy and heroic parts, she has failed, in the character of the persecuted Carolina, made suited to her peculiar style. Labiache, as her lover and coparamour, is more than equal to the secondary part which she has once more taken. The old spouser, Fabiano, is a [illegible] by which Ca[illegible]ari has earned his continental reputation as a singer of the higher classic school of Italian music. Lablache has made the world ring with his name so long, here at home. We have neither time nor space to do justice this week to the new cast of this opera, which has made the fortune and been so often the resource of so many impresarios. [illegible] Lablache, we think [illegible] Lablache, we think [illegible] Lablache, we think

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE Regatta at Henley, and the Races at Hampton, have kept the pleasure-seekers of the metropolis on the qui vive from Monday up to Thursday; fine, but cold, weather has prevailed throughout, and the sport—both on the water and on the turf—has been excellent. The events, however, have not possessed that stirring interest which gave so much éclat to the Derby and gathering at Ascot, and speculation has been on a very limited scale. As a wind up to the week the "nautical" are to-day (Saturday) afforded an opportunity of witnessing the Royal Thames Yacht Club's sailing match, postponed from the 30th ult. in consequence of the authorities of the Club having omitted to make arrangements with old Boreas to "raise the wind." Weather permitting, the match will be very interesting. The arrangements for the sensuring week embrace Cricketing at Lord's—Monday and Tuesday; Regatta at Putney, at Greenwich and Richmond on the intervening days; and the Derby and Oaks on Wednesday. The latter is the only aquatic event of any interest to the metropolitans. The Turf fixtures include Penrith Races, on Tuesday; Ripley and Stockbridge (over the same course), on Wednesday and Thursday; and Tenbury on Friday. On the whole, enough to keep the "game alive;" but not by any means an important week.

SOCIETY FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW.—A public meeting of the members of this society, and others interested in the amendment of the law, was held on Wednesday, at the society's rooms in Regent-street, to receive the sixth report of the council. The chair was taken by Lord Brougham; and amongst the more distinguished persons present were Lord Beaumont, H. Drummond, Esq., M.P., Mr. Commissioner Fane, and Mr. D. Hill, Esq., Q.C. The noble and learned Chairman opened the business of the meeting by reading the report, which stated that the returns of trials of property under the Court of Chancery were the chief points to which the society had devoted their attention, and that their efforts in this direction had not been altogether without success in legislative results. Parliament had dealt, or were dealing, with the subject of incumbered estates in Ireland, the transfer of lands, and the law of bankruptcy. The law of lunacy, and the question of the limited liability of partnership, had engaged the attention of the society, but much difference of opinion prevailed on those subjects, and no result had yet been arrived at. The reform of the Masters' office, the subject of legal publications, and other matters, were also under consideration. The council had watched the progress of the County Courts, and were gratified to report that they worked satisfactorily. The report, after referring to the necessity of obtaining larger funds, in order to carry out the objects of the society more fully, concluded with a suggestion for the establishment of a law institute, and the appointment of a number of advocates. The report having been adopted, the following resolutions were agreed to :—1. "That a cheaper, more speedy, and safer mode of transferring land was required by all classes of the community," which was carried. 2. "That the present law relating to debtor and creditor requires very great amendment to make it protective to the unfortunate, and severe to the fraudulent debtor, and inadequate to the social and financial wants of a great trading and commercial community." 3. "That the subject of the publication of legal works is one of great importance, and deserved the most earnest, serious, and careful attention of Government and Parliament."

CRIME IN SCOTLAND.—The total number of persons committed for trial or bailed in Scotland in the year 1849 was 4,894. Two were committed for offences against the person, six for offences against property committed with violence, 2334 for offences against property without violence, 60 for malicious offences against property, 121 for forgery, and 2,371 for crimes of another description. Of the total number, 3669 were convicted, and 1196 acquitted or dismissed. The number of commutals for murder were 19, but only four suffered the extreme penalty of the law, and three transportation for life.

REBELLION LOSSES (CANADA).—The appendix, just printed, of the first report of the commissioners appointed to inquire into the losses occasioned by the troubles in Canada in 1837 and 1838, and into the damages arising therefrom, contains a list of the names of the claimants, by which it appears that they are 5176 in number. The total sum claimed before the former commission was £70,851 8s. 9d.; and of this amount £40,592 4s. 1d. was awarded, £3620 5s. rejected, and £26,403 16s. 10d. left undecided. The amount claimed before the present commission is £24,065 10s 5d. The property, real or personal, damaged or destroyed, is £180,036 12s 8d; and the claim for personal sufferance, or other losses, £61,875 17s. 6d.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGNERS WITH SIDE ARMS VISITING THE TOWER OF LONDON.—Colonel the Hon George Cathcart (late Aide-de-camp), who for some time has had command of the Queen of the Tower (Major Kempton, the fort major, being on leave), made the following order to the warders on duty, to prevent the ingress of armed men, whether foreigners or English:—"June 4, 1849.—As precaution to the lands or bearers, except when on special knowledge and consent of the Governor of the Tower, will be allowed to enter the Tower at any time. 2. No person, except those belonging to her Majesty's guard and service of the garrison of the Tower, will be allowed to come with loaded arms, but must before the gates are opened, deposit their arms with the guard, to be returned on their leaving the Tower, without demanding either fee or reward. 3. The warders at the Ticket Office will take charge of any arms brought into the Tower by foreigners visiting the Tower, and return the same when the parties go out. If in large numbers, they are to depend on the arms of the interior guard."

PENINSULAR OR WATERLOO MEDALS.—The number of gold medals issued to officers who served in the Peninsular War is 621, and of silver 2819.

ENROLLED OUT-PENSIONERS.—We stated last month that a new distinguished out-pensioners would be made, after the manner of the Corps of Deputed Gentlemen. It is now decided that Deptford is to be the new district for those pensioners, and that Captain Christie, the staff officer of pensioners at Taunton, Somersetshire, is to be removed thence to the former place.

REMOVAL OF REGIMENTS.—The late confidential order given to the Major-Generals of districts not to move troops or regiments into your, has been so far departed from that in those cases in which, from concessions or misconduct, it seems fit to the Major-General, he has power to move the various troops and companies of regiments from one cantoni to another, but in no instance this year will regiments be moved, unless for some unforeseen emergency which may possibly arise.

The potato rot would appear not to be so very sudden as many think. Thomas Baker, a Quaker farmer, who is supposed to have been the first to introduce the potato into the county of Durham, by planting it about the year 1795, at Norton, near Stockton (a village famous for this root), once said, addressing his friends at the meeting house at Norton, that "he was afraid some of them were like the potatoes of that year, which, under a fair outside, concealed a rotten heart."

All diplomatic relations have been broken off between Syria and France. The French ambassador, M. de Sartiges, has left Toorean, having previously placed the French consulate under the protection of the English ambassador. The reason of the rupture is the refusal of the Persian government to ratify the treaty of commerce lately concluded between the two countries. The ratification of the French government was taken to Persia by their ambassador, Mirza Mehemet Ali Khan.

GROUP, IN MARBLE, OF THE "GRACES."—BY E. H. BAILY, R.A.—EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

We this week present our readers with Illustrations of four beautiful works from the present Exhibition—two from the Paintings, and two from the Sculpture.

Group, in marble, of the Graces, by E. H. Baily, R.A. This is, unquestionably, the principal work in the Sculpture-Room, where it deservedly occupies a central position. The figures are grouped with exquisite harmony, and they are chastely and unaffectedly classical.

The medallic composition upon the opposite page is sculptured by J. H. Foley, and its story is told in the epigraph:—

Beside his grass-clad grave she kneels to mourn,
And thanks of days that never can return.

The simple yet expressive pathos of this work is very touching.

Drawing for the Militia, painted by J. Phillip, is the artist's only contribution to the Exhibition, though it is seen to little advantage where it is hung, in the Great or East Room. It merits higher distinction; for the picture, as exhibiting a scene common in the last century, is full of character, heightened by the quaintness of the costume of the period. Here are the several phases of the "drawing," and the turmoil and excitement incident to such a scene. The episodes are very striking, the medical examination, and the measuring the lately taken from the plough-tail; the little groups in gossip, the struggle for entrance at the doorway; with a host of other life-like touches, render this a very attractive picture.

"DRAWING FOR THE MILITIA."—PAINTED BY J. PHILLIP.—EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

Innocence and Guilt, painted by A. Rankley, bears, in the catalogue, this epigraph :—

To woman's heart, when fair and free,
Her sins are great and manifold;
When sunk in guilt and misery,
No crime can then her soul behold.
Hogg.

The scene is a country church, abounding with effective bits. The clergyman is in fervent prayer, while the opposite conduct of rich and poor, during the devotion, personifies "Innocence and Guilt"—the former by a line of charity-girls and an entire family; the latter by a scene of conversational levity within the curtained pew. The sweet expression of the devotional group, not forgetting the aged man with spectacles on nose, is powerfully contrasted with the listlessness of the idlers in richer costume. This picture is the work of a young artist, and possesses, as we expressed in a former notice, talent of a very high order. Its refreshing morality is of the school of Hogarth.

EXHIBITION OF MR. ETTY'S PICTURES.

THE Great Room of the Society of Arts, in the Adelphi, was opened on Monday last, with a noble collection of pictures and studies of William Etty, one of the most distinguished of our living Royal Academicians. The collection has been formed (as was the Mulready Exhibition of last year) "in aid of the formation of a National Gallery of British Art;" and the profits will be applied in giving the artist whose works are exhibited "a commission for a work, or in the purchase of a work already painted, which will be presented to the National Gallery."

Mr. Etty is a native of York, as was our great sculptor Flaxman. He became an exhibitor at the Royal Academy for the first time in 1811, was made an associate of the Royal Academy in 1824, and a full Royal Academician in 1828. As an artist he is chiefly distinguished for his colour, for his skill in painting flesh, and for his love of subjects in which Cupid and Psyche, and Venus and Paris, and Hero and Leander may be found. His knowledge of drawing is not very correct; but there is a poetry and a knowledge of the resources of his art in all his pictures, which lifts them not unfrequently into the higher regions of painting.

The upper course of the great room is hung on the present occasion with nine large pictures. His design in painting them is thus explained by himself. "My aim," he says, "in all my great pictures, has been to paint some great moral on the heart: 'The Combat,' the beauty of mercy; the three 'Judith' pictures, patriotism and self-devotion to her country, her people, and her God; 'Benaiah, David's Chief Captain,' valour; 'Ulysses and the Syrens,' the importance of resisting sensual delights, is an Homeric paraphrase on 'The wages of sin is death;' the three pictures of 'Joan of Arc,' religion, valour, loyalty, and patriotism, like the 'Modern Judith,' these, in all, make nine colossal pictures, as it was my desire to paint three times three." Of the nine, the noblest in conception is the "Ulysses and the Syrens;" while the most complete design and most perfect picture is "The Combat; or, Mercy interceding for the Vanquished" (No. 4), an ideal group of three figures, with a bold Titianesque landscape in the background. The figure of Mercy is almost worthy of Collins, the poet; it might have given a new thought, or line, or epithet, to his "Ode to the Passions." The three Judiths are grand, the centre piece very much so, while the colouring is as rich as Gorgione. The "Benaiah" is too much like "The Combat," without, however, the drawing, or the grace and attraction of the female figure, adding so materially to the excellence of "The Combat."

Beside his grass-clad grave she kneels to mourn,
And thinks of days that never can return.

SCULPTURED BY J. H. FOLEY.—EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

After these "colossal pictures," the two fine pictures (Nos. 16 and 102) from the same subject, "The Choice of Paris," will attract attention. The larger and earlier picture was painted in 1826, the smaller one in 1846, so that this twenty years difference in point of harmony of colour is much in favour of the earlier picture. We prefer, however, the smaller and later effort, with all its comparative crudeness in the long-run it will appear the better picture. It is simple in design, with graces about it the result of a longer and deeper study of the art.

The Duke of Sutherland's picture (No 45), "A Composition from the Eleventh Book of Paradise Lost," and Mr. Serjeant Thompson's picture (No. 24), "A Subject from the Parable of the Ten Virgins," occupy, chiefly on account of size, very distinguished positions in the great room: but we prefer other pictures less prominently placed; and among these we would enumerate "Samson betrayed by Delilah" (No. 22), contributed by Daniel Grant, Esq., "Cleopatra on the Cydnus" (No 105), for which Mr. Labouchere, a few years ago, gave 1000 guineas; "Pluto carrying off Proserpine" (No. 27), the property of Joseph Gillott, Esq.; while among the smaller pictures very much to our taste we could name "The Parting of Hero and Leander" (No. 44), the property of Joseph Neeld, Esq., M.P., a circular picture, very rich in colour, and good in drawing and expression; "Cupid and Psyche descending," small full-lengths, the property of W. J. Broderip, Esq. "Cupid sheltering his Darling from the Storm" (No. 84), the property of John Sheepshanks, Esq. In Mr. Broderip's picture, and in Mr. Sheepshanks', the faces are beautifully defined, with not the least particle of that smear and smudginess which Mr. Etty has since fallen into; "Study of a Girl's Head" (No. 39), worthy of Reynolds or Lawrence, and "The Idle Lake," from Spenser (No. 45), the property of Wynn Ellis, Esq., M.P.

Of the three variations of "The Bather" (Nos. 89, 90, and 109), belonging to Mr. Gillott, Mr. Broderip, and Mr. Jacob Bell, we prefer Mr. Broderip's picture (No. 90): it is better drawn, and better coloured.

Cupid, as we have said, is often represented. No. 12 is "Cupid in a Shell;" No. 13 is "Cupid scattering Roses;" No. 15 is "Cupid hooping after Gold Fish;" No. 83 is "Cupid and Psyche" (Mr. Munro's picture): the shoulders of the Psyche are sturdy out of drawing.

Among the smaller pictures particularly deserving of attention, we could instance Mr. Munro's picture (No 64), a "Nymph after Bathing;" No. 68, a capital study of a man, called "Godfrey of Bouillon, the Crusader, arming for Battle;" and No. 40, a view of "The Bridge of Sighs," the property of Mr. Macready, the tragedian.

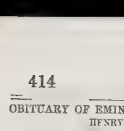
In a collection of this kind (which deserves especial patronage for its own sake, as much as for the object it has in view), the visitor should remember that one of Mr. Etty's very best pictures, "Youth at the Prow, and Pleasure at the Helm," is at present on view at the National Gallery; nor should the painter's own head, by himself (No. 77 in this very collection), pass unobserved. It is like.

Two specimens, male and female, of the rare and beautiful bird, "the golden oriole," were obtained near Emstone, near Dover, last week, together with their nest (of very rare occurrence in this country), which was suspended from the extreme end of the top branch of an oak tree, and composed entirely of wool, carefully bound together with dried grass. It contained three eggs of a pure white, mottled with black. The note of the male bird, which is very powerful, resembles the whistling of the common parrot.

"INNOCENCE AND GUILT."—PAINTED BY A. RANKLEY.—EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

HENRY TUFTON, EARL OF THANET.

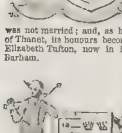


THE nobleman, who died on the 12th inst., was youngest son of Sackville, eighth Earl of Thanet, by Mary his wife, daughter of Lord John Sackville, and grandson of Sackville, seventh Earl, by Mary his wife, daughter and co-heir of William Marquis of Halifax. He was born 25 January, 1775, and succeeded to the family honours at the decease of his brother, 20th April, 1825. He held for some time the high office of Lord-Lieutenant of Kent, and was hereditary High Sheriff of Westmore and. Previous to his accession to the title, Lord Thanet sat in Parliament for Appleby. The Earl was not married; and, as he was the last male descendant of the noble House of Thanet, its honours become extinct. His Lordship had two sisters, Lady Elizabeth Tufton, now in her 81st year, and the late Lady Caroline Foster Barham.

LADY HAY.

HENRIETTA CALEDON, wife of Sir Adam Hay, Bart., of Smithfield and Haystoun, died on the 6th inst., at 12, Athol-crescent, Edinburgh. Her Ladyship was daughter of the late William Grant, Esq., of Congalton, county of Haddington. Her marriage to Sir Adam Hay, the sixth inheritor to the ancient Baronetcy of Hay of Smithfield, took place the 23d of March, 1823, and produced four sons and five daughters, the eldest of whom, succeeding Captain John William Hay, of the Scotch Fusilier Guards.

THE HON. ROBERT SHIRLEY.



THE Hon. Robert William Devereux Shirley was the grandson of Washington, eighth Earl Ferrers, and only brother of the present. He was born the 14th December, 1825, and was an officer in the 87th Foot. His death occurred on the 4th inst.

SIR BENJAMIN D'URBAN.

THIS gallant and distinguished officer entered the British service sixty years ago, as Lieutenant in the 2nd Dragoon Guards. His career has since been continually active and most honourable. He was with Sir Ralph Abercrombie in the West Indies, and afterwards through out the whole Peninsular War. He was made a K.C.H. in 1813, and a G.C.B. in 1840; he was gazetted a Lieutenant-General in 1837; he obtained the Colonelcy of the 31st Foot in 1849. His last appointment was that of Commander of her Majesty's forces in British North America, which he held at the time of his death. Sir Benjamin died, somewhat suddenly, at Montreal, on the 26th ultimo.

MARSHAL BUGEAUD.

THOMAS ROBERT BUGEAUD DE LA PICONNERIE was the son of Jean Ambroise Bugeaud, [illegible] descendant of a distinguished Irish family. He was born at Limoges on the 15th of October, 1784; he entered the French army as a private, a mode of commencing the trade of war more common and less disparaging for a gentleman in France, where there is no purchase, than here. Bugeaud's first promotion was when he was made a sub-lieutenant on the field of Austerlitz, from that period his rise was certain although gradual. He had become a well-known and efficient [illegible] of the line of Louis Philippe's accession, and to that Monarch and [illegible] himself firmly and faithfully. His first service for the King was his guardianship in the citadel of Blaye of the Duchess of Berry, after she had failed and been taken prisoner in her wild though heroic attempt to restore the Bourbon dynasty. He conducted the Princess from her prison to Palermo, and on his return, being stigmatised in the chamber as a gaoler by M Dulong, he fought a duel with that deputy, and shot him through the head. Great public excitement followed at Dulong's funeral.

On the coming back of Marshal Clausel, General Bugeaud went to command in Algeria, and there it was that he entered fully into his career there—his victory on the field of Isly, his subjugation of Abd el-kader, and his pacification of the country, are matters of very recent history. For these useful and brilliant services, he was made a Marshal of France, and Duke of Isly, in March last July, 1843. At the unfortunate Revolution of February, 1848, Marshal Bugeaud was again by the King's side, and again ready to sustain him; but the reprobation of force paralysed every effort, and left him merely a spectator of his patron's fall. The Marshal's subsequent exertions have been on the side of order and firm government, and his death happens most unfortunately for all opposed to anarchy in France. Marshal Bugeaud died of cholera at Paris on the 10th instant His death-bed was visited by the President of the Republic, and by most of the great men, civil and military, now in the unhappy French empire. The Marshal's character may be given in few words: he was a steady, strict, and determined soldier, endowed with qualities more solid than showy. He was severe, and even cruel, when he thought the occasion required it; but he had an honesty of mind and purpose which generally put him in the right. He was always ready to serve his country, and from his invariable courage and zeal not always of ability to do so.

A Portrait of Marshal Bugeaud, from a picture by Horace Vernet, will be found in No. 181 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

MARIA EDGEWORTH.

In addition to our recent notice of this excellent lady and novelist, and in answer to some inquiries on the subject, it may be proper to more particularly state the facts of Miss Edgeworth's birth. THE NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE RAILWAY.

THE STATION AT STOKE-UPON-TRENT.

THE North Staffordshire Railway is now on the eve of completion the opening of the last portion of the main line to the public being fixed to take place on the 18th inst.

The "main line" of this comprehensive project (which will afford the shortest route, by 17 miles, from Manchester to London) is from Colwich, on the Trent Valley Railway, to Macclesfield, thus forming a junction at either end with the London and North-western.

Colwich is a pretty village, remarkable as the burial-place of Lord Anson, the celebrated circumnavigator of the globe, and in close contiguity to the splendid residence of his descendants. From this place to Stone the line passes through a country of singular beauty, having almost the appearance of one continued park, and affording the traveller, amidst varied and lovely scenery, views of Shugborough Hall (a seat of the Earl of Lichfield), Sandon Hall (the Earl of Harrowby's), Ingestre (Earl Talbot's), with many other objects of interest.

From Stone to the Potteries the scenery is scarcely less beautiful, including a view of the woods, &c. of Trentham (one of the seats of the Duke of Sutherland), Sleaford Hall (Viscount St. Vincent's), &c.

The line then passes within a near view of the various important and very populous series of towns known as the "Staffordshire Potteries," including Longton, Fenton, Stoke-upon-Trent, Hanley, Etruria (founded by the great Wedgwood), Burslem, Tunstall, &c. Leaving this ancient seat of the earthenware manufacture—a district now also vying with the southern part of the county in certain branches of the iron trade—the train enters the "Harecastle Tunnel" (1¼ miles), passing through a hill previously perforated by two tunnels of the Trent and Mersey Canal, emerging therefrom on the confines of Cheshire.

From this point (whence is a branch to Crewe for Liverpool) to Congleton the main line passes through a very fine country, close by the foot of the celebrated "Mow Copp," the summit of a ridge of hills separating Staffordshire from Cheshire, and commanding most extensive and beautiful views, including the Welsh mountains

The various stations on the line are all in the Tudor style of architecture. The station at Stoke-upon-Trent is most picturesque and complete, and includes a magnificent hotel, spacious workshops, gas-works, &c

On Tuesday last the Government Inspector, Captain Wynn, accompanied by a party of the directors, and the engineer, J. C. Forsyth, Esq., made a close examination of the line, and pronounced it in a satisfactory and substantial state.

As far as we can judge, all the masonry, the embankments, and tunneling are finished in the best manner, and, to all appearance, will require no outlay for the next half-century.

To the densely populated portion of North Staffordshire this line will be of the greatest service. The traffic already is beyond expectation; and when the line shall have been opened (on Monday next) through Macclesfield, effecting a saving of above 17 miles to all passengers traveling from Manchester to London, the increase will be enormous

The finances of the line are in a most healthy state; the good sense of Mr. Ricardo, the chairman, in refusing to pay interest on calls, is one reason why there is money in hand, although all the calls have not been made. Not a single penny has been borrowed, and the line will be fully completed in the best manner at a cost below the original estimate

The viaduct at Congleton has ten arches, each fifty feet span, built of brick; the two centre arches are more lofty than any other in England, or even the celebrated Barentin Viaduct on the Rouen and Havre Railway.

The route from Congleton to Macclesfield, though not so rich in natural beauties, still furnishes various objects worthy attention, amongst which is a stupendous viaduct across the Dane Valley, an Engraving of which will appear in our next Number.

The Churnet Valley portion of the line abounds also in beautiful scenery, passing from Macclesfield, by Leek, Cheadle, &c., to Uttoxeter, where it forms a junction with another branch from the Potteries to Burton-upon-Trent and Derby. On these two portions are views of Alton Towers, the seat of the Earl of Shrewsbury, Doveridge Hall (Lord Waterpark's), Sudbury Hall (Lord Vernon's), some time the residence of the Queen Dowager; Caverswall Castle (now a nunnery), Tutbury Castle, and very many other interesting objects

On Thursday morning the portion of the line from Congleton to Macclesfield was opened by the chairman, J. L. Ricardo, Esq., M.P., and a large number of the directors, and the gentlemen officially connected with the undertaking: viz. W. Burchell, Esq., solicitor; G. P. Bidder, Esq., the engineer; S. P. Bidder, Esq., manager; J. C. Forsyth, Esq., the resident engineer; Messrs. Brassy and Mackenzie, the contractors; and their agent, John Jones, Esq.

The whole line from Colwich to Macclesfield, now open, presented a gay appearance, the various stations on the line being decorated with flags, banners, and evergreens. On the flags, the "Staffordshire Knot," somewhat like an 11-made figure of 8, was very conspicuous

In the field selected for the dinner of the directors and their friends, about 400 guests assembled. The customary loyal toasts were drunk, and were followed by the healths of the engineers, chairman, and directors. About 1000 of the "navvies" dined on good substantial fare in the open air.

A fine bullock was roasted whole on the occasion, weighing 15 cwt.

FRENCH DIFFICULTIES.

The great French Revolution of 1789 successively devoured its children, as Robespierre confessed, in one of his remorseful moods, to his disciple and confidant, St. Just. The great French Revolution of 1848 seems inclined to repeat the anthropophagism, though somewhat more merciful than its predecessor, it is contented, as yet, with imprisoning and banishing, instead of decapitating, its progeny. One after another, the heroes of February, 1848, have disappeared from the political scene; and batch after batch of "Republicans of the Eve" have been politically and socially immolated to the genius of Order, by its relentless high priests, the real and pretended "Republicans of the Morrow." Barbès, Blanqui, Raspail, Albert (ouvrier), Louis Blanc, Canssidière, and Proudhon have successively blazed on the political firmament of France, and been extinguished. To these have just been added the redoubtable Ledru-Rollin, and the Fourrierist Considérant. There now only needs the sacrifice of the sentimental Republicans who swear by the tri-color, and abhor the red flag, to exhaust the list of victims, and to bring France back to the point from which she started. Where the Revolution has not sent her children to the galleys, or to Vincennes, or to the more agreeable purlieus of Leicester-square and Regent-street, she has played sad havoc with their political reputations. M. de Lamartine, who saved Paris from Red Republicanism and anarchy in the hour of their first triumphs, and when they were flushed with victory, was speedily used up and cast aside. General Cavaignac, who performed a service as effective, and even more brilliant, shared the same fate. The Marrasts, the Aragos, the Crémieux, the Goudchaux, and all the other notabilities of the Provisional Government, are shorn of the splendours in which they revelled, and of the power which they knew not how to turn to account, and are eating, in the cold shadow of a hopeless opposition, the leek of a humiliation that must be indeed bitter to such an ambition as theirs. War and the men of war are for awhile in the ascendant. The government of brute force has succeeded, after the legitimate interval of anarchy and suffering, the keen though depraved intellectualism of Louis Philippe. France, weary of Revolution, has offered herself as the prize of the strong hand, the iron heel, and the indomitable will. Louis Napoleon, aided by General Changarnier, seems as if he would take advantage of her helplessness and disgust, and play the despot, as his only means of muzzling the "yelping hounds" of democracy, and allowing peaceable men to pursue the avocations of a profitable industry. It seems likely that either he or some one else will become for awhile the autocrat of the French. But whether he or an Algerine General shall mount the seat of despotic authority, their retention of the perilous post will be but short. The old unhappy game will have to be played over again as long as the people of France are allowed to exist in the very jaws of pauperism. Emeute will succeed émeute, and revolution will follow revolution, until France shall possess what she desires, but what she does not yet understand—rational liberty for the majority and the means of ceding her people. France is not only cursed by her minorities, but she possesses an army of pauperism. These are the two great secrets of her position. Her minorities, like British soldiers, do not know when they are beaten, but still fight on. It was the minority which made the revolution of 1848. On the steps of the Hôtel de Ville, when M. de Lamartine made his ever-memorable declaration against the Red flag, and calmed, by a sentimental speech, the overboiling passions of as fierce a multitude as ever congregated even in Paris, the minority was beaten. It was beaten again on the 15th of May; and again more effectually in the days of June. Once more, after a twelvemonth's comparative repose, it raised its head, and General Changarnier has administered a chastisement to it from which it will take months to recover. But we may depend upon it that this bigoted minority will yet give further trouble. Since the days of February it has seen, bit by bit, its principles departed from and its leaders sacrificed, but continues the struggle against the majority, and will do so until it acquires power or is extinguished.

In the meantime, the almost bloodless victory, for which French society has to thank the devotion of the army to the name and person of a Bonaparte, and the admirably firm, prudent, and able measures taken by General Changarnier to preserve the capital and the various seats of Government from surprise, will have considerable influence both upon France internally, and upon the whole politics of Europe. The insurrection was widely and even skilfully planned, and had its ramifications in every large town of France. The formidable display that was made in Lyons shows the large resources as well as the intentions of the Revolutionists; and the comparative ease with which the designs of the conspirators were frustrated in both cities shows no less clearly, that, whatever progress Red Republicanism and Socialism may have made in the ranks of the army, they have not made such progress as to impair or even to threaten its efficiency. Authority in France will for awhile be greatly strengthened by this result; and the cause of ultra-Democracy in Germany and Italy will receive from it those heavy blows and great discouragements which might be turned to great account in favour of rational liberty, if there were wise and able men at the head of affairs in those countries.

But notwithstanding all these advantages to the cause of order, both in and out of France, there will remain for France two difficulties which will task not merely the strength of the men of the sword, but the wisdom of the men of ideas, to surmount. The first is the Roman question, which neither in the success nor failure of General Oudinot in his assault upon the Eternal City can settle honourably for France, or satisfactorily for the Pope, the Roman people, or for Europe. The second question is still more difficult, for it is the question which gives life to ultra-Republicanism, and holds together that restless, earnest, impatient, and intensely practical party of the "Reds." That question is the condition of the people. Louis Napoleon and his advisers may evade it for a time. They may seek, as is too probable they will, the chances of war as an occupation for the large masses of able and virile pauperism that France has permitted to grow up within her breast: but after that war, whatever be its fortune, and whatever may be its duration, the old question will be revived in all its intensity; and Socialism, Communism, Organization of Labour, by whatever name those ideas may best be expressed, will agitate the multitude and perplex the Government. With a comparatively small and not over fertile territory—with but little trade, commerce, or manufactures, compared with Great Britain—with no available colony but Algiers—with few men of very large fortunes as employers of the people—and with a large population to be fed, France can only solve a very difficult economical problem. The Socialists and Communists offer one solution for the consideration of the Government; and until the Government offer a wiser and a better, we cannot expect that the question will ever be at rest. War may postpone its consideration, but a postponement will not settle it. Nor should Englishmen be surprised as the bold axiom has taken upon the French populace. In Great Britain, though we scarcely know the name of Communism, and though we laugh at the absurdities or pity the wickedness of the few sectarians whose modern prophet is Mr. Robert Owen, we have long established the principle for which the French multitude are now blindly and desperately contending. By the Poor-law of the 41st of Queen Elizabeth, the right of every English man, woman, and child to subsistence was formally recognized and established. Every destitute person has a claim upon property for such relief as will support life. Property pays the tax—and that tax is the Poor-Rate. Property in England is "common" to the poor—to an extent enforced by necessity on the one hand, and modified on the other by the interest of property in the paupers into labourers. No such right is recognized in France. The immense standing army of French pauperism has no legal claim upon property for the support of life. Hence the great social difficulty which feeds Red Republicanism with continual recruits, and turns able-bodied paupers into clamorous Communists. There never can be peace for France until this great economical question is understood both by her rulers and her people. Her vast army, of 450,000 men, relieves its pressure to some extent, but only at the cost of a new peril to France and to Europe. To the President of the Republic this question is not a new one. He studied it in the captivity and seclusion of Ham, and he knows how intimately it affects the whole fortunes of the nation that he has been called upon to govern. That question can scarcely extinguished in France, or anywhere else, we doubt; but that it may be very much reduced, we may be permitted to hope. It seems clear, by the whole experience of the last twenty years in that country, that no real and permanent tranquillity is possible until something be done to diminish its amount, and to give that portion which sha l be found inevitable, such a legal claim to relief the support of life as was fortunately established in England by our wise and far-seeing forefathers in the days of Elizabeth. If, in addition to maintaining order by the sword, Louis Napoleon and his generals will defeat the wild theories of the Communists by a plan for the diminution and relief of pauperism, there will be hope for the regeneration of France. If they cannot do this, there is, we fear, no prospect but that of a pure despotism, tempered by continual insurrections.

HEAD-QUARTERS OF GARIBALDI AT ROME.

The scene upon the front page shows the head-quarters of Garibaldi, at the Convent of San Silvestri, with specimens of his men. This is a very characteristic group by the Artist who is now at Rome sketching a large View of the City for our Journal.

The writer of a letter in the Times, dated June 4, states that the Romans, under Garibaldi, were not taken by surprise by the French. "For seventeen continued hours—a remarkable circumstance in Italian warfare—our people (the Italians) fought with unabated courage and determination, and a fury beyond description. The French could not succeed in placing a single piece of cannon in its proper position, so as to weaken our line of fire. At the Porta San Pancrazia, the point arrived at by the French, they could not succeed, during the whole day, in establishing more than six pieces; while one battery, under Calandrelli, did not fire less than 1200 [illegible] stroyed the Casino Valentini, which [illegible] and occupied till night, but whence they were at last dislodged [illegible]er, evidently a partisan of the Romans, reports the brother of General Oudinot to have been killed by a corporal, whose name he gives as Rinaldi; twelve Italian officers, and two of the staff of Garibaldi, are also reported killed. He concludes: "During the whole night of the 3d firing continued; and at day-break, on the 4th, Garibaldi began the attack, but the French declined it. Later, however, in the day, the enemy's works being molested by our people, he again opened fire. Our artillery is now heard beyond the Porta Pancrazia, but the enemy is further from the walls than when we were yesterday." Instances of great personal courage on the part of Garibaldi are related. Thus, in the defence of the Villa Pamfili, outside the walls, whilst the cannon along the ramparts kept up a continued fire, Garibaldi headed nearly three thousand men, rushed beyond the gates, and contested with close musketry, and often with the bayonet, every inch of the ground.

Two other Engravings illustrative of the contest will be found at page 421.

REVIEW ON WIMBLEDON-COMMON.—The 11th (Prince Albert's Own) Hussars, Colonel the Earl of Cardigan, will be inspected by his Royal Highness Prince Albert on Wednesday next, at eleven A.M., on Wimbledon-common.

METROPOLITAN CHURCH EXTENSION FUND. On Tuesday, a meeting of the friends and supporters of the St. Paul's Church Extension Fund was held at the National School-Rooms, Shaftesbury-street, Euston-square. The Marquis of Camden, K.G., presided. The report for the year 1848 showed that the exertions made on behalf of the "Fund" have been very successful. It stated that the population of the parishes was at present about 150,000, and church accommodation was only afforded to 26,200, there being thirty-two clergymen responsible for pastoral charge, five of whom are supported by the fund, and through the same source about 3000 additional sittings [illegible]. . . gratefully acknowledge the munificent donation of [illegible] by [illegible] Queen Adelaide, through the vicar, as likewise the [illegible] patronage of his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Lord Bishop of London. £4585 granted for churches, sites, &c., has been distributed in the following manner:—

SILK-MILLS DESTROYED BY FIRE, NEAR MANCHESTER.—On Saturday night, the silk mills of Messrs. Williams and Gardom, adjoining Broughton-bridge, on the Irwell, near Manchester, were destroyed [illegible]

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE

The chief feature in the intelligence this week from the Republic is a pendant to the proceedings of the "Reds" in Paris on the 13th inst. The plan of the conspirators was to produce a simultaneous rising on that day in all the principal towns, such as Lyons, Bordeaux, Toulon, &c.: it was only in the first-named place, however, that anything serious occurred, but not on the appointed day, which was only marked by the assembling in the streets of crowds, headed by well-known agitators and chiefs of sections. The night was passed by the clubs called La Solidarité Républicaine and the Droits de l'Homme sitting en permanence.

On the morning of the 14th a part of the population of the Croix Rousse began its gathering, and having descended into the city, covered the Place de Bellecour, and blockaded the Hôtel de Ville, uttering wild cries. In the evening the chiefs of the Socialists summoned the Préfect to communicate the de-patches they insisted he had just received from Paris; but he refused, at the same time pledging his honour that he had received no such accounts as they pretended, namely, communicating the fall of the President, the overthrow of the Government, &c. The Socialists then caused to be distributed amongst the crowd a forged telegraphic despatch, to the effect that the Mountain had formed itself into a convention; that the Legislative Assembly had been dissolved; and that the President and his Ministers were under arrest at Vincennes. These tidings spread quickly through Lyons, and crowds of men traversed the city, shouting "Vive la Convention!" "Vive Ledru-Rollin!" "A bas le Président!" "A bas le Pape!" It was announced that a Triumvirate had been formed at Paris like that of Rome, and of which Ledru-Rollin, Raspail, and Barbès were the members. The crowds demanded that a red flag, crowned with a Phrygian cap of liberty, should be hoisted on the grand balcony of the Townhall.

The night passed over without any act of violence; but at five o'clock on Friday morning, the 15th, the drums of the city beat the rappel in the Croix Rousse. Barricades were commenced. The military present at the Veterinary School were surrounded and disarmed, and at ten o'clock the battle began. From that hour until sunset the musketry and cannonade did not cease to carry terror and death through the streets of Lyons.

The insurgents at that hour were defeated at all points.

Some details are given that appear to have lasted, and probably final effort of the anarchists in their great central hot-bed of revolution. The first successful attempt of the insurgents—the disarming of a post of 150 or 200 men, at the Ecole Vétérinaire—was effected by a trick. The soldiers had been persuaded that the Government had been overthrown, and they gave up their arms voluntarily, and partly joined the insurgents, whose number was further increased by several pupils of the Veterinary School.

The fighting commenced at the gate of the Bernardines. The 17th Regiment of the line, of which the corps of the Veterinary school formed a part, presented itself first to the fire. The insurgents, on the other hand, had thrust forward the adherents they had got in that regiment, so that many of the men fell on both sides. The object of the first assault was to disarm the post of the Bernardines, which forms the communication between Lyons and the suburb of La Croix Rousse, where the insurgents counted most partisans, the opposition of the troops on this point was, therefore, the most fatal to the insurgents. They dispersed at once, with cries of "To arms!" The tocsin was sounded, and barricades were commenced in the Grande Rue and several adjacent streets. A determined fire from the houses and roofs of houses was at the same time commenced against the soldiers occupying the barracks of the Bernardines, who replied at first with musketry and then with cannon, bearing the houses of the Grande Place and the Grande Rue.

This state of things continued till two o'clock P.M., when a column of infantry, about 2500 strong, supported by eight pieces of artillery, and headed by General Magnan, turned the hillocks of La Fourvière by the quays of the Saone, climbing the rising grounds leading to it starting from the Quai de Serni, and moving along the fortified enceinte which separates Lyons from La Croix Rousse. Having arrived on the plateau half way from the Grand Place, General Magnan stopped his column, and, having exhorted his men, commenced the attack. The column was received with a fire of musketry from the houses and the Grand Place of the Croix Rousse. This was answered by the firing of cannon from the troops. The square was then occupied, the barricades attacked, and successively carried, after considerable resistance. Several officers were killed and wounded, amongst whom the Colonel and three Captains of the 17th. At the moment that the column of General Magnan made its principal attack, a battalion of the 6th light infantry entered the Grande Rue, by the head of the Quays, and joined the other column in the middle of the Grande Rue. From that moment the Croix Rousse might be considered as occupied. The insurgents, whose mass was thus broken, took refuge in the Quarter which formed a barricade-line at the foot of a rising hill and a second lower down. At five in the evening a battalion of infantry, accompanied by a detachment of dragoons, attacked and carried them. Other solitary barricades, in diverse parts of Lyons, were carried by the troops, which occupied the city in its entire surface. On the 16th the town and suburbs were quiet, and the disarming of the disbanded mass. The disaffected portion of the people have been disarmed without difficulty. It is calculated that the insurgents lost 150 killed and wounded, and 800 prisoners; and the troops 60 killed and wounded.

When the insurgents were taken, about six o'clock in the evening, to the Hôtel de Ville, General Gemeau was there, and the soldiers cried out loudly, "Vive le General!" General Gemeau then answered, "Soldiers of the 17th—For some time past the army had not any reason to be satisfied with the manner in which you carried your colours; but your conduct to-day has covered you with glory; you have rehabilitated yourselves in the eyes of the country. I thank and return you thanks for your gallant conduct." The soldiers replied by renewed cheers. Three of the 17th, who had gone over to the insurgents, having been made prisoners, were immediately shot by their former comrades.

During the whole of the night after the combat Lyons was occupied militarily. The bridges were all guarded by [illegible] the Place des Terreaux, the Place de Bellecour, [illegible] the Palais de Justice, &c., were all occupied by infantry. The houses at the corners of the principal streets were held by parties of infantry. The night passed over with the utmost calm.

The news from the surrounding departments is perfectly reassuring. Marseilles, Avignon, Valence, St. Etienne, Grenoble, and Chalons are tranquil. At Vienne an attempt was made to raise barricades, but they were at once overturned, without a single shot being fired.

The funeral of the officers, sub-officers, and soldiers of the 17th Light Infantry, killed in the late insurrection at Lyons, took place on Sunday. The number of coffins were ten, being those of two Captains, one sub-lieutenant, three corporals, and some privates.

In the Legislative Assembly, on Tuesday, the following law on the suppression of clubs was passed by a majority of 373 to 151:—"Article 1. The Government is authorised, during the year following the promulgation of the present law, to interdict clubs and other public meetings calculated to compromise public security. 2. At the expiration of this delay a project of law shall be presented to the Assembly, which, definitively examining the question, shall regulate the exercise of the right of meeting. 3. The Government shall give an account to the Assembly, at the expiration of that delay, of the execution of the present law."

M. Dufaure, Minister of the Interior, explained respecting this law, that the Government was perfectly conscious of its duties as regarded [illegible] It was aware that [illegible] meetings and associations were indispensable; and he pledged himself, in its name, that real electoral meetings should experience no obstacle or harassment. But it often happened that such meetings were held under the name of electoral meetings. In that case the Government would use the powers placed in its hands by the law, and be supported in the National Assembly for its conduct.

A decree of the President of the Republic suspending six Socialist journals is issued by their editors on Saturday. Those journals were Le Peuple, La République Démocratique et Sociale, Le Représentant du Peuple, Le Commerçant, La Réforme, and La Tribune. Appended to that decree is an order of the Minister of the Interior, directing General Changarnier to establish military posts in the offices of those journals.

On this subject La Presse of Sunday says: "The censorship is re-established, with the difference that it is officio ably, and not officially, re-established. A communiqué of police was sent to the offices of the National, the Siècle, and the Presse, to apprise those journals that, if they persisted in repeating their ideas on the interpretation by the majority of the 51st and 54th articles of the Constitution, the suppression of the Censorship would be consummated. On the subject, would authorise the sequestration of those journals. We submit to force, but we wish the public to know that our pen is no longer free."

General Donadieu, who filled a prominent part in affairs under Louis XVIII and Charles X., died in Paris, on Monday last, of cholera. General Pont-le-Roy died in Paris on the same day, in the 80th year of his age.

Madame Cavaignac, the mother of the General, died on Tuesday night of the cholera. She was of advanced age, and was the widow of the celebrated Conventionalist of that name.

The funeral service to the memory of the late Marshal Bugeaud was celebrated with great pomp, at ten o'clock on Tuesday morning, in the Church of St. Louis of the Invalides.

It is stated that Ledru-Rollin has escaped to this country vid Ostend.

The Abbé Faloutt, private secretary to the Cardinal Antonelli, has arrived in Paris from Gaeta. He is said to be the bearer of important despatches for the French Government, as also of an autograph letter from his Holiness to Louis Napoleon, expressive of his regret of the bombardment of Rome. He had a long interview with the President and his Ministers on Tuesday evening.

The cholera has been for the last few days slowly diminishing, but the number of new cases is still sufficiently great to cause alarm.

Among those on the recent decease of Mdme. Catalani, another artist of European fame, it has just been carried off by the disease in Paris—Frederick Kalkbrenner, who died last week, just as he had completed a work upon which he had been engaged for some time past. The deceased was on the point of setting out for Italy, for the re-establishment of his health. Bandera, the celebrated professor of singing at the Opera [illegible] since, which post he had filled for 20 years, has also been added to the list of victims.

ITALIAN STATES.

ROME.—In the early part of the week accounts reached us, and that Rome had been entered by the French, through the breach which they had effected with their cannon. That news has not been, but, from the authentic information that is published, it is evident that though the announcement was premature, the entrance of the besiegers could not be delayed many days. Much consternation, it was said, prevailed within the city, and the store of ammunition within the walls was becoming exhausted. A decree was published on the 10th, forbidding the Romans, under the severest penalties, to express their opinions on passing events; and a list of suspicious persons, denounced to public vengeance, having been drawn up by the clubs, the Triumvirs issued provocations, in which they say:—"The people will disdain the advice suggested by fear, as well as the inspirations of vengeance. The Government, conscious of the affection of the people, watches the machinations of both, and will act with energy against the propagators of alarming reports, and those who recommend recourse to illegal and perilous measures: against the first, not because it dreads the influence of cowardly advice, but because such advice and rumours are an insult to a brave people; against the latter, because anarchy is as fatal as fear to a noble cause, and because it is of importance to preserve the Republican banner free, not only from foreign insult but also from that of all stain and mockery. The Republic is strong and holy. The defenders of the walls of Rome are remarkable both for valour and virtue. Let all good citizens denounce to the Government the propagators of sinister news

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

Lord FORTMAN brought up the report of the committee on the Landlord and Tenant Bill, recommending that the bill should not be proceeded with further in the present session.

Lord BEAUMONT, in answer to Lord Brougham, replied that the commission on coal property had made considerable progress, and he hoped they would soon terminate their labours, and that the result would be satisfactory. He could not promise that the report would be presented during this session, but he hoped it would be ready soon after the prorogation of Parliament.

LEASEHOLD TENURE (IRELAND).

Lord CAMPBELL moved the third reading of the Leasehold Tenure of Lands (Ireland) Bill, explaining that the clauses had been so altered as to give full compensation to lessees and reversioners, and to retain the power as regarded the Irish Society to arbitrate between their lessees and sub-lessees.

Lord DUNSANDLE moved that the bill be read a third time that day six months.

The Earl of Wicklow, the Marquis of Donegal, Lord Stanley, and the Earl of Devon opposed the bill, which was supported by the Marquis of Lansdowne and Lord Brougham.

At the suggestion of Lord LYNDHURST, words were inserted, enacting that compensation for losses should be estimated according to the marketable value of the time.

On a division, the third reading was carried by a majority of 3, the numbers being 38 to 35—and the bill passed.

PASSENGERS BILL.

Earl GREY moved the second reading of the Passengers Bill, proposing to enact, as an amendment on the existing law, that carrying not more than two passengers for each ton should include the crew; that means of ventilation should be provided; and that there should be an increase in the dietary from a pound to a pound and a half of flour, and an allowance of tea and sugar.

VENTILATION OF MINES

On the motion of Lord WHARNCLIFFE, after a few words from the Earl of CARLISLE, a select committee was appointed to inquire into the best means of preventing the occurrence of accidents in coal-mines.

Lord MONTEAGLE presented the report of the committee on the audit of railway accounts, stating that, in the course of the week, he hoped to be able to bring in a bill to provide for the permanent and effectual auditing of the accounts of railways throughout the kingdom.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

COUNTY COURTS.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL gave notice that he would, next week, move for leave to bring in a bill to amend the Act for the Recovery of Small Debts, in which a clause with respect to the Palace Court would be introduced.

CHARTIST PRISONERS.

Sir G. GREY, at the instance of Mr. F. O'Connor, explained certain circumstances in connexion with the case of the Chartist prisoner Ernest Jones, stating that the refusal to send a letter from him was, because the privileges of sending a letter was limited to these misdemeanants to once in three months

Mr. F. O'CONNOR.—Then, if a prisoner wrote a letter, and afterwards received unjustifiable treatment, he would have no means of making a complaint in writing until three months had expired?

Sir G. GREY.—Not so; he had the power of sending a statement to the Secretary of State at any time.

Mr. HINDLEY complained that the political prisoners in Lancashire were required to wear masks on certain occasions, which was very offensive to their feelings.

Sir G. GREY presumed the prisoners referred to were those who were transported for life for having conspired against the Constitution and the Government; they were only subjected to the general regulations of the prison, as imposed by the visiting justices, and he could not recommend her Majesty to exercise any interference on their behalf.

Mr ROEBUCK thought these prison regulations ought to be laid on the table, in order to show by whose authority it was this wearing of masks was originated.

Sir G. GREY replied that all prison regulations must be sanctioned by the Home Secretary, but this was not one of a recent character. The masks were only worn on occasions when the prisoners would otherwise have an opportunity of seeing each other.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION

Admiral DUNDAS, in answer to interrogatories from Mr. Anstey, stated that the whole of the documents and papers referring to the arctic expeditions would be placed at the disposal of the American Commodore who was going in search of Sir J. Franklin

THE IRISH STATE PRISONERS.

On the order of the day for the second reading of the Transportation for Treason (Ireland) Bill, being read,

Mr. NAPIER rose to present a petition from W. S. O'Brien, F. T. Meagher, B. M'Manus, and P. O'Donohoe.

Lord G. BENTINCK interrupted, and submitted to the Speaker, inasmuch as the names appended to this petition were the names of persons who had been convicted of high treason, whether it could be received.

The SPEAKER did not remember any occasion when a petition of this kind had been refused

Mr. NAPIER was about to read the petition, when

Mr. DISRAELI rose to ask a question touching the cries of "Order" and "Chair"

Mr. ROCHE rose to order, and submitted whether, as the Speaker had decided that the petition should be read, that decision should not be final.

The SPEAKER intimated that he had only pronounced an opinion; the House would decide a question of this kind for itself

Mr. DISRAELI should not have interposed if he had understood that the Speaker entertained the question. The subject was one of so much importance that he thought notice ought to have been given of the intention to present this petition.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL believed that a petition had been received a few days ago from the same persons, but without attracting the notice of the House. He had consulted various lawyers, who all concurred that it would be laying down a serious precedent if the petition were received.

Sir G. GREY was bound, in justice to Mr. Monsell, who presented the former petition, to state that the hon. member had given him notice of presenting it; and if blame was due it rested with him (Sir G. Grey) for not adverting to the fact that it might be objectionable to receive a petition from attainted traitors.

Mr. NAPIER had only received the petition that day, and had communicated the fact to the Attorney-General and the Home Secretary He considered that it would be inconsistent with the spirit of the constitution if these men were not allowed to be heard by counsel at the bar.

Sir F TRENCHER suggested the postponement of the presentation of the petition, there appeared to be no precedent for presenting it, and therefore it was desirable that time for consideration should be afforded

Mr. ANSTEY assigned various legal reasons why the petition should be received.

Sir M. FEAZ thought the specialty of the case would warrant the House in receiving the petition. The preamble of the bill recited that doubts existed as to the power of the Crown to commute a sentence for high treason in Ireland, and therefore the intervention of Parliament was necessary to remove those doubts Under these circumstances he thought it would be hard, whether the parties were convicted or not, to say that they were precluded from approaching the House and praying that the bill might not pass into a law.

Lord J. RUSSELL was disposed, after the arguments which had been urged and as they were not affirming the proposition that every attainted traitor ough to have the right of approaching that House, to relinquish his opposition to the reception of the petition.

The petition was then read, which, after stating the several circumstances connected with their conviction, and the fact that it was proposed to commute the sentence of death into transportation, which they had been advised it was not competent for the Crown to do against their own consent, the petitioners prayed the House not to sanction the bill which was brought in for that purpose, and that they might be heard by counsel at the bar of the House against it. It was then ordered to lie on the table.

Sir G. GREY, in reply to Mr. Anstey, stated that no warrant or instrument commuting the sentence had actually passed the Great Seal. The prisoners, therefore, were in the same position in which they stood after the writ of error had been decided by the House of Lords, and were liable to have the original sentence of the court carried into execution against them. The object of the bill was to remove all doubt as to the power of her Majesty to commute the sentence of death for high treason in Ireland into transportation for life or a term of years.

The order of the day having been read,

Mr. NAPIER moved, as an amendment, that counsel against the bill be heard at the bar

Mr. J. O'CONNELL [illegible]

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL entered into an argument to show that there was no real ground for doubt upon the subject; but doubts having arisen, the best course that could have been taken was, to submit a bill to the Legislature for their removal

Mr. ANSTEY opposed the bill, and intimated his intention of throwing every constitutional impediment in its way.

Sir JAMES GRAHAM said he had no doubt but that the Queen had the power to commute the sentence; but as doubts had arisen in certain quarters, and as the bill had been submitted to remove these doubts, he had no alternative but to support it.

Mr. ROEBUCK, who got up a long time between himself and Mr. Grattan, followed in support of the bill. He would sooner hang the prisoners than suffer them to escape by the means to which they had resorted to elude all punishment.

Mr. GRATTAN opposed the bill, as did also Mr. O'FLAHERTY.

On House divided, and the numbers were—For the amendment, 31; against it, 178: majority against, 147

The question was then upon the second reading of the bill.

Mr. ANSTEY thereupon moved the adjournment of the debate

After some fair but conversation, the House divided, and the numbers were—For the adjournment, 9; against it, 196: majority against, 186.

The question being again upon the second reading, a somewhat acrimonious discussion arose, in which Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Roebuck, Mr. Dillon Browne, and Mr. Lawless took the chief part; after which the House again divided, and the numbers were—For the second reading, 175; against it, 19: majority for, [illegible]

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL obtained leave to bring in a bill for the more speedy trial and punishment of juvenile offenders.

The Select Committee on debts due from foreign Governments to this country was nominated.—Adjourned at a quarter-past one o'clock

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

REBELLION LOSSES COMPENSATION CANADA.

Lord BROUGHAM brought under consideration the affairs of Canada, and submitted to their Lordships the following resolutions:—"That by an Act passed in the Parliament of Canada, intituled 'An Act to provide for the indemnification of parties in Lower Canada whose property was destroyed during the rebellion in the years 1837 and 1838,' no security is afforded against compensation for losses sustained in Canada in 1837 being given to persons engaged in the said rebellion. That it is just and necessary, either by recommending a further and amending bill to the Legislature of Canada, or by such other means as may be effectual, to provide security against any compensation for losses sustained in the said rebellion being given to persons engaged in, or having aided or abetted, the same." The noble and learned Lord gave a succinct history of Upper and Lower Canada, pointing out the unswerving loyalty in good and bad fortune of the British population of Upper Canada, and noticing the more or less reluctant obedience of the French population of the Lower Province. He gave a rapid sketch of the rebellion of 1837-38, and brought down his narrative to the time when the Rebellion Losses Bill was introduced. He denounced the impolicy of the Colonial Government in giving a premium to rebellion, by appointing to the highest offices those persons who had been engaged in seditious practices He ridiculed the notion of applying what was the so-called "responsible government" to a colony. In the mother-country the Crown and the two Houses of Parliament together appointed the Ministry; but it was the crudest theory ever conceived to suppose that the Assembly of a colony should absolutely dictate to the Government, and that the Government should be the mere instrument, the puppet, and the tool of that Assembly. The folly of asserting that, in matters of an Imperial nature, in matters that touched the sovereignty of the mother country, or the tie that knits it with its dependencies, was passing description. The noble and learned Lord fortified his opinion on the absurdity of this theory of responsible government, as applied to a colony, by quoting similar sentiments expressed by Lord J. Russell in a despatch to Lord Sydenham. The noble and learned Lord then proceeded to trace the origin and rise and the course of the Rebellion Losses Bill. It had been said that this bill was never meant to give compensation to rebels. He denied that assertion, and he referred to the very words of the original bill as proof conclusive that such was the intention of the framers of the bill. It had also been said that the bill followed the precedent of that for Upper Canada. He denied that also, and boldly asserted that there was no analogy between the two measures. He did not ask their Lordships to recommend the refusal of the Royal assent to the bill; he only asked them to take care that the enactment should be made clear, intelligible, and strict in its terms, that its errors and blunders should be corrected, that such exception as would effectually exclude rebels from receiving indemnity under it should be added; in short, to declare that the Royal assent should be suspended. The noble and learned Lord reminded their Lordships that they were on the eve of a great struggle in North America. If America should prove to be the first Republic without cohesion that ever existed, and the first Democratic power without the lust of dominion, it would, indeed, be wonderful, and almost a miracle. He believed that America counted every day an age until she should hear of the passing of this bill, and of our fatal plunge into the gulf that this measure opened to us.

The Earl GREY was at a loss to know what great public object or interest it was the intention of Lord Brougham to promote by his motion. He had given no explanation how his resolution would facilitate the harmonious and prosperous government of Canada under the authority of the British Crown. He had spoken for two hours and three-quarters, and had given an historical review of the Canadas. That historical review he (Lord Grey) was prepared to maintain was altogether erroneous. The noble Earl referred to the conciliatory policy pursued by Lord Chatham towards the Scotch Highlanders after 1745, and to the policy adopted by Henri Quatre of France after his accession, as proofs of the wisdom of that policy. With respect to the motion submitted by Lord Brougham, he did not think that, should their Lordships resolve to take any steps in the matter, a resolution was the proper course. An address to the Crown would be the only fair mode of proceeding. The noble Earl stated that the Indemnity Bill for Lower Canada followed precisely the principle and precedent of the Upper Canada Compensation Act; and that, by the terms of the bill, all persons who had sustained losses in consequence of participating in acts of treason would be excluded from receiving compensation. In calling on their Lordships to reject the resolutions laid before them, he did so on the simple ground that they were not, on that occasion, justified in interfering with a measure passed by the Legislature of Canada, and approved of by two-thirds of the representatives of the people of that province.

Lord LYNDHURST said, that though he had not been in the habit recently of taking any share in the debates of the House, yet, upon this occasion, as a sworn adviser of the CROWN, he felt it to be his duty to express his total disapprobation of the measure under consideration. This was a case in which no colony would be Imperial Parliament was bound to interfere, the object of the bill being to reward and compensate persons who had been actively involved in the rebellion. The noble and learned Lord then adverted to the late rebellion in Ireland, and asked their Lordships what they would think of it, should her Majesty's pardon be hereafter extended to Mr. W. S. O'Brien and his fellow-traitors, and should by some strange chance of circumstances, Mr. O'Brien subsequently become a member of the Government, if he should thereupon bring in a bill to compensate himself and his friends for the losses they had sustained in a rebellion which they had themselves fomented?

Lord CAMPBELL observed that the noble and learned Lord appeared to him to be so much overcome by imaginary terrors, respecting the loss of Canada, that he came wholly blind to the real dangers likely to ensue should the bill be disallowed. Such a proceeding, instead of throwing oil on the troubled waters, would only give rise to a renewed agitation which would be fatal to the peace of the colony. In conclusion, the noble Lord expressed a hope that their Lordships would reject the motion.

The Earl of STANLEY examined the legislative proceedings in reference to the Rebellion Losses Bill, and contended that the whole course of these discussions indicated that it was the intention of the Governor of Lord Elgin to compensate traitors engaged in overt acts of rebellion, and to deprecate inquiry. The question for their Lordships to decide was, whether they would acquiesce in the declaration that such a bill as this did not affect the honour or dignity of the Crown that it did not insult every loyal inhabitant in the province.

The Earl of St. GERMANS opposed the motion.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE said that, having granted to Canada the benefits of a constitutional government, this was the first time that our sincerity was tested, and therefore he urged on their Lordships the necessity of abstaining from interference. It was not a question of the principle involved in the bill that was in dispute, but its details, and by this interposition their Lordships would be placing themselves, as it were, in communities with the Canadian Legislature. Should their Lordships agree to the motion submitted to them, they would place themselves in direct opposition to the Imperial House of Commons, to the Colonial House of Assembly, and to the Governor-General appointed.

Their Lordships divided —For Lord Brougham's motion Contents, present, 34; proxies, 42—96. Non-contents, present, 76; proxies, 38—98. Majority against the resolutions, 3.—Adjourned at half-past two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

VANCOUVER'S ISLAND.

The Earl of LINCOLN moved that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, setting forth that this House has taken into consideration the papers which her Majesty has graciously communicated to be presented in regard to the grant of Vancouver's Island by Royal charter to the Hudson's Bay Company, and is of opinion that it is ill adapted for superintending the establishment of any colony founded upon principles of political or commercial freedom. That it also appears from the papers before mentioned that the means adopted by the Secretary of State to ascertain "that the acceptance by the company or such a grant would be consistent with their Charter of Incorporation" were insufficient. That this House accordingly prays her Majesty to be graciously pleased to direct that such measures as shall appear to her Majesty most suitable may be adopted to ascertain whether, by the charter in question, a grant of the land could be made in the manner of the powers which it purports to convey. The noble Lord contended that, in whatever instances colonization was attempted by means of public companies, the experiment had failed. Without casting any imputation against the Hudson's Bay Company for the manner in which it had conducted the affairs for the management of which it was constituted, he was compelled to say that it was not calculated to carry out an efficient system of colonization. The noble Lord described the arbitrary authority exercised by the company.

Mr. HAWES seconded the motion, and expressed his opinion that the head of the Government was deserving of a vote of censure for his conduct in reference to this company.

Mr. HAWES rose to address the House, but an hon. member remarked that there were not forty members present. A "count out" was the consequence, at half-past eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House sat from noon to six o'clock

TUESDAY NIGHT'S COUNT-OUT.

Lord LINCOLN complained of the count-out of the preceding evening, on his motion relative to Vancouver's Island; and charged the Government with having, by their officials, taken active and open steps to prevent the debate from proceeding. He announced his determination to renew his motion on the first supply night.

Mr. TUFNELL denied that he had taken any step to procure a count-out. He had himself been obliged to save the House on account of its inattendance.

Lord LINCOLN did not accuse the hon. member; his charge was made against Lord Marcus Hill, one of the whippers-in of the Government, but who on this occasion was the whipper-in [illegible]

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL [illegible] count-out was, in all probability attributable to the [illegible] ough of the noble Lord. At all events it was remarkable that there were only seven members on his (Lord [illegible]) side of the House when the count-out took place, whereas there were thirty members on the Ministerial benches. The noble Lord's own friends, therefore, were more to blame, if blame there was, than his political opponents.

Mr. LABOUCHERE and Mr. HAWES denied that the Government had the slightest desire to avoid a discussion on the noble Lord's motion.

Mr. GLADSTONE and Lord LINCOLN reiterated the charge against Lord Marcus Hill, and asserted that he had taken open steps to put a stop to the debate.

Lord M. HILL, who had been absent during the preceding conversation, but who had just entered the House, declared that he had not taken any open steps; but he admitted that he knew that a friend of his intended to count out, and he did not think it his duty to prevent him

Lord LINCOLN asked if the noble Lord had not stopped a member at the door and prevented him from entering.

Lord M. HILL said he might have done so, but he did not call that taking "open steps."

Mr. V. SMITH taunted Lord Lincoln with the want of friends. If he had them, and if they took an interest in the motion, it was their business to remain, and not to desert him

Mr. HUME considered that the House should not proceed with any public business unless at least 200 members were present.

The subject then dropped.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

The adjourned debate on the second reading of the Marriage Bill, and Sir J. Inglis's amendment, was resumed by Mr. NAPIER, who, at great length, discussed the whole question, and opposed the bill. The hon. and [illegible] maintained that it was the duty of those who opposed this bill [illegible] the prohibition of marriage with the sister of a deceased [illegible] by the Levitical law, that the restriction was not warranted by the tenets of Christianity, and that the general interests of society would be more advanced by the passing of this bill than by the maintenance of the restriction. He denied that any of those propositions had been or could be proved, and therefore he called on the House to reject the motion.

The Lord ADVOCATE spoke in favour of the bill

Mr. GLADSTONE opposed it, in a speech of considerable length

Mr. J. S. WORTLEY replied.

The House divided a few minutes before six o'clock.—For the second reading of the bill, 177; against it, 143: majority, 34.

The bill was then read a second time.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The Sheep-Stealing (Ireland) Bill, the Passengers Bill, and the Grand Jury Cess (Ireland) Bill passed each through committee, and were ordered to be read a third time.

The Highways (Annual Returns) Bill was read a third time, and passed

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

Mr. DISRAELI appealed to the noble Lord at the head of the Government to give him one of the days at the Minister's disposal for the discussion of his motion on the state of the country.

Lord J. RUSSELL granted Monday, July the 2d, for the purpose of the hon. gentleman.

NAVAL AND MILITARY SURGEONS.

Sir DE LACY EVANS brought forward the claims of the medical officers of the army and navy to military rewards and distinctions.

Mr. HUME having seconded the motion,

Lord J. RUSSELL concurred in the general objects of the motion, but wished to consult the Commander-in-Chief, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary at War, before deciding whether those objects, in whole or in part, could be carried into execution. He hoped the motion would not be pressed; but, if pressed, he should meet it by moving the previous question.

After a short discussion, the motion was ultimately withdrawn.

NATIONAL POOR-RATE

Lord NUGENT moved for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the practicability of charging the maintenance of the destitute poor of England and Wales on the general revenue of the country.

Mr. BAINES, on the part of the Government, refused to accede to the motion, lest the appointment of a committee should lead to the belief that a national rate would be adopted

The motion was negatived without a division.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).

Mr. HAMILTON moved an address to her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to direct that such a modification of the system of national education in Ireland may be made as may remove the conscientious objections which a large proportion of the clergy and laity of the Established Church entertain to that system as at present carried into operation; or otherwise that means may be taken to enable those of the clergy and laity of the Established Church who entertain such conscientious objections to extend the blessings of scriptural education in Ireland.

Sir W. SOMERVILLE objected to the motion, because, let the hon. gentleman present the question to the House as he liked, it amounted to nothing less than the abolition of the present admirable system of National education in Ireland, and he should therefore ask the House to reject the proposition of his hon. friend. The present system was gradually winning its way, and extending itself; and he believed he was justified in saying that it was approved of by a large majority of the Protestants of Ireland generally, though not, perhaps, by a majority of a Protestants of the Established Church.

After some discussion, the motion was negatived by a majority of 162 to 102.—Adjourned at quarter to two o'clock.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR CHARLES RICHARD VAUGHAN, KT., G.C.H.

Sir CHARLES VAUGHAN, whose death was lately announced, was fourth son of Mr. John Vaughan, a physician of considerable practice at Leicester. His mother, Hester Smalley, was grand-daughter of Sir Richard Halford, Bart., and cousin of the last Baronet of that family, Sir Charles Halford, who died in 1780. Sir Charles Halford, who was the distinguished friend of Sir Henry Halford, was originally designed for the medical profession, and took the degree of M.B. at Oxford, where he obtained a travelling fellowship on the Radcliffe foundation, and he had made the tour of Italy, the latter part of his life, to visit many countries in Europe and Asia. In 1809 he acted as Private Secretary, in the Foreign Office, in 1810, became Secretary of Legation in Spain; in 1820, was appointed Secretary of Embassy at Berlin; in 1824, Minister Plenipotentiary to the States of Switzerland; and in 1826, having been sworn a member of the Privy Council, was constituted Envoy Extraordinary to the United States of America.

In 1837, Sir Charles was selected to undertake a special mission to Constantinople, as Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, to supply the place of Lord Ponsonby during his absence on leave, but did not proceed further than Malta, when he learned that Lord Ponsonby had determined to remain at the Porte

The right hon gentleman was equally successful in public and private life in concluding the good opinion of those with whom he came in contact. Besides Sir Henry Halford, Sir Charles had three other brothers, all now deceased; viz. Sir John Vaughan, one of the judges of the Common Pleas; the Rev. Peter Vaughan, D.D., Dean of Chester; and the Rev. Edward Vaughan, Vicar of St. Martin's, Leicester.

VICE-ADMIRAL HENRY HILL.

This gallant officer was a younger son of Lieutenant-Colonel Hill, of St. Bonifacs, Isle of Wight, Lieutenant-Governor of Berwick, by Elizabeth, his wife, daughter of John Popham, Esq., of Rusley, in Wilts, who was grandson of Alexander Popham, of Littlecott, M.P. for the county of Somerset, and one of Cromwell's Upper House. Mr. Henry Hill entered the Royal Navy on board the Venus, under the Hon. Richard Strachan, in 1787, and served in the East Indies, in active co-operation with the army, against Tippoo Saib, and, as Midshipman of the Phœnix, in the action with La Resolu, in 1791. He was subsequently under the auspices of Sir John Jervis, who appointed him Lieutenant of the Zebra, under the command of Captain Nagle, in 1794, and while in that ship he was engaged in the exploits of storming Fort Royal, Martinique, St. Lucia, and Guadaloupe, in 1794. For the first of these actions he was to have been promoted, being, at the time, senior officer of those who took part in it. During the civil war in the island of St. Vincent, in 1795, he was severely wounded, in leading the storming party at Dorchester Hill, and received the thanks of the House of Assembly for his gallantry. In 1797 he was promoted to the rank of Commander, and commanded the Gorgon and Megæra, in the Mediterranean and Channel fleet. He obtained his post rank in January, 1801.

During the war, he served in command of the Princess Royal, Fairy, Camelia, Orpheus, Agincourt, and Naiad. In 1826 he was appointed to the Superb, and subsequently to the Melville, which ship he commanded till 1829. He became Rear-Admiral in 1830, and Vice-Admiral in 1841. In addition to a good share for wounds, a good service pension was awarded him in 1844.

Admiral Hill married, first, Anne, daughter of the Rev. James Worsley, of Gatcomb; and, secondly, Caroline, daughter of James Bettesworth, Esq., of Ryde, and had issue by both marriages.

HENRY EARL OF THANET

In addition to the obituary notice of this nobleman which appeared in our last Number, we may state that his Lordship was descended from one of the most ancient and illustrious families in the kingdom. He traced his pedigree to Sir Lewis de Tufton, one of the commanders of the Saxon cavalry at the battle of Hastings; and like other representatives of the great houses of Clifford and Veteripont, his Royal descent can be well attested as far back as Rolo, grandfather of William the Conqueror. The ancient dignity of Hereditary High Sheriff of Westmoreland, which had passed lineally through the Veteriponts, Cliffords, and Tuftons, was still held by the late Earl.

[illegible]

A Correspondent ("Truth") states, in explanation of a passage in our notice of the late Mr. Fielden, last week, that, so far from his having any idea of retiring from Parliament, he announced on the hustings, at the last election, his determination to offer himself again as a candidate at the first vacancy that should occur for the borough of Oldham.

An address of condolence to Mrs. Fielden, on the death of her humane and philanthropic husband, the late Mr. J. Fielden, of Centre Vale, formerly M.P. for Oldham, is about to be presented by the Lancashire Short Time Committee. The address is beautifully written on vellum, and will be elegantly mounted.

[illegible] A meeting was held at Leicester, on Saturday, for the purpose of agreeing to an address to be presented to the Duke of Rutland, on attaining the fiftieth year of his Lieutenancy of Leicestershire; and for the purpose of deciding on the appropriation of upwards of £1400, which had been subscribed for a "Rutland Testimonial." A congratulatory address having been agreed to, it was further resolved, "That a bronze statue of the Duke of Rutland, on a granite pedestal, be erected in the market-place, Leicester, provided a site can be procured for the same."

MONTAGNARDS AT THE CONSERVATOIRE DES ARTS ET METIERS.

IN our Journal of last week we briefly described the scene of commotion which Paris presented on Wednesday. By the activity of our Artists stationed there, we are now enabled to illustrate some of the leading incidents of the abortive attempt once more to plunge the capital into the horrors of insurrection.

THE CONSERVATOIRE

First is the scene of the meeting of the Montagnards attempting to take possession of the Conservatoire des Arts et Metiers. At about twelve o'clock they proceeded from the Palais National, cloth, in their insignia as representatives, and accompanied by the artillery of the National Guard, to the Conservatoire, and there established themselves en permanence, with the object of forming a Convention in the event of the Government being upset. Even the Cabinet had been named, so as to be ready to enter on their functions without delay. The ill success of the demonstration, of course, upset all their plans.

The Conservatoire was surrounded by a large body of troops from an early hour, but so placed that the Mountain knew nothing of the fact. During their deliberations, they were gradually and impenetrably hemmed in; and, when an entrance was made by the 24th of the Line, the members of the Mountain, who were said to have amounted to upwards of one hundred, with difficulty made their escape by jumping through windows into the garden, with the exception of those who were arrested. Rumours were afloat that Ledru Rollin had been arrested, and had escaped, but this is not confirmed. It is said his hat was found on the table, with three others, and the forage cap of Sergeant Ratier.

It is stated that the plan of the insurgents was the same as that acted upon in GENERAL CHANGARNIER DISPERSING THE INSURGENTS AT THE CORNER OF THE RUE DE LA PAIX.

DESTRUCTION OF THE PRINTING-PRESSES, &c., AT THE OFFICE OF M. BOULE.

1834, when the insurrection broke out in the quarter of the Conservatoire, and that their object was to take possession of the church of St. Mary, and there barricade themselves.

Sixty of the artillerymen of Guinard, who accompanied the representatives to the Conservatoire, were arrested, and the entire corps has been dissolved.

At half-past four o'clock P M. Pierre Bonaparte showed himself at the head of the 24th of the Line, and marched on the Conservatoire.

GENERAL CHANGARNIER AND TROOPS.

In the next scene we have General Changarnier at the head of the troops, at the corner of the Rue de la Paix, looking towards the Boulevards. The details are as follows:—

At three o'clock General Changarnier, at the head of a numerous staff and escort, rode along the immense line of troops, and as he returned from the Faubourg du Temple he was received, both by the troops and the well-dressed people in the streets and at the windows, with the greatest possible enthusiasm. On his arrival at the corner of the Rue Richelieu, a man in a blouse made an attempt to get close to him, but was prevented by two of the police, who instantly seized him. Changarnier, as he rode along, harangued the people, the National Guards, and the troops various times, and each address was responded to with the loudest acclamations. As the troops marched along, large groups of men in blouses continued to shout: 'Vive la Constitution!' 'Vive la République!' General Changarnier rode up and down the Boulevards from the Faubourg du Temple to the Madeleine three times. As he passed in the former direction the second time he gave an order to an aide-de-camp, who conveyed it to the commanding officers of three or four regiments, who were drawn up in the same place. Simultaneously each man loaded and primed his piece, and for a moment it was believed that the space between the Chaussée d'Antin and the Rue Montmartre was about to become the theatre of a sanguinary conflict. This, however, did not turn out to be the case. The moment the men had done loading, the order to march was given, and the vast body moved slowly and steadily towards the Porte St. Martin and St. Denis. While they were loading, a shot was fired somewhere between the Rue Riche lieu and Rue Vivienne, very near the spot where General Changarnier was at that moment standing. It was said by some that it was aimed at him; by others, that it went off by accident while a soldier was loading his piece. Three or four shots had, however, been fired about an hour previous; and one of the bystanders in the street was killed. It is very probable that they were fired with the same intention as the famous shots fired on the Boulevard des Capucins on the night of the 23d of February, for the purpose of hurrying on the conflict. If so, it has not been followed with the same results, at all events up to the present moment.

SCENE AT M. BOULE'S PRINTING OFFICE.

M. Boulé is the printer of five journals. His printing-office consists of three floors, communicating with each other. On Wednesday, a party of National Guards, armed, some with their guns, proceeded to the office, and there ensued the scene represented in our Illustration. In the background, a door open shows a troop of soldiers. There were only National Guards in the office, the Chasseurs de Vincennes being left in the yard and streets.

This affair has given rise to much discussion. On Monday, in the Chamber, General Gourgaud denied that the 1st legion of the National Guard had violated the sanctity of any premises whatever, adding that the National Guard had stood by to protect a Commissaire de Police in the exercise of his duties.

As it is not in the duty of a Commissaire de Police to break presses and scatter types, &c., it became necessary to explain General Gourgaud's words; and, accordingly, M. Odilon Barrot got up and said that the state of siege, certainly, was a stringent measure, but it was constitutional, and it had been found necessary to provide in the Constitution for such contingencies as that of a minority taking up arms against the law. M. Barrot proceeded, amid great interruption, saying that the minority had risen and declared war against the Constitution, put the majority hors de la loi, and now, forsooth, it came and complained of measures which were but reprisals. However, he could tell them that no printing-presses had been broken, and he would remind the Assembly, that, in June last, the 1st legion had lost 300 men in the insurrection, whilst endeavouring to defend the cause of order.

The editors, managers, and compositors of the Peuple have addressed a letter to the Républque, contradicting the statements made by General Gourgaud in the Tribune of the National Assembly. They deny that violence had to be employed to effect an entrance into their offices on the 13th, or that the damage done could be considered as accidental; or that the printers of the offices of M. Boulé used insulting language; or that 150 persons were arrested in the evening in that house; they admit, however, that the next day 50 workmen were taken into c.

In the left of the sketch a National Guard is threatening with his sword a pressman, whom he holds with his left hand the man had just before told the Guard to take care lost a piece of iron might fall upon his leg; adding, "Mind, sir, this iron is more dangerous than your weapon." This was mistaken for a threat on the part of the pressman, and hence the struggle our Artist has depicted, from information furnished to him on the spot.

ATTACK ON THE MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.

In the the Illustration is the attack by the insurgents on the Minister of Public Works, the particulars of which are as—If appears that when intimation was received of the assemblage of the people and National Guards that took place in accordance with the summons issued to that effect by the Socialists and the members of the Mountain of the Chateau d'Eau, M. Lacrosse, Minister of Public Works, presented himself on the spot on horseback, accompanied by two officers of the S aff and two Republican Guards. He addressed the crowd, which then might amount to about 14,000 or 15,000 persons, including from 1500 to 2000 National Guards without arms. He used every argument he could to induce them to disperse quietly and without violating the law. Whatever effect might have been produced by his words on the mass of his listeners, certain officers of the National Guards did their utmost to destroy it. They urged the mob in every possible manner, and at length their violence was carried to such a pitch, that the life of the Minister seemed likely to pay the forfeit of his boldness. He was seized, separated from the officers who had accompanied him, and menaced [illegible] shouted "Vive la Constitution!" and "Vive la République Romaine!" The Minister held firm to the last, kept his hat on his head, and refused to join in the cry. He was torn from his horse, his clothes rent to tatters, and in all probability he would have been murdered but for the interference of M. Edmond Arago, who, in fact, was at the head of the assemblage. By his exertions M. Lacrosse was rescued from the hands of the mob, and enabled to quit the spot.

ARREST OF M. SUCHET

Mention of this arrest was thus made in the Chamber on Wednesday, when the President informed the Assembly that M. Suchet du Var had been arrested, and demanded whether the arrest would be authorsed by the Assembly. He and other members of the Mountain had held a meeting at the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers, and had gone to invite the National Guard to join them After some discussion, M. Napoleon Bonaparte proposed that M. Suchet du Var should be heard in the Assembly. The motion was rejected by 398 votes to 87. The Assembly then adjourned, at 9 o'clock, till 10, to continue the discussion on the arrest of M. Suchet du Var. The sitting was resumed at half-past ten o'clock, when the arrest of M. Suchet was authorised, it also that of Messrs. Deville, Margne, Damlle, Pilhs, Bach, Vautier, and Farguier Fayolle, representatives, who had been arrested

M. Suchet was arrested by the Mayor and a body of troops: as he was conveyed through the streets, the mob became very excited, but he did all in his power to appease this ebullition of feeling.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 23, 1849.

TELEGRAPHIC despatches received by the French Government announce that General Oudinot commenced his attack upon Rome at nine o'clock on the morning of the 13th instant. Prior to this crowning act of the goodwill of the French towards the Romans, the General addressed a remarkable letter to the President of the Roman National Assembly. He stated in this document that the "events of war had brought the French army to the gates of Rome;" or, in other words, that the French Government had declared war against Rome. He goes on to say, although such a war has been declared and carried on, "that the Roman population cannot entertain hostile feelings against France;" and summons the city to surrender immediately, under the penalty of his employing, to penetrate it, "the means of action which France has placed at his disposal." "The National Assembly," continues this illogical and ungrammatical General, "will, no doubt, like myself, spare the capital of the Christian world this sanguinary calamity:" forgetting that if France really wished to avoid such a calamity, she should keep her armies at Civita Vecchia, or re-transport them to their own country. He gave the Romans twelve hours to consider the propriety of opening their gates to their French friends; threatening that if, in the interval, a reply favourable to the "intentions and the honour of France did not reach him, he would be compelled to assault the city." In this letter was enclosed a proclamation to the Roman people, stating that France did not come to bring war to Rome, but to consolidate order and liberty, and that the intentions of the French Government had been misunderstood. The Rome triumvirate, however, turned a deaf ear to the insinuating General, and obstinately refused his friendship and good offices upon the terms proposed; and the cannonade commenced accordingly, at the expiration of the term granted. Europe will, doubtless, know the result in a few days.

There is no knowing what is to happen in the extraordinary times in which we live; and, as the Emperor of Russia has taken the field against what he calls the pernicious doctrines that are agitating the west of Europe, and which are all traceable to a French origin, it is just possible, though, we will admit, scarcely probable, "that the events of war" may bring a Russian army to the gates of Paris. General Oudinot's letter to the Romans might serve as a model to Prince Paskiewitch under the circumstances we have supposed. We should only have to substitute France and the French for Rome and the Romans, Russia for France, and Paskiewitch for Oudinot, and then one document would be as good as the other. We can easily imagine the surprise and bewilderment of the good people of Paris at receiving such extraordinary proofs of the Emperor's goodwill towards them. "We do not come to make war against you;" Paskiewitch might say. "Our intentions have been misunderstood. We come to consolidate order and liberty amongst you; and if you do not, within twelve hours, open your gates to us, we shall be under the disagreeable necessity of destroying the capital of the polite world. All the blame of such an irreparable disaster will be upon your heads, and not upon ours." Rome, it appears, has resisted his hands of all participation in those doings, and has written an autograph letter to Louis Napoleon deprecating his interference. Of all the interventions ever made by one nation in the affairs of another, this is certainly the most extraordinary.

On Friday night Lord Lincoln delivered a speech which lasted no less than four hours and a quarter, upon the subject of the recent cession of Vancouver's Island to the Hudson's Bay Company. So little interest did the subject and the orator excite, that even his own friends and supporters did not muster on this occasion; and the few members who occasionally dropped in, very rapidly dropped out again after a quarter of an hour's enjoyment of his Lordship's eloquence. The result was, that the House was counted out, but not before Lord Lincoln had concluded his oration. On the following night his Lordship made a formal complaint against the Government and the whipper-in for not taking care to have forty members present; and some other members, taking up the subject, expressed their disapproval of the system of counting out. It is no doubt extremely disagreeable to any gentleman to speak to empty benches—to be scopped in the full flow of his eloquence—or to be prevented from taking a vote upon a subject on which he has set his heart; but it is equally clear that the House must possess some remedy against the inflictions of parliamentary bores. If one member will exaggerate a small matter into undue importance, and speak for four hours and a quarter upon it; and if another will string all events, past, present, and probable, into an accusation against a Foreign Secretary whom he somehow or other imagines to be in the pay of the Emperor Nicholas, it would be hard, indeed, if members could not exercise the privilege of staying away. Like all other privileges, that of the "count-out" may be abused; but we quite agree with the remarks of Mr. Vernon Smith, which were loudly and generally cheered by the House, that it would be most impolitic and unnecessary to rescind or abridge it. Every member is liable to have the privilege enforced against him if he brings forward a subject that is without interest or importance, or if he treats even an important subject in a manner calculated to weary the House, or set its members asleep upon the benches; and the best course for any one receiving such a hint is, as Mr. Vernon Smith said, "to pocket the ridicule connected with the proceeding as soon as possible." The forms and privileges of the House, with the single exception of that parliamentary fiction which supposes that there are no reporters in the gallery, are well devised; and, if there are any of them capable of amendment, it is certainly not that sole safeguard against dulness and irrelevancy, the privilege of "counting out." If the Government abuse this privilege, the remedy is provided; and any member who thinks the public interest has suffered by a "count-out" when he is speaking, can renew his motion on a supply night, and compel the attention that was formerly withheld from him. The abuse of one great and salutary privilege is corrected in this way by the exercise of another; and neither individuals nor the public are sufferers.

HER MAJESTY'S ACCESSION.—Wednesday last was held as a general holiday in Exeter, in commemoration of the twelfth anniversary of her Majesty's accession to the throne. All the shops in Exeter were closed, the bells of the Cathedral and other churches rang merry peals, flags were hoisted in every direction, and public dinners and pic-nics were the order of the day.

It is understood that the government have decided on withdrawing the Captain and party of Royal Marines stationed at Port Essington, Australia, for many years, and of abandoning the establishment altogether

POSTSCRIPT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

POSTAGE BETWEEN FRANCE AND ENGLAND.

In answer to a question from Lord HOWDEN,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose to introduce his financial statement. Although the statement he was about to submit was not, he said, as favourable as if he had made it at an earlier period, yet he thought it would not be altogether unsatisfactory. It was to be remembered that, owing to the famin Ireland, and the generally disturbed state of Europe, our trade and commerce necessarily suffered great interruption, which would account for the less favourable finance statement that he had now to make than if he had brought it forward at [illegible] period. He was glad to find he was justified in taking a more sanguine view of the revenue than he had entertained from the Customs. The right hon. gentleman adverted to the difficulties which fell him on a former occasion to propose an increase to the income tax, to which the House was so decidedly opposed, and contrasted the then financial position of the country with that in which it now stood. On comparing the income and expenditure of last year, they would find that there was an excess of income over expenditure, after deducting £323,000 of naval excess of the previous year, of no less than £120,000. With respect to the estimate of the present year, he would take the charges on making a total of £52,107,696, which, if deducted from the income, would leave a surplus of £104,304. But if to this were added the excess of the army and navy and ordnance estimates of the previous year, there would be an excess of expenditure of the year, to an actual surplus of £236,996. It was gratifying that the income of the country had thus kept up, notwithstanding the reduction of taxation which had at various times taken place. The state of the country was such as to justify him in thinking his estimate would be fully realised; and as there was the motion of Mr. Disraeli on the paper connected with that subject, he would not then contemplate the debate on the state of the nation further than to observe, that manufactures were improving, more was being done, and there were indications of return to prosperity. He would state, however, that he hoped in the course of the year to be able to make further reductions in the expenditure, although in the present year they had effected reductions in the Making a total reduction to the extent of £1,311,455, which, if added to the reduction of the previous year, would make a total of £2,340,150. The number of persons employed in the dockyards at the public expense had also been materially reduced; the amount of reductions being 2000 persons, with a saving of a quarter of a million sterling. This was a course in which the Government was determined to persevere. The control was still left, but, under all the circumstances, he felt justified in going on with it without imposing further burthens on the people; but, at the same time, he must decline to listen to any proposition for reducing the existing taxes at the present moment. The right hon. gentleman concluded by moving that £3,000,000 be advanced out of the Consolidated Fund.

The motion for such advance, in which Mr. HUME and other hon. gentlemen commented on the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement, was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION FOR TREASON (IRELAND) BILL.

The discussion in committee of this bill, and the several amendments proposed on it, engaged the House during the rest of the sitting.

Ultimately the bill passed through committee, and the third reading was fixed for Monday next.—Adjourned at two o'clock.

REBUILDING THE OLYMPIC THEATRE.—On Thursday the reconstruction of this theatre commenced on the site of the old building in Wych-street, recently destroyed by fire. It will be built as a place for equestrian amusement.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

The principal feature of importance in the intelligence received from Paris yesterday (Friday) was a revised report of the contemplated movement of M. Dufaure and Passy from the Ministry of Justice and Finance.

The arrested insurgents, connected with the demonstration of the 13th instant, are to be tried about the 6th or 7th of the next month, at Versailles.

The General Cavaignac, Generals Changarnier and Lamoricière, confined in the Fort La Malgue, at Toulon, have been set at liberty, by order of the French ministry. The Spanish officers propos to visit England.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

THE DEFALCATIONS OF THE LATE REGISTRAR-GENERAL IN CALCUTTA.—An adjourned meeting of the "sufferers" by the recent defalcations of Sir Thomas Turton, the late Registrar-General of the Supreme Court of Judicature in Bengal, was held on Monday at the London Tavern, for the purpose of receiving from the committee, consisting of Mr. Fry, Mr. Alexander, and Mr. Shuttleworth, a report of the proceedings and inquiries instituted by these gentlemen on behalf of the sufferers. At the previous meeting, the above-named gentlemen were requested to wait upon certain members of Parliament to solicit them to move for a copy of the report of the commissioners (and the documents connected therewith) appointed by the Judge to inquire into the losses recently sustained in the Registrar-General's office in Calcutta. At the meeting held on Monday (Mr. George Edmund Shuttleworth presiding), it was announced that the document referred to had been obtained, and a copy was in the room for the instruction and satisfaction of the sufferers. The original document and all other connected therewith had, in the most liberal manner, been placed in the hands of the solicitor to the meeting for a limited time, with a view of promoting their just claims. The report of the commissioners, which was of great length, detailed the material fact, that the defalcations of the late Registrar-General amounted to no less than 683,052-2-6 rupees, or about £90,000 sterling; and the commissioners add that that sum did not correctly measure the amount of the legal liabilities, for the gross apparent default was nearer 1,025,714-5-10 rupees. The document is dated January 25, 1849, and is signed by Mr. Colvill, Mr. Macpherson, Mr. Higgins, and Mr. Smoult. Various schedules were annexed. The object of the meeting was to determine the best mode of obtaining compensation for the sufferers, and the unanimous opinion of the meeting was, that the only remedy was by an act of the Imperial Legislature, as in the case of one Ricketts, a defaulter in the Court of the Madras Presidency. After some discussion, the meeting was again adjourned to the end of July, in order to secure a more numerous attendance. Although the claims represented at the meeting were little short of 250,000 sa.[illegible]ins.

PREVENTION OF SUNDAY TRADING.—On Tuesday, a meeting of persons interested in the abolition of Sunday trading was held at the London Tavern. Lord Robert Grosvenor, M.P., presided, and was supported by Sir Edward North Buxton, Bart., M.P., Admiral Sir Percy Fe[illegible], M.P., Mr. C. Hindley, M.P., Mr. R. C. L. Bevan, Mr. Samuel Gurney, and other gentlemen. After some preliminary observations from the chairman, Sir Edward North Buxton proposed a resolution, which Mr. Samuel Gurney seconded, affirming that one day in seven was necessary for the moral, intellectual, and physical improvement of man, and highly beneficial to the people; the observance of his religious duties. Mr. Mason and several other persons who were opposed to appealing to Parliament on the subject, addressed the meeting, and expressed their determination to oppose the proceedings of the day. On the suggestion, however, of the chairman, the resolution was allowed to pass, and the opposition was deferred until the following resolutions. The next resolution stated that sunday trading was demoralising to civilised society, and repugnant to the feelings of the tradesmen and their assistants who were engaged in it. Mr. Joseph Hoare having seconded the resolution, another storm arose. Ten or twelve persons rose to speak at the same time, and the most angry recrimination ensued. [illegible] Mr. Hindley, M.P., proceeded to address [illegible] bal (now before Parliament); concluding [illegible] ing of the noble chairman and [illegible]

[illegible] Socialist principles objected to legislation with reference to Sunday trading, on the ground that it encouraged "common informers and egotistical beadle. He concluded by proposing an amendment, to the effect that laws for the better observance of the Sabbath were unnecessary, and tended to bring the whole matter into contempt. After a most vituperative discussion, the noble Lord succeeded in taking the sense of the meeting upon the subject. A division took place, and the original resolution was adopted. Sir gentlemen were appointed to wait upon Sir George Grey, and a vote of thanks was awarded to the noble chairman. The proceedings then terminated, having lasted nearly four hours.

[illegible]'S CHARITABLE INSTITUTION.—Yesterday (Friday) this excellent society held their festival, when the first stone of the new almshouses was laid at Fenn Gate, Wealdam, by the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor. We shall give a report of the proceedings in our next Number.

UNITED LAW CLERKS' SOCIETY.—On Tuesday the seventeenth anniversary festival of this society took place in the Freemasons' Tavern. Sir F. Pollock, the Lord Chief Baron, took the chair; and was supported by Mr. Rothell, Q.C.; Mr. Humfrey, Q.C.; Mr. Bat, Q.C.; Mr. Charles Dickens, and many distinguished members of the English bar. Nearly 300 persons sat down to dinner. From the secretary's report it appeared that "In the past year 24 members had received assistance from the funds, amounting altogether to £239 6s. Richard Pocock, the provident pensioner, the recipient has thus received its membership to the extent of £197 19s. 6d. The committee commenced the year with a balance in hand of £103 3s. 2d., and have since received £384 7s.; the whole of these sums has been expended and a small balance left against the society in favour of the treasurer. Though not in existence until 1832, the society is now expending in actual relief more than £400 a year.

COLONISATION SOCIETY.—On Wednesday, a public meeting of the members of this society, which was established about ten months since, for sending out religious teachers and schoolmasters on board emigrant ships, was held at WILL's Rooms, St. James's. The Earl of Harrowby presided, and was supported by Earl Nelson, Viscount Mandeville, M.P.; Lord Robert Grosvenor, M.P.; the Bishop of Oxford, Lord Arthur Hervey, &c. From the speeches delivered on the occasion, it appeared that during the last two years nearly half a million of emigrants had left our shores; but the only public provision (until now) existing for moral or spiritual superintendence on board any ship was an allowance which her Majesty's Emigration Commissioners were empowered to grant, of £5 to some one of the emigrants on board who might be considered capable of acting as schoolmaster. That was a very inadequate arrangement, even as regarded the children on board, to whom it applied. Such a schoolmaster could scarcely command the necessary respect, even if otherwise competently qualified for the discharge of his duties. In order to remedy, as far as possible, these evils, and to improve the system of emigration, by giving it a more orderly and Christian character, an effort had been made to secure the services of men of energy and piety to act as religious teachers on board emigrant ships. The Government, on the application of this society, had allotted a cabin to each teacher, and a grant was made to him from the funds of the society, payable partly in this country and partly on his arrival in the colony for which his ship was destined. Each teacher was provided with books and Bibles for the use of himself and of the emigrants, and it was hoped that, through the agency of a society lately organised for that purpose, they would in future be provided also with materials for the employment both of children and adults during the voyage. Since the establishment of the Colonisation Society, it had been instrumental in sending out seven young men with emigrant ships. A ladies' committee had been formed in connexion with the society, for selecting and recommending to the Emigration Commissioners suitable persons to act as matrons on board emigrant ships proceeding to the Australian and South African colonies. Resolutions affirming the usefulness of the society, and plotting the success of its support, were adopted.

ROYAL ASYLUM OF ST. ANN'S SOCIETY.—On Thursday and Friday was held the grand choral and fancy fête at the Hanover-square Rooms, in aid of the funds of this admirable institution. The stalls of the fancy fair were presided over by the Duchess of Leeds, the Duchess of Marlborough, the Duchess Dowager of Northumberland, the Marchioness of Bandford, the Countess of Mor[illegible], the Viscountess Bereford, the Viscountess Combermere, Lady Lady Stanley, the Lady Charlotte Guest, the Lady Caroline Bathurst, the Lady Selsey, the Lady Pearson, the Honourable Mrs. G. Anson, and Mrs. R. Montgomery. There was a large attendance of the fashionable world, such as must ensure a result most satisfactory to the charity.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE HOSPITAL.—The anniversary dinner, in aid of the funds of this hospital, took place at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, on Wednesday evening; the Right Hon. Sir James Graham in the chair. Upwards of 100 gentlemen sat down. After the usual toasts had been proposed and drunk with enthusiasm, the Chairman, in proposing the toast of the evening, said that the institution had not been long founded. About fifteen years ago, those who had the direction of the College council had a grand tend more especially to the benefit of the poor of the neighbourhood if they had an hospital attached, and accordingly the hospital was founded. In the course of these fifteen years no fewer than 250,000 poor suffering persons had been relieved by the institution. The cost of it had been comparatively small. The whole of its expenses had been met by an outlay of £75,000, and upwards of the half of this sum had been contributed by the medical students attending the hospitals. He regretted it was his duty to state that, owing to the peculiarly depressed circumstances of the times, some falling off had taken place in the funds; and that, in consequence, upwards of 130 beds had never been used. But the institution was nevertheless most beneficial. From the most distant parts of England patients had been transmitted to it; and one very distinguished individual (General Bem, the present commander of the Hungarians), who had been wounded, was sent to Scotland, and come to London, had made choice of it; and, the ball having been there extracted, he was now in health, strengthened and restored. He proposed "The Prosperity of the University College Hospital." Mr. Benjamin Gompertz de Goldsmid, the treasurer, announced that her Majesty the Queen had sent a donation of £100, and that the other subscriptions received during the evening amounted to upwards of £1000.

[illegible] SOCIETY.—The second exhibition of this year took place on Wednesday, in the gardens of the society, in the Regent's Park. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and Prince Alfred, and attended by Colonels Bowyerie and Phipps, arrived at the gardens at an early hour, and were conducted through the exhibition by the Duke of Norfolk, the president of the society. The noble exhibitors expressed themselves highly gratified at the collection of flowers, and their entire satisfaction at the arrangements made for their reception. The Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, and the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, also honoured the exhibition with a visit. The general company was exceedingly numerous, and the arrangements for the comfort of the visitors were admirable. The exhibition was held under the same number of tents as usual, and these were enlarged by the addition of some extra side stages, so that the visitors were less crowded than formerly. The marquee containing the miscellaneous collections of stove and greenhouse plants presented a very beautiful coup d'œil. The Gundania amplexium has been considerably improved. A new plant, Calceolaria Lenea, is likely to become popular.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE ACCESSION OF HER MAJESTY.—Wednesday being the twelfth anniversary of the accession of her Majesty Queen Victoria, the day was ushered in by joyous and "right merrily" peals from the bells of the steeples of the churches of the metropolitan and suburban parishes. The Royal standard was hoisted at the Tower, Somerset House, and various other public buildings. At one o'clock, the guns from the Tower, St. James's Park, the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich, Tilbury Fort, Chatham, Sheerness, and other ports simultaneously fired a grand feu de joie.

AFTERNOON DESPATCH OF LETTERS TO IRELAND.—General Post-Office, June, 1849.—On and after Tuesday last, the 19th inst., a bag of letters for Ireland is made up at this office, to be despatched by the express train which leaves the Euston-square station at 2 P.M. on Sundays and Tuesdays; and the letters despatched must be posted at the receiving-offices in London before 2 P.M.; at the branch offices in Lombard-street, Borough, Charing-cross, and Old Cavendish-street, before 1 P.M.; and at the general post-office before 1½ P.M., or before 3.30 P.M.; and they will arrive in Dublin early on the following morning. Newspapers will not be forwarded by this afternoon mail.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GEOLOGY, HUNTERIAN.—On Monday forenoon, about ten o'clock, a serious accident occurred to Colonel Hutchinson, of Upper Brook-street, Grosvenor-square, by which he received a compound fracture of the left leg. He was riding in Hyde Park, and, when opposite Lord Ward's, in Park-street, on a spirited young horse, towards one of the regiments of the Guards, which was going through evolutions, when, on the report of the guns, the animal reared, threw him, and immediately fell with its body across the unfortunate gentleman. He was promptly attended by Sir B. Brodie and other medical gentlemen, by whom the leg was set, and he is now going on well.

HEALTH OF LONDON DURING THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JUNE 16, 1849.—The mortality of the metropolitan districts, which in the previous week was rather above the average, has fallen last week to 912 deaths, or 51 less than the estimate founded on the weekly mortality of former springs. Among four principal groups of fatal cases, namely, zymotic, or diseases of the nervous system, of the heart, and of the respiratory organs, all show a decrease on the average, especially the last, in which the deaths were 98 less than the average = 134. The epidemic class alone (numbering 231 deaths) shows an excess which is considerable, and amounts to 53; but of the twenty-one deaths from hooping-cough, only seventeen were registered in the week, and convulsions, also spasmodic fatal in this return. Hooping-cough numbers 45, against an average of 36. The average of diarrhœa and dysentery is 14; but in the last three weeks they numbered 38, and in twenty-one weeks, 95, 55, and 54, showing a gradual increase. Cholera, which in five former springs averaged one death weekly, was fatal in the last three weeks to 9, 22 and 42 persons, showing that the epidemic makes some progress. Of the 8, 30 died on the south side of the river. Two men died from contact with diseased horses. One case, that of a man 48 years of age, is described as "inflamed finger (10 days), erysipelas of head and face (3 days)," manslaughter. The Registrar was informed, by a gardener's boy, that the man, aged 44, died of "farcy, caught from attending a farcied horse which was shot." This person had been ill four months. Three fatal cases of privation are this recorded: A man of 43 years, in Carlisbuildings, St. Saviour's, "starvation diarrhœa (3 days)." This case is certified by a medical man. A woman, 63 years of age, on whom an inquest was held, "was found dead apparently from want," in Ratcliff; and, according to the Coroner's return, the death of another woman, age unknown, in Goodman's-fields, was accelerated by "exhaustion from cold and privation." The births registered in the week numbered 1448.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—The mean reading of the barometer was above 30 in. on Thursday; the mean of the week was 29.778 in. The temperature rose towards the end of the week, but throughout was less than the average. The highest reading of the thermometer occurred on Saturday, when it was 69.6; the mean of that day was 57.6; the mean of the week was 53.5—lower than that of the previous fortnight by more than 6 deg. On Tuesday the mean temperature was less than the average of the same day in seven years by 10.7; the mean of the week was less than the average by 7.1.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

The Queen and Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended Divine Service on Sunday morning, in the private chapel of Buckingham Palace. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated.

Her Majesty and the Prince Consort visited the Duchess of Cambridge, at Cambridge House, on Monday. In the evening of the same day his Royal Highness honoured the Duke of Wellington with his company at the Waterloo Banquet, given by his Grace, at Apsley House.

On Tuesday morning, Prince Albert, attended by Colonel Bouverie, inspected the first battalion of Scots Fusilier Guards. In the afternoon, the Queen and the Prince took a drive in an open carriage and four.

On Wednesday her Majesty and the Prince visited the exhibition at the Botanic Gardens, in the Regent's Park, and in the evening honoured the performance of the French plays with their presence.

On Thursday the Queen and the Prince, accompanied by the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice, went to the fête at Holland Park, Kensington, and witnessed the national games, under the auspices of the Scottish Society of London. Prince Albert dined with the Scots Fusilier Club in the evening, and afterwards accompanied her Majesty to the Opera.

The Queen held a Court on Monday afternoon at Buckingham Palace. The Marquis de Sanli, Sardinian Minister, had an audience of the Queen to take leave. Count Gallina, on a special mission from his Majesty the King of Sardinia, had an audience of the Queen, and delivered his credentials from his Sovereign. Viscount Ponsonby, G.C.B., her Majesty's Ambassador to the Emperor of Austria, was presented to the Queen at an audience by Viscount Palmerston, to take leave. Sir Hamilton Seymour, her Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of Portugal, was also presented to her Majesty, on his arrival from Lisbon. The Queen was attended by Lord Canoys, Lord in Waiting, and Colonel Berkeley Drummond, Groom in Waiting.

MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.

The marriage of the Lady Caroline Somers Cocks, one of the Maids of Honour to the Queen, with the Hon. and Rev. Charles Leslie Courtenay, her Majesty's Domestic Chaplain, was solemnised on Wednesday, at one o'clock, in the private chapel of Buckingham Palace, by the Lord Bishop of London, in presence of her Majesty the Queen, his Royal Highness the Prince Albert, the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court, and a select circle. The bride was given away by her father, the Earl Somers. The bridesmaids were, the Lady Harriet Somers Cocks, Lady Emily Somers Cocks, Louisa Eliot, Hon. Agnes Courtenay, Hon. Matilda Paget, Miss Beaverch, and Miss Henrietta Cocks.

The Marquis of Stafford, eldest son of the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, was married, on Wednesday, to Anne, only daughter of John Hay Mackenzie Esq., of Cromarty. The marriage took place, by special license, at Cheffen House, near Maidenhead, the ceremony being performed by the Hon. and Very Rev. the Dean of Lichfield.

The marriage of Lady Catherine Noel to Sir James Carnegie was solemnised at Exon Park, on Tuesday last. The bride was given away by her father, the Earl of Gainsborough. The ceremony was performed by the Hon. and Rev. Leland Noel, uncle of the bride. Sir James and Lady Catherine Carnegie, after partaking of the déjeûner at the hall, left Exon Park, on their way through Matlock, to his beautiful seat, Kinnaird Castle, in Scotland.

ROYAL VISIT TO GROSVENOR HOUSE.—Her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert will honour the Marquis and Marchioness of Westminster with a visit at Grosvenor House on Thursday next.

Messrs. Hunt and Roskell had the honour on Tuesday to submit to the inspection of her Majesty and Prince Albert the plate which they had manufactured as a testimonial to Mr. Mitchell, the spirited lessee of the French Theatre. Her Majesty and the Prince were graciously pleased to express, in very flattering terms, their admiration of these artistical productions, comprising a richly chased silver salver, with beautifully engraved portraits of Racine, Corneille, Molière, and Voltaire; and subjects from these plays of "Phèdre," "Les Horaces," "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," and "Tancrède;" and a candelabrum, in silver gilt, of Louis XV. style, for ten lights, with inscription.

THE EX-ROYAL FAMILY OF FRANCE.—The Count and Countess de Neuilly, with the Duke and Duchess de Nemours and the Duke and Duchess d'Aumale, paid a visit to the Queen and Prince Albert on Thursday, at Buckingham Palace, and partook of luncheon with her Majesty and his Royal Highness. The illustrious exiles also visited the Duchess of Kent on the same day.

ROYAL VISIT TO THE DUKE OF NORFOLK.

WE have this week the pleasurable duty of chronicling the first of a series of Royal visits with which her Majesty and the Prince Consort contemplate honouring the more distinguished members of the aristocracy. The series could not have been more appropriately commenced than with the present visit of England, the hereditary Earl Marshal; and in a mansion which, irrespective of its associations with one of the most illustrious historic families in our annals possesses a species of private claim to the predilections of her Majesty, as being the birth-place of her Royal grandfather, George III.

The hospitalities dispensed by the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk on this occasion consisted of a grand banquet and a ball, to the latter of which about 200 leading members of the aristocracy were invited.

The following distinguished personages were honoured with invitations to the banquet:—His Grace the Duke of Wellington, the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, the Marchioness of Westminster, the Marquis of Granby, the Countess of Ellesmere, the Earl Grosvenor, Lord Foley, Lord and Lady John Russell, Sir Robert and Lady Peel, and Sir Edmund Lyon Lyon, G.C.B.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent arrived at eight o'clock, attended by the Lady Augusta Bruce and Sir George Couper. Her Royal Highness was received in the entrance-hall by the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk and the Ladies Mary and Adelaide Fitzalan Howard. The formal reception of her Royal Highness was scarcely completed when the Queen's carriages drove up to the principal entrance. The Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, with the Lady Adelaide and Lord Edward Fitzalan Howard, were immediately in attendance; and on her Majesty and the Prince alighting, they were received by the noble host and hostess with the most profound demonstrations of affection and respect. The Duchess, kneeling, kissed the hand of the Sovereign, who, in return, saluted her Grace on the cheek. The Queen having also received the obeisance of the Lady Adelaide and Lord Edward Fitzalan Howard and shaken hands with them, took the arm of the Duke of Norfolk and proceeded to the drawing-room, followed by her Royal Consort, on whose arm leant the Duchess; the Lady Adelaide following in the rear with the members of the Royal suite.

As the Queen entered the mansion, the fine band of the Royal Horse Guards (Blue), under the direction of Mr. Tutton, played a few bars of the National Anthem.

At a quarter past eight o'clock, her Majesty, resting on the arm of the Duke of Norfolk, left the saloon for the banqueting-room, Prince Albert leading the Duchess of Norfolk; the other guests following.

At the table, the Queen sat upon the right hand of the Duke of Norfolk, and the Duchess of Kent upon his Grace's left. On the right of the Queen sat the Prince Consort, the Duchess of Norfolk, Lord John Russell, and the Countess of Ellesmere. Upon the left of the Duchess of Kent sat the Duke of Wellington, the Duchess of Buccleuch, and Sir Robert Peel. The Marquis of Granby faced the noble host, having the Duchess of Buccleuch and the Marchioness of Westminster respectively upon his right and left. The banquet, it is scarcely necessary to say, was magnificent. The massive plateaux, shields, vases, candelabra, salvers, goblets, and other gold and silver plate with which the sideboards and buffets of the dining-hall glittered, the costumes of those present, in various styles, by the Dukes of Norfolk as hereditary Earls Marshal, were most conspicuous.

Immediately after the dessert had been placed on the table, the Duke of Norfolk rose and proposed "The Queen;" and the company, rising, drank the toast in silence. Her Majesty having bowed her acknowledgments, the Duke rose again, and proposed "Prince Albert" in like manner; and, his Royal Highness having made a similar acknowledgment, the Duchess of Norfolk conducted the Queen, accompanied by the Duchess of Kent and the rest of the lady guests, to the suite of saloons.

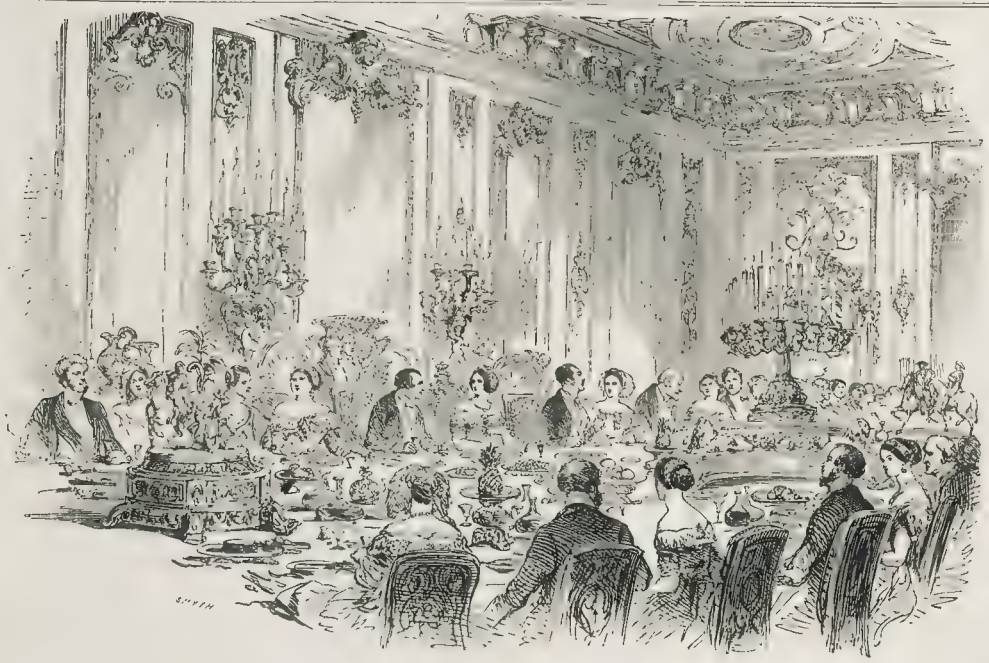
Though not regarded as one of the show houses of the metropolis, Norfolk House is rich in pictures of the Italian, Spanish, and Flemish schools; and they were seen to great advantage on Tuesday night. These paintings are generally new and gild in the style of the reign of Queen Anne; of which the banqueting-room (shown in the annexed Engraving) affords a good illustration.

The Duchess of Norfolk's suite of private apartments was specially fitted up for the accommodation of her Majesty.

The banquet was succeeded by a grand ball, for which invitations were issued to about 200 leading members of the aristocracy. These later visitors began to arrive shortly before ten o'clock. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester came precisely at that hour, attended by Lady Georgiana Bathurst and Colonel the Hon. H. F. Liddell. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge and her Royal Highness the Hereditary Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz arrived shortly afterwards, attended by Lady Augusta Cadogan and Mr. St. John Mildmay.

At ten o'clock her Majesty and Prince Albert proceeded to the ball-room, an apartment of comparatively limited dimensions, yet of sufficient extent for the purpose; but the apparent extent of which was greatly increased by the erection of an orchestra for Strauss' band, at the upper end in the garden, the musicians being placed amongst shrubs and flowering plants; through the vista again was to be seen all the remains of the original old Norfolk House, in which George III. was born, May 24, 1738 (O.S.) The room in which this event happened is still preserved. It is entirely wainscoted by Sir James Thornhill. The old mansion formerly extended to the site of Waterloo-place, but only a small portion of the building remains. The whole frontage was illuminated on Tuesday night in antique coloured lamps; and, as seen through the orchestra [illegible] the ball-room, presented a very effective spectacle

The ball was opened with a quadrille, her Majesty leading off with Lord Edward Fitzalan Howard, and the Prince Consort dancing with the Lady Mary Fitzalan Howard. Among the other couples in this set were Prince Richard Metternich and Lady Emily De Burgh, the Lady Adelaide Fitzalan Howard and



ROYAL ENTERTAINMENT GIVEN BY HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF NORFOLK, K.G.

Viscount Castlerosse, the Lady Clementina Villiers and Mr. Knightley, the Lady Charles Wellesley and Mr. Augustus Stafford, the Lady Rachel Russell and the Marquis of Aberoorn, the Lady Charlotte Elliot and the Earl Grosvenor, the Lady Harriet Anson and Lord Brooke, the Lady Adelaide Paget and the Marquis of Granby, and Lord George Paget and the Hon. Laura Macdonald.

This quadrille was followed by a waltz, in which her Majesty danced with Prince Albert, the Lady Emily De Burgh with the Hon. Percy Herbert, the Marquis of Granby with the Lady Augusta Gordon Lennox, and the Prince Richard Metternich with the Hon. Flora Macdonald.

In the "Gabel" quadrille, her Majesty honoured Lord Alfred Paget with her hand. The Queen afterwards danced with the Earl Grosvenor; and from the moment her Majesty entered the ball-room until midnight, the period at which she took her departure, the Queen omitted to dance but once, and that when a polka was played. Indeed, the Queen throughout the evening seemed to enjoy herself exceedingly.

The Queen and the Prince, accompanied by their Royal relatives, left the ball room at five minutes after midnight; and very shortly afterwards her Majesty and her Royal Consort, having taken an affectionate leave of their noble host and hostess, left Norfolk House for Buckingham Palace.

The other Royal visitors left soon after the Queen, but the festivities were kept up by the general company until a much later hour.

The Earl and Countess of Arundel and Surrey were unavoidably prevented from joining the party.

The Countess of Desart, Lord Camoys, Lord George Lennox, Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps, and Colonel Bouverie were in attendance on the Queen and the Prince.

In concluding our notice of this brilliant festivity, we regret exceedingly to state that Lord John Russell was seized with a fainting fit in the ball-room, about eleven o'clock, and carried out insensible. His Lordship speedily revived when brought into the open air, and shortly afterwards left, in company with Lady John Russell, for his mansion in Chesham-place. The noble Lord, it will be recollected, some eight or ten years since, suffered from a similar attack in the House of Commons. His Lordship, at the moment he was seized was engaged in an animated conversation with the Countess of Wilton.

ROYAL GENERAL ANNUITY SOCIETY.

A FANCY SALE, in aid of the funds of this society, commenced on Tuesday, and was continued on the two following days, at 56, Baker-street, Portman-square. The large saloon in which the sale was held was a portion of the carriage department of the Baker-street Bazaar, fitted up and decorated in a novel and tasteful manner. The walls were hung with chintz in pink and white stripes, the floor was matted, and the stands were very commodiously arranged (those superintended by the most active of the lady patronesses being in the centre), and, for the accommodation of the visitors, communications were established with the glass show-rooms of Messrs. Apsley Pellatt and Co., the Pankhanon and the far-famed exhibition of Madame Tussaud.

The show of articles in the Fancy Sale attracted a large number of persons, and among the company were the Marchioness of Londonderry, Viscountess Seaham, the Countess Ellenborough, Lady M'Naghten, Lady Fanny Howard, Miss Lane Fox, Lady Georgina Chetwynd, and the Countess Morley. Among the lady patronesses who presided at stalls, and with most praiseworthy perseverance impelled the charitable to purchase, were the Viscountess Combermere and Lady Blake. Mrs. Miller Gibson, the Duchess of Leeds, and the Countess Talbot also had stalls assigned to them, but discharged their duties by proxy.

We trust that the excellent charity, the funds of which it is held for the purpose of increasing, have been largely benefited by the fête. We should not omit to mention that the walls of the room where the fancy sale took place were hung with specimens of armour, graciously supplied by Mr. Webster, of the Haymarket Theatre, and other contributors. There were two excellent bands of music in attendance, under the direction of Mr. G. S. Taylor.

THE ROYAL GENERAL ANNUITY SOCIETY'S FANCY SALE.

SCOTTISH FETE IN LORD HOLLAND'S PARK.

THE REEL OF TULLOCH.

THE Scottish Society of London have just contributed in a very striking manner to the amusements of the London season, by giving a grand fête, for the purpose of presenting to the English public a specimen of the national pastimes of Scotland, at the same time that they have lent a powerful aid to the sacred cause of charity, the profits of the fête being for distribution among the benevolent institutions of the metropolis founded for the relief of Scotchmen in distress.

The scene of this picturesque recreation was the part of Lord Holland's park at Kensington towards Notting-hill, his Lordship having very liberally granted the use of this portion of his beautiful estate to the Scottish Society. The entertainments commenced on Wednesday. There was rather a thin muster of Scotch nobles and lairds, and the gathering would probably have been a failure, had those of them who were present not been assisted by the countenance and support of the English aristocracy. The Right Hon. Fox Maule, the Chisholm, and Cluny Macpherson took an active and important part in the proceedings. The other gentlemen connected with the Society were most obliging, and conducted all the arrangements in an admirable manner. The Marquis of Breadalbane, as president, is entitled to a large share of the praise which the fête deserves; but the Society is principally indebted to those distinguished English visitors who, in such large numbers, honoured the occasion with their presence. Among the company were the Duchess of Montrose, the Countess of Jersey, Lady Clementina Villiers, Lady Dalmeny, Lady Agnes Buller, Lady Emily Foley, Lady Anne M'Kenzie, the Marquis of Abercorn, the Marquis of Huntly, Earl Verulam, Lord Exmouth, Lord Castlereagh, Lord Chelsea, Sir James M'Kenzie Smtwell, Sir Evan M'Kenzie, Kilcoie, Macalister of Macalister, Mr. Mackay of Arisaig, the Hon. F. Villiers, and Sir Henry Meux. Many of the noblemen and gentlemen who in the autumn months go to the Highlands for grouse-shooting or deer-stalking were present. The most active members of the Society were dressed in the Celtic garb. The competitors for the strictly national games were also arrayed in tartan. The archers wore a variety of costumes, in which, however, the Lincoln green predominated.

The price of admission secured a thoroughly well-dressed assemblage of persons, and, altogether, it is very rare that a more agreeable spectacle is presented than that of the 5000 or 6000 people who were on Wednesday collected in the grounds of Holland Park. The élite of the company occupied the Grand Stand, which could not have accommodated less than 1200 ladies and gentlemen. It was situated at the lower end of a gentle slope. In front, a space of considerable extent was partitioned off for the celebration of the different games, and within it none but the competitors, the judges, and the representatives of the press were allowed to enter. Beyond this enclosure the spectators were collected. The grounds, besides the other facilities afforded, were well supplied with places of refreshment, numerous tents and pavilions having been erected for that purpose. Altogether, the scene presented was quite new in effect, and striking as well as novel.

The proceedings commenced shortly after twelve o'clock with archery at 100 yards distance, an immense number of competitors entering the lists, and a great struggle being evidently made for the 300 guineas' worth of plate to be distributed to the most successful. The whole arrangements connected with this department of the exhibition were admirable, and the contest was carried on with almost military precision. The practice was very fair, no accidents from stray arrows having been reported. Meanwhile, a band of twelve pipers marched round the enclosed space, playing as they went: and those who know the power of the instrument may fancy the effect produced. The juvenile band of the Caledonian Asylum also did good service here, performing in a very surprising manner some selections of music suitable to the occasion.

After the first bout at archery had concluded, throwing the hammer was introduced; and for this game seven competitors appeared. These had all been winners of prizes at the different local gatherings in the Highlands, and were therefore, to a certain extent, picked men. They all wore the kilt, and their appearance as they turned out into the centre of the enclosed space and stripped for the trial excited a lively interest. They were divided into two parties, the one consisting of four, the other of three; and, from the result of the competition four were chosen, between whom the prizes to be awarded on the Thursday were to be contended for. The men thus selected, and the distance they threw the hammer, which weighed 20lb., were as follows:—

	Ft.	In.
Colin Macdonald Cranachan	86	0
Alexander M'Hardy	84	0
Archibald Macdonald Cranachan	80	9½
Thomas Menzies	77	6

Throwing the hammer is a fine game, requiring that due combination of strength and expertness which constitutes the perfection of a manly exercise. Swinging round him the projectile, and taking himself one or more whirls as he approaches the limits prescribed to him, the player lets it suddenly fly from his hand, and it is hurled through the air to an amazing distance.

While this part of the programme was going on, strathspeys, reels, and the sword dance followed each other in rapid succession close to the Grand Stand. The performers acquitted themselves with great agility and spirit, and bounded, shuffled, shouted, and cracked their fingers, accompanied by the music of the bagpipes, to the great delight of the onlookers. Of the dances of Scot and the sword dance is the most peculiar and characteristic. Two swords are placed across, and the performer dances in every possible manner between the divisions until he touches the blade of either weapon. It was danced very gracefully by several of the competitors.

The next point in the proceedings was a foot-race of 1600 yards, for which eight men started, the greater number of them barebonded and barefooted, and wearing a thing but their shirts and kilts. The race-course extended along the temporary enclosure twice round, and was very well adapted to try the speed of those who entered for the prizes; but a Highlander's powers as a runner depend much more upon his great wind and endurance, particularly in running up hill, than upon his swiftness of foot. The grounds of Holland Park, however, afford no facilities for testing this sort of excellence, and so the race may be said to have differed very little, except in the appearance of those who tried it, from similar exhibitions in England. There were during the day no less than three heats, in the first two of which all the competitors joined, and in the last four men who were first and second. The prize eventually rested with Colin Macdonald Cranachan, who won the second heat, and would have won the first had his course at the critical moment when he was reaching the goal not been accidentally impeded. This young man ran beautifully, laying himself along the ground like a hunted deer, and coming in at the close almost as fresh as when he started. Thomas Black, who won the first heat, also ran very well.

To the foot-race succeeded archery at 80 yards, at 4 after that came "putting the stone," which was conducted in precisely the same manner as throwing the hammer—the competitors being divided into two parties, and the two best of each party being appointed to contend for the prizes on the Thursday. The names of the successful men, and the distances to which they put the stone, which weighed 20lb., were as follows:—

	Ft.	In.
Alexander M'Hardy	36	5
Thomas Menzies	35	2
Peter Haggart	34	8
John Fraser	30	6

Thus part of the proceedings was also varied by the playing of pibrochs, and the dancing of the reel of Tulloch—performances which in their turn drew down loud applause.

The practice of archery at sixty yards' distance succeeded, followed up by FOOT-RACE.

BROAD-SWORD PLAY.

broad-sword play and stick practice. These last exhibitions created the greatest interest. They took place on the platform which the dancers had quitted a short time previously. The Household Troops contributed a large proportion of the competitors. The Royal Artillery also furnished some excellent dancers. Corporal Turley, of the Royal Artillery, Corporal Sutton, of the 1st Life Guards, and others, greatly distinguished themselves in this division of the games exhibited. At the close, Corporal-Major Lambert, of the 1st Life Guards, showed an amount of dexterity and skill in broad-sword play which astonished and delighted all who witnessed it. It was o'clock the drive-home had terminated.

On Thursday, the fête was attended by many thousand well dressed persons, who, although chiefly English, evinced a great interest in the progress of the games. The splendid scenery, acquired additional splendour from the presence of her Majesty the Queen, Prince Albert, and the Royal children. On receiving the arrival of the Royal party, the archers again ascended for the rich prize of plate allotted to them by the Society, and putting the stone, tossing the caber, sword dances, and running helped to beguile the time of the [illegible] three the Highlanders in costume were marshalled by Clony [illegible]son, the Chisholm, and their gentlemen engaged in the management of the games, by whom they were formed into a double line leading from the gate of entrance to the centre of the enclosure. The children of the Royal Caledonian Asylum, boys and girls, were marched down towards the grand stand taking up a position on the right angles with the armed and accoutred Highlanders. The bands of the Royal Horse Guards and 1st Life Guards were stationed at a little distance in the background, and the whole, viewed from the stand, presented a picturesque appearance. At a quarter to four a shout announced the arrival of the Duke of Wellington

Her Majesty arrived about four, and proceed d in her carriage, an open barouche, slowly up the ground between the Highlanders, who saluted as she passed The Royal party was received by the Marquis of Breadalbane, the Hon. Fox Maule, the Chisholm, Clany Macpherson, and other gentlemen connected with the Society. The games then proceeded

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

CALEDONIAN RAILWAY.—A special meeting of proprietors in this company was held at the London Tavern on the 21st inst.—the Hon. Captain Plunkett in the chair.—when it was resolved that a requisition should be presented to the directors (which must be signed by one-tenth of the shareholders), calling upon them to convene a meeting, to be held in London within twenty one days, to consider the following propositions:—That it is the opinion of the meeting that the working contract entered into by the Caledonian directors with the Scottish Central Railway Company is highly injurious to the interests of the shareholders in the Caledonian Railway Company; and that the sum of £381,797 19s. 9d. admitted by the directors, in their report of February last, to have been expended in the purchase of shares or interests in subsidiary lines—is a misappropriation of the funds of the Caledonian company; and that all sums which have been or may be hereafter so expended in lieus or other shares or interests, be disallowed in the accounts of the company. A vote of thanks to the chairman concluded the proceedings.

MIDLAND GREAT WESTERN (IRELAND).—June 19. Special Meeting: Mr. J. Ennis in the Chair.—A resolution authorising the directors to negotiate with the Government for the £500,000 loan (the terms of which we gave two weeks back) for completing the line between Athlone and Galway, was unanimously sanctioned. Great opposition has been offered by landowners in Galway to the construction of the line

SOUTH-EASTERN (IRELAND).—June 12: Special Meeting. Dublin. Sir J Dombrain in the Chair.—The bill for effecting the completion of the line from Carlow to Kilkenny, the meeting that a resolution should be proposed for reducing the shares from £50 to £15, was authorised without discussion. The said [illegible] vote was to exceed £68,000.

EASTERN UNION.—June 15: Special Meeting: Ipswich: Mr. J. C. Cobbold, M.P., in the Chair.—A bill for amending their acts, so as to raise [illegible] capital, with powers of sale or lease to, or amalgamation with, the Eastern Counties, was carried with only two dissentients. The Newton line is about to be commenced, and the directors had supplied large sums for the works on their own responsibility

DUBLIN, DUNDRUM, AND RATHFARNHAM.—June 11 Meeting of Shareholders: Dublin: Mr J. Boyce in the Chair. Certain shareholders, representing one thousand shares, have subscribed to support the proceedings for changing the present board of direction, and a special meeting was fixed to be held on the 27th inst

The new bill introduced by the Solicitor-General, to dissolve incorporated Railway Companies, sets these affairs at rest. After a meeting of shareholders, the resolutions are to be submitted to the Railway Commissioners, who can, if satisfied, advise sanction the dissolution. Of course the company pays off its debts. If the shareholders have any reason to doubt the honesty or ability of their directors to wind up the affairs of a company, they can place them in the hands of a liquidator, under the Winding-up Act, 1848. Any dissentient shareholder can petition the Commissioners against the dissolution; and the Commissioners have, upon this ground or any other, which to them appears sufficiently important, the power of placing a company under the Winding-up Act. Where a company have commenced works or entered into contracts with landowners, they cannot make compensation under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and be rid of all and every liability

The report of the committees moved for by Mr. Charteris, in the House of Commons, to inquire into the participation of certain members in the £7500 expended by the Shee-lane Committee on the EASTERN COUNTIES, acquits the members entirely from any such participation

IRELAND

EXTENSION OF EMPLOYMENT.—In some of the western counties arrangements are in progress, on an extensive scale, for the promotion of employment on drainage works, which would afford material relief in those districts where pauperism and destitution are most abundant. Some of those works have already commenced in Roscommon, and others, including the clearance of the Boyle River, are about to be undertaken. The Roscommon Messenger states that "It is the intention of the Government to remove from the hands of the landlords all those powers which the Land Improvement Act invested them with: of the use to which they converted them Government [illegible] well informed [illegible] immediate control of the Board of Works, and the money to be paid by their officers. Mr. Mahony, of the Board of Works, has been in Galway, making preparations for the extension of the drainage works in that county. In Mayo very extensive works of the same kind are in contemplation, and it is stated that the orders already issued amount to £100,000.

THE CHURCH.—The new Bishop of Down and Connor has signalised his elevation by an act of some energy. Dr. Mortimer O'Sullivan was announced to preach on Sunday last at Crossfist for the Church Education Society; but the Bishop interdicted him, on the ground of his being a stranger in the diocese. There can be no doubt that the Bishop had power to forbid Dr O'Sullivan from preaching in any church in his diocese, and every one must approve of his discretion in the exercise of it. In the course of last week Drs. Cooke and Stewart, heads of the Presbyterian church, paid a congratulatory visit to the new Bishop of Down.

The 156th July is fixed for the Consecration of the Bishop of Limerick. The ceremony will take place in Dublin, and the Archbishop will be assisted on the occasion by the Bishops of Meath, Down, and Cork.

THE CHOLERA.—This dreadful disease is on the decline in Dublin, not, however, without having left behind fearful traces of its ravages.

THE RATE IN AID ACT.—An order of the Poor-Law Commissioners, under seal, has been received by the several Boards of Guardians, requiring that the sum of £3,58 12s. shall be raised for the purposes of the act, in the Newry union, during the year ending the 31st day of December, 1849. The above sum is equivalent to a rate of 6d. in the pound on the valuation of the union.

At this early period of the season, the lake districts (Westmoreland) were seldom known to be so crowded with tourists as they now are.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S

On Saturday and Tuesday nights, Cimarosa's "Il Matrimonio Segreto" was repeated with increased éclat on the former evening with the new ballet divertissement, by M. F. Taglioni, of "La Prima Ballerina, ou l'Embrassade," founded upon an incident in the career of a great danseuse, who, on her way to fulfil an engagement in Naples with her maître de ballet and her comprimario, was waylaid by bandits, by whom the incursion by some of the choicest strains of her répertoire. "La Prima Ballerina" was charmingly danced by Rosati, and the entire ballet was very successful.

On Thursday "Lucrezia Borgia" was given: with Mdlle Parodi (for the first time) as Lucrezia; Mdlle Alboni as Orsini; Signor Mariani as Gennaro; Ifficus, Signor Lablache; and Calletti, Belletti, F. Lablache, and Rovida in the subordinate characters. With such an ensemble, we need scarcely add, the performance was a splendid success.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA

The final performance of Madame Persiani have been attracting immense houses. On Saturday night the third representation of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" was a complete overflow. There were no less than seven encores, three of which were gained by the gifted syren of the south (Mdme. Persiani), who was in beautiful voice. The sixth representation of Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," on Tuesday night, was one of the most effective interpretations of this great work that has yet been heard. The theatre was filled; and the scene of the "Benediction," and the duo between Grisi and Mario, in the third act, were rapturously applauded. The opera will be repeated, for the seventh time, next Thursday.

On Thursday night, for the farewell benefit of Madame Persiani, Cimarosa's "Matrimonio Segreto" was given for the first time at the Royal Italian Opera. The fair bénéficiaire will, however, appear for three additional nights, prior to her final retirement from the lyric boards in this country. Even with the powerful cast of the "Matrimonio," the policy of performing this opera is questionable As a cabinet curiosity, and as a curious specimen of the state of art in Cimarosa's days, it is open to possess many points of interest. There is a happy flow of melodious imagery and comic impulse throughout the work; but its orchestration, which is exempt from the rich resources of the modern school, is sometimes monotonous, relying more for effect, as it does, upon the brilliancy and crispness of the stringed instruments. Of the eighty operas of Cimarosa, this is the only one which is retained on the stage, and its continued favour in this country has been mainly owing to the combination of its great singers in the cast. On this occasion Grisi was the haughty Elisetta, Mdme. Persiani the imperious Carolina secretly married to Paolino, Mdlle. Angri the vain aunt Fidalma, Mario the Conte, Tagliafico the Count, and Tamburini the coat tailor Geronimo

The opera was sung and acted with great spirit. The trio, "Le facciò un inchino," by Grisi, Persiani, and Angri, was so admirably given that it was encored with enthusiasm; the rich comedy of the three artistes could not be surpassed. Mario was compelled to repeat the air, "Pria che spirii," which he acted and sang with the most impassioned feeling and with the utmost refinement of style. The deaf man of Tamburini was excellently conceived, and he provided continued hilarity during the evening by a very droll display of acting. All the artistes were recalled at the end of each act. The last act of the "Sonna ibula" followed the "Matrimonio:" Mdme. Persiani and Sims Reeves singing the respective airs with the greatest effect. The house was crowded

FRENCH OPERA.

On Wednesday night, Rossini's two-act comic opera, "Le Comte Ory," was produced for the first time in this country, the occasion being for the benefit of Mr. Mitchell, the lessee and director of the St James's Theatre, for French plays. Her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the performance with their presence, as also the Duchess of Kent, the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, and the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz, the Prince of Syracuse, and a great assemblage of opulence and fashionable celebrities. "Comte Ory" is one of Rossini's most sparkling productions, and the director deserves credit for having introduced the work, although with limited resources (Lord Chamberlain, Nourrit, and Levasseur are the original cast in 1828; and it was in this opera that Marie created such a sensation, at the Académie Royale in Paris, where she first appeared on the stage. M. Occave is scarcely equal to the part of the sanguinary hero, but he sang carefully and zealously. The Countess d'Formoutiers, whose affection the Count Ory strives by divers stratagems to obtain, was gracefully asserted and cleverly sustained by Madle. Charton. Zelger, the basso, was somewhat ponderous in the Gouverneur. The Page of Mdlle Guichard was acted with naïveté. The choral singing was unusually fine; the instruments, generally speaking, were in tune during the opera through with some degree of éclat. The famed Mdme. Cinti Damoreau appeared after the opera, and, accompanied by Benedict, sang a cavatina composed by her son. She was at one period the great exponent of the florid school of French music; and if her organ be impaired, her skill and facility are still remarkable. Mdme Doche and M Ladoni appeared in the vaudeville "Les Extrêmes se Touchent" with which the evening commenced.

On the morning of Mr. Mitchell's benefit a number of his subscribers and amateurs assembled on the stage, to present him with a magnificent silver-gilt candelabrum, and a richly and elegantly chased salver, as a testimonial of his zeal, ability, and good faith in his management for five years of the French Plays.

The Duke of Beaufort, in a neat address, presented the testimonial, and Dr Dantel, the hon. secretary, read the inscription. Mr. Mitchell, in reply, also presented Mr. Mitchell with a cup, as a separate offering. Mr. Mitchell returned thanks in an appropriate speech. He has merited this compliment for the supporters of the French plays, for his programmes of every season have been executed with the most honourable punctuality, and, considering the limited size of the theatre, he has rarely produced a piece unworthy of the patronage bestowed on him, and entitling him, also, to the present gratifying tribute.

GERMAN OPERA.

The production of Spohr's "Faust" at Drury-Lane Theatre was the most unfortunate exhibition the company has yet made. With the single exception of Herr Formes, the representation was a complete failure; and the opera, which is "Faust," as promised, the execution of Spohr's great work was most indifferent. Formes is a great artiste. His Leporello and Mephistopheles are both splendidly original conceptions; but the remainder of the company, with the exception of associated with competent singers, his appearance in this country would have ensured a great success for the troupe. We perceive that the German Opera is now removed to the Princess' Theatre, where the final representations will be given.

HAYMARKET.

The production at this season, and in these degenerate dramatic times, of a five-act play, is a striking proof of the energy and enterprise which characterise the management of Mr. Webster, and we are happy to see, was welcomed by one of the most crowded and enthusiastic audiences which have congregated within the walls of the Haymarket for many a day

Mr Marston, the author of the new play of "Strathmore," is favourably known to the public by his "Patrician's Daughter," "The Heart and the World," and one or two other pieces. The action of the present drama is laid in Scotland, during the Restoration period of the Stuart dynasty, 1679, when the attempt of the Government to enforce conformity in religious observances was the unhappy cause of so much bloodshed, and the severance of the fondest ties of love and kindred. In his new production Mr Marston has the disadvantage of his action, the author has manifestly kept in view Scott's famous "Old Mortality," a proceeding which tends, in some degree, to detract from the interest of his story, by leading one in search for resemblance and infinite comparison

The plot may be told in a few words. Strathmore, a young gentleman of a loyal family, entrusted upon his father's death to the guardianship of Sir Rupert Lorn, a staunch, inflexible old Royalist, introduces to his guardian's daughter, Katherine, but becomes infected with the resonant spirit of the time, and, like Henry Morton, leagues himself with a party of the desaffected. The stern old knight, on hearing of his treason, offers him a free trial moment to choose whether he will abjure the cause he has sided with, or quit his home for ever His love for Katherine and his pride of race yields to his sense of duty, and he resolves to stand or fall with the party he has joined. An engagement shortly after taking place between the Covenanters and the Royal troops, the latter are worsted, and in their retreat come upon a small party of the enemy, who are engaged in prayer by the hill side. Stung by the recollection of their recent defeat, they put the unresisting peasants to the sword, and Sir Rupert Lorn, who is assisting the soldiers, is charged with slaying their aged leader, Ivres Keith, with his own hands. It is then that the redoubted [illegible] Barley, Cromborn, and one Irregield, a soldier of fortune, the captains of an insurgent band, determine to attack Sir Rupert's castle, and to test the fidelity of Strathmore, they appoint him the leader of the enterprise Tortured by conflicting feelings of duty to his cause, and tears for the safety of those he loves, Strathmore accepts the command. The day of battle arrives, and the uncompromising old loyalist is brought to trial for the murder of the pastor. He avows and affects to glory in the act. The assembled Covenanters insist on retribution, and he is condemned to die. An interview now takes place between Strathmore and Katherine Lorn, in which she endeavours to move him, by her father's ancient friendship, and by the hallowed memory of their own loves, to delay if he cannot prevent the execution until the arrival of her brother, who with a powerful force is on his way to their relief. The second fearful struggle between his love and duty prove too much for Strathmore, and the author has but upon the novel [illegible] device of releasing him from the difficulty of his position, by making [illegible] son at his mistress' feet: the latter permitting his guilty lover to escape. Sir Rupert's son returns, the insurgents are defeated, the old knight is saved, and Strathmore, who refuses to sign his recantation, and thus purchase life at the cost of dishonour, dies heart broken in the arms of the suffering but devoted Katherine Lorn.

The materials it will be seen are somewhat meagre for a drama of five acts, [illegible] are pieced out by a sort of underplot, in which Lee wife of Sir Rupert's son, in order to effect her husband's escape, adopts the very questionable step of encouraging the addresses of Bryngfield, who, ignorant of her marriage, is disposed to barter his faith for the purchase of her hand. There is also a comic episode, wherein Mr. Buckstone and Mrs. Fitzwilliam figure as waiting man and French serving woman, and endeavour, with a success which is quite inadequate to their exertions, to throw a gleam of merriment across the sombre scenes

Of the merits of this play we are unwilling to express any very decided opinion upon a first representation, and without the advantage of perusal. The author appears to rely more on the treasures of language and imagery, and his knowledge of stage effects, than on the subtle development of character, and the invention of a plot. Hence there are many passages of unquestionable tender ness and beauty, and not a few situations of powerful dramatic interest. But the excitement is neither continuous nor progressive, and the metaphorical sententiousness of the dialogue is wearisome to a degree.

Few things could be finer than the acting of Mrs Charles Kean, in the very arduous character of the heroine; and the vital success of the play is attributable far more to the intensity and touching delicacy of her performance, than to any intrinsic merits of its own.

Isabella was also exceedingly well played by Miss Reynolds; and her piquant and spirited interpretation went far to redeem what in truth, and in more senses than one, is a very unattractive part.

Mr. C. Kean was energetic and impressive, and exerted himself, as did every one concerned, to the very utmost, to secure the success of the piece

The costume and scenery were new, and, with the exception of some trifling inconsistencies in the dresses of the Covenanters, appropriate also; and the applause throughout the play, as well as its conclusion, when the principal actors were called before the curtain, was unanimous.

We ought to add, that, in compliance with a very general demand, Mr. Marston appeared in a side-box, and received the congratulations of his friend.

MUSIC.

CONCERTS.

On Monday morning the annual public rehearsal of Handel's "Messiah," and on Monday night the performance of this sublime oratorio, took place, at the Hanover-square Rooms, in aid of the funds of the Royal Society of Musicians. Sir H. R. Bishop, Prof. Mus. Oxon, was the conductor. The principal vocalists were Miss Catherine Hayes, Miss Dolby, the Misses A. and M. Williams, Mrs. Bassano, Miss E. Lyon, and Mdme. Dorus Gras; Messrs. Sims Reeves, Barnby, T. Williams, J. A. Novello, Machin, and Phillips.

Herr Rohrer, a distinguished violoncello performer, had a morning concert on Monday, at Willis's Rooms, supported by Mdme. Dulcken, Ernst, Platti, Lucas, Hausmann, Cossman, H. Bohrer, Mdme. Palm, Mdlle. Grauman, Mdlle. Treffz, Herr Fischer, Stigelli, Schönhoff, the Hungarian Singers, and Strauss' band.

Mr. Hullah's Singing Classes are not equal to the performance of such an elaborate work as Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and the instrumental forces were also not sufficiently strong; but there was some novelty as regards the principal singers in the east at Exeter Hall on Wednesday night. Fischek's appearance to sing the music of the Prophet piqued curiosity, and he sang with great effect. The return of Mrs. Shaw—which is such a fine declaimer of dramatic and sacred music—was also an interesting event, although her voice was not in the best condition. Miss Lucombe and Miss Deaken, Messrs. Seguin and Lockey, were also among the vocalists.

Koutzki, the violinist, who made his début at Madame Dulcken's concert, is an executant of extraordinary skill, but he gave the amateurs an unfavourable impression as to his powers, by the announcement of divers tours de force; and we shall be glad to hear him in a more legitimate school of playing than paganiniana and one-stringed effects. Madame Dulcken's performance of the pieces in her scheme was worthy of her great reputation, and she presented her patrons and friends with a good concert, combining, as it did, the English and German artistes, as well as the company of Her Majesty's Theatre.

The pugnacious announcements in the advertising columns of the [illegible]rs respecting the "Prophète," of Meyerbeer, prevent us from noticing the execution, at Exeter Hall, on M. Jullien's second Concert Monster

The performance of Mendelssohn's Athalie, at Exeter Hall, by the Sacred Harmonic Society, will be famed, as having been honoured with the visit of Her Majesty and Prince Albert

Benedict, this season, has been indefatigable, as usual, in his exertions to render his annual concert the event of the season. He must have exercised nothing short of the diplomacy of a Talleyrand to have combined Mollique, Ernst, Joachim, Sainton, Ernst in Master's Concertante for four violins, and Halle, Lindsay Sloper, Bennett, and himself, in a pianoforte quintuor; with Vivier, the horn player, Piatti, Hausman, and Cossman, the violoncellists, and Botesini, the contra-basso; Puzzi, the German valve horn, Fischek, Mdme. Palm; the Hungarian vocalists, and the artistes of Her Majesty's Theatre; and the addition of Miss Catherine Hayes, the Misses A. and M. Williams, Mdlle. Vera, and Mr. Reeves. Mr. Benedict certainly has mounted a magnificent concert

Miss Collins, a vocalist from Bath, had an evening concert at the Mortimer-street Rooms, assisted by Misses Bassano, Messent, E. Lyon, Thornton, Messrs. F. Bodda, Herbert, Wilbraham, Miss Kate Loder, Mr. Willy, Mr. Carte, and Mr. Rockstro

MUSICAL EVENTS.—The eighth and last Philharmonic Concert will take place on Monday.——On Tuesday will be the seventh meeting of the Musical Union, being the matinée of the director, Mr. Ella.——On Wednesday, Dreyschock, the famed pianist, will have a concert at Willis's Rooms.——On Tuesday night Mr John Parry will give a Welsh Club entertainment in the same locality.——On Monday Mr. Sprengler will have a matinée at the Beethoven Rooms.——On the 2d of July Ernst and Halle will give a concert at the Hanover Rooms.——Amongst the victims of the cholera in Paris has been Madame Catalani, at the age of seventy. She had been long retired at Florence, but, after the Tuscan revolution, took refuge in France from the effects of the French army. She was most generous and liberal during her career, and gave away to the poor, by gratuitous concerts, upwards of £60,000, in the various capitals she visited. She founded a singing school at Florence, and gave a concert for its benefit at Drury-lane Theatre on Monday, and, with the native and foreign talent he has announced, will no doubt have a bumper.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The current week has not been prolific of racing, Bibury and Stockbridge, with good average fixtures (the latter recommended by a strong "Triennial"—its [illegible]ture, of taking), having been the only meetings of any interest. The cricketers are warming up for the "Gentlemen and Players" and other at head-quarters (Lord's) or at the Surrey grounds, scarcely a day passes in which the lovers of this manly and invigorating pastime may not find amusement. The matches and trials are many and various, that of the Club against the County of Sussex, on Monday; and the same club and ground against the undergraduates of Oxford, on Thursday both at Lord's. The weather continues favourable for aquatic sports; and the Thames Regatta, announced, will take place until Saturday next, on which day the Royal Thames Yacht Grand Challenge Cup will be sailed for: being open to vessels of all "Royal Yacht Clubs," a highly-interesting match may be anticipated.

The racing, next week, will be important. Newcastle commences on Monday, with a series of minor events, for the especial behoof of the holiday people. The real business of the meeting will commence on Tuesday, with the grand "cup" for the Northumberland Plate. The Triennial and Hotspur Stakes will be run on Wednesday; and on the following day, for the Gosforth, or Lastley, and Tyne Stakes, Gold Cup, &c. The programme, altogether, is very promising. The Winchester meeting, on Wednesday and Thursday, seems likely to produce a fair amount of racing; the stakes, however, are not events much interest.

ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB SAILING MATCH.

The first sailing match of the club this season came off on Saturday last the one appointed for the 30th ult. having failed in consequence of the unfavourable state of the weather. The prizes contended for were two elegant silver cups, that for the first-class yachts containing eighty sovereigns, and that for ten [illegible] class forty

The distance appointed for sailing was from Erith round the Nore Light, and back to the place of starting. The steam-packet Jupiter was engaged for the accommodation of the members of the club and their friends. The following is the time and order in which the yachts rounded the winning buoy:—

[illegible]	..	..	.. 7 .. 30
Mosquito	..	..	.. 7 .. 50
[illegible]	..	..	.. 7 .. 55
Sacred	..	..	.. 8 47 15
[illegible]	..	..	.. 8 57 10
[illegible]	..	..	.. 9 .. 0
Wildfire	..	..	.. 7 12 0

The last yacht having passed the buoy, the first prize was presented to Mr. Wicks, the owner of the Cynthia, by Lord Alfred Paget, with a most complimentary speech, and the usual honours. The second prize was not given up in consequence of a dispute as to the [illegible] which will be settled at the next meeting of the club.

The band of the Royal Artillery were on board the steamer, and performed a favourite piece or music at intervals throughout the day.

THE WINNER OF THE DERBY, 1849.—Mr. Moore, of West-street, St. Martin's-lane, has just published an effective Engraving of "The Flying Dutchman, from a picture recently painted by Elmore, and which has been purchased by the Earl of Eglinton.

The Thames Angling Preservation Society had its annual dinner at the Star and Garter Inn, on Thursday last. This little society, which has now been in existence for eleven years, has, by its exertions, considerably put a stop to the unlawful fishing which was at one time so perniciously prevalent, and afforded the lover of the angle the sport which the noble river Thames promised. The chair on the occasion was filled by W. H. Whitbread, Esq., who performed the duties most admirably. Mr. Henry Perkins, Mr. A. Perkins, the Honorary Secretary Mr. Farrell, and about thirty gentlemen, were present, and the evening passed off with great éclat. We wish a hearty success to this useful and agreeable society.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Duke of Wellington celebrated the thirty-fourth anniversary of his crowning victory on Monday evening, at Apsley House, by the customary Waterloo Banquet. Prince Albert and the great military celebrities were present as usual.

The Earl of Rosse, as president of the Royal Society, held his last soirée for the present season on Saturday evening, at Somerset House. The noble president's saloons contained some most interesting models of new inventions and other scientific objects, and some rich specimens of home-grown fine art. The attendance of visitors was larger than at any previous soirée.

On Wednesday, the 13th inst., the Board of Guardians at Lurgan, in County Down, received an application for a French cook, about to be sent out to supply their Union with bread, meat, flour, vittles, beer, &c., at a less price than any English tradesman.

The Great Britain, it is understood, has been purchased by Mr. Gibbins, of London, for £20,000, who has contracted a further expense of £30,000 to have her fitted out for sea. She is to ply between Liverpool and New York.

At a preliminary meeting of mechanics, &c., last week, at the Freemasons' Lodge, Myton-gate, near Hull, it was resolved that John Lee Smith, Esq., the Mayor, be requested to grant the use of the Town Hall for a public meeting, to take into consideration the present distress existing among the working classes.

The increase in the emigration from Liverpool continues. During the past month, the numbers were 19,151 souls, against 13,336 in May, 1848, and 18,320 in May, 1847. The numbers of the five months ended May 31, are—1847, 71,874; 1848, 52,289; and 1849, 72,536. The increase is thus 20,247 this year over 1848, but only 662 over 1847.

The beautiful estate of Glenormiston, Peebles, has been bought by W. Chambers, Esq., of Edinburgh, at a shade above £39,000.

The following is a return of Indian corn, wheat, flour, provisions, &c., imported into Liverpool from America in the week ended the 12th inst.:—10,994 bags Indian corn, 18,110 bushels Indian oatmeal, 315 barrels flour, 5144 quarters wheat, 6,900 sacks wheat, 745 quarters beans, 600 firkins peas, 238 barrels of pork, 160 hogsheads of bacon, 351 cwts. of bacon, 961 boxes ditto, 150 hogsheads of hams, 151 boxes of ditto, 153 barrels of lard, 1149 hogsheads of ditto.

At the meeting of the Presbyterian Church in Scotland, held last week in Edinburgh, a resolution disapproving of reading discourses from the pulpit of that church was carried by a majority of 165 against 121.

The Head-Mastership of the Northern Church of England College, Fleetwood, has been conferred on the Rev. W. A. Osborne, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge.

The hay harvest has commenced pretty generally throughout the West Riding of Yorkshire. In some districts the superior meadows in the southern districts. The yield is very good, and many crops have been already well housed, though there is a great deal yet to cut. The recent rains have greatly improved the appearance of the grass crops, as well as potatoes and pulse; and turnips are understood to be generally doing well.

At the last meeting of the Exeter Reform Association, the following extraordinary resolution was unanimously adopted:—"That the Russian Company for the Hungarians was unanimously adopted:—"That the Association hails with delight the success that has attended the armies of the Hungarians, led on by Dembinski, Bem, and others, and sincerely hopes they will succeed in driving the tyrant from their soil, and that as long Poland also may again be free."

Exaggerated reports of the cholera at Boulogne having appeared in some of the journals, various official persons in that city have circulated notices stating that the disease was never very prevalent in the place, and now no longer exists there. The only victims of the disease in insalubrity appear to have been some of the poorer class of Frenchmen, none of the English visitors having been attacked.

The progress of evictions of tenantry in Ireland still continues. From Lord Lorton's trust estates, in the county of Kerry, there have been driven, since the 19th of May, 254 individuals. In Tipperary, the Clonmel Chronicle records cases of the same kind.

It is stated in the Cork Reporter that in one of the chief streets of Cork there are fourteen shops closed, and in the main street of Clonmel there are not less than twenty-two shops shut up.

A company established in the metropolis, intitled "The Company of Window Cleaners," are now cleansing house windows for nothing, in order to demonstrate their abilities.

The Bank of Ireland has declared a dividend of 8 per cent. on the last half-year.

The Marquis of Westminster, at his last half-yearly audit, gave his tenants a reduction of ten per cent.

The Port of Ancona is declared in a state of blockade by the Austrians.

On Saturday last the officers of the 7th Hussars held their anniversary dinner at Gillon's Hotel, Albemarle-street, to commemorate the last time that service of that regiment at Waterloo. The Duke of Beaufort was in the chair; and his Grace was supported by the gallant veteran who has now commanded that fine regiment for fifty years, Field-Marshal the Marquis of Anglesey.

The total amount, either granted or advanced from the Exchequer of the United Kingdom on account of the distress and famine, or in aid of the Poor-Law in Ireland during the years 1846, 1847, 1848, was £8,049,400. Of this sum £4,826,100 was granted, and £3,639,300 advanced as a loan. The principal and and interest repaid, amounts to £988,596.

It was supposed that Orangeism in Ireland was dead, and that we were not likely to hear more of it; but those passing anticipations were erroneous. The foundation-stone of a new Orange hall has been recently laid at Newry, with great pomp and ceremony. The inscription on the brass plate states that the ground for the building had been given by "Arthur Wills Blundell Sandys Trumbull Windsor Hill," otherwise the Marquis of Downshire.

The cholera is raging in the village of Arlington, Gloucestershire. A singular incident occurred there on Monday last. A child named Phillips, who was supposed to be dead, was laid out with her mother, who had died of cholera, and the bodies were about to be buried. The father, however, while bearing some burning tar through the house, had the child moved; it gradually recovered, and is now living.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert, Captain-General and Colonel of the Hon. Artillery Company, has signified his intention to review the regiment on Monday next, the 25th instant, at ten o'clock.

Her Majesty's steam-vessel Trident, Lieut. Commander Risk, arrived at the Cove of Cork, from Kingstown (Dublin) on Sunday morning, at three o'clock, with the two political prisoners Messrs. O'Doherty and Martin, who were immediately transferred to the convict-ship waiting for them, which is now still detained for Admiralty orders to proceed.

The annual distribution of prizes to the pupils of the Royal Naval School took place on Tuesday at the establishment at New Cross. Rear-Admiral Bostock, C.B., M.P., the President, was in the chair.

Breudel's Zeitung mentions the following tragic end of Madame Schodel, one of the prima donnas of the German Opera in London, under the management in 1832. She was the intimate friend of Bem, one of the Hungarian chiefs; and having tried to persuade him to desert the Hungarian cause, and made also an unsuccessful attempt to poison Kossuth as a traitor, was given to him, she was in consequence ordered to be publicly beheaded in Debrezin.

The late Surgeon Carmichael, who met an untimely death by drowning at Dublin, has bequeathed £4850 to the Medical Benevolent Society, £3000 to the Royal College of Surgeons, the interest to be applied to granting a quadrennial prize for the encouragement of medical science, and £5000 to the Richmond Hospital School of Surgery.

From the hop districts in Kent the general report is that the well-cultivated gardens present different appearances to the others, but the fly and vermin are numerous everywhere.

Dr. Ewerbeck, a physician, naturalised in France, and Dr. Jausenau, who took an active part in the late insurrection at Vienna, and afterwards went to Kossuth at Pesth, have been arrested, with a great many of the German Socialist-Democrats, in Paris, who signed the German manifest addressed to the people of Paris.

On the 13th inst., the day of the late "Red" demonstration in Paris, M. Alexandre Dumas met in the Rue du Faubourg Montmartre M. Ledru-Rollin, arm in arm with an ill-looking man, and walking very quick. On seeing M. Dumas, M. Ledru-Rollin, fearing that the illustrious novelist would accost him, waved his hand to him at a distance, as much as to say, "I am in a hurry, don't stop me." M. Ledru-Rollin must, indeed, have been very much pressed for time, for he had just lost his place in the Assembly, and was very anxious not to lose his place in the railroad train

M. d'Alton Shée left Paris for Brussels in the evening of the 14th by the Northern Railroad, in the disguise of a stoker. It is singular that the Socialist ex-peer of France performed the offices at the engine of the man who leat him his dress, and the train it drew contained the late questor of the Assembly, M. Degousée, and several of his political friends, called sous de la constitution.

The country house of M. Ledru-Rollin at Fontenay-aux-Roses has been searched, and a quantity of arms and ammunition of all kinds found in it and seized. It had been converted into a regular fortress.

Lieut-General Lord Seaton, who has been replaced as chief commissioner of the Ionian Islands, left Corfu on the 2nd inst., when there was a great demonstration of the loyal inhabitants to go him honour, such as was never before seen, for it was spontaneous. The whole Greek population turned out; small boats, crowded with country people shouting "Live forever!" waylaid his Excellency's barge; and he could hardly move down to the shore for the mass of people who lined the quay.

EXHIBITION OF OLD MASTERS,

AT THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

IT was well remarked (when in England) by Waagen, the distinguished Director of the Berlin Museum, and perhaps the best critic upon art alive, that the number of good pictures in this country was not to be judged by the leading collections—by the National Gallery, Windsor, Buckingham Palace, Hampton Court, Dulwich, Grosvenor, Bridgewater collections, and others; but that whoever would wish to see the rich resources of this country in works of art, must pierce into private houses—into back-parlours and attics, as well as into drawing-rooms. The truth of this remark is not to be denied. The present Exhibition of the British Institution is another proof of its correctness. How few have imagined, as they passed up and down Arlington-street, Piccadilly, that within the walls of a dingy-looking house there were so many fine works of art as we see assembled this year in the principal room at the British Institution? It was well known that the Earl of Yarborough had some very fine pictures at his seat at Appuldercombe, in the Isle of Wight; but that his Arlington-street collection was at all remarkable, would appear to have been unknown to so untiring a picture finder as Waagen, who stated, in English with a very great reputation, with most knowledge of what we possessed, and with the very best kind of introductory letters. It is one of the good effects of the British Institution, that it is the means of making known many fine pictures—scarcely distinguished beyond a family circle; or, if at all known, only to a few picture-cleaners and frame-makers.

The principal contributors to the present Exhibition are the Earl of Yarborough, who exhibits sixty-three pictures in a collection of only one hundred and forty; Earl Grey, her Majesty, who contributes Wilkie's "Blind Man's Buff," the Duke of Sutherland, who sends a very sweet specimen by Stothard; the Marquis of Westminster, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Sir Robert Peel, Sir R. W. Vaughan, Mr. Hope, and others. The collection is in all respects a very excellent one, and should be seen by every one at all interested in art.

Of the early masters, there is nothing better in the three rooms than the "Coronation of the Virgin," a fresco by Taddeo Gaddi, the property of C. Baring Wall, Esq., M.P.; and a small Leonardo da Vinci, representing a "Card Party," the property of the Earl of Pembroke. The Taddeo Gaddi is full of that devotional feeling, which the Germans, and now Mr. Herbert, and others of the English school, are endeavouring to introduce among us. The Leonardo Vinci Leyden is valuable, but in a different way, as an illustration of the history of art. The large Titian, the "Rich Family," occupying the centre of the great room (one of Lord Yarborough's pictures), is hardly up to the mark of the great Venetian's second-rate style. It has very little of that devotional feeling which prevails so much in the Taddeo Gaddis; while in power, arrangement, and even in colour, it is not very remarkable. Of Salvator Rosa there is as fine an example as we have seen for some time. It is one of Lord Yarborough's treasures, and is alive in spirit, conception, and execution to the utmost amusement of the same great master which Government bought a few years back for the National Gallery.

Of the Spanish school there is not a single example, if we remember rightly, in the whole collection—there is certainly nothing worthy of the three great names of Murillo, Velasquez, and Zurbaran. Nor does the Flemish school fare much better—though Rubens is well represented by a "Lion Hunt," a magnificent sketch for the great picture at Dresden, full of fire and masterly execution, though made up of the fewest touches imaginable. It is a small picture, belonging to Sir Robert Peel, and infinitely superior to the large picture by the same master. "The Alteration of the Magi," contributed by the Marquis of Westminster. To our thinking there is very little of Rubens's hand in this large picture

The French school is fairly represented by Lord Yarborough's Claude (No 9), painted at Rome for Pope Urban VIII., afterwards in the collection of Louis XVI., when it was engraved by Le Bas, with the title of "La Récompense du Village." The Gaspar Poussins are average specimens; but the Grenze hardly does justice to a painter who is only to be endured in his best style

The Dutch school is, of course, well represented in a country singularly rich in the very best examples of the best masters. Lord Yarborough contributes a Cuyp, a "Frost Scene, with a ruined Tower," marvellous in effect, and even superior, we are inclined to think, to a similar and somewhat smaller subject of the same master, which we remember to have seen at Sir Robert Peel's. It is all glow and winter sunshine—warm and yet cold, and occupies, as it deserves to do, the place of honour in the great room. Mr Hope contributes five pictures, and all five are perfect in their way. The Wouvermans, a "Village Festival," No. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Wouvermans he had ever seen. The large Jan Steen, "A Merry-making," might hang, in point of excellence, as a pendant to the famous "School" by the same master, for which Lord Ellesmere paid so largely at Lord Camden's sale. It is, moreover, free from that indecency wh ch is too common a drawback to Jan's best efforts. The De Hooge, an "Interior," is full of that marvellous effect of light with which the painter's name is now inseparably associated; and the pair of Metzu's, a "Lady receiving a Letter," and a "Gentleman writing a Letter," exhibit the excellences of the master of the subtlest perfection. How much is made out of so very little, and how graceful and easy is the whole composition in both pictures!

But it is the English school which is seen to the greatest advantage in the present Exhibition. Sir Robert Peel has sent the fine half-length, by Sir Joshua Reynolds, of Admiral Keppel, which he bought a few years back, at Christie and Manson's; and Lord Yarborough has sent the full-length of "Mrs. Pelham in a fancy dress, holding chickens." The "Keppel" is not so good as the "Lord Heathfield" in the National Gallery, but it is not very far behind. The colours in both have stood. Sir R. W. Vaughan has sent the five Richard Wilsons which his collection contains. The "View of Penshurst Castle" (No. 121) is one of the best, though all possess that rich effect of mellow atmosphere, and wood, and water, of which Wilson seems to catch some of his most hurried efforts. Gainsborough is fairly represented by a pair of subjects contributed by Mr. Tollemache, M.P.: one called "Landscape, with a girl feeding pigs;" the other, "Landscape, with Peasants and Cattle going to Market." The former is the better picture, though both exhibit many of the characteristic excellences of the artist. By Zoffany, a painter hitherto imperfectly appreciated, there are three pictures, two (Lord Yarborough's subjects, for which he paid 1000 guineas) contributed by Lord Yarborough, and a "Group of the Townley Marbles," with small full-lengths of Townley and two friends. The expression on the face of Garrick in one of the theatrical subjects is another of those many instances of the versatile powers of that great actor, nor is it less to Zoffany's praise that he has caught it so well. By Benjamin West there is a characteristic "Portrait of Benjamin Franklin," which bears the impress upon it of being painted like, though as a work of art it is very poor. By Sir Thomas Lawrence there is a portrait, head size, of "Canova," painted for Sir Robert Peel, and one of the most marvellous male heads which Lawrence ever painted. The eyes are full of brilliancy and thought, the expression animated yet heavy, the texture of the flesh quite particularly good, and the whole appearance of the head that of an inspired peasant, less Roman, or like Curran himself. By Sir Thomas there are two good specimens—a small "Canterbury Pilgrimage," contributed by Miss Rogers (the sister of the poet), and a scene from the "Spectator," the property of the Duke of Sutherland. As a piece of colour and execution, the latter is the better work; in many respects, indeed, it is the best picture by Stothard we have seen. By Wilkie, we have "The Rent Day," contributed by the Ladies Phipps, and "Blind Man's Buff," contributed by her Majesty. Of pictures so well and deservedly known it is unnecessary to speak; but it is pleasing to see them here, from their very excellences, and the good service they will render to all students who examine them with care. By Washington Allston, an American painter and poet, there is a noble scriptural landscape, representing "Elijah in the Wilderness" (the best picture we have seen by this painter); while by Mr. J. M. W Turner (a living painter) we have a grand and-cape, painted in 1803, and the "Wreck of an Emigrant Ship," painted in 1841, both the property of Lord Yarborough. The earlier picture is a vintage scene, with a river like the Thames at Richmond (there are few things lovelier) wandering at its own sweet will through a rich wooded country. As a composition, it is worthy of Poussin or Claude, while it unites many of the excellences of those two great painters, and combines, at the same time, merits of a high order peculiar to its painter. This is a picture to do honour to any school.

NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE RAILWAY.

LAST week we gave a brief notice of some of the leading features of this important undertaking, to accompany a Sketch of the principal station, at Stoke-upon-Trent, and the view of the Congleton Viaduct.

We now present to our readers three other Views, illustrative of the near completion of this railway, or rather series of railways, traversing one of the most interesting districts in the kingdom.

A glance over any railway map will show that the large tract of country which is bounded by the Manchester and Birmingham, the Grand Junction, the Trent Valley, the Birmingham and Derby, and the Midland lines, was, before the formation of the North Staffordshire Company, wholly destitute of railway accommodation, although it contains near half a million of inhabitants, and includes the manufacturing districts of the Potteries, Leek, Congleton, Macclesfield, and the towns of Uttoxeter, Stone, Cheadle, Newcastle-under-Lyme, and Ashborne, all of them centres of business for the agricultural population of the surrounding villages. No accordingly portion of this large tract of land stands in mineral wealth—lime, coal, and iron being found in abundance.

The inconveniences experienced, through the perversity of the previously existing railway companies in choosing to carry their lines round this district, or anywhere rather than through it, led to the formation of the North Staffordshire Company; and a little further examination of the map will show the comprehensiveness of their plan.

Taking Stoke-upon-Trent as the centre, the Company's lines may be said to radiate in almost every direction, thereby giving the best possible means of accommodation, and also materially shortening the distance for the through traffic between Manchester and Birmingham and London.

The North Staffordshire has three principal lines; but the one from Macclesfield to Colwich, through the Potteries, is designated, par excellence, "the main line." This line, which connects the London and North Western at Macclesfield with the Trent Valley at Colwich, is thirty-nine miles in length, with a branch of three miles and a half from Stone to Norton Bridge, for the convenience of the traffic for Stafford, Wolverhampton, Birmingham, and the West of England. It has also a short line in progress from Stoke to the coal and iron district, northwest of Newcastle

The "Derby and Crewe" line is the next in importance. This line, before its adoption by the North Staffordshire Company, was promoted by the London and Nor h-Western, who subscribed a third or half of the capital. Commencing at Crewe, it falls into the Macclesfield and Colwich line at Harecastle, and traversing the Pottery valley, it branches eastward from Stoke-upon-Trent, and falls into the Midland (Birmingham and Derby) at Burton-upon-Trent, where it unites also with the South Staffordshire and the Leicester and Swannington lines. The distance from Crewe to Burton-upon-Trent is 44½ miles. A short branch is in course of construction for the convenience of the Derby traffic.

The "Churnet Valley Line" leaves the Macclesfield and Colwich line at North Rode, about five miles south of the former place, and passing for about twenty-seven miles through one of the loveliest valleys in England, unites with the Derby and Crewe line at Uttoxeter. This line is expected to be ready for opening about the middle of next month

There is a short line from Harecastle to Sandbach, about seven miles long, which brings the salt district of Cheshire into communication with the line from Crewe to Burton, and so on to the eastern coast.

It is but a few days more than twelve years since the Royal assent was given to the Company's act; yet, during that time, upwards of 100 miles have been brought to completion, although some of the works are amongst the most difficult that have been executed in any part of England. Notwithstanding the severe commercial pressure, the shareholders have met the calls upon them with unexampled punctuality, and have paid up the whole of the capital required, with the exception of some £20,000 or £30,000. The entire paid up capital of the Company is more than three millions.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Cloud-End and Mow Cop are noble features in the landscape in the left, between Macclesfield and the Potteries. Cloud-End is a bold promontory, and of great advantage near the junction with the Churnet Valley line, at North Rode. It is the termination of the hilly range known as Biddulph Moor, remarkable as the site of the remains of Celtic encampments and entrenchments. Mow Cop is the site of a Druidical temple. It also makes a fine background in the view through the arches of the Dane and Congleton viaducts

Mow Cop, although not nearly so lofty as Cloud-End, presents a much more striking appearance to a distant observer. It is a mountain in miniature—precipitous on three sides, and bleak, bare, and craggy, except in one part, where there is a fine hanging wood. From the summit of the hill a view is obtained unequalled in any direction. In certain states of the atmosphere, it is said, the shipping in the port of Liverpool are distinguishable. The Welsh mountains, the Wrekin in Shropshire, Beeston Castle, Stafford Castle, the Peak in Derbyshire, and the ranges of hills which form the Staffordshire moorlands, are prominent objects. Nearer, on the south, nearly the whole of the Pottery district is seen. Congleton lies nearer still, to the north.

The whole country is studded over with towns and villages, of which a sort of bird's-eye view is presented. But nothing can be more glorious than the view of almost the entire county of Chester, which is here to be obtained. The hill stands on the boundary line between the counties of Staffordshire and Cheshire, and the latter county is at present in full view. It has a good appearance at this point of view. We have been informed that this building [illegible] century ago, and that originally the tower contained a furnace [illegible], which visitors were allowed to use

Etruria, of which we give a View, is on the east side of the Pottery Valley. It is almost classic ground. Here the celebrated Wedgwood built [illegible] mansion, and erected the spacious manufactory of earthenware, [illegible] carried on by one of his grandsons in conjunction with a partner. Here, too, Flaxman modelled some of his finest forms, to be reproduced in almost [illegible] by the potter's art. The park, and nearly the whole estate, [illegible] manufactories and the village, a long street of workmen's cottages, have within these few years been sold to the Duchy of Lancaster, whose coal and iron works threaten at no distant period utterly to destroy the waning beauty of the place. A church, recently erected from a design of Ward and Son, architects of Hanley, in the early English style, is a very interesting object.

The Dane Viaduct is the most magnificent feature of the whole line. This viaduct consists of 20 arches, of 50 feet span, divided into three compartments by large bastions—the middle one containing six arches, and the others seven each. The extreme length of the viaduct is 448 yards, exclusive of the embankment at each end; and the height from the bed of the river to the level of the rails is 100 feet. The piers and arches are constructed entirely of blue brick, the only stone-work being the facing of the bastions, a bold cornice, and the parapet walls, five feet high. The Dane flows through two of the arches, and is at times a deep and rapid stream. Very extensive views amongst the hills, which are clustered together at the junction of the three counties of Stafford, Chester, and Derby, are obtained from the viaduct.

The Congleton Viaduct, though consisting of only ten arches, is scarcely inferior to that over the Dane in grandeur of appearance. The construction is the same—blue brick with stone bastions, and stone parapet, with arches of fifty feet span. The extreme height from the bed of the stream to the rails is 114 feet—the viaduct being 231 yards long, exclusive of the embankments. Buglawton Hall and Church, with a portion of the village, may be seen to the right; and in front is the lofty range of Congleton Edge, the view terminating at Mow Cop. The distance from the viaduct to Mow Cop is about half a mile, and presents no fresh object deserving notice.

All the buildings on the line, with few exceptions, are fine specimens of the Tudor style of architecture.

Opposite the Stoke station, a view of which was given last week, is a magnificent hotel, corresponding with it in size and appearance, which will shortly be opened by Mr. Cuff, of the Midland Hotel, at Derby, to whom, we understand it has been let for a term of years.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

MINSTER ABBEY, THANET.

THE foundation of a religious establishment upon this site occurred as early as the seventh century, and had its origin under the following circumstances:—The manor, called "Thanet Manor" in the "Domesday Survey," was possessed by Egbert, King of Kent, about the year 670, when he undertook the guardianship of his two nephews, Ethelred and Ethelbright, sons of Ermenfrida, the deceased King, who likewise left two daughters, Ermenburga, otherw se called Domneva (married to Merwald, son of Penda, King of Mercia), and Ermengitha. The King, having covenanted with his deceased relative that the sons should succeed to the government of Kent, was induced by his creature, Thunnor, who had immediate charge of them, to consent to their destruction. This he undertook to perform, in order that the usurpation of their rights by Egbert should remain unquestioned. To explate this crime, according to the easy rule of Saxon retribution, the King was advised by Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Adrian, Abbot of the Augustine Monastery, to send for Domneva, who had taken a vow of chastity, to entreat her pardon, at the same time offering her rich presents. These, however, were rejected by the vestal Princess, who solicited instead that the King should make atonement by granting her a place in Thanet, where she might found a monastery for the repose of their souls; to which the King consenting, granted her, in the fulness of his penitence, the space of one half of the island, his gift being the eastern portion thereof.

But, as the foundation of such establishments was seldom unaccompanied by events of a miraculous nature, we have accordingly the following version of the transaction by Thodi—a monk of the Augustine order at Canterbury. He relates that the King demanding how much land she desired to have, she replied as much as her deer could run over at one course. This being allowed, the deer was started at Westgate in Birchington, in the presence of the King and his nobles, among whom was the murderer of he young princes, Thunnor, who [illegible] the free course of the deer "But, however," says the [illegible] offended at his impiety, while he was in the act of his career, the earth opened and swallowed him up, leaving the name of Thunnor's Leap to perpetuate this judgment." Meanwhile the deer ran over forty-eight plough lands, and gained to Domneva a fair endowment for her monastery. Its abbey founded by this lady was dedicated to the blessed Virgin Mary as a cloister for nuns; afterwards it was called St. Mildred's Abbey.

Among vestiges of rude masonry, probably of Saxon construction, the more cognisable feature of this remaining portion of the Abbey may be considered to date from about the time of Henry the First, who granted a market to be held yearly within the manor of Minster. In the gable a portion of a good Norman window is visible; and the present entrance to the building now a farm-house, is by a fine early English arch. The Norman windows, whose vestiges are still visible, have been built up, and replaced by square lights, which, however, are by no means modern. Other smaller windows and niches are of the Decorated and successive periods, indicating successive changes in the character of the ancient edifice.

The Abbey Church, which is close by, contains fine details of early English work, lately restored; and other indications of the extent of the monastic establishment are to be traced in different parts of the adjacent village, parts of which are beholden to its masonry for the materials of their structure. In one of the cottages, especially, there may be observed a piece of early zigzag moulding, with the fragments of an early Norman or Saxon rood built into the wall.

CATHEDRAL OF ST. JOHN, NEWFOUNDLAND.

We present our readers with an Engraving of the new Cathedral of St. John, Newfoundland, now erecting from the designs of Mr. George S. Scott. A deficiency in funds will probably delay the building of the eastern part, more prominently displayed in the above drawing; but we may as well give a description of the whole edifice, abridged from a critical account published in the Ecclesiologist.

"The style is First-Pointed (Mr. Rickman's 'Early English'), of the latest phase, in the nave and transepts; transitional towards Middle-Pointed (Decorated) in the choir. To this style the architect was confined by the rigorous prescription of external shafts and mouldings; the cold and driving mists of the climate being so severe as to destroy all ornamental or crocketed work exposed to the air. In plan, St. John's is to consist of a nave with aisles; transepts with eastern aisles; and a tower at the intersection. The length of the nave is 106 feet; of the crossing, 30; and of the choir, 60 feet: the nave consisting of six, the choir of four bays. The site is a fine one—the ground rising rapidly northward, which gives opportunity for a dignified substructure in the south elevation, and a commanding flight of steps to the west porch. The choir is designed to have stone groining; the nave roof is of open timbers."

A large portion of the stone for this Church has been imported from Scotland, which, together with the vast expense of labour on the spot, makes its cost very considerable. Some portion of its costs will be defrayed from the general collection made in the churches of England for the relief of the sufferers in the great fire at St. John's a few years ago, in which the old wooden church, which the present more dignified structure replaces, shared the fate of nearly the whole city. At present not more than the nave can be completed, unless the friends of the Church exert themselves at home. It is an undertaking well worthy of help for we hear that the sacrifices of Dr. Field, Bishop of Newfoundland, to the work are very considerable.

We cannot quit the subject without congratulating Mr. Scott upon the success with which he has adapted his Church to the climate and circumstances under which it is reared. Where all external ornament was impossible, Mr. Scott has given dignity to his Church by the simple force of mass and outline—by broad, deep shadows and solidity of structure. The Church is in thorough keeping with the storms and snows of St. John's.

PLATE PRESENTED TO DR. FORBES.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

THE RIGHT HONORABLE THOMAS WYSE.

By intelligence just received from Athens, we learn that the Right Honorable Thomas Wyse, the newly-appointed Minister to Greece, arrived at the Piræus in the night of the 6th instant, and landed next morning under a salute from the

THE RIGHT HON. THOMAS WYSE.

English Government steamer which conveyed him from Trieste, as also from a Russian vessel-of-war lying in the harbour. His Excellency is accompanied by his niece, and has taken up his residence at the Hôtel d'Angleterre, in Athens, for a few days, as the mission residence has been fresh painted and decorated since Sir Edmund Lyons's departure. The King had delayed his departure for the country for several days, from a desire to enter into the best possible relations with the new representative of Great Britain.

The right honourable gentleman, who is now somewhat beyond the middle age of life, is a native of the county of Waterford, where his family have been settled, with considerable influence, for some centuries. The family seat is known as the manor of St. John. Mr. Wyse, after receiving the rudiments of his education, entered Trinity College, Dublin, where he took high honours. After completing his course of education, Mr. Wyse travelled on the Continent; and, during an absence of some years, visited (in company with Mr. Barry, the eminent architect) Greece, Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt. Both gentlemen, in those countries, studied from the finest works extant the principles of architecture. From his earliest youth, the pursuit of art has been a passion with Mr. Wyse. His personal associations have all conduced towards this end, and he is himself a painter. Mr. Wyse's well-known devotion to these subjects led to his being named one of the Royal Commission for superintending the building of the new Houses of Parliament.

On educational questions Mr. Wyse has taken a prominent position from the first moment of his entry into the House of Commons, in 1830.

Mr. Wyse (says a contemporary) is essentially Catholic in his mind, which ... enough to embrace any and every proposition which is calculated to elevate intellectually and morally the human character. His whole life has been devoted to the ardent pursuit of such objects in Parliament. By his speeches and also by various contributions to contemporary literature, to secure some grand and comprehensive scheme of education for the people, is the one absorbing idea of his life, conceiving as he does, that, if the intellectual standard of a people be raised, other beneficial consequences follow as a matter of course He has either originated or promoted with unabated zeal all the efforts that have been made to prepare the public mind on the question. He has written upon it with great ... power and perseverance, and his plans combine the practical and the practicable in an eminent degree. The large work of his on Education is a complete treasure on the subject, with an elaborate plan of action followed out into its minutest details. It would be impossible to estimate the amount of labour which the fervent and able ex. of Mr. Wyse have led him to bestow upon the subject; to him will belong a great part of the merit of having astonished the public mind with the idea of the necessity of a system of Public Education."

Mr. Wyse was always a favourite of Ireland's people; but was, at the same time, a determined opponent of the Repeal of the Union. He was most active in the struggle for Roman Catholic Emancipation. He is the author of a "Historical Sketch of the Catholic Association," and other popular works and pamphlets. In 1830-31 he sat for the county of Tipperary. In 1832 he unsuccessfully contested Waterford. He was elected for it in 1835 and 1837. At the general election in 1841 he was not returned, but he succeeded on petition. At the last general election he was left in a minority on the poll, because he would not adopt the Repeal pledge.

Mr. Wyse was one of the first Roman Catholics raised to any place of rank or emolument in the Government of this country, after the passing of the Relief Bill. During the later years of the Melbourne Administration, he was a Lord of the Treasury; and, on the accession of Lord John Russell to power in 1846, he was appointed Secretary to the Board of Control, or India Board. While in this department, he originated a plan for preserving and exploring the ancient monuments and other antiquities of our Oriental empire.

The right honourable gentleman is a most eloquent speaker, possessing a delivery remarkable for grace and elegance.

By marriage, Mr. Wyse is connected with the President of the French Republic, having married, several years since, the daughter of M. Lucien Bonaparte, one of the President's uncles.

TESTIMONIAL TO DR. FORBES.

This elegant piece of Table Plate has been presented to Dr. Forbes, by public subscription, in acknowledgment of the deep service rendered to medical science by the spirit and method displayed by the Doctor, for twelve years, in the editorship of The Brunsh and Foreign Medical Review, as well as in recognition of his high professional and excellent moral character. The presentation took place at a meeting of the subscribers, when the Testimonial was delivered by Mr. Stanley, President of the Royal College of Surgeons, after a graceful address, to which Dr. Forbes feelingly replied.

The plate consists of a candelabrum for six lights, with a twin stem, at the base of which are three figures representing Industry, Health, and Hope, corresponding to Dr. Forbes's motto, "Labore, Robore, Spe." The lights are supported by the branches, enclosing a cut-glass dish; and thus serving as an epergne and candelabrum. The plate is from the establishment of Messrs. Smith, of Duke-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields, and in design and manufacture is highly creditable to their taste and skill.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD.

At the convocation on Thursday last it was proposed to confer the honorary degrees of Doctor in Civil Law on the Rev. George Bancroft, Minister of the United States, and Sir Heywood Markham, F.S.A. At the same time the honorary degree of Master of Arts was conferred on Fletcher Fulton Compton Hayes, Captain in the East India Service, and Gentleman Commoner of Hertford Hall.

In the convocation held on Friday, the 22nd instant, at ten o'clock, it was proposed to grant out of the University Chest to Mr. Donkin, Savilian Professor of Astronomy, a sum not exceeding £500 for the purpose of providing such instruments and apparatus as may be necessary for the illustration of his lectures

A general meeting of the Oxford Museum Committee was held on Tuesday, in the Sheldonian Theatre, when the secretary read a report upon the proceedings, and several resolutions were passed, which were respectively proposed and seconded by the Master of Pembroke and Dr. Bunbury, the Principal of Brasenose, and the Rev. R. Greswell, the Vice-Chancellor, and the Rev. W. H Cox. Subscriptions were announced, of £100 by the Wardens of New College; £250, by the Rev. Dr. Buckland; the Dean and Chapter of Christ Church £100; the Dean of Westminster, £100; Dr Acland, £100, Dr. Daubeny, £100, &c. All persons friendly to the undertaking will contribute, it is earnestly requested, to the funds requisite for this object, and commend it by their influence to the general favour and support necessary to ensure its success.

EXETER COLLEGE.—There will be an election to a Fellowship in this college on Saturday, June 30, open to natives of the counties of Somerset, Exeter, and Barnstaple, who are at least of the standing of Generalis Sophista in the University. Candidates are required to deliver to the Rector, on or before Monday, the 25th, a certificate, legally attested, that they are within the archdeaconries above mentioned, together with a certificate of their baptism, their Responsion Testamur, and testimonials of good conduct from the college or hall of which they are members.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE.—Thomas William Falcon, of Cheltenham, and Thomas Rennie, Commoner of Queen's, have been elected to be Tabardars.

CHRIST CHURCH.—The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay, M.A. of Christ Church, has been presented by her Majesty to the vicarage of Bovey Tracey, Devon.

ORIEL COLLEGE.—The Rev. G. A. Denison, M.A., of this college, has been appointed Prebendary of Wells Cathedral.

WORCESTER COLLEGE.—Henry Moore, from Bromsgrove School, has been elected a scholar of this college

PEMBROKE COLLEGE.—The Rev. H. S. Polehampton, M.A., fellow of this college, has been presented, by the master and fellows, to the rectory of St Aldate's, in this city

CHURCH EXTENSION.

CHURCH EXTENSION.—The general committee of the Incorporated Society for Promoting the Enlargement, Building, and Repairing of Churches and Chapels, held its usual monthly meeting on Monday last. His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury took the chair. There were also present the Bishop of London, Winchester, Bangor, Worcester, Chichester, St. Asaph, Norwich, and Oxford; Earl Powis, Lord Fielding, &c. Among other business transacted at the meeting, grants of money were made in aid of the erection of new churches at the new district of All Saints, Leeds; at Gravesend, for a district proposed to be formed out of a portion of that parish; towards rebuilding the churches at Virginstow, near Launceston, and East Walton, near Havert rdwest; enlarging the churches of St. Stephen, Islington; Compton, near Peterse d; re-arranging the interior of the churches at Langtoft-cum-Cottingham, Yorkshire; Halstead, Essex; Hinton Charterhouse, near Beckington; Brooke, near Norwich; Sutton, near Stamford; Grately, near Andover; and Cheam, Surrey. In all these churches very great improvements are contemplated, with increase of accommodation; in several cases extensive repairs will be executed, some of which received additional aid as being those in favour of which briefs would formerly have been granted. The population of the district of St. Barnabas, in Leeds, is 20,000. Before March last there was no place of worship within the district; there is now one church-school, which is inconveniently small. The proposed district in the parish of Gravesend is about a quarter of a mile from the parish church The site is given by Earl Darnley. The ancient church of Virginstow is of stone, with earth for mortar, and in a dilapidated state, owing to the walls being ruinous; no portion of it being worth preserving. The church of Llanfihangel is in a bad state, being partly unroofed. It is situated in a hilly district, and will be convenient for a population of eight hundred. The Lord Arthur belong to a neighbouring parish: the people are poor. The fine church at Halstead is in a very precarious condition. The nave roof is now supported by seventeen large wooden props, and is considered unsafe even with these. The tie-beams have ... decayed as to have no bearing on the walls. In January last the wooden spire was much injured by a storm. To save the church from total ruin, an attempt is now making to restore it by subscription. The majority of the parishioners are poor people. The next meeting of this society, which will take place on the third Monday in July, will be the last for the present season.

THE CITY OF LONDON NATIONAL SCHOOLS.—The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury on Sunday preached in the church of St. Dunstan-in-the-Tower street, on behalf of the city of London National Schools ... institution consists of four schools, in which 1500 children, for the ... no room in the ward schools, are instructed according ... ciples of the Church of England. The annual income derived from ... scriptions does not exceed £200, and the charity depends greatly for its support on occasional collections. The sum contributed after the Gra... amounted to £111 14s. 6d. The Sheriffs were present. The L... ... was presented by subscription from attending.

On Saturday last, June 16, was presented to the Rev. W. Sutcliff, ... incumbent of Bosley, by the congregation of North Rode Church, on his resignation of it, a beautiful pocket communion service, with a very handsome and superior clock or timepiece, of French design, bearing the following inscription "Presented to the Rev W Sutcliff, M.A., by the congregation of St. Michael's, North Rode, Cheshire, 1840."

FLOATING OF THE BRITANNIA BRIDGE TUBE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

THE first of the four great tubes on the far-famed Britannia Bridge was successfully floated to its destination on Wednesday evening; and, perhaps, no sight was ever of a more thrilling character, or of greater moment in its probable results.

The huge bulk of the tube, its seaming unwieldiness, and the novelty of the scene contributed to add a vast amount of interest to it; and the great control, which the tube was evidently under from the first separations to the last, completely allayed, which will be in about a month, when it will be hoisted to its proper elevation, a height of 100 feet. No cheering occurred as the tube sped on, all the gazers being apparently spell-bound and silent, so that the commotion even could be easily heard by the parties concerned; but, on the successful termination of the great event, the cheering was loud, hearty, and prolonged; and the deep-toned boom of some cannon placed near the shore added to the effect, their loud reports being caught up and re-echoed along the valley of the Straits Nothingmoral caused the perfect harmony of the arrangements; and the whole affair was as successful as possible, no lives being lost; and only a few bruises were received by some men working a capstan, which, almost at the conclusion of the proceedings, broke, and, as may be surmised, the men who worked it were hurled in different directions

Twenty, the first hint, was the time fixed on originally for floating the tube; but, unfortunately, one of the bolting apparatus broke, and, therefore, the pontoons were immediately made fast, and, to the disappointment of thousands, the event was postponed till the following (Wednesday) morning at seven o'clock. This intention was also frustrated by the want of a proper wind and one or two boats to which they were attached being swamped during the night by the rapidity of the tide. This was an unfortunate contretemps, and a great annoyance to the engineers and directors, and vexatious to many persons of high scorers, who were early on the spot to watch the commencement of the operations; but it soon transpired that in the evening all efforts would be made to float the tube, otherwise a delay of two or three days must certainly occur; and, at the time appointed, as we have before briefly stated, the tube was positively secured in its intended position, no hitch having occurred in anything for which, at present, all necessary preparations are not quite completed.

It is our intention to illustrate fully, by description and pictures, this highly interesting event next week.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

STEAM NAVY.—The Parliamentary committee appointed "to inquire into the practicability of providing, by means of the commercial marine of the country, a reserve steam navy available for national defence when required," have reported as follows:—"Your committee are of opinion, which is corroborated by the evidence taken before them, That mercantile steam-ships, of the size and strength necessary for the reception of such guns as are in use in the Royal navy, would be a most useful auxiliary force for national defence: and your committee see no difficulty in providing and carrying out such a measure. That the prompt development of the whole available maritime resources of the country, in the event of threatened hostilities, is most desirable, as a means for the preservation of peace. That the steps necessary to render such mercantile steamers available for the purpose, and the remuneration to be given by the public for fitting them and holding them liable to be called into the public service, must be matter of arrangement between the owners and the Government, upon which your committee do not deem it necessary to offer an opinion."

SHORE OPERATIONS AT CHATHAM.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert has expressed his intention of witnessing the operations, which will take place in this garrison on the 30th instant. The recently-invented American mud-raker pontoons, so highly spoken of by Sir Harry Smith, in his despatches from the Cape of Good Hope, will be specially brought into play in connexion with the pontoon service on the occasion

RUMOURED LOSS OF H. M. STEAMER "BULLDOG."—On the 11th inst., by the arrival at Malta of the Tartar despatch-vessel, news was brought of the loss of her Majesty's steamer Bulldog, en route from Civita Vecchia to Leghorn. Although no official information of the disaster had been received, the plucky little Bulldog was known to be lost, and this was greeted with much precision as to cause considerable anxiety in the minds of the relatives of the officers and men residing in Malta.

The 17th Regiment (Lieut.-Col. Tynte), stationed at Canterbury, entertained the inhabitants of the city and its vicinity with a novel and very interesting scene of a sham fight, on Saturday last. The regiment formed in line at open order, after marching into the field, at the back of the Dane John, and when within sixty or seventy paces of the saluting point, band ceased, and the companies brought forward their left shoulders, closing ranks at the same time without halting, and advancing in line at the double quick step, and to the distance column, to the admiration of the numerous spectators. Nothing could exceed the steadiness and excellent marching of the men. A few manœuvres were performed previously to the mock fight, at the close of the week, as the officers entertained a great number of the gentry of Canterbury and the neighbourhood to a déjeûner immediately after the field day, after which dancing commenced, and was kept up until about four o'clock. The people of Canterbury much regret the departure from the town of this fine regiment.

COMMAND IN NORTH AMERICA.—We are authorised to contradict a statement that has been going the round of the newspapers, to the effect that Lieutenant-General Sir John Harvey is to succeed Sir Benjamin D'Urban in the command of the troops in North America. We believe one of the Line Major-Generals in Canada will be the successor to the vacancy.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Tranquillising accounts from Paris, with the anticipation of the customary investments, consequent upon the payment of the dividends, caused great buoyancy in the English Market at the beginning of the week. Consols, on Monday, opened at 91¼ ex dividend, a slight reaction of a fraction occurring. This rapid advance was, however, checked on Tuesday by some extensive realising, and, notwithstanding the French Funds quoted an advance of 7 per cent. within the week, Consols declined to 91⅛, afterwards closing at 91⅛ ex dividend. The price was barely maintained on Wednesday, 91⅜ to ⅝ being the quotation during the day. The market on Thursday was dull, more from absence of business than any other cause. Prices ranged from 91⅜ to ⅝ ex div., buyers and sellers alternately. Exchequer Bills continue to be largely dealt in, and Bonds are in demand. Money continues to command a reduction on the rate of interest. Some large sales in New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, and Reduced, on account of an instrance office, have depressed those stocks rather below the market price. At the close of the week some heaviness prevailed, the last quotation being, for Bank Stock, 195¾; Three per Cent. Reduced Anns, 91¼; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent. Anns, 92¼; Long Anns, 18 5-16; India Bonds, £3 17 6 pm.; Ditto, Old, 98; Exchequer Bills, under £1000, 73 p.; Consols for Account, 91¼; Exchequer Bills, £1000, June, 64 p., £500, June, 62 p.; Small, June, 62 p.

The agents of the Mexican Republic have published a statement of the receipts and disbursements made by them on account of dividends. It appears that the total amount received has been £37,500 11s 4d; from which £141,189 3s. has been paid for the dividend due the 1st of January, 1844, and £1,311 for the three-fourths of the dividend due January, 1847, on the new bonds, leaving a balance of £4,666 8s. 4d. in the hands of the agents.

The Foreign Market partook of the animation that prevailed in the English house, prices generally quoting a slight advance. Mexican was 28¾ to ¾; Portuguese Three per Cents, 37¾; Spanish Three per Cents, 21¾ to ¾. Whilst the sales were improved, in consequence of the statement published by Messrs. Schneider, and now quotes 26¾ for account. Portuguese Four per Cents have advanced to 28. The market, at the close of the week, was dull, with limited transactions, as the following authentic list of prices will evidence:—Buenos Ayres Bonds, 6 per Cent., 40¾; Danish Bonds, 1825, 3 per Cent., 65; Equador Bonds, 4¾; New Granada, 1845, Ex Coupons, Account, 3¾; Peruvian Bonds, 4 per Cent., Active, 92¾; Portuguese 4 per Cent., Account, 28; Russian Bonds, 105¾; Spanish 5 per Cent., 1840, 16¾; Dutch 2½ per Cent., 12 Guild., 50¾; Ditto 5 per Cent., 103¾.

Shares have been more ... in during the ... week than for some time previously. Towards its close, however, business became more limited, and prices, in consequence, to be made lower. SATURDAY MORNING.—Consols were buoyant yesterday, opening at 91⅞ to ¾ for the Account, ex div., afterwards improving to 91¾ ⅞, which was the closing price. The Foreign Market was also more animated, although no material variation in prices occurred. In Shares there was little done.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Although several fresh runs of English wheat have been received up to our market sometime since Monday, the total arrival for the week amounting to 1950 quarters—the show of samples of both red and white this morning was again small, but of ... quality. The attendance of both town and country buyers was limited; nevertheless the demand for all descriptions of wheat, of home production, was decidedly firm, at the extreme rates of Monday. Indeed, in some few instances, selected qualities were sold for more money. Refer to the close of business a good clearance was effected. The Sun Weekly Average.—Wheat, 44s 8d; barley, 27s 6d; oats, 17s 8d; rye, 28s 8d; beans, 32s 9d; peas, 31s 2d Returns on Corn-Cart.—Wheat, 44s; barley, 1s 0d; oats, 1s 0d; rye, 0s 0d; beans, 1s 0d; peas, 1s 0d.

Flour.—Public sales of 20,000 packages have been held during the present week. A fair ... quantity has sold, at prices about equal to those obtained at the preceding auctions. ... for the article to demand is in a very sluggish state.

Sugar.—An improved business has been transacted in most kinds of raw sugar, at, in some instances, a slight advance in the quotations of 6d per cwt. Refined goods have moved off slowly. Brown Lumps at 51s to 53s. and standard do, 52s to 53s per cwt.

Coffee.—In this article has sold to some extent, and the quotations have risen fully 1s per cwt.

Rice.—Only a limited business is passing in our market, yet the holders are firm.

Provisions.—Since our last report, the prices of Irish butter have advanced to ... tent; hence the dealers are purchasing cautiously. Fine Friesland, 88s to 92s; fine ... and Kiel, 74s to 76s; and fine Holland and Zeeland, 76s to 78s per cwt; inferior marks, 46s to 66s per cwt. Now Irish butter.—the stock of which is not large—is selling at 70s to 72s per cwt. Clonmel and Kilkenny, landed, 68s to 70s; Cork, 70s to 72s; and Limerick, 69s to 68s per cwt. For forward delivery, most business is doing, at steady prices. English butter firm, ... 2s per cwt. fresh, 7s to 9s 6d per dozen lbs. The best Irish bacon has advanced ... per cwt. Waterford, singed, 56s to 58s; hairy, 52s to 53s per cwt. Most other kinds of provisions support last week's prices

Tallow.—Our market is extremely flat. P.Y.C. ... the spot is selling at 38s to 38s 6d; and for forward delivery, 38s 9d per cwt. Town ... 37s to 37s 3d per cwt, net cash

Spirits.—About 600 puncheons of rum have found buyers, at full prices. Brandy and corn ... rise are quite as dear

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £3 10s to £3 15s, clover ditto, £3 15s to £5 0s; and straw, £1 8s to £1 15s per load

Wool. In all kinds the demand is to a very inactive state. In prices no change can be noted

Potatoes.—The sea-s on for old potatoes is now over. The best qualities of English have sold at 200s per ton

Hops (Friday).—Very unfavourable accounts still continue to reach us from the plantations. It is asserted that the growth of the bine will be very small this year, as the blue is in an extremely unhealthy state We however, do not place much confidence in these reports, many of which come from speculative sources. Only a limited business is doing to hops here; yet holders refuse to sell except at full prices. The duty has been as low as £80,000. Sussex pockets, £3 10s to £3 15s; Weald of Kent ditto, £4 10s to £4 4s; Mid and East ditto, £3 15s to £7 10s.

Coals (Friday).—Ouvry Boulogne, 12s 6d; Tanfield Moor, 12s 6d, Gosforth, 14s; Hetton, 13s 6d; Seymour Tees, 15s; and Tees, 16s 3d per ton.

Smithfield (Friday). The supply of beasts in to-day's market was very moderate as to number, the arrivals of part coming to hand only since noon. All trade was very dull, and scarcely enough by no means active, request, at prices about equal to those paid on Monday. The top figure for the best Scots was 3s 6d per 8lb. Sheep are very heavy and unsaleable On the whole, the mutton trade was in a very sluggish state, and last week's quotations were with difficulty supported. The extreme value of Downs was 4s per 8lb The number of lambs was somewhat extensive. Owing to the prevailing warm weather, the lamb trade was very heavy, and is some instances the currency was lowered a shilling per head. The arrivals from the Isle of Wight have nearly ceased. Calves were in good supply and fair demand, at late rates. Pigs were in good request, and fetched £3 5s to £3 8s each, including their small calf

PRICE to stink the offals: Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 4d to 2s 8d; second quality ditto, 2s 8d to 3s 10d; prime large oxen, 3s 0d to 3s 4d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 6d to 3s 8d; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 6d to 3s 4d; second quality ditto, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; prime coarse woolled ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; prime South Downs, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; large coarse calves, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; prime small ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 10d; large lambs, 5s 0d to 5s 6d; prime small porkers, 4s 8d to 4s 10d; lambs, 4s 6d to 5s 8d; sucking calves, 18s to 28s, and quarter-old store pigs, 16s to 20s each. Total supplies: beasts, 6,000; sheep and lambs, 23,800; calves, 360; pigs, 320. Foreign supplies: beasts, 82; sheep and lambs, 1,200; calves, 193. Scotch: beasts, 109; sheep, 90.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—These markets were heavy to-day, at barely stationary prices

PRICE to the carcase.—Inferior beef, 2s 8d to 2s 4d; mid. ling ditto, 2s 6d to 3s 8d, prime large ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime small ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; inferior mutton, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; prime ... 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime Scots, 3s 4d; middling ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime ditto, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; veal 3s 0d to 3s 8d; small pork, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; lamb, 4s 6d to 5s 6d.

NEW WORK BY THE AUTHOR OF "MODERN PAINTERS."
THE SEVEN LAMPS of ARCHITECTURE.
By JOHN RUSKIN, Author of "Modern Painters." Imp 8vo, with 14 Etchings by the Author. Price One Guinea, bound in embossed cloth, with top edge gilt
"The Author of this essay belongs to a class of thinkers of whom we have but few among us at present. The Seven Lamps of Architecture: we understand Mr Ruskin to mean the seven fundamental and earthly laws, the observance of, and submission to, which are indispensable to the architect who would deserve the name. The essay is calculated to supply to the architects of the day what they are most deficient in, and men of other intellectual pursuits—the public at large—to the student, the divine—will find in it ample store of instructive matter."—Examiner
"Mr. Ruskin's detail is of that vigorous and searching nature which can be satisfied with nothing less than the application of the great principles he sets. He observes and he investigates for himself, and expresses himself in a style of copious expression, which flows the mind for the fullness of meaning."—Britannia
"We find the same qualities in this essay as marked 'Modern Painters,' comprehensiveness and massiveness, great breath and volume of detail. Every lover of the beautiful should read this excellent book."—Weekly Chronicle

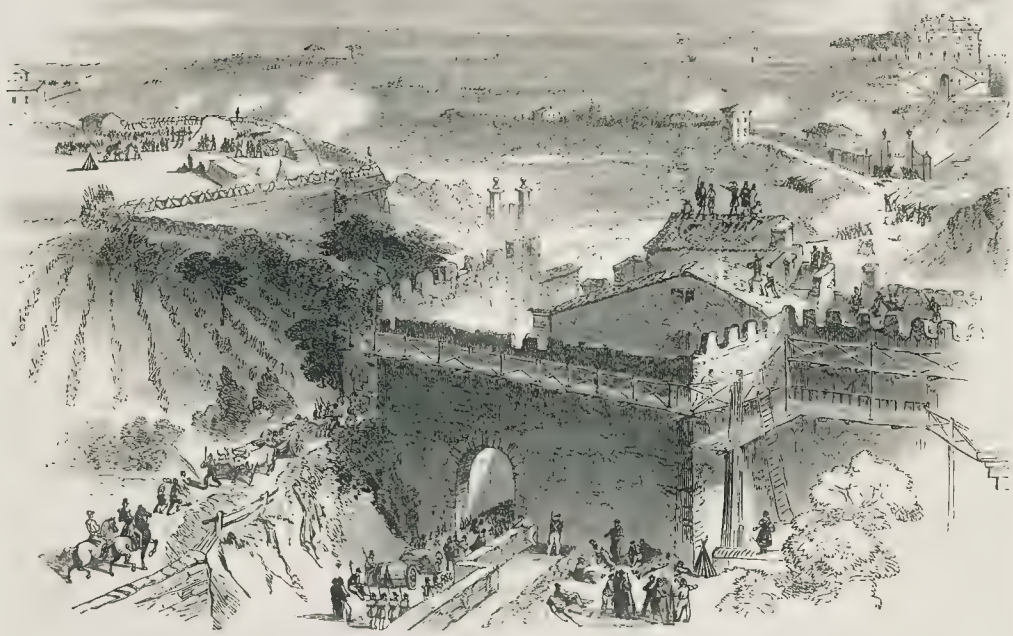
THE FRENCH ATTACK ON ROME.



ATTACK OF THE FRENCH ON THE PORTA SAN PANCRAZIA.

By aid of the Artist who is now engaged in Rome upon the Sketch for the Large Picture of that city, more fully announced elsewhere in this Number, we are enabled to present our readers with the accompanying views of the principal points of the conflict between the French and Italians, detailed in our Journal of last week. These scenes were sketches as near to the actual locality as safety would admit, and one of the hasty notes in the letter enclosing these sketches contains the significant words, "The French are firing away."—The first of the Engravings is a kind of bird's-eye view of the attack of the French on the Porta San Pancrazia, which was taken at seven o'clock on the morning of the 3rd instant. In the distance, the point leftward, under the two pine trees, is the head-quarters of General Oudinot; and the edifice to the extreme right is the Villa Corsini, taken at ten o'clock on the above day. Our Artist, writing on the 4th, says:—"The French occupied it, and the Italians firing into it, completely riddled the walls with cannon-shot the walls bristled with Italian sharp-shooters, and were fortified with bags of earth."

In the second scene the Roman Legion are entering the city, with Galetti at their head, after the taking of Velletri. In this view, the Arch of Titus and the Coliseum are prominent.—(See also page 418.)

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 378.—Vol. XIV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JUNE 30, 1849. [Sixpence.

OUR FINANCIAL POSITION.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has presented his Budget; and considerable satisfaction has been felt and expressed at the results which it exhibits. If we be not compelled by the pressure of an overwhelming misery in Ireland to be generous to that country without being just to ourselves, and if the far from over-sanguine anticipations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer be realised, we shall have the small surplus of £94,304 at the conclusion of the financial year. That sum is calculated as the probable amount of our surplus wealth on the 5th of April next ensuing. Shall it be applied towards the payment of our enormous debt in the shape of a magnificently minute dividend of one-eighth or one-ninth of a farthing in the pound; or shall taxes to that amount, affecting injuriously the health, morals, comfort, and occupations of the people be forthwith repealed? These are the questions which have already been asked, but to which any reply would be somewhat premature in this year of 1849. When we realise the surplus, it will be quite time enough to deal with it.

Yet, although, upon the whole, the Budget is a good deal more consolatory than might have been anticipated, and although we have as a nation every right to be grateful, that, amid the unparalleled disasters and convulsions of the time, we have not suffered more greatly from the political and commercial difficulties of the world, we do well to reflect that our financial condition is not what it ought to be. There is a deep and general feeling that the whole system of taxation needs revision and reform; that we are spending more than is just, prudent, or safe; that the reform of the tariff commenced by Sir Robert Peel might be carried further, both with advantage to the people and to the revenue; and that the question of direct taxation, fairly and equitably levied upon realised property, has not yet received from our statesmen, or from the public generally, the attention which it merits.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to participate in this feeling to a considerable extent, if we may judge from his speech on the introduction of the Budget. Like all other men that become Ministers of State, he does not hold out the prospect of any great economy. Nor should we be surprised at this, when we consider that out of every pound produced by taxation we pay at least eleven or twelve shillings as interest upon the debt incurred by the wars of our forefathers, and five shillings for our present defences. It is evident, therefore, that the margin left for present economy is small. But the Ministry, though - from necessity more than from predilection—no great economists, cannot be unaware of the public sentiment of dissatisfaction with our fiscal system. We trust they are not disinclined to treat the subject as a fitting opportunity with the care it demands, and with the largeness of purpose essential to its satisfactory handling. In the meantime, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, very wisely, as we think, deprecates the isolated repeal of any small, though vexatious and unjust taxes, on the faith of such a surplus as he has announced in his present Budget. It is clear, as the right honourable gentleman says, that if we are to give up any moderate amount of surplus that may be obtained in repealing some small amount of taxation, we shall never be in a condition to make any of those larger changes which would be most beneficial to the country. The subject must, in fact, be considered in its unity; and when one honourable gentleman insists upon the reduction of the tea duties as the one thing needful; when another offers a plan by which the duties on malt, hops, bricks, soap, windows, paper, and advertisements might be removed without loss to the revenue; or when another considers the tax upon attorneys as the greatest of all the grievances of our system, we can but applaud the determination of the Government in refusing to enter upon the matter in this fragmentary method. What is wanted is the master-mind that shall grapple with the subject as a whole. No partial reforms will suffice; no local alleviation will stay the national demand for a thorough reform. Finance is the touch-stone of all statesmanship in every country, and in this more especially; and it will continue to be so until some great public benefactor shall devise and carry to completion an equitable and inoppressive scheme whereby a sufficient revenue shall be raised to pay all current and necessary expenses, and provide for the gradual but certain extinction of our enormous National Debt.

The comparatively favourable state of the revenue during the current year will probably lead to the postponement of this paramount subject for awhile. But it will not, because it cannot, be lost sight of. We have increased the public debt when we ought to have diminished it: we have depended upon China money and other windfalls and irregularities to make both ends meet, when we should have depended upon ordinary revenue; and though we have abolished a few taxes, we have imposed a new one which presses very injuriously upon the doubtful incomes and precarious energies of struggling and industrious men. All this must be amended; if not during this year, in the next—if not in the next, at a remoter period, with all the disadvantages, if not the perils, which delays in matters of vital consequence are sure to entail.

Sir Robert Peel has done much as a financial reformer, which never can be undone. He has also done a great deal to create dissatisfaction; and, by placing a notoriously and admittedly unjust burden upon the shoulders of the most valuable class of the community, has impaired the national morality, as was shown in the returns of the Income and Property Tax, upon which we offered some remarks in our Journal of the 16th instant. But, notwithstanding all his faults in the latter respect, he has traced out the path which the nation must follow, if it is ever to be extricated from a vicious system. Tea duties, that enhance the price of a necessary of life to the poor, and enormously diminish consumption, must be reduced; window duties, duties upon soap, and all other taxes affecting the public health; the excise upon paper, and all other imposts operating as taxes upon knowledge; must be abolished, together with all taxes that impede commerce and trade, or clog the industry of the most industrious people in the world. In this respect, Sir Robert Peel has made a beginning. He has shewn in the path to be pursued; and, sooner or later, it will become necessary to advance along it a good deal further than we have yet gone. It will be necessary at the same time to reimpose an Income and Property Tax, and abolish the odious injustice which at present disfigures it. The true principle of an Income and Property Tax is that all realised property should be liable to it; that no various income should be valued at a less amount than income which is derived from permanent investment; and that all income should be liable. Under the present system, a man deriving £149 per annum from his investments in the Three per Cents pays no Income Tax; while the poor clerk in the Bank, or the struggling tradesman, with an income of but one pound additional, is mulcted annually of ninety shillings. Under it, the single man, with £149 per annum, goes scot-free; and the married man, with a family of half a dozen, perhaps, and only £150 a year to maintain them upon, is fleeced of a sum which might have paid his life insurance, or provided that decent apparel for himself and family which they are now obliged to forego. All this is unworthy of our character and of our civilization. It is generally conceded that the Income Tax must be permanent; but it can only be endured by being made equitable. The Government must be just to the people, or the people will take the remedy into their own hands, and either defraud the Government or nurse an animosity against it which no wise Government should provoke. Under its present operation, not only is injustice committed on the one side and dishonesty practised on the other, but a large amount of realised property is exempted from taxation, at the expense of the brains and hands of men whose wealth is their skill and their labour. In a letter from Mr. Ray Smee, of the Bank of England, to a contemporary, it is stated that from fifteen to twenty per cent. of the National Debt is untaxed, and that upwards of 1,800,000 persons, with incomes varying from £50 and £150 per annum, have been exempted from taxation at the expense of those who have more than £150. The equalization of the tax would, according to his estimate, raise an additional five millions; supported by which, a whole host of injurious taxes, affecting all classes, and especially the poorest and the most industrious, might be swept away. Favourable years, like the present, afford the best opportunities for discussing the subject. In more unprosperous years its discussion might not be so likely to lead to a fair and full comprehension of its vast importance. It is in this direction that Financial Reform must travel. The path has been indicated; and sooner or later our statesmen must look to it. The sooner they devote their whole energies to the subject, the better for their reputations and for the country.

ADDRESS FROM THE IRISH NATION TO THE SULTAN.

[illegible] Constantinople, June 5.

A few days since, Mr. O'Brien had the honour of being received by his Majesty, the Sultan, at the Imperial palace at Beglerbey. Mr. O'Brien presented to the Sultan an address, signed by the leading men of Ireland, thanking his Majesty for his generous donation of £1000 for the relief of distress in that country. It is proper that it should be known that the Sultan originally offered to send £10,000 to Ireland, as well as some ships laden with provisions. It was, however, suggested at the time, by his Majesty's Ministers, that it would not be proper for a foreign Sovereign to make so large a donation, and that £1000, which is half the sum contributed by Queen Victoria for the same purpose, would be sufficient. The money was transmitted to England by Lord Cowley, their British Minister at Constantinople, and whose conduct on that occasion deserved the praise of every Irishman.

The address presented was written upon vellum, and was in the richest and most elaborate style of illuminated engrossing.

The following is a copy of the address, which was translated into Turkish for the Sultan by Mr. Pisani, dragoman to the British Embassy.

TO HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY, ABDUL MEJID KHAN, EMPEROR OF TURKEY.

"May it please your Majesty,

"We, the undersigned noblemen, gentlemen, and inhabitants of Ireland, beg leave most respectfully to approach your Majesty, in order to testify our deepfelt thanks and gratitude for the munificent act of benevolence and attention lately displayed by your Majesty towards the suffering and afflicted inhabitants of Ireland; and to thank your Majesty, on their behalf, for the liberal contribution of £1000 lately given by your Majesty to relieve the sufferings of the Irish people.

"It had pleased Providence to deprive this country suddenly of its staple article of food, and to visit our poor people with privations such as have seldom fallen to the lot of any civilized nation to endure. In this emergency, your Majesty evinced a generous sympathy for the Irish people, thereby playing a worthy example to other great nations to assist their suffering fellow-creatures in affliction.

"For this timely and benevolent act, which [illegible] your Majesty's own subjects, but to the people of [illegible] territories which acknowledge your sway and participate in your bounty, will be saved from those privations and afflictions which it has been our unhappy destiny to endure.

The address was signed by his Grace the Primate of Ireland, the Lord High Chancellor of Ireland, the Archbishop of Dublin, the R. C. Archbishop of Dublin, the Duke of Leinster, Marquis of Ormonde, Marquis of Clanricarde, Marquis of Londonderry, Marquis of Waterford, Marquis of Headfort, Marquess of Kildare, Marquis of Sligo, the Earl of Charlemont, Earl of Cork, Earl of Fingall, Earl of Leitrim, Earl of Roden, Earl of Gosford, Earl of Caledon, Earl of Bandon, Earl of [illegible], Earl of Rosse, Earl of Erne, Lord Dunsandle and Clanconal, Lord Hamilton, Lord [illegible], Lord Monck, Sir Lucius O'Brien, General Sir Charles Napier, [illegible], Henry W. Barron, Sir R. Peckenham, Sir James Stewart, Sir G. Hodson, Franc Sadleir, Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, Pierce Mahony, High Sheriff of Dublin, Frederic Shaw, Recorder of Dublin,

In answer to this address, his Majesty the Sultan said he was greatly flattered in the manner in which the distinguished persons from whom it emanated expressed themselves towards himself and the country over which he ruled. "It gave me great pain," continued the Sultan, "when I heard of the sufferings of the Irish people. I would have done all in my power to relieve them; and I pray God that the future may be happy and prosperous and happy, and independent of the aid of other nations. In contributing to the relief of the Irish people, I only listened to the dictates of my own heart; but it was also my duty to allow my sympathy for the sufferings of a portion of the subjects of her Majesty the Queen of England, for I look upon England as the best and truest friend of Turkey."

FAMINE IN IRELAND.

A public meeting took place on Wednesday evening at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, for the purpose of hearing the statements of a deputation from Ireland, and of taking into consideration the subject of the alarming distress now prevalent in Ireland, and with a view to suggest measures for preventing its periodical recurrence. There was a very full attendance. Mr. Bright, M.P., presided; and on the platform were Colonel Dunne, M.P., Mr. Tennison, M.P., Mr. Cardwell, M.P.; Mr. O'Flaherty, M.P.; Mr. P. Scrope, M.P.; Mr. Ewart, M.P.; Mr. M'Call agh, M.P.; Mr. John O'Connell, M.P.; Mr. M. J. Blake, M.P.; Mr. Reynolds, M.P.; Rev. Dr. Hilly, &c.

The Chairman opened the proceedings with an explanatory statement. He observed that the deputation from Ireland is composed of gentlemen with whom I have had no acquaintance before this meeting was proposed, except by name. They are, I believe, connected politically with various parties, and religious with different denominations in Ireland. They are not here on what may be called vulgarly a begging expedition. (Hear, hear.) They come for a higher and more permanent object than that. They wish to state a simple fact; and simply what they know of the condition of large [illegible] of the country; and they feel assured that the wealthy and benevolent in England will be willing, as the opportunity may be afforded them, to make some contribution to that condition. They feel assured that, with the view of giving relief, in certain districts, and to a considerable portion of the population, during the short period which shall pass between the present time and the full gathering of the harvest. (Hear.) This is the time of the season when the people suffer and suffer most, it is what they call the period between the new and the old provision. For this month and the next, and a portion of the month after, there will be an accumulated suffering in Ireland. (Hear, hear.) And it is essential during that period that this laborious committee should have the support and assistance of the wealthy and benevolent in the city of London, to enable them to continue that distribution of relief which they have been so admirably collecting for some time past. (Hear, hear.) It may be said that much has been already done in Ireland, and from the resources of this country. No! it denies that. The very last people in this room to deny it will be the gentlemen of the Irish deputation. (Hear, hear.) Having recapitulated all that has been done in the way of relief, the hon. gentleman proceeded:—"This is a great deal; but it only proves the enormous, the incredible excess of the calamity we had to meet. (Hear, hear.) It was no trifling, temporary, local, or partial disorder, but a vast disease, spreading over half a nation, and involving this country and Ireland in greater exertions that probably were ever made before in the history of the world [illegible] people. (Hear, hear.) The Relief Committee is pursuing its labours in [illegible]. It has branch committees in a very large number of the distressed parishes, unions, and districts in the south and west of Ireland; the parties connected with these sub-committees are generally the Roman Catholic priests, the clergymen of the Established Church, gentlemen, and persons of every party; because party differences, with all the best people of the country, at any rate, have been swallowed up in this great calamity. (Hear, hear.) They propose to give relief especially to those of the peasantry who hold some portion of land, and who would have been unable, but for the exertions of the committee, in many cases, to cultivate it, and make preparation for the forthcoming harvest and the future year."

The members of the deputation entered into statements descriptive of the present wretched condition of the country; and then, on the motion of Mr. Ewart, M.P., the following gentlemen were nominated members of a committee to receive subscriptions and transmit them to the Corn Exchange Relief Committee:—R. Christy, Esq.; W. Alexander, Esq., M.P.; R. Cobden, Esq., M.P.; P. Scrope, Esq.; M.P.; J. Tritton, Esq., M.P.; R. Godley, Esq.; W. Bennett, Esq.; W. Ewart, Esq., M.P.; G. Gilpin, Esq.; J. Bright, Esq., M.P.

On the motion of Mr. P. Scrope, M.P., it was resolved—

That the interests of England, no less than Ireland, require that some energetic action be taken to alleviate the condition of the Irish people, and enable them to sustain themselves by the exercise of that industry which has characterised them when placed in circumstances favourable to its development; and that we are convinced that object can be materially advanced by measures and obstacles which at present impede the application of labour and capital to the soil, and will secure to the occupier the enjoyment of the fruits of his industry.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE

The abuses of the liberty of the press which have marked the journalism of the Revolutionary writers, both in Paris and the Departments, have led the Government to introduce to the Assembly a bill on the subject, which is rather of a severe and penal character.

M. Odilon Barrot, in presenting the measure on Monday, took occasion to describe the perils resulting to society from the impunity of the press, which had of late assailed them by direct appeals to violence and riot. The new law prohibits representatives of the people from being responsible editors of journals, and interdicts the opening of subscriptions to pay the fines inflicted on editors. In future, a journal suspended for provocation to civil war; and its editor sentenced to fine and imprisonment, from one month to two years, for attempting to seduce the troops from their allegiance; and to fine and imprisonment, from one month to one year, for circulating false intelligence with a view to disturb public peace. The cautionnement, or security in money, is maintained. Severe penalties are also pronounced against the writers of seditious pamphlets and publications. The bill consists of 19 articles.

The Assembly was occupied the whole of Monday and Tuesday with a debate on foreign affairs, originated by MM. Lamartine and Savoie, with a view of showing that [illegible] of the French Government was contrary to the [illegible] Constitution.

M. Odilon Barrot, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, replied to both speakers, and among other things stated that M. [illegible] had given the Pope the right to Civita Vecchia, had harangued there a meeting of insurgents in very revolutionary language, and promised them, in the name of M. Ledru-Rollin, the support of the Socialists of France. The Minister also declared that France was not in any danger of war, and that, if liberty had suffered in Germany, it was entirely owing to the conduct of the Revolutionary party itself.

The principal incident of Tuesday's discussion was the speech of General Cavaignac, who strongly advocated peace, and eulogised the English alliance. The Assembly, on a division, adopted the order of the day pure and simple, by a majority of 353 to 163, a decision in favour of the Government.

On Wednesday, M. Bovet complained of the extension of the state of siege beyond Lyons.

The Minister of the Interior replied, that the Government were fully aware of the ramifications of the anti-social conspiracy, and would have been guilty of a dereliction of duty had they not sought for increased powers to put it down. The Government would remove the state of siege as soon as it could be done with safety.

The Assembly then proceeded with the order of the day.

From Toulon we learn that a reinforcement of four batteries of artillery and two regiments of the line have been embarked for the Roman States. The steamboat Caton, which returned to Toulon from Port Vendres on the 21st instant, received orders to sail forthwith for Italy, with despatches from the Government for General Oudinot and M. de Corcelles. She sailed again from Toulon on the 23d.

ITALIAN STATES

ROME.—The accounts from the "Eternal City" are so contradictory—some representing the city as having been entered by the French amidst great slaughter on both sides; others denying the slaughter, but affirming the surrender of Garibaldi and his troops—while, again, a third declares that the French are still outside the walls, are so far and different from each other, that it is not an easy matter to ascertain the actual position of affairs. The most authentic account states, that on the 21st the French army effected three practicable breaches, and that preparations were being made for the assault.

The following telegraphic despatch, dated Toulon, the 23rd inst., half-past 2 P.M., addressed to the French Government, confirms that intelligence, and communicates an additional item of news:—

"ADMIRAL THEHOUART TO THE MINISTER OF MARINE.

"Gulf of [illegible], June 23. "CIVITA VECCHIA, June 23.

"General Oudinot writes

"'From the trenches, June 22, 2 o'clock A.M.

"'The assault took place last night at 11 o'clock. Three columns have penetrated by the breaches on the bastions Nos 6 and 7, and the curtain which unites them. The troops marched with resolution, and have carried the positions without much loss. Up to the present moment, the enthusiasm (bon hospitalité) has received only two captains and eight or ten men. The gabions established at the gorge of the two bastions are much advanced, and the positions will be secured before daylight. In a word, the operations are altogether satisfactory.'

Somewhat later intelligence adds that on the French entering the breach, a second wall was discovered within the ramparts, of amazing thickness, which, it was said, General Oudinot would find it almost impossible to destroy. The Romans work night and day in throwing up fortifications; and General Oudinot seems to have met with a more formidable resistance than he had ever calculated upon.

So far with respect to the capital of the Papal States. In the provinces, we find that Ancona surrendered to the Austrians on the 18th after a well-sustained bombardment. The conditions of the capitulation are—a political amnesty for the inhabitants, the dissolution of the corps forming the present garrison, and the occupation of the fortress and of the port of Ancona by the Imperial troops in the name of his Holiness the Pope. The port of Ancona has been effectually blockaded by ships of war of the Austrian and Neapolitan Marines, preventing officially all measure to the French Chargé d'Affaires at Vienna, added, that the sole object of the Austrian Government is to re-establishment of the Pontifical authority, and that the blockade shall be raised when that object shall have been effected.

The Municipal council of Bologna has sent a deputation to Gaëta to express to the Holy Father the sentiments of fidelity and submission towards him on the part of the population as also their desire for the maintenance of constitutional institutions. Nearly all the towns in the Romagna and the Marches intend presenting addresses to the Pope.

VENICE.—His devoted city of the waves still holds out against its Austrian besiegers. Assistance was expected from Hungary, and it was said that a letter from Kossuth to Manin (the Provisional Dictator) had been received, informing his regret that he could not send assistance to Venice so speedily as he wished. But assuring him he would do all he best to send relief as soon as possible, and fighting at the same time a force of 2,000,000 florins (about 5,000,000*l.*) to the Venetian Government.

PIEDMONT.—It [illegible] only with the treaty entered into between both powers, that hostilities [illegible], on the 20th instant, the citadel of Alessandria. They [illegible] however, occupied the territory of Valenza, which is not included in the [illegible] tion of the armistice, and commands that point a force of 6000 men, which renders them absolute masters of the entire valley of the Tanaro.

GERMAN STATES.

BADEN AND BAVARIA. The general actions were fought between the Prussians under the command of the Prince of Prussia and General Peuchner, and the insurgents under Mieroslawski, on the 21st instant and three succeeding days. The insurgents, when attacked, were entrenched on the banks of the Neckar. They were entirely routed. Manheim and Heidelberg are taken. Mieroslawski and the remnant of his army have taken flight towards the line of mountains on the borders of the Grand Duchy of Baden. The Free Corps have dispersed in the country. A counter-revolution is stated to have driven the insurgents from Carlsruhe.

WURTEMBURG.—The "Rump" Frankfort Parliament has been expelled from Stuttgardt by the Wurtemburg Government.

AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY

Accounts from the seat of war state that a series of actions between the combined Imperial forces and the Hungarians commenced on Georgey, terminated, on the 21st instant, by the defeat of the Hungarians. The battle is stated to have taken place at Galantha, and General Georgey's forces are quoted at 40,000 men, with 60 pieces of artillery. The Austrians were commanded by the Austrian General Wohlgemuth and the Russian General Paninith. It is added that the Hungarians were forced to recross the Waag on all points.

This news comes through Vienna, and requires confirmation, as it is the Austrian version.

The four Russian corps which have entered Hungary, by way of Dukla, Komuna, Grab, and Jasy, amount to 144,000 men.

RUSSIA.

We have from Warsaw, under date of the 23rd instant, the announcement of the arrival of his Majesty the Czar in the capital of his Polish provinces. The Czar was accompanied by the Counts Orloff and Adlerberg.

There prevails great mortality among the Russian troops at Kalish. No less than 1000 soldiers died within the fourteen days preceding the above date.

PORTUGAL

There has been a change of Ministry at Lisbon. The new cabinet is composed of the Conde de Thomar, Home Department, Conde de Tojal, Foreign Affairs; Avilla, Finance; Felix Pereira de Magelhaens, Justice; Ferrari, War; Fortida, Marine.

The ex-King of Sardinia, Charles Albert, lies dangerously ill. He has refused the Queen's invitation to Lisbon, and says he will never go to any Court again.

UNITED STATES.

By the Roy. Mail Steam-ship Niagara we have accounts this week to the 13th inst. from New York.

There is little news of interest by this arrival.

The cholera was the great subject of universal concern in the country. It had made its appearance in all quarters, though nowhere with much violence. In the city of New York there had been 257 cases and 122 deaths during the week ending the steamer's departure. Ex-President Polk had been attacked by the epidemic at his residence near Nashville. The veteran General Gaines had died at it at New Orleans on the 8th instant.

The Indian depredations in Southern Texas were continued. The flood at New Orleans remained unchecked; the water continuing to rise, and all attempts to arrest its inroads having been abandoned.

There is also by the latter news from California. The United States ship Lexington had reached New York from San Francisco on the 10th inst., bringing 1218 lb. of gold.

CANADA.

There is nothing new from this quarter. The effect in Canada of the decisive and unanimous support which Lord Elgin's administration finds from the Sovereign, public opinion, and the press at home, tends to the restoration of order and authority.

The Governor-General intends passing the summer at Beaumont, below Quebec.

INDIA.

Advices in anticipation of the overland mail have been received at Bombay in the week. The dates are, Calcutta, May 9, and Bombay, May 12. The only intelligence worth notice in the intelligence thus conveyed is the reappearance of the missing Rajah Dhuleep Chunder Kooroo, the mother of Dhuleep Singh, late Maharajah of the Punjaub, who, having been removed from Benares to Chunar for safe custody, had, on the night of the 18th of April, contrived to make her escape from the Chunar Fortress, and after ten days made her appearance in Nepaul, having travelled 300 miles in the disguise of a pilgrim through the most populous parts of Bengal. On announcing her arrival, all she asked for from the Court was leave to live at Jung.

A second arrival, by extraordinary express, which reached town on Thursday evening, brings intelligence to the 8th of May from Calcutta, and the last from Bombay. The only fact of any serious importance contained in the papers are, the reported surrender of the Ranee to the British authorities by the Court of Nepaul, and the final suppression of the insurrection in the Nizam's dominions, together with the capture of the pretended Appa Sahib.

From Calcutta we learn that Sir C. Napier reached that place on Sunday, the 6th of May, and disembarked about half-past three o'clock in the afternoon, under a salute from the fort guns.

Sir Charles was sworn in on the 7th, in the usual manner, and took his seat, in accordance with his appointment, as Extraordinary Member of the Council of India.

CHINA

Matters in this distant quarter look as if we were likely to have a quarrel with the Chinese again. Accounts from Hong-Kong to the 30th of April state that entrance to the city of Canton has been refused us, the Emperor declining to carry out the stipulation of the treaty, which provided for the admission of subjects at the close of two years from the 26th of April, 1847.

The Governor has directed that no British subjects shall for the present attempt to enter the city, and most of the vessels of war that had assembled here have sailed for other stations.

Preparations for resistance have been made on the part of the Chinese.

Sir George Bonham assumed charge of his duties as Consul at Canton on the 13th of April.

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

FLEETWOOD, PRESTON, AND WEST RIDING JUNCTION.—June 27: Adjourned Special Meeting: Preston Town Hall, C. B. Addison in the chair.—The report from the committee of investigation was received. When this line is joined with the Lancaster and Preston and Preston and Wyre, the receipts it is believed will meet the interest liabilities, and also yield a revenue. Payment of all arrears is to be enforced immediately. The directors were complimented for their management and the correctness of their published accounts.

MR. WORDSWORTH headed a deputation of shareholders of the SOUTH DEVON (representing £153,000 of bonds becoming due), who seek, with the aid of the directors, to improve the general prospects of the company.

WEAVER.—June 27: Witnag: Leeds: Mr. G. Leeman in the chair. The chairman introduced the outlines of the Dissolution Bill (which we noticed last week), and the meeting determined to petition Parliament in its favour. The directors resolved to abstain from making any call, or in any way attempting to proceed with the line; and a committee is to be appointed to confer with the board as to the liabilities and accounts of the company. All the shareholders present appeared to agree to an abandonment of the line.

NORFOLK.—A special meeting of the proprietors in this company was held at the Shire-hall, Gaol-hill, Norwich, on the 26th inst.—A. D. F. Esq., in the chair—to consider the bill now before Parliament, for the amalgamation of this company with the Eastern Counties Company. The chairman having moved a resolution approving of the bill, Mr. Peto entered into a long statement to show that, should the Eastern Counties Company [illegible] there was some reason to believe they might do—attempt to upset the agreement for amalgamation, and disapprove of the bill. The Eastern Counties were in a position to carry on the working of their own line profitably. He stated that by their agreement with the Eastern Counties Company they had undertaken to complete the line for £2,330,000; and, including the Lowestoft and branch to Fakenham, the total cost would be £2,333,748, or nearly £70,000 within the estimate. The committee of investigation of the Eastern Counties Company had reported to be the average half-yearly dividend on the Eastern Counties Company [illegible] Eastern Counties Directors had also shown [illegible] cradle of £30,000 in-a-year; on the Eastern [illegible] to their own dividend of 2½ per cent, they had £50,000 [illegible] carry, which if they were working independently, they could transfer to [illegible] and see what they could get for it. He [illegible] shareholders of that company to confirm the agreement, and, at considerable length, [illegible] propriety of working all lines by contract under the superintendence of three or four able directors, who should be sent out yearly [illegible] them to give their time to a proper development of the resources of the line. After some discussion the amalgamation bill was approved, and a vote of thanks given to the chairman.

In the dissolution of the LONDON AND BIRMINGHAM EXTENSION, viâ NORTHAMPTON, DAVENTRY, LEAMINGTON, AND WARWICK, Mr. H. Croysdill of Old Jewry, was appointed official manager. There are Liabilities amounting to £10,000.

In the dissolution of the BRIGHTON, LEWES, AND HASTINGS, Mr. H. J. Norris, of Gower-street, was appointed official manager. The Liabilities are £700, out of £4,700 unpaid on deposit, only £346 were paid.

In the dissolution of the NORTHAMPTON, LINCOLN, AND HULL Direction, Mr. W. C. Spiller was appointed official manager. The liabilities are nearly £1,000.

In the dissolution of the WORCESTER, TENBURY, AND LUDLOW, Mr. A. K. Baker was appointed official manager. Captain Richardson, as our readers may remember, was prosecuted for forging [illegible] on Coutts's bank, by which he gained £5000 of the depositors.

The great hollow Girder Bridge, of the MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE, across the Trent, at Gainsborough, was fixed in its place, on Saturday, some time as the floating of the Britannia Bridge took place. Designed by Mr. Fowler, and constructed by Messrs. Fairbairn, of Manchester, it is of the largest dimensions yet executed of that construction. It differs from the Britannia and Conway bridges in this respect, that instead of the tubes running through the inside of the tube, the girders form the parapets of the bridge, and the roadway is supported by transverse wrought-iron hollow beams, also of the tubular construction.

During the week the Royal assent (the last step in Parliamentary sanction) has been given to the bills for the Universal Railway Gauntry Company; Bedford and Reigate (branch to London and South-Western); Chester and Holyhead (increase of capital, with powers to the London and North-Western to subscribe); Leeds and Thirsk (increase of capital, with powers to the London and North-Western to subscribe); London and South-Western (extension of time for the purchase of lands and completion of works on the Basingstoke and Salisbury and Farnham and Alton lines); [illegible] Bridgend, and Portcawl receipts, £8,348 per quarter. Accounts for goods, £ 741, [illegible] open and used by the public, 5079.

ELECTION FOR THE CITY OF LONDON.—The writ for the election of a member to serve in Parliament for the City of London was received by the Sheriffs on Thursday morning. At two o'clock Mr. Sheriff and Alderman John Mr. Undersheriff Shearman, and Mr. Secondary Potter, appeared on the hustings, in the Guildhall, when the writ having been read by Mr. Harker, Mr. Alderman Finnis stated that the sheriffs would proceed to the nomination at each section of a fit and discreet citizen to serve in Parliament for the City of London, on Monday next, the 2nd of July, at eleven for twelve of the clock at noon precisely, and in the event of a poll being demanded the poll will be opened the following day.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH SPAIN.

The Earl of ABERDEEN inquired if there were any prospect of a speedy renewal of our diplomatic and friendly relations with the Spanish Government. The noble Earl remarked that it was more than a year since our diplomatic relations with the Court of Madrid had been abruptly terminated, under circumstances of indignity to the representative of her Britannic Majesty. Every Government possessed the power to dismiss an Ambassador at its Court, but he did not think that the Spanish Government was justified in its dismissal of Sir H. Bulwer. However, that question of personality and hatred which distinguished her Majesty's Foreign Office at present, and which had been attended with so many mischievous results, had not, on the Spanish Government strong grounds for suspicion. But, as he understood the Spanish Government had expressed a desire to make any reparation consistent with Spanish honour, he could not see any difficulty in the way of an accommodation. The question rested altogether between the two Governments. Sir H. Bulwer had received the approbation of his Government, had obtained honours, and another diplomatic employment. The Spanish Government had taken the first step by slighting our communications upon rather favourable terms; and he (Lord Aberdeen) would venture to predict, that, should the same Government remain in power, they would make a satisfactory arrangement with the English bondholders. But that arrangement would, of course, depend on ourselves.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE said that no justification, and no reparation, supplied or not ample, had up to that moment been offered by the Spanish Government for the dismissal of Sir H. Bulwer. Last year her Majesty's Government had accepted the good offices of the King of the Belgians in this matter; but, notwithstanding various communications had passed, the King of the Belgians had not yet received any formal declaration from the Spanish Government that he could feel himself justified in recommending to the acceptance of the British Government. Although Sir H. Bulwer had obtained another appointment, it was still necessary that not only the honour of this country, but the personal honour of that gentleman, should be satisfied. Whenever the Government of Spain should think fit to offer reparation through the King of the Belgians, her Majesty's Government would give it their best consideration. With respect to the new Spanish tariff, it was a wise policy adopted by Spain on the most significant of all remonstrances—the remonstrance of the smuggler.

The Marquis of LONDONDERRY moved for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the advantages or disadvantages of changing the Post-office packet station and communication between Portpatrick and Donaghadee.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE opposed the motion.

After a brief debate the motion was withdrawn; but Lord LONDONDERRY gave notice that he would on a future day move an address to the Crown on the subject.

On the motion of Lord CAMPBELL, the Encumbered Estates (Ireland) Bill went through comm ittee pro forma.

The Grand Jury Cess (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

TRANSPORTATION FOR TREASON BILL.

Sir G. GREY moved the third reading of the Transportation for Treason (Ireland) Bill.

Mr. NAPIER opposed the bill, and moved, as an amendment, that it be read a third time that day three months.

A short discussion ensued, in which Col. Rawdon, Mr. Spooner, Sir G. Grey, Mr. S. Crawford, and Mr. Reynolds took part, and the House divided. For the third reading, 159; against it, 37: majority for the third reading, 132

The bill was read a third time

Mr. ANSTEY then moved that the words "imprisonment during the Queen's pleasure, or banishment," be substituted for the word "transportation."

On a division there were—For Mr Anstey's amendment, 21; against it, 146: majority against the amendment, 125.

The bill then passed.

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) BILL.

The House went into Committee on the Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill; and on the clause for establishing a maximum rate being put,

Mr. FERGUSON pointed to the fact that the experiment of a maximum rate in England had entirely failed, and felt himself bound to take the sense of the House ag ainst the clause.

Mr. O'DONNELL suggested that a 2s. 6d. maximum was enough; and if there was a deficiency after that, then let it be supplied from the imperial treasury.

Mr. HORSMAN, in a speech which was loudly cheered, condemnatory of past legislation for Ireland, said all history told them that there was nothing so fatal as the recast of bad legislation, and they might depend upon it that the Irish difficulty would not be got rid of by putting it out of sight for a year. He must say that Parliament even now, if possessed with a due sense of its responsibility with regard to Ireland, had an opportunity of remedying the existing evils. If this were not done, the greatest opportunity which had occurred for years was afraid without affording so excellent an opportunity of dealing with them hereafter.

Lord J. RUSSELL replied to the arguments raised in opposition to the clause, expressing his belief that by imposing this maximum they would make the Poor-Law more efficacious than it otherwise would be, as it would operate as a direction of capital to the cultivation of the land; he therefore trusted the committee would adopt it.

After explanations between Mr. Horsman, Lord John Russell, and Mr. C. Lewis, and speeches from Mr. H. Drummond, Mr. R. M. Fox, Mr Monsell, Mr. S. Rocke, Colonel Dunne, Mr. Spooner, and Sir A. Brooke, the committee rejected the clause by a majority of 197, the numbers being 78 to 51; after which the House resumed.

Mr. HAWES withdrew the Australian Colonies Bill, in consequence of an informality, and ordered leave to bring in a fresh bill.

The Juvenile Offenders, &c., Bill, after a short discussion, was read a second time

Adjourned at a quarter past one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

ROYAL COMMISSION.

The Royal Assent was given by commission to the Navigation Bill, the Transportation for Treason (Ireland) Bill, and a great many other bills.

PARLIAMENTARY OATHS (JEWS') BILL.

The Earl of CARLISLE moved the second reading of the Parliamentary Oaths Bill, the intentions and provisions of which he explained at length. He admitted that that portion of the measure which related to the oath proposed to be rendered to members of the Jewish persuasion was the most important, and indeed the first and principal object of the bill. He considered it at the root of the whole measure, and of the arguments by which it was defended, lay in the principle that in no case ought civil disqualification to be attached to religious opinions. He was of opinion that the above admissions were lyrel vant, absurd, and obsolete: and he knew that some members of their Lordships' House were prevented from taking their seats—he named Lord Clonearty as an example—because they could not conscientiously make the oath required of them. The noble Earl in a florid and poetical address, called on their Lordships to remove this last remnant of intolerance from the statute book, and thus to crown the just measure of retribution for all the wrongs of the past.

The Earl of EGLINTON objected to the bill on political grounds, but especially for religious reasons.

The Duke of CLEVELAND avowed that he had changed opinion—which, were the great political apostasy of 1846, was nothing so direful: but the reasons which inclined him formerly to oppose the admission of Jews to Parliament no longer existed, or were greatly mitigated. We had since admitted Jews to civil and highly important offices; we had likewise admitted Quakers to the Legislature; and, therefore, he thought that we were bound in justice to go further, and admit the Jews to Parliament. We had, perhaps, advanced too far; but, in the present spirit of the times, we should, if we did anything, advance—retrogression being out of the question.

The Archbishop of CANTERBURY thought that the circumstances of the last year furnished reasons for considering the present a season peculiarly improper for making such a change as that proposed. The distinct spirit and aim of the bill, as acknowledged, was to lower the qualification of members of both Houses of Parliament—to declare that a Jew was equally fitted as a Christian for all the most important functions of legislation. The most rev. prelate proceeded to point out the dangers to religion, and the religious character of Parliament, that would flow from admission of Jews, and he warned their Lordships to pause before assenting to this bill

The Archbishop of DUBLIN said the question was, whether the electors should be left to decide upon the person to represent them, or whether their hands should be tied up by Parliament. He considered that the electors should be left unfettered to choose whomsoever they pleased. He firmly believed that the existence of Christianity was not a stigma on the laws, but a stigma on our own religion. He contended that we should either retrace our steps and exclude all who did not conform to the Established Church, or remove this last barrier to the perfect equality of the Jews.

The Bishop of EXETER condemned the bill, as well for the mock principle, which was unsound, and put forward with the hope of catching a few stray votes, as for its real object. He denounced it as a scheme devised to entrap their Lordships unawares to repeal the Bill of Rights, which would be effected by abrogating the oath now in force. The right rev. Prelate earnestly entreated their Lordships to reject the bill.

The Earl of SHREWSBURY so far objected to the bill, that while its principle was to emancipate the Jew, it at the same time would restrict the Roman Catholic. According to its enactments, the Dissenter, the Quaker, or the Jew would be regarded as more trustworthy than the Roman Catholic. Should their Lordships go into committee on the bill, it was his intention to move that the oath proposed to be tendered to Jews, &c., should be extended to Roman Catholics, thus placing all on the same footing. Should the distinction be maintained, he, for one, should refuse to sit on such terms. The noble Earl supported the second reading.

The Earl of WINCHELSEA gave to the bill his strenuous opposition.

The Duke of ARGYLL supported it. He did not think it possible to secure the Christian character of Parliament by any oaths

The Earl of NELSON opposed it.

The Earl of WICKLOW was anxious to admit Jews to Parliament; but he was more anxious to see the parliamentary oaths altered. Therefore he supported the bill, and felt much satisfied at the manner in which it was framed. He thought that those noble Lords who objected to the Jew clause might vote for the second reading with the view of striking out the objectionable clause in committee

The Earl of DERBY trusted that their Lordships would at once reject the bill, without being influenced by any quibbling ideas about altering it in committee. It was to the principle of the bill that he was opposed, and that their Lordships were opposed last year, when they threw out a similar measure.

The Bishop of OXFORD opposed the bill in an eloquent speech. He considered that there was an especial danger at the present time in increasing the money power in the House of Commons, separated from those other influences that modified its action

Lord BROUGHAM supported the bill.

The Earl of CARLISLE closed the debate, and their Lordships divided:—For the second reading of the bill: contents, present, 70; non-contents—present, 85: majority against the bill, 15.

Proxies were not used on the division. The bill was therefore lost.—Adjourned at a quarter to one o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

THE IRISH POLITICAL CONVICTS.

The House met at noon

Sir G. GREY, in reply to a question from Sir Lucius O'Brien, stated that orders having been sent out in the usual manner to convey the Irish state prisoners to their destination, other arrangements had been made for their transport.

Sir LUCIUS O'BRIEN expressed his thanks to the Government for their humanity, and remarked that, though he had voted on some divisions against the Transportation for Treason (Ireland) Bill, he should offer no further opposition to the course of justice, and he sincerely hoped that such occurrences as those which had taken place in Ireland would never be repeated.

POOR RELIEF BILL (IRELAND)

The House went into committee on the Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill, and continued discussing the clauses till four o'clock, when the chairman reported progress, and the House adjourned to half-past five o'clock

GUIANA.

At the resumed sitting,

Mr. HUME inquired if the Government had received a despatch from British Guiana, containing the information that Governor BARKLY had brought in a bill to change the constitution of the Court of Policy, by extending the suffrage, and if the governor had the power so to change the constitution of the Court of Policy?

Lord J. RUSSELL answered that it was true that Governor BARKLY had, following the example of other persons at home, brought in a bill for the extension of the suffrage in British Guiana, but he could not say, without taking time for consideration, whether the governor had the power so to change the constitution of the Court of Policy.

Mr. MACKINNON gave notice that he would on Tuesday draw attention to the report of the committee on Smithfield Market.

COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

Sir W. MOLESWORTH moved that an address be presented to her Majesty praying for the appointment of a commission to inquire into the administration of her Majesty's colonies, possessions, with the view to removing the causes of colonial complaint, of diminishing the cost of colonial government, and of giving free scope to individual enterprise in the business of colonising

Mr. HUME seconded the motion.

Mr. HAWES regarded the plan shadowed forth in the hon. baronet's speech as impracticable and delusive, and calculated to excite expectations in the colonies that would be disappointed. The hon. Under-Secretary opposed the motion.

Mr. GLADSTONE thought that the time had come when something in furtherance of the course of policy recommended by Sir W. Molesworth should be attempted. The right hon. gentleman supported the motion

Mr. LABOUCHERE opposed the motion.

Mr. ADDERLEY and Mr. F. SCOTT spoke in favour of it.

Lord J. RUSSELL said that such a commission to enquire into so many and different details would be impracticable. He could not consent to it.

The House divided:—For the motion, 89; against it, 163: majority against the motion, 74.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the Act for the more speedy Recovery of Small Debts and Demands in England, and to abolish certain offices of courts of record.

Adjourned at a few minutes past one o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House assembled at noon, and sat till six o'clock.

NEW WRIT FOR LONDON.

A new writ was, on the motion of Mr. J. A. SMITH ordered to be issued for the City of London, in the room of Baron RICHARD, who has accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

PRISON DISCIPLINE.

The adjourned debate on Mr. C. PEARSON'S motion for leave to bring in a bill for the reform of prison discipline was resumed by Mr BROTHERTON.

Sir H. HALFORD enforced the utility of the separate system. The honourable Baronet moved, as an amendment, that a select committee be appointed to inquire into the prison discipline of England and Wales

Mr. Frewen, Mr. Alderman Sidney, Lord Mahon, Mr. B. Denison, Mr. Harris, Mr. R. Palmer, Sir G. Grey, and several other gentlemen addressed the House.

Mr. PEARSON'S motion, and Sir H. HALFORD'S amendment, were ultimately withdrawn.

INSOLVENT MEMBERS.

On the motion of Mr. MOFFATT, the House went into Committee on the Bankrupt and Insolvent Members Bill.

Mr. WYNN pointed out the dangerous course the House was pursuing in the matter, by proceeding by bill instead of resolution. If they sought to attain the object in view by means of a bill, they would submit their privilege to the House of Lords; and should they afterwards desire to alter the rule, they could not do so without the assent of the other branch of the Legislature. The right hon. gentleman suggested, that, should the House resolve to proceed at all, it should proceed by resolution.

Mr. LAW supported this suggestion, and, in order to give time to Mr. Moffatt to look up his case, and frame a resolution in accordance with his desire, moved that the Chairman report progress.

After a short conversation, progress was reported.

Mr. FREWEN moved the second reading of the Benefices in Plurality Bill, with the view to have it amended

Sir G. GREY recommended the withdrawal of the bill and the introduction of a new one, as the most convenient and convenient course

Mr. FREWEN adopt ed that advice, and withdrew the bill.

On the motion of Mr. HAWES, the General and Quarter Sessions Bill went through committee, with amendments.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

ILLNESS OF THE LORD CHANCELLOR.

Lord BROUGHAM, after stating that certain returns be made from the Court of Chancery, declared that no possible inconvenience had arisen, or could arise, from the absence of the Lord Chancellor; and he begged to ask whether that state of things would not go on one day more than he felt himself equal to do. He remembered [illegible] occasion, Lord [illegible] for three days.

Lord LANGDALE could not agree in opinion with his noble and learned friend that no inconvenience had arisen from the absence of the Lord Chancellor; but he suggested that during the short absence of the Lord Chancellor a commission might be issued to perform temporarily the functions of the Great Seal.

Lord CAMPBELL said that in former times nothing was more common than for the Lord Chancellor during his absence abroad, or during his indisposition, to hand over the seal to a Vice-Chancellor, who performed the functions of his office.

The subject then dropped.

FRENCH EXPEDITION AGAINST ROME.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE, in reply to the Earl of Aberdeen and Lord Stanley, stated that her Majesty's Government had not taken, for or received from the French Government any information as to their future course towards Rome, or any explanation of the grounds on which they based their proceedings of siege and bombardment.

The Incumbered Estates (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr OSBORNE said a return had been laid on the table of the House, by which it would appear that, instead of the estimate of the expenses necessary for completing them was now given as two millions and a half. He begged to ask whether that sum of two millions and a half included the new ventilation, and furnishing, and fitting-up of the House of Commons, and the Speaker's and clerks' houses; and whether it included the expense of the new gallery about to be erected in the House of Lords?

Mr. GREENE said the estimate did not include the new gallery in the House of Lords, but he understood the whole of the return in question included all the other matters to which the hon. member adverted. There was a sum of about £5000, he thought, for machinery, which was not included.

Mr. OSBORNE asked if he was to understand if the furnishing was included.

Mr. GREENE replied that it included the furnishing of the House and of the Committee-rooms

Mr. OSBORNE, seeing now the noble Lord at the head of the Government in his place, would ask him when he would bring the estimate on for the consideration of Parliament

Lord JOHN RUSSELL said he would bring it on in the week after next.

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) BILL.

The House having gone into committee on this bill, was engaged the rest of the evening in discussing the various clauses.

Adjourned.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

MILITARY COMMAND IN CANADA.—In consequence of the lamented death of Sir Benjamin D'Urban, G.C.B., late Commander of the Forces in Canada, the opportunity has been taken to reduce the military establishment in British North America. The command has been divided, and the highest Military rank in the Province of Canada, Lieut. General Sir John Harvey, will command the troops in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, receiving additional pay, as he holds also the situation of Civil Governor of Nova Scotia. Major-General Rowan will receive the local rank of Lieut.-General on the Staff, and succeed to the command in the Canadas. The effect of these arrangements will be a saving of the difference between the pay of Commander of the Forces and a Lieutenant-General on the Staff, and a reduction entirely of a Lieutenant-General, which all has staff, as soon as these arrangements take effect, making a saving to the public of nearly £3000 a year.

ROYAL ARSENAL, WOOLWICH.—The public will learn with satisfaction that the restriction which was made of admission to view the grounds of the Royal Arsenal, on the announcement of the meeting of the Chemical Association common, on the 10th of April, 1848, was removed last week; now visitors to Woolwich will now be allowed to go over the grounds upon giving their names at the gate, where they will receive a card specifying the number of their party, and pointing out the best mode of going over this extensive naval and military depôt without interfering with the duties of the persons in her Majesty's employment and on the public service.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS

MR. ROUNDELL PALMER

THE House of Commons does not number amongst its professional members one who brings to the discussion of Parliamentary questions a clearer or more enlightened intellect than the hon. and learned gentleman who sits for Plymouth (Mr. R. Palmer).

He is not a very frequent speaker, though few measures of real importance are disposed of without eliciting a full and explicit expression of opinion from him; and on these occasions he seldom fails to sustain the reputation for distinguished talent which he well earned during his collegiate career. He received his early education at Winchester, and subsequently entered Oxford University, where he became a Scholar of Trinity College, and afterwards a Fellow of Magdalene College. He obtained first class honours in classics, two Chancellor's prizes for Latin verse and Latin essay, Newdegate's prize for Eng lish verse, and Johnson's Scholarship, and the Eldon Law Scholarship. In 1837 he was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn.

He was first returned to Parliament in 1847, for Plymouth, and is that on the same members of the House. So far, however, as his legislatorial career has hitherto been, it has been somewhat to warrant large expectations from the future from him in that respect One of the most successful efforts which he has as yet made in addressing the House was on a recent occasion when Mr. Smart Worsley's bill to legalise a marriage with a deceased wife's sister was under discussion. A few evenings Mr Palmer spoke against the bill. He reviewed the [illegible] historical, and social point of view; and, in a speech [illegible] elicited the admiration of the House, as well by the great research and learning which he displayed in matters pertaining to ecclesiastical and civil law, and also the usage of the Christians, as by the close logic and force of reasoning and which he embraced the supporters of the measure, and sustained his own position of opposition to it. It is to be regretted that, owing to its [illegible] length, and the late hour at which it was delivered, the speech was not fully reported. From an extract or two, however, it may be seen what the character of it was. Referring to the Scriptural argument on the subject, he said—"The Jewish authority had been called in to settle the question, but in the New Testament they received a warning against receiving the opinions of the Jews upon their own law. Therefore, Christian men could not govern themselves by Jewish notions in opposit on to the universal opinion which had prevailed in the Christian church; and the marriage now in question had never been sanctioned except to be reprobated in canons, by councils, and by individual fathers of the church. In the fourth century, St. Basil, being written to on the subject, was struck with horror at having the question put to him. The traditions of the Christian church were all consistent on the subject, it having been always held that the marriage with the wife's sister was prohibited by the law of God. One main difficulty in dealing with the argument derived from ecclesiastical history on this subject arose out of the circumstance that the early church incorporated the canonical prohibitions most of the Levitical degrees, and which, according to the agreement of all, were not at present binding; but Thomas Aquinas, the divines, and the Popes, drew the line between the Leviticdegrees and those beyond them, holding the first to be intrinsically and immutably evil, and that the power of dispensation did not apply to the former, which included the wife's sister."

His concluding remarks were directed to the social inconvenience likely to result from the adoption of the measure—"To place a sister-in-law in the same position as a first cousin would be, he contended, be a cruel privation. There were many men who could entertain no desire to marry a sister-in-law, and, taking into account the vast disproportion between them and those who did feel such a desire, he repeated that no society could be greater than that estrangement between those near relations which must be the necessary consequence of the passing of such a measure. Their first cousins would not do it now, unless they had reached an age when they would put all such considerations out of the case. The effect of their law would be to put sisters-in-law in the same situation as first cousins, and thus prevent that pleasant domestic intercourse with them which now existed. He contrasted the House in give effect to these objections, objections entertained upon such strong grounds, and corroborated by all the authority and antiquity of the Christian church to respect the feelings and wishes of the women of England, 11,000 of whom had petitioned the Queen not to assent to this bill, and who now implored them not to violate the purity of domestic retirement and the sanctity of their homes."

Mr Roundell Palmer is the second son of the Rev. William Jocelyn Palmer, of Maxbury, in Oxfordshire, by a daughter of the late Rev. William Roundell, of Gledstone, in Yorkshire. He was born at Maxbury, in 1812, and married last year the Lady Laura, second daughter of Earl Waldegrave. In politics he is an old-fashioned gentleman is a "Liberal Conservative:" he is in favour of the existence of Free Trade, and is opposed to the endowment of the Roman Catholic Clergy.

BOLSOVER CASTLE.

THIS fine old place has just been the scene of great festivity, to celebrate the birth-day of his Grace the Duke of Portland, who, on the 24th inst., attained his 81st year.

Bolsover is a populous village on the eastern verge of Derbyshire, upon the county of Nottingham, and a short distance from Chesterfield. The Castle occupies the plain of a rocky hill, that rises abruptly from the meadows. The building is of great extent, and, from its elevated situation, is a landmark for the surrounding country.

It never has been the subject of [illegible] since the date of the Civil War, all traces of the siege having been [illegible] almost disappeared. At the [illegible] survey it belonged to William [illegible] Deincourt, in the reign of [illegible] remained for [illegible] King John, when it came into the possession of Robert [illegible] Castle, and held it against the rebellious barons; or, if he could not make it tenable, he demolished it, that, no doubt, was the period when the fortifications, which are yet visible about Bolsover, were established.

In the long and tumultuous reign of Henry III. the Castle still retained its consequence. William [illegible] Earl Ferrars had the government of it for six years: afterwards it had eleven different governors in less than ten years. In the reign of Henry VII. it was the property of Thomas Howard, the first Duke of Norfolk. In the calendar of his estate, the Castle escheated to the Crown. Shortly afterwards it was granted to Sir John Byron for life by Queen Elizabeth, and, Gilbert Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, was the owner of Bolsover. In the year 1613 he sold it to Sir Charles Cavendish, whose eldest son, William, was the first Duke of Newcastle, a personage of great eminence during the troubles of his time, and in high favour at court. He was sincerely attached to his royal master, King Charles the First, whom he entertained at Bolsover Castle on three different occasions, in a style of princely magnificence. On the king's second visit here, where he was accompanied by his queen, upwards of £10,000 were spent on the Castle. The Duchess of Newcastle, in her Life of the Duke, her husband, says: "The Earl employed Ben Jonson in fitting up such scenes and speeches as he could devise; and sent for all the country to come and walk on their Majesties' land; and, in short, did all that even he could imagine to render it great and worthy of their Royal acceptance." It was this nobleman who erected the edifice which is now in ruins. The place was seized by the Parliament after the Duke went abroad, and was sold and began to be pulled down, but was then bought by Sir Charles, the Duke's youngest brother, and so restored to the family.

The present Castle was built at different periods. The north-east end, which was erected by Sir Charles Cavendish, about the year 1613, is the oldest. The interior of this portion is extremely strange. The rooms are small, and the walls are wainscoted, and fancifully inlaid and painted. The ceilings are the best apartments are carved and gilt, and nearly the whole of the floors are coated with plaster. There is a small hall, the roof of which is supported by pillars, and a star-chamber, richly carved and gilt. The only considerable apartment, according to Sir Rhodes, is now called the drawing-room, but was formerly the guitar-parlour, from its having in the centre a stone column, from which springs an arched ceiling. From the roof of this building, to which the ascent is by winding stairs, the view extends "till all the stretching landscape into mist decays."

Hitherto we have spoken but of that part of Bolsover Castle which was formerly denominated the Little House, to distinguish it from the more [illegible] recent structure adjoining. This immense fabric, whose [illegible] are now roofless and rent into fissures, was built by William, the first Duke of Newcastle, in the course of the reign of Charles II., but is said never to have been entirely finished. The interior walls are but bare stones, the [illegible] of many window cases, and the different apartments, are of unusually large dimensions, the principal remaining apartment being 220 feet by 88. The entire western part, including the Little House at the northern extremity, extends to at 150 yards.

The best point of view, or north-west, is [illegible] presented in the [illegible] short distance hence [illegible] the village of Bolsover

MARBLE STATUE OF THE REV. JOHN WESLEY.

THIS fine work was modelled by the late Mr. Samuel Manning, and the commission for its execution in marble was given, some years since, by Mr. Butterworth, M.P. It was not, however, then carried into effect; but the Statue has since been sculptured in marble by the grandson of Mr. Manning; and on the 14th instant, it was placed, with a religious service, in the noble building of the Theological Institution, at Richmond, Surrey. The Rev. Robert Newton, D.D., President of the Conference, presided, having on his right the Secretary of the Conference; Mr. Manning, the sculptor of the Statue; and the Rev. Joseph Sutcliffe; and on his left, the Rev. Dr. Bunting, the Rev. Dr. Reece, and Thomas Farmer, Esq., by whom the Statue has been presented to the Connexion. The report of the services occupies five columns of the Watchman; and was closed by the President tendering to Mr. Farmer the thanks of the meeting for his munificent present of the Statue to the Institution and Methodism at large.

The Statue, as we have stated, was modelled by the late Mr. Samuel Manning. When exhibited at the Royal Academy, it was asserted by Henry Howard, Esq., R.A., that its own merits, as a work of art, had gained it a central position amongst the sculptures exhibited that year. The model attracted many visitors to the studio, and amongst them the late Joseph Butterworth, Esq., M.P. for Dover. In the year 1838, he commissioned Mr. Manning to execute the work in marble, at the price of 1000 guineas. A block of marble was purchased for this purpose, but the decease of Mr. Butterworth induced Mr. Manning to suspend the work; and the marble was used for the beautiful monument to the memory of the late Charles Grant, Esq., M.P., erected in Bloomsbury Church.

In June, 1839, proposals for the completion of the statue, and its erection in the Committee-room of the Mission House, Hatton-garden, were drawn out by Mr. Manning, and laid by the Rev. George Morley before the Committee of the Wesleyan Missionary Society; and, in the same year, he offered the marble statue to the Connexion on very liberal terms, which were with equal liberality and good feeling accepted by the Conference. But, unfortunately, this transaction was accidentally omitted to be inserted amongst the minutes, and the work was again suspended, with the intention of bringing it before the Conference of another year. In the meantime, a site was requested for the marble in Westminster Abbey; but the Rev. Dr. Ireland, Dean of Westminster, at that time refused, on account of what he called the factious character of Mr. Wesley. The subject of the situation then became an obstacle, and years were allowed to pass away, until Mr. Manning's decline of health and decease

The late John Manning, Esq., then offered his grandson, the present Samuel Manning, sculptor (and successor to his father, Samuel Manning, Esq., and to John Bacon, Esq.), the sum of 500 guineas to proceed with the work, with the view of another gentleman joining in presenting the statue to the Connexion. The marble was purchased for the purpose, but, before a chisel could be put to it, that able and liberal artist died, aged 93. The work has since been executed by Mr. Manning. It is of exquisitely pure marble, and is placed upon a pedestal of Peterhead granite; the weight of the statue with the pedestal being between three and four tons. The attitude is well chosen and expressive, and the drapery well arranged. Extraordinary pains has been taken, and with perfect success, to ensure in this statue a good likeness of the excellent Wesley. Dr. Adam Clarke (who knew Wesley for several years), in 1830, bore the following testimony to the fidelity of Mr. Manning's model—the original being a bust, for which Wesley sat five times to Mr. Wood, of Baraleu, and which was cast in brass by Mr. Forshaw, of Liverpool, under the eye of the late John Jackson, R.A. Dr. Adam Clarke says:—

"The noble appearance of Mr. Wesley's face I see in the terra-cotta of Mr. Wood, exactly transcribed from it to the clay and afterwards to the selenite of Mr. Manning, and in the brass cast by John Forshaw, Esq., and chased up to nature under the eye of John Jackson, R.A. I see also in Mr. Manning's work the whole length with its exact proportions and drapery, his commanding attitude, his attractive expression—in a word, his mind and his manner, as his friends now remaining long beheld, and rejoiced in him, and as those who have only seen him in his works may not be a little glad to know, on the faith of those who have seen him and could judge.

"This statute is a perfect likeness of John Wesley, and was declared to be so by Mr. Wesley himself in the original bust from which this was correctly taken."

Mr. Jackson's description of Wesley's person will be read with interest in connexion with Mr. Manning's statue:—

"The figure of Mr. Wesley was remarkable. His stature was low; his habit of body, in every period of life, the reverse of corpulent, and expressive of strict temperance and continual exercise: and, notwithstanding his small size, his step was firm, and his appearance, till within a few years of death, vigorous and muscular. His face, for an old man, was one of the finest we have seen. A clear, smooth forehead, an aquiline nose, an eye the brightest and most piercing that can be conceived, and a freshness of complexion scarcely ever to be found at his years, and impressive of the most perfect health, conspired to render him a venerable and interesting figure. Few have seen him without being struck with his appearance; and many who had been greatly prejudiced against him, have been known to change their opinion the moment they were introduced into his presence. In his countenance and demeanour there was a cheerfulness mingled with gravity; a sprightliness, which was the natural result of an unusual flow of spirits, and yet was accompanied with every mark of the most serene tranquility. His aspect, particularly in profile, had a strong character of acuteness and penetration. In dress, he was the pattern of neatness and simplicity. A narrow plaited stock; a coat with a small upright collar; no buckles at his knees; no silk or velvet in any part of his apparel; and a head as white as snow, gave an idea of something primitive and apostolic; while an air of neatness and cleanliness was diffused over his whole person."

KEW CHURCH.

THE advowson of Kew was anciently attached to that of Kingston; but divine service was performed here in a small chapel (originally a private one), which was licensed as early as 1522: it was separated from Kingston, and constituted a distinct vicarage, in 1769.

The present Church stands on the open area of Kew Green, on a plot of ground granted by Queen Anne. It was built by subscription, headed by the Queen, and was completed and consecrated as "the Chapel of St. Anne, of Kew Green," on the 12th of May, 1714. It then consisted of little more than a nave and north aisle, with a school-room on the south; and, after several alterations, as the population increased, its character was completely changed in the years 1837 and 1838; when it was enlarged into its present state, under the direction of Sir Jeffrey Wyatville. "This was accomplished," says the "New History of Surrey," "through the considerate munificence of his late Majesty, William the Fourth, who, on his last visit to Kew, in April, 1837, had the plans and estimates prepared by the architect submitted to him for approval; and after his decease, on the 20th of June following, the requisite funds (amounting to nearly five thousand pounds) were found to have been scrupulously set apart by the King for the completion of the work. In reference to his intentions, the following inscription, dictated by himself, and engraven on brass, has been affixed to the front of the Royal gallery:—

KEW CHURCH.

King William the Fourth, in the year 1836, directed 200 free seats to be provided in this Church at his expense, for the accommodation of the poor of the parish, and of the children of the King's Free-School; to be for ever appropriated to their use. Rev. R. B. Exon, A.M., Vicar. Edward Scard, Churchwarden

"This is a brick building, of which the dressings are more vivid than the other parts. At the east end is a portico of the Doric order, with three entrances and balusters above; and from the roof springs an octagonal clock-turret, with one bell. The interior is arranged and fitted up in a style of much simplicity and elegance; and the monuments are affixed against the end and side walls in a regular manner. There are no aisles, except what arise from the disposition of the seats and pewing, which are grained oak, and very neat. The roof, which is waggon-shaped, is supported on each side by three Doric columns, and at the ends by pilasters. The altar-recess is ornamented by Corinthian pilasters, and tables of the Lord's Prayer, Creed, and Commandments, in white and gold, and in a recess beyond (constructed for its reception) is a small richly toned organ, which is said to have belonged to Handel, and was a favourite instrument of his Majesty George the Third, by whose successor (George the Fourth) it was presented to the Church in 1824."

The walls bear several very interesting monuments. Among them is a tablet, with a white marble medallion bust of Jeremiah Meyer, R.A., painter in miniature and enamel to George III.: the epitaph is an elegant poetical composition, written by Hayley.

The Royal gallery, at the western end of the Church, contains seats for about sixty persons. In front, besides the inscription already given, are the arms of William the Fourth, and several small atchments of Royalty. This gallery was originally constructed at the expense of George III., in 1805; and on the re-opening for divine service, the King, the Queen, and nine Princes and Princesses (their offspring), were present.

The churchyard, which is merely separated from the Green by a dwarf wall, is crowded with tombs. Here, in kindred graves, are Meyer, Zoffany, and Gainsborough, the painters—the latter one of the founders of the English School. Here, too, rest Joshua Kirby, the architect; William Alton, the gardener; Francis Bauer, the microscopist, &c.

Among the larger mansions surrounding Kew-green, are those of the King of Hanover and the Duke of Cambridge. On the grounds of the former, on the north side of the green, Sir Peter Lely had a copyhold house.

Photography was discovered here; for, according to the "New History of Surrey," "M. Niépce, sen., the original discoverer of the photographic art, afterwards advanced to perfection (but by entirely new processes, and under different views), by Daguerré, and thence called the 'Daguerréotype,' resided at Kew in 1827; and in the month of December, in that year, he submitted a paper on the result of his experiments, with several sketches on metal, to the Royal Society, by the intervention of Mr. Bauer. His communications, however, made but little impression at the time upon that learned body."

BOLSOVER CASTLE, NEAR CHESTERFIELD.—(SEE PRECEDING PAGE.)

ROYAL VISIT TO THE MARQUIS OF WESTMINSTER.

THE DINNER-TABLE, AND PLATE-BUFFET.

On Wednesday, her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Queen of the Belgians and a brilliant suite, honoured the Marquis and Marchioness of Westminster with their presence at breakfast at Eaton Hall.

The hospitalities of the noble Marquis and Marchioness commenced with a grand banquet, which was succeeded by a concert, in which most of the leading Italian performers took part. The guests invited to meet her Majesty at dinner were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Earl Spencer, the Viscount Hardinge, Lord Robert Grosvenor, the Hon. Bulby and Lady Elizabeth Lawley, the Hon. W. H. and Lady Caroline Leigh, and the Earl Grosvenor.

The noble Marquis and Marchioness, with the Ladies Elizabeth Lawley and Caroline Leigh, and the Earl Grosvenor, were in attendance, and, with the Duke of Norfolk, as Master of the Horse, awaited her Majesty's arrival.

The Royal carriages entered the court-yard at five minutes after eight o'clock, when the band of the Royal Horse Guards played a few bars of the National Anthem.

On the Queen alighting, the noble Marquis was received her Majesty with the usual ceremonies, which the Queen acknowledged by saluting her lordship very graciously. The Queen of the Belgians was similarly received by the noble Marchioness, after which the whole party passed into the drawing-room, where the guests honoured with invitations to meet the Sovereign had assembled.

At a quarter-past eight o'clock, dinner was announced, when, the Queen having taken the arm of Lord Westminster, the august party proceed to the banqueting-room. This apartment presented a most magnificent appearance, a buffet at one end of the room was displayed the superb collection of family gold plate, including a variety of antique salvers of great value, and a profusion of race cups, trophies of the Lord Westminster's celebrated stud. Along the centre of the table was a magnificent plateau of silver gilt, on which were placed gold vases filled with flowers interwined with race groups in silver.

Her Majesty occupied a seat in the centre of the table, having to the right of Canterbury upon her right, and the Marquis of Westminster upon her left hand. His Royal Highness Prince Albert faced her Majesty, having the Queen of the Belgians and the Marchioness of Westminster respectively upon his right and left.

The banquet was of the most superb description. The dessert was especially remarkable for its choiceness and rarity; and among the fruits on the table were four splendid pines, averaging 10lb. weight each—a present to the noble Marquis from the Duke of Devonshire, and grown at Chatsworth.

During dinner the band of the Royal Horse Guards played a selection of music.

After the banquet, the noble Marquis gave "The health of her Majesty the Queen."

The toast had been drunk by the guests upstanding, in silence, her Majesty bowed to acknowledge it, and the band played a few bars of the National Anthem.

The noble Marquis next gave "The health of his Royal Highness the Prince Albert," which was similarly honoured, and followed by the band playing "Prince Albert's March."

The noble Marquis gave, lastly, "The health of her Majesty the Queen of the Belgians," which was duly responded to, and succeeded by the band playing the Belgian National Hymn.

Her Majesty and the Queen of the Belgians and the other ladies of the party here left the banqueting-room for the saloon, where tea and coffee were served.

At half-past nine o'clock the company invited to the concert began to arrive. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester came attended by Lady Georgiana Bathurst, Lord James Murray, and Colonel the Hon. H. T. Liddell. Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and the Hereditary Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz followed their illustrious relative, attended by Lady Augusta Gilmour and Mr. Hope Johnstone.

His Grace the Duke of Wellington arrived before ten o'clock, and, with the members of the Royal family, was conducted to the saloon, in which her Majesty and the Queen of the Belgians remained.

The principal company [illegible] were conducted to the gallery.

Among those present with [illegible] were the Prince de Schwarzenberg, the Prussian Minister, Baron Bunsen, the Princess Bunsen (our Princess Mary), Monsieur [illegible], Turkish Ambassador and suite, the Russian Minister and Madame de Brunow, the Austrian Minister and Madame de Wesse, his Excellency the Austrian Ambassador and the Countess Colloredo, his Excellency the Hanoverian Minister, his Excellency the Bavarian Minister and Madame de Schrenk, his Excellency the Saxon Minister and the Baroness de Cetto, his Excellency

THE GROSVENOR GALLERY.

the Prussian Minister and Madame Bunsen, Baron Koller, M de Sabbern, and a long list of nobility and gentry

At a quarter past ten o'clock her Majesty entered the Gallery, where the concert-room, under the direction of Mr. Lucas.

The following is a programme of the music performed:—

Duetto, "Del ragginare," Madame Persiani e Mlle de Meric, Signori Marini, Tamburini e Lablache ("Guglielmo Tell") ... ... Rossini.

During the interval of the concert her Majesty retired to the banqueting-room, and, with the other Royal visitors, partook of refreshment.

At the period of the evening the windows in the rear of the mansion being opened, discovered a brilliant illumination in the gardens, the green swards and branches of the trees being richly studded with variegated lamps. Her Majesty expressed her extreme gratification at the beautiful effect produced; and subsequently returning to the Gallery, remained until the close of the concert.

At twelve o'clock her Majesty took leave of the noble Marquis and Marchioness, and with the Prince Consort and the Queen of the Belgians returned to Buckingham Palace.

The other Royal visitors left shortly afterwards, and all the guests had departed before one o'clock.

The Duchess of Kent was prevented being present owing to a slight cold.

The gallery was perfectly illuminated, under the direction of Messrs Sedgwick and Tayle.

On the Queen's arrival, her Majesty and her august relatives were presented with magnificent bouquets of the choicest flowers, supplied from Harding's, in Cafford street

THE ENGRAVINGS.

Our illustrations show the Table and Buffet, with the costly plate, as displayed on Wednesday evening.

In the second engraving is pourtrayed the splendid "Grosvenor Gallery," in point of variety, equals any private collection in the kingdom. This magnificent apartment is the new gallery built by the late Marquis of Westminster, and which are hung most of the large pictures.

Mr. [illegible], in her "Sketch of the Private Galleries of Art," says:—"No private collection of pictures in Bridgewater Gallery is more than double, the [illegible] but the Grosvenor Gallery, [illegible] Mr Smirke. The double [illegible] nor Gallery quite as popular as a resort for the more amateur, and not less attractive to the student and artist."

The Gallery, by no means perfect, it appears that in this single [illegible] there are 5 Raphaels, 3 Murillos, 2 by Velasquez, [illegible] Guidos, 4 Salvators, no less than 10 the Claudes, 4 [illegible] Poussin, 7 Rembrandts, 11 Rubenses, 2 Vandykes, [illegible] Hogarths, [illegible] Wouvermans, Sir Joshua, and many others. These comprise what is generally known as the Grosvenor Gallery, but extensive additions [illegible] are now been made.

The whole collection, at present, numbers nearly 100 pictures; the most conspicuous being the four oils at Rubenses, "The Israelites Gathering Manna," and three others, which belonged to a series of nine, painted by Rubens when in Spain, in 1699, by order of Philip IV., for his Minister, the Duke of Olivares, [illegible] to the Carmelite Convent of L[illegible].

Amongst the rarities, and comparatively unknown, is a triptych panel picture, the work of John Memmelline, who flourished [illegible] fifteenth century, representing in the centre a garden, with the Virgin Mary and St. John the Baptist on either side of him on the right hand [illegible] Mary, the sister of Lazarus, and [illegible] Magdalene, and St. John the Baptist. The background [illegible] with a lake, [illegible] villages, and figures, beautifully finished. In the [illegible] hand St John the Baptist, the business of our Saviour is represented; an angel, kneeling by, holds his raiment. This rare painting was purchased by the present Marquess of Westminster in 1847. The gallery is further enriched [illegible] very beautiful works of sculpture, amongst which we may instance [illegible] figure of "Sabrina Fair," Cupid and Psyche, by Sir Richard Westmacott, a Faun (antique), and busts of Mercury, Apollo, Clytie, Homer, Paris, Helen, Charles I., Cromwell, &c.

Barrot to restore it; and the Italian question will not be one iota nearer to a practical and permanent conclusion, than it was a month ago, by the occupation or destruction of that city.

The Pope himself is ashamed of his French allies, and will hesitate to return to Rome under their protection. Perhaps, however, when French "honour" is satisfied by the temporary occupation and partial destruction of the most famous city in the world, the French troops will be ordered home, and the only parties really interested in the affairs of Rome and of Italy will be allowed to manage their own business. It would be idle to speculate as to the turn affairs will then take; but it is quite clear, whatever it may be, that it will be better for the French character and honour, and more likely to lead to satisfactory results for all parties, than the [illegible] of Rome by the troops of a Government professing liberty and violating it openly, and preaching peace while waging the most disgraceful war recorded in modern history.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

The Queen and the Prince Consort, and the Court, attended divine service in the private chapel at Buckingham Palace, on Sunday morning. The Bishop of London preached the sermon.

On Monday, Prince Albert inspected the Honourable Artillery Company, and afterwards rode out on horseback with her Majesty.

On Tuesday, the Prince Consort, attended by Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps and Colonel Bouverie, inspected the troops in Hyde-park; and afterwards, together with the Queen, the Queen of the Belgians, the Prince of Wales, and the Princess Alice, took a drive in an open carriage and four, Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps attending on horseback. In the evening, the Queen and Prince Albert, and her Majesty the Queen of the Belgians, honoured the Haymarket Theatre with their presence.

On Wednesday Prince Albert attended the review of the 11th Hussars on Wimbledon Common. Her Majesty the Queen and the Queen of the Belgians took a drive on the same afternoon in an open carriage and four. In the evening the Court honoured the Marquis and Marchioness of Westminster with their presence at Grosvenor House.

The Queen of the Belgians took leave of her Majesty and the Prince Consort on Thursday, and left town for St. Leonard's, on a visit to her illustrious parents, the Count and Countess de Neuilly.

The Queen held a privy council yesterday, at Buckingham Palace.

The Countess of Mount Edgcumbe has succeeded the Countess of Desart as Lady in Waiting to the Queen; and Lord Waterpark has relieved Lord Camoys in the duties of Lord in Waiting to her Majesty.

ROYAL VISIT TO TUNBRIDGE-WELLS,

The Queen and the Prince Consort paid a visit to her Majesty the Queen Dowager, at the Calverley Hotel, Tunbridge-Wells, on Saturday last. Her Majesty and her Royal Highness travelled from town by a special train on the South-Eastern Railway; and on arriving at Tunbridge-Wells, were received by Earl Howe, Lord Chamberlain, and Captain Somerset, one of the Equerries to the Queen Dowager, by whom the Royal party were conducted to the Calverley Hotel. Her Majesty and the Queen Dowager subsequently took a carriage airing in an open pony phaëton, accompanied by Prince Albert. After proceeding through Calverley Park and the Wells, the Royal party passed over Mount Ephraim and crossed Rusthall Common to the High Rocks. These localities were all perfectly familiar to the Queen, and her Majesty appeared much delighted at revisiting the scenes of her childhood. From the High Rocks the Royal party drove across the Forest to the Beacon-field, and upon their return called at Mr Nye's Tunbridge repository, where her Majesty inspected the manufactures in the show-room, and made several purchases for the Royal children. Their Majesties returned to the Calverley at six o'clock; and the Queen and the Prince having taken leave of their illustrious relative, arrived in town shortly after seven o'clock

The Calverley Hotel stands on the site and forms part of the mansion formerly inhabited by the Duchess of Kent, and then called Calverley House. The rooms occupied by the Queen, when Princess Victoria, are still preserved, and have lately formed a portion of the Royal suite of apartments. The magnificent heraldic lanthorn from Stowe is suspended in the entrance-hall of this establishment.

VISIT OF HER MAJESTY TO IRELAND.—It is announced that the Queen purposes, this autumn, to visit Ireland, previous to her Majesty going to Scotland. The Royal yacht will first touch at the Cove of Cork, and thence proceed along the coast to Dublin, where her Majesty will stay for some days.

Her Majesty the Queen honoured the Duchess of Gloucester with her presence at a grand ball, given by her Royal Highness, at Gloucester House, on Friday.

THE QUEEN OF THE BELGIANS.—Her Majesty the Queen of the Belgians arrived at Dover from Ostend on Monday, by the Government mail steamer, attended by the Countess Van der Straten and the Baron de Moerkerke. Her Majesty and suite [illegible] o'clock, and proceeded thence to Buckingham Palace.

THE QUEEN DOWAGER.—Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, attended by the Earl and Countess Howe and a train, left the Calverley Hotel, Tunbridge-Wells, on Thursday, and proceeded on the South-Eastern Railway to Croydon, whence her Majesty crossed to Bushey Park.

The Duchess of Orleans, accompanied by the Comte de Paris, and attended by the Prince de Joinville, arrived in town yesterday, from Rotterdam.

The Prince and Princess Dora Pamphili, with their family and suite, arrived at Mivart's Hotel, from the Continent, on Wednesday evening. Prince and Princess have since been joined by the Earl and Countess of Shrewsbury.

We regret exceedingly to announce that the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland have sustained a severe domestic affliction by the sudden demise of their youngest daughter, the Lady Alexandrina Leveson Gower. The deceased child was taken ill on the route of Thursday morning (the day after the nuptials of the Marquis of Stafford and Miss Hay Mackenzie), never afterwards rallied, and died within a few hours.

The windows, &c., are of Bath [illegible]: the belfry is of oak, filled in with decorated tracery. The grey tint of the flint-work gives this chapel a very ancient appearance. There are encaustic tile pavements, and a coloured reredos. The cost of the building was about £1100 or £1200. Mr. Park Harrison was the architect.

POSTSCRIPT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

OATHS BILL.

The Earl of WICKLOW said: I rise to exercise a privilege that is the right of every member of this House. I now lay on the table a bill to alter the oaths to be taken by all persons required to take the oaths of allegiance, abjuration, and supremacy, which I now move be read a first time.

The bill was read a first time accordingly.

VANCOUVER'S ISLAND.

Earl GREY moved the second reading of the Administration of Justice (Vancouver's Island) Bill. The colonization of Vancouver's Island was intended to take place by the Hudson's Bay Company. No political power was conferred on that company, but grants of land were to be made as had been customary in former times to other colonizing companies, but under much greater restrictions. The company were bound to provide for the defence of the island. They were also [illegible] the appointment of the governor, [illegible] the power of appointment of Vancouver's Island.

The bill was read a second time and ordered to be committed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

STATE OF THE NATION.

Mr HUME proposed to move, by way of amendment to Mr. Disraeli's motion, that, although the free admission of food by the repeal of the corn-laws had contributed to relieve the distress of the country during the late period of suffering, and although the recent relaxations in our commercial system must tend to [illegible] the means of subsistence of the people, nevertheless, in the present state of the nation the state of the finances demanded a thorough revision, that Parliament might be enabled to stimulate the industrial resources of the country by the reduction of taxation. He proposed to move something positive—(laughter)—instead of the hon. member for Buckingham's motion.

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) BILL.

The House having gone into committee on this bill, the discussion on the several clauses was resumed. Adjourned at half past one o'clock.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

ROME.

Nothing of a positive nature that can be relied on has reached us up to last evening.

The French Government were, on Thursday evening, said to be in possession of intelligence from Rome calculated to lead to the expectation of a surrender by the Roman Government. General Oudinot is master of both walls and of the advanced works; and being in a position which gives the city at his mercy, should he have recourse to the horrors of a bombardment rather than engage his men in the streets, he has offered terms of accommodation, which there is reason to think, through the [illegible] agency of M. de Corcelles, will be accepted.

GERMAN STATES.

The insurrection in Baden and the Bavarian Palatinate is completely over, and Mieroslawski is a prisoner in the hands of the Prussians.

The Prince and Princess Joinville arrived at Munich on the 20th instant, from Coburg. On the 21st instant they proceeded to Spain, to visit their mother-in-law, the widowed Empress of Brazil.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ENTERTAINMENT AT THE MANSION-HOUSE TO SIR R. PEEL.

The sixth of what may be termed the state dinners given by the Lord Mayor during his year of office, and the third of the municipal festivities, took place on Wednesday evening at the Mansion-House. The party to whose honour the present banquet was devoted was that of which Sir R. Peel is the leader—the two [illegible] members constituting the [illegible] Minister absent and the Protectionists.

The dinner was served, as usual, in the Egyptian hall, where covers were laid for about 200.

Amongst the more distinguished of the visitors were Sir Robert and Lady Peel and Miss Peel, his Excellency the American Minister, Marquis and Marchioness of Londonderry and Lady Adelaide Vane, Marquis and Marchioness of Westminster, Marquis and Marchioness of Blandford, Marquis and Marchioness of Ormonde, Earl of Aberdeen, Earl and Countess of St. Germans, Earl of Lovelace, Earl of Lincoln, Earl Jermyn, Earl of Barrowby, Earl Bathurst, Viscount and Viscountess Castlereagh, Viscountess Hardinge and Hon. C. Hardinge, Viscount and Viscountess Sydney, the Right Hon. Sir James Graham, Bart., the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P., the Right Hon. H. Goulburn, M.P., the Right Hon. Antony Hervey, M.P., and Mrs. Herbert, the Right Hon. Sir George Clerk, Bart., M.P., the Right Hon. Sir Frankland Lewis, Bart., M.P., the Right Hon. Spencer Horsley, M.P., the Right Hon Sir Thos. Fremantle, Bart., the Right Hon. H. T. L. Corry, M.P., Cabaaly Effendi (Turkish Embassy), Zaver Effendi (Turkish Embassy), the Lord Chief Justice and Lady Wilde, &c.

STEAM COMMUNICATION WITH AUSTRALIA.

A public meeting was held at Willis's Rooms on Wednesday, to discuss the most desirable method of promoting steam communication with Australia. The Right Hon. the Earl Talbot in the chair.

The Chairman expressed the interest which he felt in the colony of Australia, which was growing day by day of greater importance and thought required a more direct steam communication with the mother country. [illegible] by the Isthmus of Panama and the Pacific. Thus, however, was a matter of mere detail, and ought to be left for after consideration. Their sole object now was to force upon the attention of the public the paramount importance of a prompter communication with those distant dependencies of the empire than that at present existing. To show the increase of commerce with them he might state that, while in 1800 the quantity of wool imported into Sydney was but 600 pounds, it had since then gradually increased until, in 1848, it amounted to 46,612 pounds. The exports from this country to Sydney of German wool amounted to 17,000 lbs. in 1836, but of that of home growth until Thursday week, when he was about to the act of committing sacrilege, and when brought to Horsemonger lane Gaol, identified by Mr. Keene, the governor, as the respectable man who was robbed. He was tried at the last sessions, and sentenced to similar punishment for breaking into a gentleman's house near Kingston, but through the intrepid conduct of the son of the owner he was captured. Smith was one of the same stamp, and from the state in the rear of the Sessions House, the outer wall of which is about 20 feet high, and surmounted with sharp spikes. Over these they threw themselves on the prisoners' rugs and tied them together, and had actually attached one end to the wall ready to ascend, when one of the watchmen perceived their movements, and instantly communicated with the others. Devant was about to climb up the wall, when the watchman in question ran to the spot and secured him; and while he was struggling to prevent the others from escaping, Mr. Keene and a number of turnkeys came to his assistance, and overpowered the others. They were taken back to the interior of the prison, and so heavily ironed as to prevent them making such an attempt again. The key is kept as a matter of great [illegible]

HEALTH OF LONDON DURING THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JUNE 23, 1849.—The total deaths registered in the week were 985, and exhibit an excess, but not more than 23 above the average. The increase is not in the previous week, arises almost exclusively from epidemic diseases; for the deaths in this class were in the last three weeks 251, 251, 277, whilst the average does not exceed 150. Hooping cough and cholera are also predominant on the list; the former having been fatal to 55 children—more than the average by 19; and the latter to 49 persons at all ages. Of these 49 deaths from cholera, 11 occurred under 15 years of age, 32 between that age and 60, and six 60 years and upwards. They principally occurred in the southern and eastern districts. The progress of mortality from this disease during the last four weeks is marked by the following numbers:—9, 22, 42, 49. The mortality from diarrhœa has rather decreased: for the number of deaths from it, which in the previous week were 36, in the last week were only 17, whilst the average is 12. All other fatal causes which make the largest contribution to the week's mortality, now exhibit the usual amount, or are less generally under it. The deaths from phthisis have been for a week or two less than the average; last week they were 127, or 18 under the estimated number. A man of 56 years died, according to the return of the medical officer of health, of general decay, produced by voluntary abstinence from food "after an illness of ten days." Two deaths from destitution occurred in Islington Workhouse. In Goswell-street sub-district, a lady died at the extreme age of 98 years, within two years after having taken a dose of laudanum, which had been prescribed by a druggist. The births registered during the week were 1255

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—The mean reading of the barometer at Greenwich was 29·890 in. for the week; the greatest daily reading was above 30 in. on Wednesday. The mean daily temperature rose from 54·9° on Sunday, to 67·2° on Saturday, on which day it was highest. The highest reading the thermometer on that day, when in shade, was 69·2° in the sun. The mean temperature of Saturday was 6·8° above the average of the same day in seven years, though the temperature of the whole week was rather less than the average.

WILLOW BANK, FULHAM.—The view of this villa and its costly contents has been attended by a large number of the nobility and gentry during the week. Among the articles of vertu, the Dresden and Sèvres porcelain is entitled to a special notice: a set of Sèvres dessert plates, and a déjeuner set... of Dresden, with exquisitely painted portraits and flowers, have rarely, if ever, been surpassed in delicacy and high finish. The arrangements for the sale commence on Monday, and continue for a week.

THE HONOURABLE ARTILLERY COMPANY.—On Monday, this ancient and honourable body was inspected and reviewed by the Captain-General in Royal Highness the Prince Consort, at the spot on the grounds of the Artillery Company, which, as well as the Armoury and butting house, was formerly occupied by a brilliant circle of marksmen. Shortly after ten o'clock, the Artillery Company, properly so called, conveyed to the review ground four handsome specimens of ordnance, and took up their position on the right of the line formed by their brethren. The muster roll numbered about 340 non commissioned officers and rank and file. The Lieutenant-Colonel Commandant, the Hon Henry Fitzroy, took the command, and was supported by Major Barnard, Captain and Adjutant Bosscy, Assistant-Adjutant Snell, and the staff of the corps. The band was also in attendance. His Royal Highness was enthusiastically greeted by the company, the cheers being renewed on his mounting his charger. The Prince was clothed in uniform as Captain-General of the Hon. Artillery Company, with which he wore the star and ribbon of the military Order of the Bath. Immediately on entering the ground a Royal salute of twenty-one guns was fired in honour of His Royal Highness, and the review commenced. The various evolutions and manœuvres were performed with a high degree of excellence. At the close the companies were drawn up, in three sides of a square, when his Royal Highness addressed the company in terms expressive of the [illegible] appearance and efficient manner in which the corps had gone through the evolutions of the day. The Prince Consort and suite then quitted the grounds, and, after a brief sojourn in the Armoury, entered the Royal carriages, and, amidst loud and hearty cheers, returned direct to Buckingham Palace. The companies afterwards went to ball practice, and in the evening concluded the day by a banquet at the Sutting House. The proceedings were not marred by any accident, and afforded universal gratification to all present.

ROYAL HIGHLAND SCHOOL SOCIETY.—On Wednesday a public meeting was held at the Freemasons' Tavern, in aid of the funds of this society, the Rev. Dr. Cumming in the chair, supported by the Rev. Dr. Clark, of St. Andrew's church, Edinburgh, the Rev. Norman Macleod, of Dalkeith, and other gentlemen, forming a deputation from Scotland. Dr. Clark stated that, through the instrumentality of the excellent society, education had been carried to the remotest parts of Scotland. The number of children under the charge of the society was 20,000; and the cost of educating each child was only 5s. a year. The total amount, therefore, that was required for the instruction of each child was £1 sterling—taking a period of four years as the time usually occupied for that purpose. But, notwithstanding the advantages derived from the labours of this society, there were still many thousands of families living in as complete ignorance as if they were in a heathen land, and as devoid of religious instruction as if the light of the Scriptures had never dawned upon their Christian country. The society, therefore, were desirous of augmenting their funds, not only on account of the children who were at present destitute of education, but in order that they might be enabled to increase the salaries of the schoolmasters, who now received only £18 a year each, a very inadequate remuneration for their services. The funded property of the society was £5000, but this sum was entirely absorbed in the maintenance of the various schools already established. In the evening the anniversary festival of the society was held at the same establishment, the Duke of Argyll in the chair.

LONDON ORPHAN ASYLUM.—A special general court of the governors and subscribers to this institution was held on Monday, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, James Shaw, Esq., in the chair, when, on the recommendation of the board of managers, rule 58 was amended, so as to confide in the board the power of granting leave of absence to children; and it was also carried, with but two dissentient voices, "That the practice of allowing as many votes as there are children to be elected be discontinued, and that for the future one vote be allowed for each annual guinea and ten guineas life subscription." The election into the establishment at Clapton of 30 children—13 girls and 17 boys—from a list of 141 candidates, was then proceeded with. The business of the day terminated at three o'clock, when the chairman announced the issue of the polling.

INFANT ORPHAN ASYLUM, WANSTEAD.—The governors of this institution celebrated their anniversary on Wednesday, at the scene of their humane labours—the institution itself—which stands amidst the glades of Epping Forest. The building itself is a fine Elizabethan structure, combining with the quaint designs of the period to which it belongs the comforts and conveniences which modern science and experience have engrafted upon the architecture of [illegible] and above are dormitories, constructed with every attention to cleanliness and ventilation, and capable of accommodating 400 children. The proceedings were commenced by the Bishop of London, who took the chair at two o'clock, and carefully examined the children in such elementary branches of religious and moral education as were suited to their tender years. A hymn was [illegible] sung by some of the senior pupils, and the examination concluded with the exhibition of specimens of writing and needlework. The right rev. Prelate then addressed a few eloquent observations to the large company assembled collectively and individually, and concluded by expressing his regret that other engagements prevented his remaining to partake of the hospitality of the institution. After this the company adjourned to the refreshment-rooms, and [illegible] of an elegant and abundant déjeûner. The chair was taken by his Grace the Duke of Argyll, at whose table was seated Miss Burdett Coutts and several other persons of distinction. About 400 ladies and gentlemen partook of this entertainment. The subscriptions of the evening amounted to £1[illegible].

CONSECRATION OF THE NEW WEST LONDON SYNAGOGUE.—[illegible] the 5th of TAMMUZ, 5609 of the Jewish era, the ceremony of the consecration of the West London Synagogue of the British Jews, which is situated in Margaret-street, Cavendish-square, was performed by the Rev. Mr. Marks, the minister, in the presence of a respectable and influential congregation of members of the Hebrew nation, among whom were Baron de Goldsmid, M. Mocatta, &c. During the service, a prayer, written for the occasion, was offered up [illegible] Queen and Royal Family. At the conclusion [illegible]

ATTEMPTED ESCAPE OF TWO PRISONERS FROM HORSEMONGER-LANE GAOL.—The following extraordinary particulars of a recent attempt of three burglars to escape from this prison, were elicited at an investigation held by the visiting justices a few days ago. The parties in question were convicted of housebreakers named Devant, Marten, and Smith, and were tried at the last Surrey Assizes, and sentenced to fourteen years' transportation. Devant was tried at the Central Criminal Court in 1847, and sentenced to ten years' transportation for breaking into the Archbishop of Canterbury's palace at Addington, near Croydon. On the same day that he received his sentence he managed to break out of Kingston gaol, and was not heard of until Thursday week, when he was about to the act of committing sacrilege, and when brought to Horsemonger lane Gaol, identified by Mr. Keene, the governor, as the respectable man who was robbed. He was tried at the last sessions, and sentenced to similar punishment for breaking into a gentleman's house near Kingston, but through the intrepid conduct of the son of the owner he was captured. Smith was one of the same stamp, and from the state in the rear of the Sessions House, the outer wall of which is about 20 feet high, and surmounted with sharp spikes. SUMMER.—THE STRAWBERRY GIRL.—DRAWN BY GAVARNI.

We owe thee much, resplendent June,
For fresh delights of morn or noon,
For lingering eves with sunsets bright
For deep serenities of night,
For foliage rich, and pomp of flowers
For music of the skies and bowers,
For sweet fruition, early found,
And all the promise of the ground.

But, lovely June, although we prize
The charms thou spreadest to our eyes;
Though we admire thee, young and fair
With jocund cheeks and flowing hair;
Although we love to hear the song
That floats thy leafy woods among,
We own a fondness as intense
For gifts that please another sense.

When swallows build beneath the eaves,
There grows, deep hidden under leaves,
Near to the ground, retiring, shy,
Tinged with the summer's earliest dye,
With bright complexion—healthy—clear—
The fairest berry of the year;—
The Strawberry, profusely strewn,
The jewel in the lap of June.

Happy is he who, now and then,
Can wander from the marts of men,
To prune his trees, to trim his walks
To lift his roses' drooping stalks;
Or, with his wife and children fair,
Eat his own fruits in open air,
And watch, well pleased, their bright eyes gleam
To feast on strawberries and cream.

Pleasant the picture of the joy
That fills the heart of girl and boy.
See how they spy, 'mid leaves conceal'd,
The berries by their flush reveal'd;—
See how they pluck them as they go
From hiding-places warm and low;
And eat a tax of one in two—
A tribute claimed in transitu.

The happy lark is mounting high;
Her anthem quivers through the sky.
The wind upon the tree-top swells;
Below it rock the lily-bells;—
The fruit is pluck'd—the cloth is laid—
They sit together in the shade,
And share a feast whose luxury pure
Might tempt the richest epicure.

Even those whom harsher fate detains
By care, or toil, or money-chains,
In smoky precincts of the town,
Far from the garden, field, or down;
Who, bending over desks severe,
Scarce know the changes of the year—
Partake, O June! thy blessings shed,
And love thee for thy berries red.

Pomona sends through street and lane
The buxom maidens of her train;
And toil-worn men at work rejoice
To hear the customary voice,
That rings adown the busy street,
In long-drawn accents, clear and sweet—
"Hautbois! fresh gather'd! taste and try!
Hautbois! ripe hautbois! come and buy!"

Sweet are the grapes that bloom by Rhine,
Sweet are the eastern date and pine;
Sweet are the oranges that grow
Where Guadalquiver's waters flow;
Sweet is the apple—sweet the pear—
The blushing peach—the cherry fair.
But bright and beauteous though they be—
Give me, oh give, the STRAWBERRY.—CHARLES MACKAY

THE BRITANNIA TUBULAR BRIDGE.

In our last we briefly noticed the floating of this mighty iron monster to its destination, and this week we illustrate the event. In our Journal of January 13, 1849, some particulars of the construction of the Britannia Bridge will be found—the size of the piers, their general architectural features, &c. with a view of the structure completed; and in our Journal for March 11, 1848, will be found sectional and other representations of the iron tube erected over the river Conway, and which will serve to elucidate the character and mode of construction of this, its larger conquener, as in principle they are exactly similar, and to it we refer our readers, to understand the mode in which the iron plates are riveted together, so as to form the huge fabric shewn in our representations; promising that the following details of the size, &c. of this tube are correct, as they are generally taken from a good description in the Carnarvon and Denbigh Herald, where they are based on the statistics given in a capital pamphlet, just published, entitled "A General Description of the Britannia and Conway Tubular Bridges:" and it is worthy of remark, that the London press generally quoted, inaccurately, this pamphlet, without acknowledging, in the slightest manner, their obligation.

The tube which was floated on Wednesday is one of four, which, with four smaller ones (that are erected where they will have ultimately to stand), will form the entire double hollow of the viaduct. It has been built by Mr. Charles Mare, of Blackwall. It, as well as the other three large tubes, is four hundred and seventy-two feet in length; an allowance of twelve feet having been made, over and above the span between the two towers that are destined for its reception, in order that six feet, at either end, may be finally imbedded in the solid masonry.

The author of the "General Description" of these tubes gives the following pleasing illustration:—"Our London readers will better appreciate the great length of these tubes, by remembering that if one of them were placed on end in St. Paul's Churchyard, it would reach 107 feet higher than the top of the cross."

The tube is not of equal height throughout: the end which is to be fitted into the central main tower (commonly called the Britannia Tower) is 30 feet in height; whilst the end which will be fitted into the Anglesey Tower is only 27 feet high; the centre being intermediate, and the smaller tubes still further tapering towards their terminal—so that the whole viaduct may have that extra strength which an arched roofing only could confer. The width is 14 feet 8 inches throughout. The sides, top, and bottom of this gigantic tube are formed of oblong wrought-iron plates, varying in length, width, and thickness, according to circumstances, but of amazing size and weight. They are so placed as to produce the appearance of stone or brickwork, and to obtain the greatest possible amount of strength; care being taken to secure every joint by means of a thick plate closely riveted over it. These rivets are the same as those by which the plates themselves are connected; and no less than 327,000 of them are contained in a single tube. Holes were punched out in the plates in order to receive them; and they were made red hot immediately prior to being driven in, in order to increase their hold upon the plates.

In addition to the sixteen hundred tons of wrought iron made use of in the construction of the tube itself, an additional two hundred tons of metal was necessary, in order to form lifting frames and cast-iron beams for the purpose of attaching the tube to those chains by which, under the potent influence of hydraulic pressure, it will be eventually lifted one hundred and two feet above high-water level.

These chains, beams, and frames are thus referred to by the intelligent and well-informed writer above quoted:—"The chains by which the tube is lifted will be attached to it at two feet from the end; and, in order to get sufficient attachment at this part, three strong frames of cast iron are built into each end of the tube. The uppermost frame is intended only to stiffen and support the sides while the tube is resting on its ends: the two outer frames are the lifting frames; the chains are attached to these by three sets of massive cast-iron beams, placed across the in ide of the tube, one above another, the ends fitting under deep shoulders or notches in the lifting frames, where they are secured by screw bolts. As an additional security, two very strong wrought-iron straps pass over the upper pair of beams, and descend into the bottom of the beneath the frames, where they are strongly keyed.

The lifting apparatus is shown in our first and third Engravings.

In order to convey an iron tube of this stupendous magnitude and weight from the Carnarvon shore towards that of Anglesey, in a slanting direction, that is, in a line forming the hypothenuse of a triangle, to which nearly the entire width of the Straits was a side, it was clearly necessary that it should be previously made capable of floating. This was to be effected, as in the case of the Conway tube, by large hol ow cylinders of sheet iron, of 12 feet in diameter, closely joined together, and furnished with valves, so as to admit water, and also with pumps, in order to eject it. The same six wooden pontoons that had been used at Conway, were put in requisition on the present occasion; and, in addition, two others, built for the purpose, of wrought-iron plates, closely and strongly riveted together. Each of these eight pontoons or boxes is ninety-eight feet in length, twenty-five feet in width, and fifteen feet in depth. Although, at the entrance

The Anniversary of the Battle of Victoria was celebrated at Glasgow on Thursday week by a public dinner, in the City Hall, given in honour of the naval and military officers in her Majesty's service, connected with Glasgow and the neighbourhood, who received medals under the general order of 1st June, 1847. There were about 220 gentlemen present.

A few days ago, at the Country Court held at Morpeth, a pitman from Nathaniel Colliery was ordered to goal in default of payment of a debt of 15s. While his commitment was being made out, however, he coolly took his hat, walked away, locked the door on the outside, and made his homage, and all the rest of their prisoners. Some little time elapsed ere they could get egress, and in the meantime the pitman had escaped.

Mr. James Ligar, chessemonger, Peterborough, has exhibited an immense cheese, which has attracted the admiration of the inhabitants. The weight is 1474 lb., its circumference 13 feet, and thickness 18 inches. This exceeds in size and weight the one sent as a present to the Queen from Somersetshire, in 1841, which measured 9 feet round, and was 22 inches deep. Mr. Ellar's cheese was made from upwards of 20 hogsheads of milk, of one meal, from 737 cows.

The success of the Dutch against the pirates of Bally, in the East Indian archipelago, lately has been complete. The expedition which left Batavia for the purpose of accomplishing the subjugation of Bally, commenced operations on the 13th April, and after 3 hours' hard fighting all the fortifications were taken, and the Netherlands flag was hoisted within the walls. The Bali incas had 5000 killed, and the loss of the Dutch was about 200. The Dutch have thus gained undisputed possession of an island which has long been regarded as the granary of the Eastern Archipelago, and which has been repeatedly offered to the English.

THE NELSON MONUMENT.—On Monday afternoon, about five o'clock, when the mould from Mr. Carew's design of the "Death of Nelson" was completed, the molten bronze was most successfully poured through the great feeding apertures of the bas relief, and in a few minutes the most important portions of the composition were faithfully secured in enduring bronze. The guns, which formed the chief material, were furnished from the Government stores, at Woolwich, taken from his country's enemies by the hero himself. The bas-relief is fourteen feet square, and has been cast in seven separate portions, the greatest and most important of which, the one made on Monday, is, probably, the largest sculptural cast ever cast in this country. The whole of the bas-relief will be finished in the principal front of the column in a very short time.

SANATORIUM FOR THE CONSUMPTIVE, IN THE ISLAND OF MADEIRA. —On Monday a public meeting, under the presidency of Lord Robert Grosvenor, M.P., was held at the Hanover square rooms, for the purpose of aiding in the foundation of an establishment of the above nature. The noble chairman, throughout whose instrumentality the scheme was first brought under the notice of the public in this island, explained the objects of the institution. It was intended for those who, being unable to defray the whole expenses incident to a removal from England and a residence for the requisite time in that island, would yet gladly avail themselves of the advantages of that health giving climate, and pay the expense of the voyage at a reduced rate, were they sure of finding, on their arrival, lodging, service, and medical attendance free of charge, and comfortable board upon the most moderate terms. The project had been primarily stated by certain resolutions passed at a public meeting held at Funchal, in Madeira, in March last. It was under the Act of the resolutions to interfere with any existing institutions; but the fact was notorious, that though pulmonary disorders were in England a most numerous class, they were yet the very one for which local provision had been made the least. (Hear, hear.) The proprietors of some of the packets plying between this country and the island and considerately agreed to take out passengers, in connexion with the institution, for half fare—namely, £10, provided there was room in the vessels. It was thought that a convenient building could be procured at a rent of from £60 to £70 a year, which, when nicely fitted up, would be surrounded by a matron of good character. These circumstances, together with the low rate of charge for it was not contemplated that the institution should be purely gratuitous—would doubtless induce many persons, more especially females, to seek the blessings of such a happy climate. A report of the proceedings of the committee since the commencement gave a list of the subscriptions received, among which was a donation of £10 from her Grace the Duchess of Norfolk. Two resolutions were unanimously adopted, one pledging the meeting to support the proposition for a sanatorium, and the other appointing an English committee "which shall make regulations for the purpose of carrying into effect the objects in view."

PROTECTION TO NATIVE INDUSTRY.

GREAT MEETING AT DRURY-LANE THEATRE

On Tuesday, the first public meeting of the "National Association for the Protection of British Industry and Capital," consisting of persons connected with the agricultural, commercial, colonial, and shipping interests, favourable to the principle of protection, was held in the Theatre Royal, Drury-Lane, for the purpose of receiving the report of the Provisional Committee, appointed at the meeting held in the Hall of Commerce, in the City of London, on the 1st instant, of considering the rules and regulations to be then proposed for the management of the association; of completing its organisation; and adopting any further steps that may be deemed advisable. The house was very pretty full.

Soon after twelve o'clock the Duke of Richmond, accompanied by the vice-presidents and prominent members of the association, appeared upon the platform, which was, as usual, placed on the stage, and took the chair on the hand seating.

The Chairman said that he had consented to take the chair on the occasion although he could have wished that it was filled by one who was more capable than himself of performing with efficiency the duties which necessarily would devolve on him. He should be sorry, indeed, that any but what he was able to say with truth that he was lukewarm in the cause of protection to native industry. He never had advocated protection on selfish grounds, or as a means of benefiting one class only; and although he well knew that, when the Corn Laws were repealed, the proceeding would be seriously hurtful to the agricultural interest of the country, with which he was so intimately connected, he felt as much indignation at the clamour of those raising the first step of the system of Free-Trade which had ruined so many of the industrial population of the country. He believed that the operative and industrial classes were as deeply interested as the agriculturist in the success of the attempt to provide labour for the people of this country, and not for those of other countries. (Hear, hear.)

The Secretary read the report, in which the proceedings of the association since its commencement were detailed; the necessity for combination as a strong protectionists to resist the progress of Free-Trade measures, and force their promoters to retrace their steps, was insisted on, and the duty of contributing to the funds of the association was strongly urged. The report concluded by describing the prospects of the Protectionist party as being most promising, and those of the Anti-Corn-Law party as being in a state of rapid decadence.

The Earl of Malmesbury moved the first resolution:—

That the report be received and adopted; that the offers of his Grace the Duke of Richmond, to preside, and of the seats and use of the rooms granted by the various proprietors, be thankfully accepted; and that the provisional committee already organised be selected to continue their services as the general committee of the association, with power to add to their number.

Major Beresford, in seconding the resolution, briefly explained the objects of the association, which he hoped the meeting was by no means selfish or grasping league, but merely a defensive co-operation to protect the fruits of industry, and to ward off evils which had been proved, not by theory, but experience. (Hear, hear.)

The resolution was unanimously adopted

The Marquis of Downshire proposed the second resolution, which was as follows:—

That the agric ulturists of England, and the labourers they employ, are at this moment involved in the greatest difficulty and distress, while in Ireland the condition of the population is perilous in the extreme; that the prosperity of the whole of England by the sudden and extensive admission of foreign produce, which has also greatly aggravated the misery and distress of Ireland, and that unless just protection be afforded against the competition of countries comparatively untaxed, the ruin of the present race of English farmers, and the destruction of the agricultural classes, are inevitable, nor will it be possible that Ireland can be recovered from her present deplorable condition.

He assured the meeting that he would not have intruded himself upon the attention of the meeting were it not that he had a large property at stake in Ireland, as well as a considerable quantity of land in a certain quarter of this country; and, recollecting his duties as a landlord, he would be ashamed of himself, as utterly unmindful of the interests of his tenants, if he did not publicly stand forward to identify himself with the present movement, and in emphatic tones cry, "No more Free-Trade!" (Cheers.) He congratulated them on the fact of being presided over by the Duke of Richmond, because he was an honest and straight-minded man; and his presence there was a guarantee that he intended to fight their battle in the House of Lords with persevering consistency—not saying "Aye" one day, and "No" the next. (Hear, hear.) That noble Duke had not partaken of the infernal mess of lies—both with the last Whig and Tory Ministry administered to so many; and he was happy that he (the Marquis of Downshire), for himself, and he, joined in the mess, and never would join in it. (Cheers and laughter.)

Mr. E. Iman, a farmer in the county of Sussex, seconded the resolution, which was carried.

The Chairman next introduced Sir Allan M'Nab to the meeting, as a gentleman who, when it was attempted to create a revolution in Canada, risked his life for the preservation of peace and good order

Sir A. M'Nab said that he could not boast of being an Englishman or a Scotchman, but he was the son of an old Scotch soldier, and was born in Canada, one of the most valuable colonies her Majesty possessed. That colony was six times as large as England and Wales, and, being originally founded by British subjects who had preserved their allegiance, the desire to remain under the protection of the British flag remained strong; and he could state that there was no more loyal population than that of Upper Canada (Hear, hear.) No portion of the British empire was more prosperous than Upper Canada previous to the Free-Trade system which they had been forced to adopt by the mother country (Hear, hear.) He had said it was six times as large as England and Wales, and, if properly treated, might be made a safe and advantageous receptacle for the surplus population of this country. There was no finer wheat-growing country than that tracts which lay between the three lakes—Erie, Huron, and Ontario; but, in consequence of the abolition of the protective duties by this country, without corresponding retaliation on the part of America towards the colony, the market for wheat had been destroyed. He concluded by moving the following resolution:—

That the adoption of the principles of Free-Trade to British colonial policy has produced the most disastrous effects in colonial interests, ranking in the West Indies the proprietors of estates, which has stimulated the slave-trade, and impressed an increase in the trade with America on other existing discussion, which, pressed into disaffection, may endanger the connexion with the mother country.—Carried.

On the motion of Mr. G. F. Young, the fourth resolution, which was as follows, was agreed to

That the shipping interest, together with many important branches of British commerce and manufacturing, are in a state of extreme depression, which can only be relieved, and prosperity be permanently restored, by a return to the principles of protection to British industry and capital; and that the meeting deeply regrets that, during the principles of Free-Trade her Majesty's Government have succeeded in forcing through Parliament, contrary to the unanimous wishes of the people, the Bill for the repeal of the Navigation Laws, and that, in the sweeping extension of those principles to navigation, British maritime commerce will be severely injured, and the national defences be seriously endangered.

Mr. E. Barthalli, of Cheapside, moved, and Mr. Appling, of Spitalfields, who stated that he was an operative, seconded the following resolution, which was unanimously carried:—

That the general adoption of the principles of Free-Trade must lower wages and depress the labouring classes of this country to the level of the lowest class in competing countries.

Mr. Bonwell proposed the ninth resolution, which was as follows:—

That, from the peculiar circumstances attending the last general election, and the strong reaction since produced by disappointed expectation on the public mind, the present House of Commons does not, in supporting the various policy of Free-Trade, faithfully represent the sentiments of the people; and that, considering the urgent necessity for a change of system—for the preservation of all the best interests of the country—this meeting pledges itself to all constitutional means to achieve the object, praying that her Majesty will be pleased to dissolve the present Parliament and appeal to her people.

Mr. Ball having seconded it, it also passed unanimously.

Thanks were then voted to the noble President, and the meeting separated about six o'clock.

THE SCOTTISH SOCIETY OF LONDON.

IN our Journal of last week we briefly chronicled this fête to the conclusion of the proceedings on Thursday night. Throughout the day the stands were densely crowded with a highly fashionable and respectable company, and the whole space beyond the inclosure reserved for the celebration of the games was filled with visitors. The general character of the games was, as usual, as per bill, that which was presented on the previous day, and which we described last week; but the effect was greatly heightened by the increased numbers present, by the fine weather, and by the additional interest imparted by the patronage and presence of Royalty; and last, but not least, by the unexpected, yet welcome appearance of his Grace the Duke of Wellington in the grounds of Holland House.

As the intention of her Majesty to visit the fête became known, a hundred of fresh visitors poured in, and before the time the Royal party were expected to appear, there could not have been less than from 7000 to 8000 persons present.

The programme previously known did not give a slightly clue, so as to afford her Majesty an opportunity of witnessing the games which were most likely to attract her attention; and preparations were made for rendering her reception as striking as possible. On a raised platform, in front of the Grand Stand, were placed the pipers entered as competitors. The way thence to the entrance to the grounds was lined with Highlanders. The large body of archers waited outside to receive her Majesty, and formed a kind of crescent in the open space; and in the meantime all the present company took the position where they could most appropriately and effectively welcome the Royal party. Just as these arrangements had been completed, a signal was given that the illustrious visitors were approaching, and the vast assemblage, rising spontaneously, prepared to greet them in loyal and most hearty welcome. Unfortunately, however, the Queen's arrival was beginning to subside, the outriders of the Royal cortège, in their scarlet liveries, appeared upon the ground, and immediately afterwards her Majesty drove, in an open carriage, right into the centre of the space enclosed for the games. The carriage, which was also occupied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert and three of the Royal children, drew up immediately in front of the Grand Stand; and there, after sufficient time had been allowed for the expression of a loyal welcome, the horses were unharnessed, and the games proceeded

As on the previous day, the proceedings commenced with archery, varied and enlivened by the performances of the military bands and the pipers in attendance. This was succeeded by a match not included in the programme, but got up by the judges, for the throwing of the light hammer. This hammer ought to have been 16lb weight, but was, in fact, considerably heavier; for it was thrown a distance of 86ft. 6in. by Sandy M'Hardy, who won the first prize, and of 80ft. 2in. by Colin Macdonald Cranachan, who won the second.

Dancing and pipe music succeeded the hammer, and gave the greatest delight to the body of spectators present. The reel is a wild and striking performance—full of animation, of rapid movement, of violent though not ungraceful exercise, and in which the hands, the fingers, and the voice take part equally with the feet. The dancing was of a very superior kind, the best performers only appearing, and the applause of the spectators encouraging them to put forth their best efforts.

The next game was the final contention in the putting of a stone, 21lb. weight. Prizes were awarded as follow:—

1. Alexander M'Hardy .. .. 34 feet 5 inches.
2. Thomas Menzies .. .. 33 feet 10 inches.

Both successful competitors distinguished themselves greatly in this game; and the great distance to which they put the stone, and the clean, admirable manner in which it was put, excited general praise.

After the arrival of her Majesty, the proceedings were reopened with dancing, in which those who had won the prizes took part, and with which her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Royal children seemed to be highly delighted. This was succeeded by the final contention for prizes in the throwing of the heavy hammer.

At the close of this game broad-sword playing and stick practice commenced, and was carried on with the same spirit and skill as on the previous day.

Besides the sword play and stick practice, an interesting exhibition of strength was made by Professor Bushman, who, with a sweep of his sword, cleft in two an immense thick bar of lead, and by a different, though not less expert, use of his weapon, cut right through a thin handkerchief resting upon its edge.

After the sword-playing came the "tossing of the caber."

Her Majesty remained more than two hours upon the ground, and her departure took place amidst manifestations of affection and loyalty still more enthusiastic and striking than those which greeted her arrival.

A banquet was then given in a pavilion erected on the grounds, at which Lord Drumlanrig, as vice-president of the society, in the unavoidable absence of the Marquis of Breadalbane, filled the chair. In discharging the duties which thus devolved upon him, his Lordship was ably supported by the Right Hon. Fox Maule, the Chisholm, and other gentlemen well known for their high national spirit, and the interest which they take in everything connected with Scotland. The Chisholm, especially, was most happy in giving the right tone and character to the proceedings of the society. He announced the list of prizes, which was given last week.

The Chisholm also announced that Colin M'Donald Cranachan had won the largest number of prizes given at the fête, and was therefore entitled to an extra prize on that account.

The Chairman likewise stated during the evening that her Majesty and Prince Albert had subscribed £50 to the society, and that Lord Holland had consented to allow the use of his park at the repetition of the national games next year.

In our report of last week, the name of the winner of the first prize (for archery), instead of "Mr. Peter Moore," ought to have been Mr Arthur Pension Moore. As the defeat, on this grand and public occasion, of fifty competitors—many of whom are well known as the most renowned archers in Great Britain—is an achievement highly honourable to the victorious party, it is only just to the latter that his name should be correctly given. The winner is also reported to have belonged to the "English Archers, London." This is also a mistake; he being a member of the West Norfolk Bowmen.

ASSAULT OF ARMS AT WILLIS'S ROOMS.

On Saturday, a very interesting performance of this kind took place at Willis's Rooms, under the patronage of Colonel John Hall and the officers of the 1st Regiment of Life Guards. There was a large and highly-respectable attendance of visitors present, who appeared to take a warm interest in the proceedings. The exhibition comprised swordsmanship, stick-play, sparring, and other amusements, and was commenced by Messrs. Arnold and Sherry taking the foils. They were followed by Messrs. Bushman, jun., and Jackson, Sergeant Tuohy and Mr. A. Sherry, Sergeant Collins and Mr. Winterbottom, each pair of whom showed surprising mastery of their weapons, and the due combination of elegance with dexterity. This part of the performance was succeeded by a sabre encounter between Mr. Bushman and Sergeant Tuohy, in which the latter, notwithstanding his marvellous rapidity and audacity of manner, was obliged to succumb to the calm and well-directed skill of the former. A still more attractive exhibition was the opposition of the bayonet to the sword, for the purpose of testing which is the most effective weapon. The musket, with spring bayonet attached, was wielded by Sergeant Tuohy in the first instance, Mr. Bushman taking the sword. After a time, the former getting rather the worst of it, the different weapons were changed; and in the hands of Mr. Bushman, the victory, which seemed at first to rest in favour of the sword, was eventually decided for the bayonet.

Nothing could be more satisfactory than the proof which Saturday's exhibition supplied, that in resolute hands the bayonet is one of the most effective of all our weapons of war. After this part of the performances had terminated, Mr. Bushman performed the feat of cutting through a large leg of mutton with one sweep of the sabre. He also severed a thin handkerchief, previously placed on his sword's edge; and handed round the large bar of lead which he had cut in two, two days previously, before her Majesty, in Holland Park. After some clever stick play, young Keene, the well-known pugilist, put on the gloves with Mr. Arnold, the bénéficiaire, and some sparring commenced, which excited a very lively interest—in none more so, judging by appearances, than in Sir Robert Peel, who, with two of his sons, was present.

Our Illustrations show the Sword and Bayonet contest; and the successful attack upon the leg of mutton.

"MRS. PEPYS'S NEW GOWN."

IN our notice of the Exhibition of the Society of British Artists, (page 230 of the present volume,) we pointed to this picture as a successful contribution to the Suffolk-street Gallery, by Mr. Noble, a non-member of the Society. The subject is a pretty little interior, painted from one of those curious entries in Pepys's "Diary," which give so many striking traits of the life and manners of the period. This is, indeed, purely a matter of fashion, the passage running—"My wife this day put on first her French gown, called a sac, which becomes her very well." As we said before, the portraits of Pepys and his wife are the least successful portion of the picture; but, what is important, "the composition is good, while the details, in point of selection and execution, show an eye attentive to the niceties of the art." This is an interesting picture, of a class lately become very popular.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

THE continued performances of Mr. Marston's new tragic play of "Strathmore," has induced us to illustrate one of its most impressive scenes—the last, in which Strathmore (Mr. C. Kean), having refused to sign the confession, and abjure his righteous cause, reasons with Katharine (Mrs. C. Kean):—

Strathmore. You shall decide (she kneels by his side); two paths before me lie
The one, through death, to honour——
Katharine. Halbert!
Strathmore. Nay,
There are but two! First, say we chose the nobler.
Then will thou think of Strathmore as of one
Who, by his last act, fitly seal'd a life
His world bequeath thee spotless.
Katharine. Ah, beyond!
And I shall never see thee more!
Strathmore. Yes, Katharine! (pointing upwards.)
Katharine. The other path?
Strathmore. It leads to life, through shame!
Would'st have me take it?—live to own no bond
But with dishonour; feel remorse consume
My hope, in ashes; when I hear the tale
Of heroes, vainly groan—such case I was!
And, when the cowards shudder—such I am!
Katharine. This gloom will melt in a bright future.
Strathmore. No!
He has no future who betrays his past!
Katharine. Still live! ——
Strathmore. To give the lie
To my true youth; shrink, when thy straining breast
Throbs to a traitor's; read in those dear eyes
The Temptress, not the wife!—All springs of joy
Reflecting my own brand, the ailment
Of every blasting poison'd, age's frost
Numbing the pang it cures not—to crawl down
The steep of time, and to the grave—that last
Dark shelter for disgrace—bear's dead heart.
Katharine. Cease! cease!
Strathmore (raving). Speak, shall I sign?
Katharine (starting to her feet). NO DIE!
Strathmore (embracing her). My wife! my Katharine! We are one for ever.
Katharine. Teach fate that truth, that we may die together.
Strathmore. Fount of my peace! My own!
Katharine. I am at rest.
How is't with thee?
Strathmore. Sweet, sharp care has mined
The bulwarks of my life, and thy great sea
Of love doth overflow it!

Enter HENRY LOHR, SIR RUPERT, and ISABEL.

Henry. Where's the confession? Dalzell comes: your judge!
Katharine. Help, Henry!
Henry. Strathmore! [Supporting him.
Katharine. You are come too late!
Strathmore. No, love is ne'er too late. Harry! Old playmate!——
Is that Sir Rupert!
Henry. Speak to him!
Sir Rupert. A nag it
Deepens upon his face. Halbert, this hour
Blots all our rancours, and I but behold
Thy father in thee!
Strathmore. We're at peace—all, all!
I pray you to deal gently with my brethren.
Isabel. Lean on my bosom, sister!
Katharine. No; 'tis well!
Strathmore. Where art thou, Katharine? [She places her hand in his.
So—I turn my life
To the bright East, where all its beauty rose,
And sleep beneath its beam—we do not part!
(He falls back into HENRY'S arms, and dies.
Katharine (after a pause). I am his now—I am his own in death!
(She sinks on her knees before the body solemn music.)
CURTAIN FALLS.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

Two performances have created the greatest sensation during the last two weeks; the one was the new and picturesque ballet, in which has at last been realised all that is required of such an entertainment. The first desideratum in this respect, of our day, appears to be curiuess. We pampered Sybarites of the nineteenth century require the condensed quintessence in choreography as we do in perfume. "La prima Ballerina," combining with piquant plot and spiritad score pictor.al illusion, dances of every kind, from the solo of the fascinating Rosati, and the national "Brigantum" of Petit and Charles, up to the most numerous pas d'ensemble, lasts but forty minutes. The attention is always agreeably kept on the stretch; "curiosity is on tip-toe" to know what is to follow; and the whole is finished without the ear or the eye being tired.

The more important affair has been the production of "Lucresia Borgia," as it has never been presented before. In this magnificent opera, passages of melody and of dramatic action of the greatest beauty and effect are distributed to an extraordinary number of separate and secondary dramatic characters. These, always assigned to third-rate singers, have made this opera incomplete wherever it has been given. At Her Majesty's Theatre, on the present occasion, the distinguished singers, Coletti, Beletti, Bordas, F. Lablache, and Bartolini, from zeal for the establishment, have each taken a part. The result is magnificent. The second scene of the opera, in which each of the characters in turn hurls his execrations at Lucrezia Borgia, is fraught with the highest spirit of the lyrical drama. But on this effect so often repeated in the course of the opera—Leither on Alboni, who is nightly made to repeat three times "Il segreto," and has introduced a cadenza the most marvellously original its success does not depend. The great tenor, Moriani, who, when he last appeared in England was in such declining health, that, in spite of his success, it was clear he had not half his powers then under his command, has now reappeared "like a giant refreshed." The astonishment and enthusiasm of the old frequenters can scarce be described. Supported by Parodi, who has here found a part so well suited to her great dramatic genius, and by Lablache, the most magnificent of all Alfonsos, this rentrée of Moriani has proved one of the most signal triumphs on record.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA

Cimarosa's "Matrimonio Segreto" was performed for the second time on Saturday last, and went off with the greate t spirit, the trio between Grisi, Persiani and Angri, "Le faccio," being eminently acted. On Tuesday night was the fourth and last performance of Mozart's "Don Giovanni." On Thursday, for the extra night, Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" was given for the seventh time; and such was its attraction that the opera will be repeated to-night (Saturday). Next Tuesday will be an interesting night in operatic annals, being the last appearance on the stage of the gifted vocalist, Madame Persiani, the queen of the school of florid vocalisation. Signor Mario's benefit is announced for next Thursday. Rossini's opera of "La Donna del Lago" will be revived for the occasion; Mr Sims Reeves appearing, for the first time, as Rodorick Dhu, and Mdlle. Angri as Malcolm; Grisi, Lavia, Marini, and Mario being included in the cast, and Salvi, Tagliafico, Massol, Polonini, and Tamburini joining in the "Chorus of Bards."

Her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the performance with their presence on Thursday night.

MUSIC.

CONCERTS.

The eighth and last Philharmonic Concert of the season took place on Monday, at the Hanover Rooms. The scheme opened with Mozart's lovely symphony in E flat, No. 5, op. 58, the Minuet in which was rapturously encored. Pischek then sang the air, "It is enough, O Lord," from Mendelssohn's "Elijah," with earnestness. The trio in E flat of Mozart, for pianoforte, clarionet, and tenor, so familiar to amateurs, was next in rotation; and so admirable was its execution, by Lindsay Sloper, Williams, and Hill, that the amateurs forgot entirely that such works are ordinarily only calculated for chamber practice. Madame Persiani gave the cavatina from the "Sonnambula," "Come per me sereno," and the first part terminated with Mendelssohn's overture, "Ruy Blas," which was executed with such fire by the band, that its repetition was instantaneously demanded with acclamations. It is a highly dramatic composition, replete with graceful episodes, displaying the incessant restlessness so peculiar to the composer. The second part opened with Beethoven's C minor, marvellously rendered, as may be conceived. Pischek gave a scena from Hérold's "Zampa" vigorously but coarsely. A dull violoncello concerto, by Kraft, followed, enabling Mr. Hancock to show off his dexterity as an executant, but the concerto might have gained in favour with more tone and a more refined style. Mdme. Persiani's "Una voce" was brilliantly vocal sed; and Weber's Jubilee overture, in which the National Anthem was interwoven, played out the sub-critters for the season. The Philharmonic Society this season has maintained its fame by the execution of symphonies and overtures; but we cannot praise the taste and discretion exercised in the selection of solo players and singers. It is a mistake in the policy of the directors to present, year after year, the same executants, as if they were entitled to the distinction from prescriptive right, and there have been too many great artistes excluded if it were from the programme to have called forth a strong expression of opon on that there has been too much favouritism. The Philharmonic Society should preserve a standard of art, and the directors are as much bound to resist the inordinate pretensions of native talent as to disc arge the inroads of foreign mediocrities; but celebrated artistes of undeniable pre-eminence, whether native or foreign, ought to have a hearing; and it is not fair that the directors in their management should more only in a circle of the narrowest kind

LAST SCENE OF THE NEW TRAGIC PLAY OF "STRATHMORE," AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE.

THE MUSICAL UNION.—The Directors' matinée, on Tuesday, was full and fashionably attended, a compliment justly earned by Mr. Ella, who has been indefatigable in promoting the legal sociality of art. There was a great combination of executive talent, including Ernst, Sainton, Jaell, Goffrie, Piatti, Pratti, Sottesini, and M. Meyerbeer Fontain. The Hungarian vocalists and Madle. Grummann sang vocal pieces.

The season of the London Wednesday Concerts terminated on the 27th inst., with the 57th of the series. Mr. Stanmers, the acting director, with great tact, yielding to the representations of criticism, to raise the character of the programmes, produced Mendelssohn's "Antigone," and it was, on the whole, a very [illegible] in this country. Mr. Bartholomew's translation (1) [illegible] Sophocles' play, with some curtailments, was recited by Miss Vandenhoff, Antigone; Miss Huddart, Ismene; Mr. Vandenhoff, Creon; Mr Stuart, Tiresias; Mr. Lloyd, Hæmon; Mr. Smithson, Chorus Speaker; and Mr. G. Bennett, the Sentinel. Even without scenic accessories, so impressively was the poetry delivered, that many portions, particularly the scene between Creon and Hæmon, and Antigone and Creon, created a marked sensation. The question was conducted Antigone," and it was, on the whole, a very [illegible] and the "Hymn to Bacchus" was encored. Singers of a first-rate class ought to have been selected for the quartet "O Eros." There was a miscellaneous selection for the second part of the concert, in which Madle. Jetty de Treffz, Miss Lucombe, Mrs A. Newton, Herr Paschek, Herr Formes, Messrs. Reeves, Williams, and Binge sang, and Mrs Ellen Day and Mr. John Day played on the pianoforte and violin.

Dreyschock, the celebrated pianist, gave a matinée on Wednesday, at the Hanover-square Rooms, and performed five times with the greatest success, commencing with a sonata of Beethoven. He also played a concerto of his own, first book of Mendelssohn's Songs without Words, besides several of his own compositions. The marvellous dexterity of this artist is the result of power with the left hand, his mastery of octaves and arpeggios, quite electrified the amateurs. It is impossible to conceive that manual dexterity can be further carried: he has gone infinitely beyond every rival, and Thalberg is no longer unique. He was rapturously encored in his Fugue, and he was also called noon to repeat the "Rhapsodie;" but such a terrific call on his powers it was impossible to give twice. The vocalists were Madle Jetty Treffz and Hollis, Agnes Bibbing (the latter an accomplished pupil of Manuel Garcia), Herr Stigelli and Paschek. Treffz sang a graceful air, "La Veneziana," composed for her by Herr Panofka. The latest of this concert was centred in Dreyschock's performances.

MADAME SONTAG.—We have the pleasure of announcing that Mr. Lumley, who has just returned from Berlin, has definitively settled the engagement of Madame Sontag, who will henceforth only appear at Her Majesty's Theatre, the scene of her former triumphs. This celebrated lady, whose theatrical career was as brief as it was brilliant, retired from the stage on her marriage with a nobleman of the Prussian court, and has long been in the service of his Sovereign. For some years she happily enjoyed her privileged position, amidst universal respect, and with marks of more than ord nary consideration from the Sovereign, Princely Lords, the personages who formed her habitual circle at the different courts she visited. Unfortunately, the amiable and gifted lady and her husband have the whole of their property invested in the recent convulsions of the Continent: and, to secure the future welfare of her family, she is compelled to return to the stage. Music having ever been with her a ruling taste at the dividend hour of Berlin, where she has resided for many years, and of which she was one of the principal ornaments, she has constantly cultivated her remarkable natural gifts of voice. Thus, by deep study, and without necessity of overtaxing exertion, she is said to have added to her former power and beauty of tone still greater delicacy in expressing every shade of vocal and dramatic sentiment

MUSICAL EVENING.—M. Hanssens, the chef d'orchestre of the St. James's Theatre, will take a benefit the morning.—The concert of Ernst, the violinist, and Hallé, the pianist, will be given on Monday, at the Hanover Rooms

Mr. John Parry will open his entertainment, called an "Hour with Rooms.—On Friday next (the 6th of July) will be given the fourth and last Grand Morning Concert of the season at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent-garden. The celebration "Chorus of Handmaidens" "Mayerbeer's "Huguenots," the "Prayer," without accompaniment, from "Mas-aniello," and the marvellous Dervises' chorus from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," will be sung; and the orchestra, conducted by Costa, will perform the Overture of Beethoven, the "Oberon" of Weber, and the "Anacreon" of Cherubini. Koutski (the violinist), Demmick (the violoncellist), and Messrs. Osborne and Lindsay Sloper (the pianists), will perform solos. Angri, Dorus Gras, Meric, Miss Catherine Hayes, Madle. Corbari, and Madame Persiani, Marie, Salvi, and Sims Reeves, Mel. Lazzi, and Soldi, Tamburini, Tagliafico, Polonini, Marini, and Massol, will be the singers.——The opera of the "Prophète" has been represented twenty-two times in Paris, despite of the cholera and of political anxieties, and still produces large receipts. Next month, Madame Viardot-Garcia will visit London, departs for London, to play her original part of Fides at the Royal Italian Opera, where the opera has been in active rehearsal for some days, and will be produced early in July. It is to appear with Duprez, the false Prophet; Marini, Mei, and Polonini will be the three Anabaptist Chiefs; Tagliafico, Count d'Oberthal; and Miss Catherine Hayes will be Bertha. The principal singers of the company will assist in the concerted pieces.

COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS' INSTITUTION.—On Tuesday afternoon, the annual examination of the children of the excellent institution, which was established in 1849, for the purpose of clothing, educating, and maintaining the orphan and necessitous children of commercial travellers, was held at the London Tavern; J. Masterman, Esq., M.P., presided. The numbers were the children acquitted themselves at the examination elicited the enthusiastic applause of a most numerous auditory. The subjects selected embraced all those branches of secular and religious instruction which are requisite for an enlightened education, and the answering of the children showed that they perfectly comprehended the various elementary departments of knowledge in which they were examined. In the evening the governors entertained the children to tea. From the report of the committee, it appeared that the first election of children took place in 1847, and that there were at present in the establishment, which is situated at Wanstead, 87 inmates; that the advantages of the institution were not limited to [illegible] but included Ireland; and that in imparting information, all sectarianism was obviously excluded.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW.—On Monday evening, an adjourned meeting of this society took place at the rooms, 21, Regent-street, Lord Brougham presided. The discussion on the propriety of appointing authorised reporters for each of the superior courts of law and equity, was adjourned to the first meeting of the society which shall be held subsequent to the Long Vacation.—Mr. C. Pearson, the honorary secretary of the meeting in elucidation of suggestions in regard to an improved system of prison discipline, which had been extensively distributed among the members of the society. He stated that he was not his province to enter into any formal speculation on the subject, but merely to ask the meeting to consent to refer the matter to a committee of the society, which should have power to report on it on a future occasion to the general body. The chief object of law, he observed, was the protection of the honest part on of the community from the encroachments of the dishonest. and he contended that it was the duty of the Legislature to see that that protection was effected in the most economical manner. He was prepared to prove, in the clearest manner, the following propositions:—That, for the purpose of more economically and effectually punishing, deterring, and reforming criminals, it is expedient to vary the punishment in proportion to their crimes, instead of time sentences and to render the duration of their imprisonment, and the quantity of their labour, to be regulated upon their conduct in gaol, and upon the amount of their labour, having regard to their age, sex, and strength. That, by a judicious application of this system, any number of prisoners, of the average age, health, and strength of the criminal class, may be made to produce food and clothes sufficient for themselves and the officers of the establishment, by labour on land, and will be rendered more willing and able to maintain themselves by honest industry when they are restored to a state of freedom. He was prepared to show that if 1000 persons were placed in a prison conducted on this system, and having 1000 acres of land attached to it, which should be purchased at the highest value of agricultural land, it could be carried out at a cost of £110 a prisoner, while in [illegible] prisons at present, evil and Reading, with all their acknowledged inefficiency, the cost was from £220 to £300 a prisoner. No system of law reform, by which 40 per cent for the uprooting of habits of idleness, and the cultivation of habits of industry and moral habits, could not be produced in prisons where criminals were super saturated with idleness, as in the separate system. The same motives which enabled men to advance themselves in society should be assigned to the prisoner; and the quantity and quality of his food, and the duration of his imprisonment, should be made to depend on the amount of work done by him; and such a process of information should be commenced in prison with respect to his character as would fit him for co-operating with society on his return to it. He concluded by proposing that his suggestions be referred to a committee of the society for consideration.—Mr. Hill seconded the motion, and Lord Brougham in putting it from the chair, said that he would give a formal notice in his place in the House of Lords of his intention to bring the whole question of prison discipline before the House on some given convenient day, nd he would then press on the attention of the Legislature the views and forward by Mr Pearson. The motion was then carried unanimously, and the meeting adjourned.

RUGBY SCHOOL.—Mr. E. Parry, son of Captain Sir Edward Parry, head boy of the school, and who last year obtained the Queen's Medal for the Historical Essay, has just gained the prize for the Latin Essay

EIGHT MEN KILLED AT ROXBURGH.—On Wednesday week a frightful accident occurred at the railway-bridge now building at Roxburgh, over the Tevi-ot, on the line of the Kelso and [illegible] Boswell's branch of the Edinburgh and Hawick Railway. The bridge consists of a number of stone piers, all of which are up to the intended height, and the arches are in course of formation. The abutm nt on the north side of the river, and the second pier from it rest on each side of a very deep quarry, from which the stones for building the bridge have been worked (this part of the structure not being in the river); and between these there was an intermediate pier, over which, at the time of the accident, rested one of the large heavy travelling cranes used in lifting blocks of stone and other weights, the crane however, as we understand, did not rest upon the pier, but rested upon a self-supporting service-way. Between five and six o'clock eight men were on the crane, engaged in the work of springing the two arches, and a number of others were working in the quarry beneath, a depth of eighty feet. Suddenly and when, without giving any warning, the pier in question gave way with a sudden crash, precipitating the eight men, the mortin and part of the arches, and the wooden framework underneath, into the abyss below, and burying those employed there in the ruins. Surgical assistance was promptly sent for, and the dead, as they were taken from the ruins, and survivors who were in a state to be removed, were, after being attended to, conveyed to their homes. Several of the unfortunate men were shockingly mutilated. The two eight who were either killed on the spot, or who died soon after being taken out.

ELIZABETH WOODCOCK.—At the village of Impington, near Cambridge, where Mrs. Woodcock, fifty years since, was miraculously recovered from a snow-drift, wherein she had remained eight days, a jubilee has just been held, to commemorate the setting up of a memorial in place of the stone reared just after the above event. On Tuesday week, a large barn was tastefully decorated with roses and other flowers and evergreens, in the midst of which was a portrait of Elizabeth Woodcock, a wreath of which flowers repeating the same. In this barn refreshments were served to 120 of the villagers; dancing was kept up till about eleven o'clock, when the parish-clerk, William Muncey, who found Mrs. Woodcock in the snow, recited the circumstances to the company She narrator was then carried round the barn; and dancing being resumed, was kept up till three o'clock, when the party separated, highly delighted with the village festival, which it is hoped will be annually celebrate annually. The new monument consists of a neat stone column and pedestal, 7 feet 4 inches high, the latter bearing suitable inscriptions; it is placed in a field near the Histon railway station. The cost has been defrayed by public subscription COLLIERY EXPLOSION IN SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE.—A serious explosion from fire damp occurred at half-past seven o'clock on Tuesday morning, in a pit belonging to Mr. G. Morris, of Moor Lane, near Dudley. The colliers, sixty-eight in number, on entering the pit an hour before, were accompanied by Thomas Pritchards, the "doggy," who had the safety-lamp, and is said to have made use of it. The explosion was heard by the neighbourhood, and in a short time several thousands of persons were assembled, and exertions were made as speedily as possible to rescue the wretched people. Before eleven o'clock eight of them were brought up dead and 34 living, of which last number many were dreadfully injured. Six boys were still in the pit, of whom deaths no doubt was entertained. Seven horses were in the pit at the time, two of which have been brought up alive. The pit had not been worked since Saturday last. The unfortunate "doggy" is amongst those deprived of life, and as yet the immediate cause of the calamity is unknown.

THE NECESSITY FOR HOLDING CORONIAL INQUESTS IN CASES OF CHOLERA.—Mr. B [illegible]rd, coroner for Westminster [illegible] and city and metropolitan coroners, have received copies of a correspondence from the General Board of Health on the subject of holding inquests in cases of cholera. It appears that the Rev. G. R. Harding, of the Keynsham Union, has refused to bury five persons who have died from cholera until an inquest has been held, and in consequence the clerk to the board of guardians addressed to the General Board of Health a letter, in which the circumstances are represented. The secretary to the Board of Health, Mr. Chadwick, in reply, says that the question law the occurrences of mortal disease through causes known to be within the control, and therefore preventible, is a case to which [illegible] punishment by [illegible] may attach, and therefore a legitimate subject [illegible]

THE CHOLERA IN DUBLIN

[illegible]ficial returns are as follows in the South Dublin Union district:—

BRUNSWICK STREET HOSPITAL.—In hospital at last report, 20, admitted since, [illegible]; total, 66. Of these have died, 23; discharged cured, 18; remaining in hospital [illegible]. Total number admitted since opening, 354, discharged cured, 191; died, 135; remaining in hospital, 28.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The continued accumulation of capital, from a deficiency of demand in other quarters, has again improved the value of money. Funds this week. Consols on Monday held firmly the advance of the previous Saturday; and on Tuesday, upon the receipt of the Liquidation and the insurrection in Baden was suppressed, and the evacuation of Alessandria by the Austrians effected, Consols advanced from 91¼ to 91¾ 92 x d. This was followed by another advance of ¼ per cent. on Wednesday; and on Thursday they closed at from ¾ to ⅞. Exchequer Bills quote an improvement of about ½. India Bonds remain at previous rates. A slight reaction in Consols occurred towards the close of business, the following being the last quotations:—Consols for Account, 91¾; Reduced Annuities, 91¾; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent. Annuities, 99⅝. Long Annuities, to expire January, 1860, 8 11-16; Ditto, Thirty Years, October 10, 1859, 8¾; India Stock, 259 to 260; Ditto, Bonds for Account, 92¾; Exchequer Bills, £1,000, June, 46 p; £500, June, 46 p.

The Foreign funds have been firmer during the week, prices in some instances showing an advance. Spanish Three per Cents have been done at 21¾. Three per Cents to 24¾, the latter again improving on Wednesday to 24¾, when the above sales seem to be maintained. Portuguese Four per Cents have also advanced from Monday's quotation of 30 to 30¼, but have since receded to 29¾. The close of the week's market generally displayed much firmness, as the following quotations will show:—Brazilian Bonds 80½; Ditto, Small, 81½; Ditto, New, 1829 and 1839, 80; Buenos Ayres Bonds, Six per Cents, 42½; Equador Bonds, 3¾; Mexican, Five per Cents, 1846, Ex Coupons, 28; Ditto, Account, 28¼; Peruvian Bonds, Deferred, 14¾; Portuguese, Four per Cents, Account, 28¾; Russian Bonds, 103; Spanish Five per Cents, 1840, 17¾; Ditto, Account, 17¾; Ditto, Three per Cent., 9¾.

Shares have been in request during the week; Eastern Counties, Great Western, and North Western quoting an advance. The Market generally is not, however, much firmer, the low price of Eastern Counties tempting investors being the principal cause of the small rise. The closing values of the shares last dealt in are, for Aberdeen, 18; Birmingham and Oxford Junction (calls duly paid, or with a guarantee), 20¾; Ditto (without guarantee), 23¾; Boston, Stamford, and Birmingham, 44¾; Caledonian, Scrip, 6¾; Chester and Holyhead, Preference, 12¾; Eastern Counties, 8¾; Ditto Extension, 5 per Cent., No. 2, ¼ prem.; Ditto, Northern and Eastern, 6 per Cent. SATURDAY MORNING.—Consols opened buoyantly yesterday, advancing to 92¼ to ⅞. The news by the Continental mail not being, however, regarded favourably, a reaction to 91¾ ex div. afterwards occurred. In the Foreign and Share Market there were no changes of importance.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—During the present week the arrivals of English wheat coastwise for our market have been confined to 1240 quarters shipped from Essex [illegible] Those by land carriage and sample have been small to the extreme. To day the supplies were very scant of supplies, owing to which the demand for all kinds of wheat of home production was firm, at quite a fully equal to the as obtained on Monday, and at which all prices were obtained at an early hour. The imports of foreign wheat have amounted to 4250 quarters. The trade ruled extremely dull, at extreme rates of value. In the middling and inferior sorts of wheat no business was transacted at late rates. For malting barley of fine colour and quality prices were quite as dear. No English barley on sale; the supply of foreign was 5640 quarters, and have been in good supply and heavy trade at barely last week's quotations. To day the malters were not anxious to purchase at extreme currencies; and a samples moved off scarcely. Fine oats, in retail demand; [illegible] corn, beans, and peas are as dear as

NEWCASTLE RACE PLATE.

THIS handsome Prize was run for at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, on Thursday. It consists of a richly-chased candelabrum, with six branches for lights, and a triangular base, composed of three spirited horses, one at each angle; the whole surmounted by a figure of Victory. The height is 31 inches; weight 240 oz.

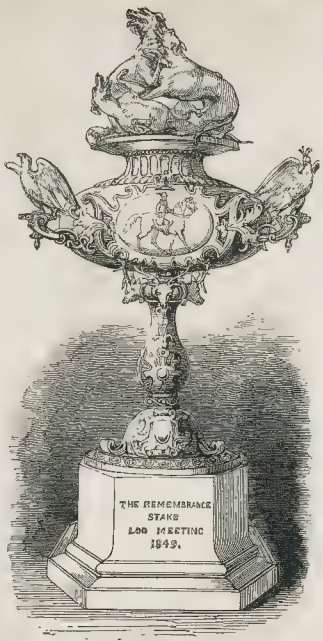
value £150. It has been ably manufactured by Messrs. Redd and Son, silversmiths, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

THE LOO REMEMBRANCE CUP.

THIS beautiful Cup, just run for at the Loo Meeting, in Holland, is of classic form, enriched with ornaments of Elizabethan character and sporting device, two cleverly modelled hawks resting on the handles; the Cup being surmounted by a spirited group of wolf and dogs. The composition is intended to be commemorative of the reception given to the late Prince of the Netherlands at Glentil, Mar Lodge, Dalkeith, and Gordon Castle, during the visit of his Royal Highness to Scotland in the year 1845. It has a legend to that effect on the base.

This Prize was ordered by his Majesty, the present King of the Netherlands, during his late visit to this country. The weight of the Cup is upwards of 200 oz.;



THE LOO REMEMBRANCE CUP.

value £150. It was designed and modelled by Mr. A. Brown, under the superintendence of E. H. Baily, Esq., R.A.; and it has been chastely executed in silver, by Hunt and Roskell, late Storr, Mortimer, and Hunt, 156, New Bond-street.

The King of the Netherlands, during his recent visit to the metropolis, ordered of Messrs. Beale and Co., of New Bond street, some superb hawking scarves, which were manufactured at Spitalfields expressly to his Majesty's taste. They are made of soft rich silk, the design after Landseer, representing a falcon on the stoop, just before pouncing on its prey. The ground of the scarf is black, the falcon bright scarlet; these being the colours of the Hawking Club.

The Hawking Club is highly patronised by his Majesty; several English gentlemen belong to it, and the King is very desirous of increasing the number of its English members. The Duke of Leeds, the Earl of Strathmore, and Mr. W. S. S. Crawford are already members of the Club.

ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB CHALLENGE CUP.

THE members of the Royal Thames Yacht Club are indebted to the good taste of the Right Hon. Lord Alfred Paget for this most pleasing and beautiful work of art. The composition is a group of figures, Neptune and Æolus, with appropriate naval emblems surrounding the base of a column, surmounted by figures of Minerva personifying Wisdom instructing Youth in the science of Navigation. On one side of the column is a beautiful bas-relievo of a sailing match, and the reverse bears the inscription—"The Grand Challenge Cup, presented by the Royal Thames Yacht Club, 1849."

This tasteful work has been designed and modelled by Mr. A. Brown, under the superintendence of E. H. Baily, Esq., R.A., and has been exquisitely manufactured by Hunt and Roskell, late Storr, Mortimer, and Hunt, 156, New Bond-street. The Cup weighs 270 oz.; value £300.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JULY.

THE great heat of the weather only admits of the most diaphanous tissues for morning and evening dress; rich stuffs being replaced by elegant transparent tissues, which can scarcely be manufactured with sufficient rapidity to meet the demand. The promenades and drawing-rooms present an infinity of aërial muslins, gauzes, cashmeres, organdies. Cashmere barèges are quite in vogue; the plain ones are very much worn: the skirts are trimmed with deep flounces; and a wreath of oak-leaves woven in brown silk on the barège itself forms a device of elegant simplicity. Book muslins are equally sought after, and nothing is more becoming for chez soi in the country: especially full loose gowns of organdie, trimmed with lace, over light-coloured slips. Among these flowing muslins we sometimes see dresses of shot-silk; but, however light the shades may be, they are rare. Artificial flowers are worn no longer, but wreaths of natural flowers ornament the hair and corsage. To maintain them fresh all the evening, the flowers are attached to wire, which is arranged in wreaths, bunches, or bouquets: geraniums thus placed are delicious.

Mantles do not vary in form, but their cut has been perfected by a bending at the waist. They are worn in silk of light shades, with two rows of frills. The richest are trimmed with deep black lace, and some are braided. Mantles of embroidered muslin are much less fashionable; and large shawls of black or white lace are infinitely more graceful thrown over a dinner or evening costume than when displayed on a walking dress.

The bonnets are regulated, too, by the temperature. Italian gauzes have almost entirely supplanted straw bonnets; nearly all the drawn bonnets are made with these light gauzes, puffed and trimmed with simple ruches over and under the poke for young people, and little bunches of the lightest feathers for married ladies. The shapes are still open and round: they are very becoming either in forming a frame, as it were, to the hair, dressed in bandeaux, or in enveloping long curls. The bonnet trimmings are very simple, and are placed very low at the side.

Caps are worn so small, and are placed so much on the back of the head, that it is difficult to distinguish them from the head-dress. Thick caps for the morning are more than ever greatly admired; they are usually made of Mechlin lace, old Valenciennes or pillow lace, ornamented with bunches of ribbon à la jardinière instead of ribbon strings, they have lappets placed a little behind the ears.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JULY.

SOMERSET HOUSE.—Mr. P. Cunningham, in his valuable "Hand-book for London," just published, relates: A little above the entrance door to the office of Stamps and Taxes, is a white watch face regarding which the popular belief has been, and is, that it was left there by a labouring man who fell from a scaffold at the top of the building, and was only saved from destruction by the ribbon of his watch, which caught in a piece of projecting work. In thankful remembrance (so the story runs) of his wonderful escape, he afterwards desired that his watch might be placed as near as possible to the spot where his life had been saved. Such is the story told fifty times a week to groups of gaping listeners—a story I am sorry to disturb, for the watch of the labouring man is nothing more than a watch face, placed by the Royal Society as a meridian mark for a portable transit instrument in one of the windows of their ante-rooms. To this account of Somerset House, I may add a little circumstance of interest which I was told by an old clerk on the establishment of the Audit-office. "When I first came to this building," he said, "I was in the habit of seeing, for many mornings, a thin spare naval officer, with only one arm, enter the vestibule at a smart step, and make direct for the Admiralty, over the rough round stones of the quadrangle, instead of taking what others generally took, and continue to take, the smooth pavement of the sides. His thin frail figure shook at every step, and I often wondered why he chose so rough a footway; but I ceased to wonder when I heard that the thin frail officer was no other than Lord Nelson, who always took," continued my informant, "the nearest way to the place he wanted to go to."

BATHING IN THE THAMES.—The impurity of the stream has driven bathers away; yet it was once very different. Lord Northampton, in the reign of Charles I., was taken ill of the colic, of which he died, while washing himself in the Thames, after he had waited on the King at supper, and had supped himself. Blood concealed himself among the reeds at Battersea, in order to shoot King Charles II., while bathing in the Thames over against Chelsea. One of the darling recreations of Sir Dudley North was swimming in the Thames; "he used that so much, that he became quite master of it." The polite Earl of Chesterfield directed a letter to Lord Pembroke (the collector), who was always swimming: "To the Earl of Pembroke, in the Thames, over against Whitehall." "Last week," says Lord Byron, the poet, in a letter dated August 11th, 1807, "I swam in the Thames from Lambeth through the two bridges (Westminster and Blackfriars), a distance—including the different turns and tacks made on the way—of three miles." Cunningham's Hand-book for London.
